Of these doings likewise let the guardians of the laws be the inspectors, in order that either they may not take place at all, or, taking place, meet with condign punishment. Now it is meet for every man to bear in mind touching all men, that⁴ he, who has never been a servant, will never be a master worthy of praise;⁴ and it is requisite to pride oneself rather upon acting properly the slave, than on acting properly the master, first towards the laws, since this is being a servant to the gods; next towards elders and the young persons⁵ who have lived with honour. After this it is meet for the person, who has been one of the Rural-Stewards, to taste during these two years daily food of a humble and poor kind. For, after the twelve magistrates shall have been enrolled,⁶ let them come together with the five and take counsel, that, like domestics, they will not have other persons to be domestics and slaves to them, nor will they from the household of other farmers and villagers use their attendants for their own concerns, but only so far as relates to the public at large; but in other matters let them consider that they are to live, dependent themselves on themselves, and ministering to, and ministered by, themselves; and in addition to this, searching through the whole country, summer and winter, in arms, for the sake of guarding and knowing thoroughly all places, that successively present themselves. For it appears that for all to know accurately

² As nothing has been said of the fine imposed upon young men, this allusion to them seems to be here out of place. Cousin understands by τῶν νέων "les simples games, lesquels sont des jeunes gens de vingt cinq à trente ans."

³ Ficinus has "et," for his MS. probably read περί τε τὰς— not περί τὰς— Ast however says that the conjunction is unnecessary.

⁴ To this sentiment of Plato Cicero alludes, De Legg. ii. 2, 5, "Qui bene imperat, paruerit aliquando necesse est."

their own country is a piece of learning inferior to none. For the sake of which it behoves a person at the period of youth to attend to hunting by dogs and to other kinds of catching wild beasts, no less than for the sake of any other¹ pleasure and profit at the same time, which results through these means to all. ² These very pursuits³ then let every man to the utmost of his power readily pursue, whether a person delights to call them³ concealments, or rural stewardships,³ or by any other name, if they are about to preserve sufficiently their own state.

[10.] After this there follows the subject relating to the election of those acting as rulers, both Market-Stewards, and City-Stewards. Upon the Rural-Stewards, sixty in number, there should follow three City-Stewards, dividing the twelve parts of the city into three; and in imitation of those (the Rural-Stewards) they should have the care of the path-ways, and of the city, and the public roads, that respectively stretch from the country to the city, and of the buildings likewise, so that all of them are made according to law; and moreover of the streams of water, ⁴ which those, who watch them, send to them and deliver, after being attended to,⁴ in order that they may pass on to the fountains, sufficient in quantity and clear, and adorn at once and benefit the city. These too ought to be

persons of influence, and at leisure to pay attention to public affairs. On this account let every man propose as a City-Steward whomsoever he wishes out of those with the largest property. ¹ And when (all) have had hands held up for them, and those are reduced to six,¹ to whom the most (votes)² have been given, let those, who are to have this charge, select by ballot the three, and after they have undergone a scrutiny, let them be in office according to the laws laid down for them. Next in order after these (it is meet) to choose Market-Stewards, five in number, out of those with the valuation of the second and first class; but in other respects let their election be in the same manner as for the City-Stewards. ³ (For it is meet) that ten out of all the rest, having had hands held up for them, should ballot for the five,³ and declare them, after undergoing a scrutiny, to be the persons in power. And let every one hold up his hand ⁴ for ten in all.⁴ But let him, who is unwilling to vote, if informed against before the rulers, be fined fifty drachms, in addition to his being held to be a bad man. And let any one who wishes go to the public assembly and common meeting; and let it be compulsory on him, who belongs to the second and first class of property, to be fined ten drachms, if he • is not present and mustered at the conventions; but it shall not be compulsory on the third and fourth class of property; but let such a person be dismissed without a fine, unless the rulers give an order for all to be present in consequence of some (urgent) necessity.

² The ellipse of ψηφοι is supplied in § 12.

And (it is meet) for the Market-Stewards to preserve the orderly arrangement enjoined by the laws relating to the market-place; and to take care of the temples and fountains in the market-place, so that no one injures them; and to punish the party so injuring with stripes and bonds, if a slave and a stranger; but if a native acts in a disorderly manner with respect to things of this kind, let them be authorized, after a trial, to fix a fine up to one hundred drachms in money, but to fine up to the double of this sum the offending party, if they are sitting in judgment in common with the City-Stewards. Let there be the same power to fine and punish allowed to the City-Stewards in their own department, so as to fine offenders up to a mina themselves, but the double of this sum in conjunction with the Market-Stewards.

[11.] After this it will be proper for the leaders in Music and Gymnastics to be established, two kinds of each; some of them for the sake of instruction, and others for the sake of contesting. Now in the case of instruction, the law relating to Gymnasia and schools means to speak of those, who have the care of orderly arrangement and instruction to boot, and of the attention paid to such matters, and of the frequenting and staying at schools on the part of young persons, both male and female: but in the case of contesting, (it means to speak of) those who assign the prizes to competitors in Gymnastics and Music; and these two are two-fold; one employed on Music, and the other on Gymnastics.¹ Now in the contests of men and horses,² it would be proper for the same persons to assign the prizes; but in those of Music, for some to do so in the case of solo-singing and the imitative art,³ such as the rhapsodists, and all of this kind; but others over chorus-singing and players on the harp and hautboy. First then with regard to the amusement of the choirs of boys and men, and girls (exercised) in dancing, and in the whole order of music, it is surely requisite to elect their leaders. Now one leader, not less than forty years old, will surely suffice for these. One too not less than thirty years old will suffice for solo-singing, and to be the introducer of, and to give a judgment sufficiently upon, the competitors. Now the leader and regulator of the choir it is requisite to choose in some such manner as this. Let those, who have a friendly feeling towards such matters, go to the meeting, subject to a fine if they do not go, and of this let the guardians of the law be the judges; but upon the rest, if they are not willing, let there be nothing compulsory. And let the person, who makes the nomination, select one out of those who are skilful; and in the scrutiny let there be only this one charge and denial, on the part of some, that the person, who has obtained the lot, is unskilled, but on the part of others, that he is skilled; and let the person who, out of ten previously voted for, has obtained singly the lot, be, after undergoing a scrutiny, the leader of the choirs according to the law for one year. In the same manner as these, let him who, out of those that come to a trial, in this way obtains the lot,¹ be the leader for that year of the ³solo-singing, and concert-singing,³ after giving, as the party so obtaining the lot,² to the judges the power to decide. After this it is necessary to choose from the persons belonging to the third and even second class of property, the assigners of prizes in the contest relating to the exercises of horses and men. Now to the election let it be compulsory upon the three classes to go, but let the smallest class be dismissed without a fine; and let there be three who obtain the lot, twenty having previously had hands held up for them, but three of the twenty obtaining the lot, whom the vote of the examiners shall approve of. But if any one is rejected through any balloting or decision whatever of a magistrate, let another be chosen in his stead, and the scrutiny take place in the same manner respecting him.

² To explain this reference to horses, Ast refers to Plutarch in Problem. Sympos. ii. 5, p. 639, E., who says that to the horse alone of all animals there was a participation in a crown and contest; since he alone, both by nature and art, is wont to be present with man and to fight on his side.

[12.] There remains now the ruler relating to what has been mentioned by us before, namely, the party to take care of the whole instruction of females and males. Let the person who is to rule over these be, according to the laws, not less than fifty years old, and the father of children lawfully begotten, males and females especially, but if not, of either sex. And let both him, who selects, and him, who is selected, consider that this office is by far the greatest of the chief offices in the state. For the first budding of every plant, when it runs in a beautiful manner to the excellence of its nature, is the most powerful to put a suitable finish ¹ of other plants,¹ and of animals tame and wild and men. Now man we say is a tame animal; and when he meets with proper instruction and a fortunate nature, is wont to become an animal the most divine and tame; but when he is not sufficiently or not properly brought up, he is the most savage of all the animals, which the earth produces. On which account the legislator ought not to suffer the bringing up of children to be a secondary thing, or as a by-work. ² But it is necessary to begin from the first step, by the person,² who is about to have the care of them, being selected, who is the best in all respects of those in the state; ³ and by the legislator ordering that person to be by all possible means set over³ and to take care of them. Let all the magistrates, therefore, except the Counsellors and Prytanes, go to the temple of Apollo and give, unknown to the guardians of the laws, their votes for him, whom each conceives would rule the best

^{1, 2} As the words ὁ λαχών are repeated in each clause, Ast, whom Stalbaum follows, would reject it here as an interpolation; but the subject ought to be found rather in the first clause than the second. Hence too Orelli suggested ἀποδιδούς ὅλων τὴν κρίσιν— But ὅλων could not stand here without the article τῶν—

³— Ficinus, apparently unable to understand καθιστάντα, has rendered it, as if his MS. read καταστάντα, found in Stobæus; while to avoid the want of connexion likewise, I have translated, as if the Greek were καὶ τοῦτον—καταστάντα αὐτὸν προστάττειν, where τοῦτον would refer to the teacher selected, and αὐτὸν to the lawgiver selecting, and προστάττειν be read with all the MSS. in lieu of προστάτην καὶ—amongst those conversant with education. And let him, for whom the most votes come together, after he has been scrutinized by the other magistrates, who, with the exception of the guardians of the laws, have chosen him, enter upon his office for five years; but in the sixth year, let another be chosen to the office in a similar manner.

[13.] But if any ruler dies while employed in a public situation before the term of office shall have expired, wanting more than thirty days, let those, to whom this duty belongs, appoint another in the same manner to the office. And if any one, who is a guardian to orphans, dies, let the relations on both the father's and mother's side, as far as the cousins, who may at that time be in the country, appoint another within ten days, or let each be fined a drachm a day, until they shall have appointed the guardian¹ for the children.¹

Now every state will surely become no state,² in which courts of justice are not properly established; and on the other hand a voiceless judge, and who, in the preliminary proceedings,³ does not speak more than the litigants, as in the case of arbitrators,⁴ will never be sufficient for the purpose of deciding justly. On this account, it is not easy, when there are either many or few indifferent characters, to have a fair trial. But it is necessary for the matter in dispute to be clearly stated by each party; and time too and the sifting slowly and frequently a question conduce to the rendering a doubtful point clear. On this account it is meet for those, who complain of each other, to betake themselves first to their neighbours and friends, and those the most conversant with the subject of dispute. But if a party is unable to obtain a satisfactory decision from them, let him go to another tribunal; but if those two cannot bring about a reconciliation, let the third put an end to the suit. In

² The oxymoron πόλις ἀπολις is found in Æsch. Eum. 435.

a certain respect, indeed, the establishment of courts of justice depends on the choice of magistrates; for every magistrate is necessarily a judge of certain things; but every judge¹ is not a magistrate, although, in a certain respect, during the day in which he is deciding a suit, he is no mean a magistrate. Considering, then, the judges likewise as magistrates, let us state which of them would be proper, and of what matters they are to be the judges, and how many for each suit. Let then that tribunal be of the highest authority,² which each show forth, themselves to themselves, after having chosen certain persons in common.³ But as regards the rest, let there be two tribunals; one, when a private person accusing another private person of doing him a wrong, shall bring him to trial, and be willing for the suit to be decided; the other, when any one conceives that the public has been injured by some of the citizens, and is willing to aid the community at large. Let us state then³ of what kind are the judges, and who.³

In the first place then, let a tribunal common to all, who are contending for the third time, as private persons with each other, exist in this manner. All the magistrates that are in office for a year, and those for a longer period, ought, when the new year is about to commence in the month that succeeds the summer solstice,⁴ to come on the day, before that very⁵ day of the month, together to one temple, and, swearing by the god, to take, as it were, for the initiatory rite⁶ of every

² I confess I am at a loss here. For there is nothing to which ἑκαστοὶ and τινας can be referred. Ficinus—"quod sibi met aliqui præfecerunt, communi sensu judicem eligentes," as if his MS. read ὅπερ ἂν αὐτοὶ ἑαυτοῖς ἀποφώνωσι τινες, δικαστὰς κοινῇ ἐλόμενοι, in lieu of—ἀποφώνωσιν ἑκαστοὶ κοινῇ τινας ἐλόμενοι.

office, one judge, who shall be deemed to be the best in each office, and appear likely to decide in the best and most holy manner lawsuits amongst his fellow-citizens¹ during the ensuing year. When the judges are chosen, let a scrutiny take place by the very persons who have chosen them; and if any one is rejected, let them choose another in the same manner; but let the persons approved of act as judges in the case of those,² who have fled from the other courts of justice,² and let them give their vote openly. The Counsellors, however, and the other officials, who chose them, must of necessity be the hearers and spectators of these decisions; and other persons too, whoever wish it. But if any one accuses any person of having willingly decided a suit unjustly, let him go and make the accusation before the guardians of the law; and let the party found guilty undergo a punishment of this kind, namely, to pay half of the damage done to the injured party; but if he shall appear to deserve a greater fine, let those, who tried the suit, fix what additional punishment he ought to suffer (in person), or to pay either to the public treasury, or ³to the person who has suffered the injury.³ But with respect to public accusations, it is necessary in the first place for the multitude to participate in the decision. For all are injured, when any one does wrong to the state; and hence the multitude would justly take it ill, if they had no share in such decisions; but both the beginning and the end of such a suit it is requisite to refer to the people; but the inquiry into it, to the three greatest magistrates, whom both the defendant and plaintiff agree in acknowledging; but if they are unable to participate in such agreement themselves, let the Council decide upon the choice⁴

^{2—2} Ficinus has, what is more intelligible, "qui per præcedentia reconciliati non sunt."

^{3—3} So Taylor translates the version of Ficinus, "injuriam passo." But such could not be the meaning of τὴν δίκην δικασμένῳ, but of τὴν δίκην καταδικασμένῳ, found in xi. p. 928, C. § 8. Plato wrote, I suspect, τὴν δίκην ἀδικίας αἰτιασάμενῳ, to answer to the preceding ἐπαιτῖται—ἀδίκως κρίναι τὴν δίκην. For the sense would then be, as it should, "to the party accusing justice of injustice."

of each of them. It is meet moreover for all to have a share as far as they can in private suits. For he, who has no share in the power of acting as a judge with others, conceives that he has in no respect a share in the state. On this account then it is necessary for the courts of justice to be according to the wards, and for the judges to give on the instant, uncorrupted by entreaties, their decision by ballot; and that of all such matters that tribunal is to give the final decision, which we say is established, as far as is possible by human power, the most incorruptible in the case of those, who are unable¹ to come to terms¹ either through their neighbours or the tribunals belonging to the wards.

[14.] Now in truth, respecting courts of justice, of which we said that a person speaking could not easily assert indubitably that they are offices of rule or not, this description, painted, as it were, in outline,² has asserted some things, and nearly left out others. For the exact laying down and at the same time the division of laws relating to suits³ will take place by far the most correctly at the end of legislation. Let it then be told to those subjects to wait for us.⁴ For the appointments relating to other magistrates have taken up nearly the greatest part of legislation. But the totality and exactness relating to one and all of the subjects connected with a state, and the whole of a state administration,⁵ cannot become clear, until the digression shall arrive at the end, after having embraced⁶ from the beginning portions of itself, the second and the middle and all. At present, however, as far as the choosing of magistrates has taken place, this would be a sufficient finish to what has been previously mentioned; while⁷ the commence-

³ Ast has adopted δικανικῶν for δικῶν, as suggested by Stephens from "judicialium" in Ficinus.

⁴ Ficinus has "Quare ad idem tempus has differamus," from which it is impossible to discover what he found in his MS.

ment of the laying down of laws is⁷ requiring no longer a putting off and doubts.

Clin. Having spoken, O guest, what has gone before entirely to my mind, you have now said this, still more agreeably than those, by uniting the beginning with the end, touching both what has been, and is to be, said.

Athen. Thus far then will the game of prudent old men have been played by us in a becoming manner.

Clin. Beautiful is the serious pursuit of men, which you appear to show forth.

Athen. It is probable. But let us reflect whether this appears to you as it does to me.

Clin. What kind of thing? and about what?

Athen. You know that, as in painting to the life, the business appears never to have an end as regards each animal, but that by colouring, and decolouring, or by whatever name the sons of painters call a thing of this kind, it seems that it never would cease giving a fresh touch, so that what has been painted receives an increase towards becoming more beautiful and more clear.

Clin. I almost understand, by hearing, what you mean, although I am by no means conversant with this kind of art.

Athen. This will be no detriment to you. But let us employ the expression, which has occurred to us respecting the art, to this purpose, so that, if any one had an idea of painting a most beautiful animal, and to keep it for not a worse state, but a better one, as time was continually progressing, do you not perceive that, through his being a mortal, unless he left behind him a successor to set it to rights, should it make any slip through time, and ¹who would be able to add what, through his own weakness in the art, had been omitted,¹ and by giving a brilliancy cause it to improve, all his great labour would last but a short time?

Clin. True.

Athen. What then, does not this appear to you to be the intention of the legislator? First, to write down his laws as accurately as possible, (or)² sufficiently so? In the next place, ¹ I have translated as if the Greek were not καὶ τὸ παραλειφθὲν—ολός τε εἰς τὸ πρόσθεν ἔσται, where I cannot understand εἰς τὸ πρόσθεν, but καὶ ὅς τὸ παραλειφθὲν—ολός τε ἔσται προσθεῖναι καὶ—similar to “prætermissum adjicere possit atque—” in Ficinus.

² To avoid the absurdity in πρὸς ἀκρίβειαν κατὰ δύναμιν ἱκανῶς—for do you think that in the course of time, and after making an actual trial of what has been decreed, any legislator has been so insane, as not to know that many things of this kind must necessarily be left out, which it is requisite for some successor to set to rights, in order that the polity and arrangement may by no means become worse, ¹(but always better and more adorned,) as regards the state settled by him? ¹

Clin. It is likely—(how not?)—that every (legislator) whatever intends a thing of this kind.

Athen. If then any (legislator) possesses any plan for this, in deed and in word, namely, by what method he could teach another, whether a greater person or less, to have his wits upon this point, how it is requisite to preserve laws and to set them to rights, he would never be tired of telling a thing of this kind, until he reached the end.

Clin. How should he?

Athen. Ought not this then to be done both by you and me at present?

Clin. Of what kind of thing are you speaking?

Athen. Since we are about to establish laws, and guardians of the laws have been chosen by us, but we are ourselves ²at the sunset of life,² and the guardians are young men as compared with us, it is, as we have said, necessary for us at the same time to lay down laws, and to endeavour likewise to make these very (young) men, as much as possible, both legislators and guardians of the laws.

Clin. How not? since we are able to do so sufficiently.

Athen. Let us then make the attempt, and be eager (to do so).

Clin. How not?

Athen. Let us say to them—O friends, the preservers of the laws, we shall leave very many things relating to matters, the laws of which we have laid down; for it must needs be so; nevertheless we will not omit matters of not small moment, nor the whole as far as we can, undescribed, as it were, by some what is done as accurately as possible is done more than sufficiently so—I have translated as if ἦ had dropt out before ικανως. Ficinus avoids the difficulty by rendering “sufficienter et exquisite pro viribus.”

sketch;¹ and what is so sketched, it will be requisite for you to fill up. But it is meet for you to hear by looking to what point you will accomplish a thing of this kind.

[15.] For Megillus, and myself, and Clinias have spoken upon these matters with each other not seldom, and we agree that it has been spoken correctly. And we are desirous for you to be at the same time indulgent to us,² and to become our disciples,² looking to those points, to which we have agreed among ourselves that a guardian of the laws and a legislator ought to look. Now this agreement has one head,³ namely, how a man may become good by possessing that virtue of the soul, which is suited to his nature, either from a certain study, or some habit,⁴ or from some kind of possession or desire or opinion, or from some kind of learning, whether the nature of those dwelling together is male or female, youthful or aged, in order that there may be, through the whole of life, every serious exertion directed⁵ to that very same object, of which we are now speaking; but of all the rest, that are an impediment to these, there will appear not one person holding a single thing in greater honour; but that he will at length even die for⁶ a state, rather than be willing to support the yoke of slavery, should there appear a necessity for it to be overthrown, and to be under the rule of worse men, or to quit it a not-state by flight;⁷ since every thing of this kind

² Ficinus evidently found this passage more complete in his MS. For his version is, "et imitari, quasi discipuli, magistros velitis."

⁶ The Greek is πόλειως, ἰάν—But as there is nothing to govern the genitive, I have translated as if it were πρὸ πόλειως τις θανεῖν, ἰάν—similar to "pro patria—mori" in Ficinus. The attempt made by Ast to restore the passage, although it has met with the approval of Stalbaum, seems to myself any thing but a happy one.

is to be endured by those who are suffering, before they take in exchange that polity, which naturally makes men worse. On these points we have previously agreed; and do you now, looking to both of these, praise and blame the laws; blaming¹ such as are not able to effect these objects;² but, embracing and receiving with a kind feeling such as are able, do live³ ye in them; but to other pursuits, and many⁴ of those called good, it is meet for you to bid a farewell.

Let this then be to us the beginning of the subsequent laws, commencing from things holy. For we ought in the first place to resume the number five thousand and forty, because it had and has now convenient distributions, both the whole number, and that which was assigned to the wards; which we laid down as the twelfth part of the whole, being exactly four hundred and twenty. And as the whole number has twelve divisions, so also has that of the wards. Now it is meet to consider each division as a sacred gift of a deity, through its following both (the order of) the months and the revolutions of the universe.⁵ Hence that which is inherent⁶ leads every state, making them⁷ holy. Some persons indeed have perhaps made a more correct distribution than others, and with better fortune have dedicated the distribution to the gods. But we now assert, that the number five thousand and forty has been chosen most correctly, as it has all divisions as far as twelve, beginning from one, except that by eleven; and this has the slightest correction.⁸ For it becomes whole,

² i. e. To be a good man.

³ Instead of ζῆτε Cornarius suggested ζῆτε, found subsequently in all the MSS. but one, from "vitam agite" in Ficinus.

⁸ The word "correction" is the proper translation of ἴαμα taken in its arithmetical, not medical, sense. For 5040 divided by 11 is $458\frac{2}{11}$, a sum that is only not an integer. Cousin's note is—"En divisant 5040 par 11, on a pour quotient $458\frac{2}{11}$ de sorte, que, si on retranche deux unités de 5040, 11, et 458, en sont les divisions exactes."

arrangers and the legislators likewise, together with the guardians of the laws, by ordaining what we may have left out. But it is necessary, as we have said, that, as regards all such matters, the legislator should leave out all that are small and numerous; but that those, who become in succession during the year experienced by learning from their use, ¹ be arranged and being corrected move yearly, ¹ until there shall appear to have been made a sufficient limit ² to such legal enactments and pursuits. Now the space of ten years will, when applied to all and each, be at the same time moderate and sufficient for an experience ³ in sacrifices and choirs, ³ ⁴ a legislator, who had arranged, living in common, ⁴ but coming to his end, let each of the magistrates themselves, bringing before the guardians of the laws, what is omitted in their own office, be corrected, ⁵ until

³—³ This mention of sacrifices and dances seems very strange to Ast, and justly so; for the question is here about the manner of reforming laws.

⁵ I have said just above that ἱκανοθυθεῖσθαι only seems to mean "to correct." The fact is that δι' has dropt out before αὐτάς, and ἱκανοθυθεῖσθαι is to be taken in a passive sense, and to be united to τὸ παραλειπόμενον as its subject; while to avoid the difficulty in κοινῇ, I would suggest that τάξαντος κοινῇ be altered into τάξοντας κοινῇ, and be placed after τοὺς νομοφύλακας: for the sense would be, "while the law-giver is living; but at his decease, through each of the magistrates bringing before the guardians of the laws, who are to arrange the matter in common, what is deficient in their own offices, let it be corrected."

each thing shall appear to have attained the end of having been done properly. And then, after laying them down as immovable, let them use them in conjunction with the other laws, which the legislator, who laid them down,¹ ordained at the beginning; ²of which it is becoming² for them to change voluntarily not a single thing at any time. But should perchance any necessity seem to lay hold of them, it is requisite for all the magistrates and all the people to consult together, and to go to all the oracles of the gods; (and) should all these accord, then to disturb (the laws), but by no means otherwise; but let the person, who prevents (a change), ever be, according to law, the superior.

[16.] Whenever then at whatever period a person amongst those of five-and-twenty years old believes that he has, after ³seeing and being seen³ by others, found some one⁴ to his mind and fitted for a communion in, and procreation of, children, let him marry when he is within thirty-five years of age; but how it is requisite to seek the becoming and fitting, let him first hear. For it is meet, as Clinias says, to lay down before each law a prelude relating to it.

Clin. You have very properly reminded us, guest; and you have seized upon the opportunity of a discourse, that appears to me to be extremely well-timed.

Athen. You speak well. Let us then say to a person born of good parents—It is meet, O boy, to contract those marriages, which appear correct amongst thinking men; who would advise you neither to avoid a marriage with poor persons, nor to pursue pre-eminently one with the rich; but, if all the other things are equal, to always honour the inferior, and to enter into a communion with it. For this⁵ would be

^{2—2} Instead of ὧν περί, where the preposition has no meaning, I have translated as if the Greek were ὧν πρέπει—

^{3—3} This use of σκοπεῖν “to see” in a bodily, instead of a mental sense, is very rare. Compare, however, below, § 18, and xii. p. 963, B § 11.

⁴ Ast vainly endeavours to defend πρίποντα applied to a woman, through not seeing that τινά had dropt out.

advantageous both to the city and the hearths which come together. For the equable and commensurate infinitely surpass the immoderate with respect to virtue. He therefore, who is conscious of being rather headstrong, and carried away more than is fitting towards all kinds of actions, ought to be eager to become the relation of parents of orderly manners: but he, who is naturally of a contrary disposition, ought to proceed to an alliance of a contrary kind. And in every case, let there be one story¹ respecting marriage. For it is meet that each person should be a suitor in a marriage that is beneficial to the state, and not what is the most pleasant to himself. For all are naturally carried to that, which is the most like to themselves; from whence the whole state becomes in an anomalous position as regards wealth and manners; through which those things, that we do not wish to happen to ourselves, happen especially to the majority of states. Now in our system to order by law that the rich are not to marry with the rich, or the party, who has much power, not to do so with another such, but to compel the quicker in their habits to go by a community of marriage to the more slow, and the slower to the quicker, would, in addition to its being ridiculous, excite a feeling of anger with the many. For it is easy to understand that a city ought not to be mixed like a cup,² in which the maddened wine, when poured forth, effervesces; but one that, being corrected by another and a sober deity,³ does, after receiving a beautiful commingling, produce a good and moderate drink. But not one, so to say, is able to clearly see this taking place in the mingling (of the sexes) with respect to children. On this account it is necessary to leave alone things of this kind in a law; and to endeayour by charms to persuade ¹ each person to set a greater value upon the equality in their children, themselves to themselves, than in the equality of marriages, insatiable of wealth,¹ and by reproaches to turn aside him, who makes riches the object of his pursuit in marriage, but not to compel him by a written law.

[17.] Let these then be the exhortations respecting marriages, and those too, which have been mentioned previous to these,² that it is requisite to hold fast to ever-producing nature, by leaving behind children of children, and to deliver them over continually as servants of god in the place of ourselves. All this then, and still more, a person may say respecting marriages, how they ought to take place, and may make use of a prelude correctly. But if any one cannot be persuaded willingly, but keeps himself in the city estranged and without connexion, and remains unmarried for five and thirty years, let him be fined every year, if he possesses property of the largest class, one hundred drachms; if of the second, seventy; if of the third, sixty; but if of the fourth, thirty; and let the fine be sacred to Juno.³ And let him, who does not pay every year, be made a debtor tenfold; and let the Steward of the goddess exact the fine; and if he does not exact it, let him be the debtor. ⁴ And let every (Steward) in the passing of his accounts give a statement relating to (debts) of this kind.⁴ Let him then, who is unwilling to marry, be thus punished as regards money; and of all honour from juniors let him be deprived: nor let any young man voluntarily obey him in any thing; and, if he attempts to chastise any one, let any one assist and defend the injured person; and let him, who when present does not assist, be pronounced by the law to be both a cowardly and a bad citizen. Concerning the marriage portion we have spoken before; and let it be said again, ⁵ that equal things are in return for equal

¹—¹ Such is the literal translation of the Greek, which I confess I cannot understand; nor could Ast, I suspect; who is content to produce the version of Cornarius—"Ut quisque pluris faciat liberorum inter se æqualitatem, quam nuptiarum æqualitatem pecuniis inexplabilem—" which to me at least is quite as unintelligible as the Greek. Ficinus has "ut æqualem temperatamque liberorum suorum generationem pluris faciant, quam opulentissimæ affinitatis æqualitatem."

³ For she was the goddess who presided over marriages.

⁴—⁴ All the words between the numerals are omitted by Taylor.

⁵—⁵ Such is the literal version of the Greek; out of which I cannot make things, by neither the poor receiving nor bestowing 'through want of money to grow old.⁵ For the necessities of life exist to all of those in this state; and to wives, there will be less of insolence, and to the men who marry for money, (less of) humble and illiberal slavery.¹ And he who is obedient (to this law) will perform one of the things that are beautiful. But let him, who is not obedient, and either gives or receives more than the worth of fifty drachms² for the sake of a garment,² pay³ one mina, or three half-minæ, or two minæ;³ but let him who has the largest property, pay another such sum to the public treasury; and let whatever has been given or received be held as sacred to 'Juno and Zeus,⁴ and let the Stewards of those deities exact the fine, just as was stated in the case of those who did not marry, that the Stewards of Juno were on each occasion to exact the fine,⁵ or each of them to pay it themselves.⁵ With respect any sense, nor could Cornarius, nor Ast, nor Wyttenbach; all of whom have suggested emendations, from which nothing is gained, even if we adopt διδάσκειν found in Ald., but not in the MS. Z. from which Aldus printed, in lieu of γηράσκειν. I could have understood the Greek, had it been ὡς ἴσα παντὶ ἴσῳ ἔσται τῷ μήτε λαμβάνειν τι μήτε ἐκδιδόναι τι διὰ γὰρ χρημάτων ἀπορίαν οὐ τι διὸς γηράσκειν τοὺς πένητας—in English—"that equal things will be to every one on an equality by neither receiving nor giving aught; for there is no fear of the poor growing old from the want of means"—where λαμβάνειν τι μήτε ἐκδιδόναι τι is due to Cornarius.

Who for a dowry has his body sold,
Is, though free-born, still of a wife the slave.

²—³ Ast alone has objected justly to ἐσθῆτος χάριν. But he did not see that Plato probably wrote εἰς θήλεος χάριν—"for the gratification of a female;" although it is true that persons did in former times, as they do now, make presents of parts of a dress to gratify those, whom they were courting, as shown by Aristoph. Plut. 983, where an Old Girl, speaking of her young lover, says,

"Some twenty silver drachmas he would ask For a cloak, and for a pair of sandals eight."

to the power of betrothal, let the first be in the father, the second in the grandfather, and the third in that of brothers by the same father. But if there be none of these, let the right rest afterwards in a similar manner on the mother's side; but should an unusual misfortune¹ occur, let the nearest of kin have the power together with the guardians. But whatever are the rites before marriage or any other sacred act, relating to things future, present, or past, and fitting to be done, it is requisite to inquire of the interpreters, and for each person to consider that, by obeying them, every thing will take place in moderation in his behalf. [18.] With respect to (nuptial)² feasts, it is meet to invite together not more than five male and five female friends; and as many of both sexes of kindred and familiars; and let the expense be not more than is according to any one's substance; a mina to him of the largest property; to another, the half of that sum; and so to another in succession, according as the value of his property decreases. And it is requisite for all to praise the person who obeys the law; but let the guardians of the law punish the disobedient, as being a person unskilled in what is becoming, and uneducated in the laws relating to marriage songs. To drink, however, to intoxication, is never at any place becoming, except in the festivals of the god who is the giver of wine; nor is it safe³ for a person seriously occupied about a marriage;³ at which it is becoming for the bride and bridegroom to be particularly prudent, as making no small change in their life, and at the same time, that the offspring may always be produced as much as possible from prudent parents. For it is nearly uncertain what kind⁴ of night or day will in conjunction with a deity whom Taylor follows, has "qui si neglexerint, de suo persolvant—" as if his MS. read ἡ παρ' αὐτῶν τῶν παριέντων ἐκπράττειν ἐκδόνους—

² The word "nuptial" Taylor took from "nuptiale" in Ficinus, who introduced it to suit the train of thought; for ἐορτασις means "the feast" that takes place at the hearth of any one.

produce. And moreover it is meet for the work of procreation to take place, not when bodies are relaxed by drinking,¹ but for what is born to stand together compact, not wandering and quiet in fate.¹ But he, who is filled with wine, is carried along every where, and carries (others)² along, maddened both in body and soul. Hence he, who is drunk, is² at the same time beside himself,³ and bad to sow seed; so that it is probable he would beget offspring anomalous, and not trustworthy, and with a habit of body and mind not straightforward. Hence,⁴ it is requisite⁵ through the whole year, and life more, but mostly during the time of procreation, to be careful,⁵ and not to do willingly such things as produce disease, or such as are close upon conduct riotous or unjust. For it must needs be, that what is squeezed out into the souls and bodies of what is being born, should be moulded into a form, and produce things in every respect inferior. But pre-eminently is it requisite to abstain from what is related to such things on that day and night. For the principle and deity⁶ seated in man preserves all things, if it obtains the honour, suited to it, from those, who make use of it. And it is requisite for the bridegroom to consider that one of⁷ the two dwellings assigned by lot⁷ is for the procreation and bringing up of, as it were, fledgelings; and that, separated

² The syntax, as regards φέρει, and the antithesis, as regards αὐτὸς, show that ἄλλους has dropt out between φέρει and λυττῶν—

³—³ Ficinus has “tanquam mente captus—” as if his MS. read ἅτε παράφορος ὦν, κακός—not παράφορος ἅμα καὶ—

⁴ In lieu of οὐδὲν εὐθύπορον ἦθος οὐδὲ σῶμα, Plato wrote, I suspect, οὐδὲ εὐθὺ ἦθος οὐδὲ σῶμα εὐπορον—

⁵—⁵ Ficinus has, what is far more intelligible, “per totam quidem vitam—abstinebit quisque,” thus avoiding all the difficulty in the Greek, μᾶλλον μὲν ὅλον τὸν ἐνιαυτὸν καὶ βίον—εὐλαβεῖσθαι; where ἐνιαυτὸν καὶ βίον are thus strangely united, instead of being thus written, ὅλον τιν’ ἐνιαυτὸν μᾶλλον δὲ καὶ βίον, to say nothing of εὐλαβεῖσθαι standing alone. What the train of thought evidently requires is something to this effect, διὸ φιαλῶν μὲν ὅλον τὸν βίον ἀμίαντον χρῆ— from his father and mother, he is to make his marriage there, and have it as his own residence and the nurture-place of his children. For where in friendships¹ there exists a feeling of desire, it glues together and binds all habits; but where intercourse becomes satiated, and has no retaining power, it causes the desire, that existed for a time for each other, to glide away through excess of repletion. On which account it is meet for husbands to give up to mother, and father, and the relations of the wife their own dwellings, as if they were departing for a colony, and to live² observing at the same time and observed,³ while begetting and rearing children, and handing in succession from some to others life, like a torch,³ and ever paying, according to law, worship to the gods.

[19.]⁴ (We must consider)⁴ after this by having what possessions would a person keep his substance in the most careful order. The majority indeed it is not difficult to imagine or possess; but in the case of domestic servants there is a difficulty on every side. Now the reason for this we can assign in a certain manner not correctly, and again in a certain manner correctly; for we consider what is said respecting slaves to be contrary, and yet according to, the use of them.

Megil. How can we say this?⁵ For we do not, O guest, understand at all what you are asserting at present.

⁵ The Greek is πῶς δ' αὖ τοῦτο λέγομεν. But as αὖ has no meaning here, we must read, πῶς δ' ἂν τοῦτο λέγοιμεν—

Athen. And very reasonably so, Megillus. For the Helot state amongst the Lacedæmonians would give rise to the greatest doubt and contention to nearly all the Greeks, to some as being well introduced, but to others, not; ¹ but a less contention would the enslaving of the Marianduni by the Heracleotes furnish, and the clan of the Penestæ under the dominion of the Thessalians.¹ Looking to which and every thing of that kind, what ought we to do with respect to the possession of servants? a subject, that I happened to pass by in my discourse, when I was speaking; and as you have very properly asked me, what I meant, (I say) it is this. We know, that we should all assert, that it is requisite to possess slaves of the kindest and best dispositions. For many slaves, by conducting themselves with respect to all virtue better towards some persons than brothers and sons, have preserved their masters, and their possessions and the whole of their dwellings; for we surely know that these things have been said of slaves.

Megil. How not?

Athen. And is not the contrary likewise (said), that, as there is nothing healthy in the soul of a slave, it behoves a person, who possesses any intellect, never to trust at all to that race. The wisest too of poets has given this opinion, when speaking of Zeus, he says, (Od. xvii. 332,)

“Half of their minds wide-seeing Jove has ta'en
From men, whose doom has slavery's day brought on.”

Since then each person has got such notions in his mind, some place no confidence at all in the race of slaves, but with goads and whips, not thrice alone, but often, cause the souls of their domestics, as if they had the nature of wild beasts, to become slavish; but others on the other hand do what is quite the contrary.

² Megil. How not?

¹ Such is the interpretation of this passage given by Ruhnken on Timæus, p. 215. But to get at it we must transpose some words, despite the fact that the common order is found in Athenæus, vi. p. 264, E., and read ἐλάττω δὲ ἢ τε ὑπὸ Ἑρακλεωτῶν δούλεια τῶν Μαριανδύνων ἔριν δὲ ἔχοι, τό τε ὑπὸ τῆς καταδουλώσεως Θετταλῶν τὸ Πενεστικὸν ἔθνος. For whatever Ast may say, δούλεια, “slavery,” never does nor could mean “mastery;” and least of all in a place where καταδούλωσις has the same meaning. With regard to the double insertion of ὑπὸ, the preposition could not be omitted without destroying the perspicuity of the whole account.

² I have with Stalbaum adopted the arrangement of the speeches suggested by Ast.

*Clin.*² How then must we act, since persons thus differ, in the case of our land, touching the possession, and at the same time the punishment of slaves.

Athen. How, Clinias, is it not¹ evident that, since man is an animal ill-tempered, he is by no means willing to be easily got under hand³ for the purpose of a compulsory definition, namely, to define in reality a slave, [a free-man,]³ and a master?

Clin. So indeed he appears to be a thing difficult to have and hold.

Athen. (True.) For it has been often proved by facts in the case of the frequent revolts of the Messenians, that have been wont to occur, and of the cities of those, who possess many servants, speaking one language, how many mischiefs happen; and further still, (by)⁴ the doings and sufferings of all kinds of the thieves, called "Prædonēs,"⁵ who exist round Italy. By looking to all of which a person would doubt what he ought to do in all matters of this kind. Two methods then alone are left, namely, for those, who are to act rather easily as slaves, to be not of the same country with each other, and, as much as possible, not of the same language; ⁶ but to bring them up correctly, and to hold them in honour, not only for their sakes, but much more for the sake of themselves.⁶ Now the proper

³ As the question is between δοῦλος and δεισπότης, this introduction of ἐλεύθερος seems to be rather irrelevant.

education of such persons is in not behaving insolently towards domestics, but in acting less unjustly towards them, if possible, than towards one's equals. For he is quite clearly a person reverencing justice naturally and not fictitiously, who truly hates what is unjust as regards those human beings, amongst whom it is easy for him to do a wrong. He then, who is with respect to the habits and doings of slaves undefiled by an unjust and unholy manner,¹ will be the most competent to sow what is² suited for the springing up of virtue. The very same thing one may correctly assert, when speaking at the same time of a despot and a tyrant, and of any person exercising authority of any kind over a party weaker than himself. It is however necessary³ to punish slaves,⁴ and not to make them conceited by admonishing them, as if they were free-men; and the address to a slave ought to be entirely (or) nearly a command; nor should persons ever in any respect jest with them, whether males or females—acts which many persons do very foolishly towards their slaves—and by making them conceited, render it more difficult during life for their slaves to be governed, and for themselves to govern.

Clin. You speak correctly.

Athen. When then a person has become furnished with domestics to the best of his power, as regards their number and fitness to assist in each employment, is it not requisite after this to describe the dwellings?

Clin. Entirely so.

[20.] Athen. And of the entire, so to say, house-building, it appears we ought, as regards a new city and one never before inhabited, to have a care, in what manner each, as respects the temples and walls, ought to be. The buildings ought⁵ in-δὲ αὐτῶν προτιμώντας: where αὐτοὺς and ἐκείνων are improperly applied to the same persons, whatever Heindorf and Ast may say to the contrary, and there is nothing to which αὐτῶν and προτιμώντας can be referred. Opportunely then has Ficinus "educunturque recte, non solum, ipsorum gratia, sed dominorum multo magis," adopted to the letter by Taylor, although no notice is taken of the omission of προτιμώντας. Plato wrote, I suspect, τρέφειν δὲ δεσπότας τοὺς τοιούτους ὀρθῶς—"but for masters to bring up such kind of persons correctly—"

² I have translated as if τὰ had dropt out between σπείρειν and εἰς—

³ Ast was the first to restore from Athenæus δεῖ for ἀεί—

⁴ To this doctrine Aristotle objects in Polit. i. 8.

⁵ The Greek is γάμων δ' ἣν ἐμπροσθεν ταῦτα. But Ficinus has deed, Clinias, to precede the marriages. But now, since it exists only in word, it is all very well for matters to stand as they do at present. When however it shall exist in reality, we will, if god wills, make these (the walls) before the marriages, and then put those things, that are requisite,¹ to a finish after all matters of this kind. But at present let us go through in a few words some model merely.

Clin. Entirely so.

Athen. The temples, then, it is necessary to build around all the market-place, and about the whole city in a circle upon elevated spots, for the sake of defence and purity.² And hard by them the dwellings of the rulers, and the courts of justice;³ in which, as being most holy, they shall inflict and undergo punishments;⁴ partly, as being about holy matters, and partly, ⁵ the seats established of such kind of gods;⁵ and in these ⁶ courts of

"quæ sane nuptias præcedere debebant," as if his MS. read, γάμων δὲ δέον ἦν ἐμπροσθεν εἶναι ταῦτα—

² So Aristotle, in Polit. vii. 12, says, Ἀγορὰν δεῖ καθαρὰν εἶναι τῶν ὀνίων πάντων.

⁴ From this it would seem that the rulers were to undergo their punishments, when convicted of any crime, in the very courts of law where they had presided. Ficinus indeed renders τὰς δίκας—λήφονται τε καὶ δώσουσι, "justam et accipient et ferent sententiam." But such is never the meaning of δίκην δίδοναι. And should it be said that δίκας means here "lawsuits," it may be replied that δίκας λαμβάνειν is not elsewhere found united in any legal sense. I suspect that Plato wrote τοὺς εἰς τὰς δίκας ὅρκους—λήφονται καὶ δώσουσι, i. e. "they shall receive and tender the oaths relating to lawsuits." For not only has Pollux in iv. 30, ὅρκους—δοῦναι καὶ λαβεῖν, but the phrase is found in Eurip. Suppl. 1187, Πρῶτον λάβ' ὅρκον. 1231, Ὅρκια δώμεν τῷ δ' ἀνδρὶ πόλει τε. Instead however of λαμβάνειν, Plato uses its synonyme, δέχεσθαι τε ὅρκους παρ' ἀλλήλων—καὶ δίδοναι κυρίους, in Legg. xii. p. 949, B.

⁶—⁶ The words δικαστήρια ἐν οἷς have been evidently repeated by some justice, in which⁶ there shall be fitting suits relating to murders and whatever crimes are worthy of death. With respect to the walls, Megillus, I would agree with Sparta, to let them lie sleeping on the earth,¹ and not raise them up on this account.² For well is hymned that poetical saying respecting them, that "walls ought to be³ of brass and iron,³ rather than made of earth." But our plan, in addition to this, of sending young men every year into the country to dig out the earth and make trenches, and by means of buildings to keep off the enemy,⁴ as if forsooth not suffering them to put their foot on the boundaries of the land,⁴ would justly pay the forfeit of very great ridicule. For we throw round a wall, which in the first place by no means contributes to the health of the citizens; and moreover it is wont to produce a cowardly habit in the souls of the inhabitants, by inviting them to fly to it, and not to repel the enemy, nor to find their safety in some persons in the city ever guarding it both night and day, but to fancy that, while they are hedged in with walls and gates and asleep, they will in reality possess the means of safety, as if they were born not to labour, nor knew that an easy life is the result of labour; but that, as I conceive,⁵ from a disgraceful inactivity and easy temper⁶ labours naturally result again. But if there is any need to men of walls, it must needs be that the buildings of private dwellings be so laid down from the commencement, that the whole city may be one wall through the equality and similarity of all the dwellings, possessing, as regards the roads, a good fortified position; and by the city having thus the form of one house, it would be not unpleasant to look upon; fault of transcription, which both here and just before only a better MS. than any hitherto collated will enable us to correct.

¹ On this celebrated passage relating to Sparta being without walls see Longinus § 4, and Aristotle in Polit. vii. 11, who ridicules the notion as being antiquated and silly.

² The words τῶνδε εἶναι are omitted by Ficinus. Ast attempts to explain them in a way, I confess, I cannot understand.

³ By walls of brass and iron were meant the bodies of men clothed in armour.

⁴ All the words between the numerals are omitted by Taylor.

⁵ Ficinus justly omits οἶμαι—unless δε γε οἶμαι τῆς conceal ὃ αὐ καὶ γαμήταις, so that καὶ γαμήταις αἰσχρᾶς may mean "disgraceful even for married persons."

and it would be in every respect pre-eminently adapted to the ease of its guards, and the safety of the garrison. To these points it should be particularly incumbent on those, who are to dwell in it, to direct their care, until those at the commencement are built up, and that the City-Stewards should look to it, and compel the party, who pays no attention, by imposing a fine; and they ought to have a care with respect to the purity of every thing in the city; and that no private person seizes upon any public property, either by buildings or diggings; and moreover it is requisite to take care that the waters from Zeus (i. e. rain water) may run off easily; and that every part, both within and without the city, may be fit for dwelling in. And let the guardians of the laws, knowing all this by experience, lay down additional laws on all these points, and on such others as the law may from its want of power have omitted. But since both these matters and the buildings about the market-place, and the particulars relating to the gymnasia,¹ (have been gone through,)² and the schools, that have been prepared, and the theatres too, are waiting for scholars and spectators, let us now proceed to what is consequent upon marriages, and keep close to the business of legislation next in order.

Clin. By all means.

Athen. ³Let then marriages be considered, Clinias, by us to exist.³ But the mode of living prior to child-getting should subsist for not less than a year ⁴after this;⁴ but in what

² I have added the words between the lunes to supply what I conceive to have been lost.

manner it is requisite for a bride and bridegroom to live in a city, which is ¹about to be pre-eminent¹ above the majority of cities—²a point which is close upon what has been mentioned already²—is a thing not the most easy of all to state. But though not a few of what have gone before are of such a kind, this will be still more difficult than all of those for the many to take in. Nevertheless, Clinias, that which appears to be right and true must be mentioned.

Clin. By all means.

[21.] Athen. He then, who thinks to promulgate laws for states, as to what manner citizens³ should live and perform their public and common duties, but of their private concerns⁴ such as necessity does not bind down ought to be let loose,⁴ and that there should be a license for each person to live as they please each day, and no need for every thing to take place by an order, and [thinks]⁵ that by leaving private matters not regulated by law, persons will be willing, as regards public and common concerns, to live according to law, (he) does not think correctly. Now on what account has this been asserted? On this; that we shall lay down that the bridegrooms ought neither pre-eminent⁶ more⁶ or less, than during the time previous to marriage, to have their living at the com-

³ The Greek is αὐτοῦς— But the preceding πόλεσι requires ἀσποῦς— Cousin refers αὐτοῦς to πολίτας, understood in πόλεσι.

mon tables. Now this was ¹ a wonderful thing when it took place at first in your country through some war, as it seems, or some other circumstance possessing the same power, establishing it legally over you, ² when hampered during a paucity of people by a great want of means. But after you had tasted these common tables, and been compelled by necessity to make use of them, the law was deemed ³ to conduce very greatly ⁴ to your preservation; and in some such manner as this, the employment of common tables was established amongst you.

Clin. So it appears.

Athen. What I mentioned as being at that time ⁴ a thing wonderful and fearful for some to enjoin, it would not be now equally difficult for the person enjoining it to establish by law. But that which follows this, namely, that the thing naturally existing would exist in a proper manner, but not existing at all at present, ⁵ it would want but little to cause ⁵ the legislator, as the saying of persons in jest is, ⁶ to card wool for the fire, ⁶ and to do by labouring ⁷ in vain an infinity of things of this kind, it is ⁸ not easy to mention, nor, after mentioning, to accomplish. ⁸

Clin. What is this, guest, which you appear, although attempting to mention, so vehemently to shrink from?

Athen. You shall hear, in order that there may be no longer needlessly a waste of time about it. For every thing, that in a state partakes of order and law, produces every good; but of things that are without order, or ordered badly, the majority

² I have inserted ὑμῖν, required for the sense. It was lost through ἐν—

³ The Greek is μέγα διαφέρειν. Plato wrote, I suspect, μέγιστα δὴ φέρειν, as I have translated. For the phrase is rather φέρειν εἰς τι than διαφέρειν εἰς τι: and, while δὴ and δια are constantly thus interchanged, δὴ is perpetually united to a superlative, as I have shown in my Poppo's Prolegom. p. 309.!

⁶ As wool is carded generally for the loom, to card it for the fire is in fact to do so for no useful purpose.

⁷ I have adopted Ast's πονοῦντα for ποιῶντα, who aptly compares ἀνῆντα—πονῶν in Rep. vi. 2, p. 486, D.

⁸ The words between the numerals are found in the version of Ficinus, at the commencement of the sentence, after "that which follows this—"

² The Greek is οὗ δὴ καὶ νῦν ἐφέστηκε περί, where Ast says that οὗ is governed by περί. But the preposition could not be thus separated from its case. I have therefore adopted δ, from "quod" in Ficinus.

⁵ I have adopted with Ast ἀκόσμητον in lieu of ἀκοσμήτως, similar to "res—inordinata" in Ficinus.

⁶ Ficinus alone has "humanarum rerum," as if his MS. read τῶν ἀνθρώπων, i. e. τῶν ἀνθρωπείων, after μόνον.

⁷ I have supplied what the antithesis requires for the sense states, where it has been voted that common tables shall not exist at all in a city. How then shall any one without being laughed at attempt in reality to compel women to make their consumption of meat and drink a conspicuous spectacle? For there is nothing which that sex would with more difficulty endure than this. For being accustomed to live in retirement¹ and obscurity it will, when brought by force into the light, make every possible resistance, and greatly overpower the legislator. This sex then, as I have said, would not elsewhere endure a reason urged even correctly, without making every kind of outcry; but in this state perhaps they would. If then it is agreeable to you, for the sake of conversation, that our reasoning, as regards every kind of polity, should not be imperfect,² I am desirous of telling you, how good and becoming a thing this is; if, as I said, it seems good to you to hear; but if not, to leave it alone.

Clin. But, O guest, it does seem by all means wonderfully good for us to hear.

[22.] Athen. Let us then hear it. But do not wonder, ³if I appear to you to make an attempt from some source far back.³ For we are now in the enjoyment of leisure, and there is nothing pressing us so as to prevent our seeing on every side and in every way what relate to the laws.

Clin. You have spoken correctly.

Athen. Let us then return to what was stated at first. For it is proper for every person to correctly understand so much as this, that the generation of men either never had any beginning at all, nor ever will have an end, but always was and always will be, ⁴or that the length of time from which its

² In lieu of ἀνυχή, Ficinus, as shown by his version "manca," found in his MS. ἀρελή, as remarked by Faehse and adopted by Ast. Stalbaum prefers ἀνυχή. But λόγος ἀνυχής is not, I believe, found elsewhere in Greek.

³⁻³ Such is the literal version of the Greek. Ficinus has "si rem altius repetere visus fuero." If then he is to be depended upon, he must have found something in his MS. very different to what is read in other MSS.

⁴⁻⁴ The Greek is ἡ μῆκος τι τῆς ἀρχῆς ἀφ' οὗ γέγονεν ἀμήχανον ἀν χρόνον ὅσον γεγονός ἂν εἴη. I have translated as if it were originally — ἡ μῆκος τι, ἀφ' οὗ τὰ τῆς ἀρχῆς γέγονεν, ἀμήχανον ἦν χρόνου, ὅσον οὐδὲ χρόνος ἂν γνοίη: where χρόνου is due to Ast; who, with Stalbaum, gave up the correction of the passage as hopeless; for they did not per-beginning took place, is so measureless, that even Time would not know it.⁴

Clin. How not?

Athen. What then, do we not think that there have been the establishment and subversion of cities, and all sorts of pursuits relating to order and disorder, and the use¹ of drink and food, (and) the desires of all kinds of those, mad in the affairs of love, and through all the earth, and all varieties in the alterations of seasons, in which it is likely that animals have undergone very many changes?

Clin. How not?

Athen. What then? Do we believe that vines appeared somehow, not having existed previously; and in a similar manner olives, and the gifts of Demeter and her virgin daughter; and that a certain Triptolemus was the minister of such powers; and do we not think that during the time, in which these did not exist, animals turned to devouring each other, as they do now?

Clin. How not?

Athen. But we see the custom remaining even now in many places of men sacrificing each other;² and we hear, ceive that Plato had here probably played upon Χρόνος, as he has on Ἀνδρεία in Lach. § 23, ἵνα μὴ ἡμῶν αὐτῇ ἡ Ἀνδρεία καταγελάσῃ, ὅτι οὐκ ἀνδρείως αὐτὴν ζητοῦμεν: and on Μῶμος in Rep. vi. p. 487, A., οὐδ' ἂν ὁ Μῶμος τὸ γε τοιοῦτον μέμψαιτο: where he probably wrote μωμήσαιτο, as shown by the imitation of Aristænetus in l. 1, οὐδ' ἂν ὁ Μῶμος—μωμήσαιτο: and of an unknown writer in Suidas, Μῶμος—ὥστε μὴδὲ ἂν τὸν Μῶμον αὐτὸν ἐπιμωμήσασθαι: to which may be added Strato in Athenæus ix. p. 383, τὸν δ' οὐκ ἂν ταχὺ Ἐπεισεν ἡ Πειθῶ. Lucian in Hist. Conscript. § 38, τὰ μὲν πραχθέντα οὐδὲ Κλωθῶ ἂν ἔτι ἀνακλώσειεν: and the passages quoted by Porson on Heo. 779, τίς οὕτω δυστυχὴς ἔφθ γυνή; Οὐκ ἔστιν· εἰ μὴ τὴν Τύχην αὐτὴν λέγεις: who might have added from Plautus in Captiv., "Neque jam servare Salus, si vult, me potest, nec copia est;" and from Mostellar., "Nec salus nobis Saluti jam esse, si cupiat, potest."

on the contrary, that in others we did not dare to taste the flesh even of oxen, and that the sacrifices to the gods were not animals, but ¹ cakes moistened with honey, and fruits,¹ and other innocent offerings² of a similar kind; and that we entirely abstained from flesh, as it was unholy to eat it, and to defile the altars of the gods with blood; and that there existed, what is called the Orphic³ life amongst persons of that period, keeping fast to all things without life, but abstaining on the contrary from all that had life.

Clin. What you say is greatly bruited abroad, and is very easy to be believed.

Athen. But for what purpose, some one may say, has all this been mentioned now?

Clin. You very correctly understand, O guest, the matter.

Athen. I shall endeavour therefore, Clinias, to state, if I can, what follows in order upon this.

Clin. Speak then.

Athen. I perceive that all things in the case of man hang from a threefold want and desire; through which virtue results to them, if they are properly led, but the contrary, if improperly. These are, immediately on being born, eating and drinking, for which every animal having an innate love, is full of a mad feeling, and a disinclination to hearken to him, who says that one must do something else than, by satisfying the pleasures and desires connected with such things, to be totle shortly afterwards to give an account of the political constitution of that city.

ever¹ freeing oneself from all pain. But a third, and the greatest want, and a desire the most acute, comes rushing on the last, and causes men to be the most inflamed with all kinds² of madness, (I mean) that which is on fire with the very great³ sexual passion for propagating the species. These three diseases it is meet to turn⁴ from what is called the most pleasant⁵ to the best,⁴ and to endeavour to keep them down by the three greatest (bonds), fear, and law, and truthful reasoning; and by making use moreover of the Muses, and the gods who preside over contests,⁶ to extinguish their increase and influx. ⁷But after marriages let us place the procreation of children, and after procreation their nurture and instruction. And by our discourse proceeding in this manner, each law will perhaps advance onwards to (our doctrine of) common tables; when, after arriving at communities of this kind, we shall perhaps see better⁸ by approaching nearer to them, whether they ought to exist of women likewise, or of men alone; and by putting into order the institutions antecedent to these, which are at present not laid down by law, we will consider them previously; and, as has been just now said, we shall see them more accurately, and lay down laws more suited to them and becoming.⁷

¹ The Greek is ἀεὶ δεῖν, where Ast conceives that ΔΕΙΝ is only the repetition of ΑΕΙ, or else that it has been interpolated from the preceding δεῖν. Perhaps the words ἀποπληροῦντα, οἷα λύκους, τῆς ἀπαστίας ὀδυνῶν lie hid in ἀποπληροῦνται (so one MS.) λύκης τῆς ἀπάσης ἀεὶ δεῖν—i. e. “by satisfying ourselves, like wolves, to be free from the pain of not tasting food.” For the wolf is known to be an animal, that remains the longest without food, and gorges himself the most when he gets plenty of it; and while ἀπαστία is found in Aristoph. Νεφ. 621, in the sense of νηστεία and ἀσιτία, the change of λύκους into λύπης would be owing to the common confusion of κ and π, as shown by myself on Æsch. Suppl. 927.

³ Instead of ὕβρει πλείστην, Plato wrote, I suspect, either ἀπλήστην, “insatiable,” or ἀκολάστην, “unchecked.”

⁵ In μέν, which has no meaning here, lies hid δεσμοῖς—

⁶ The gods who presided over contests were Jupiter, Neptune, Apollo, and Mercury, as shown by Æschylus in Suppl. 193.

⁷—⁷ Stalbaum considers all between the numerals an interpolation; for according to two MSS. it was wanting in some copies.

⁸ Instead of μάλλον, which came from ἀκριβέστερον μάλλον, just below, the sense requires κάλλιον, as I have translated.

Clin. You speak most correctly.

Athen. Let us then keep in recollection what has been just now said ; for perhaps we shall have a need of it hereafter.

Clin. What do you bid us (remember) ?

Athen. That which we defined by three words. For we surely spoke about eating, and secondly, drinking, and thirdly, a kind of madness in the matters of love.

Clin. We will by all means, O guest, recollect, ¹what you now bid us (to do).¹

Athen. It is well. Let us proceed then to the affairs of marriage, and teach the parties how and in what manner they ought to get children ; and, if we cannot persuade them, we will threaten them with certain laws.

Clin. How ?

[23.] Athen. It is requisite for the bride and bridegroom to consider, that they are about to exhibit to the state children, the most beautiful and the best in their power. Now all persons, who share in any work, when they give their minds to themselves and the work, produce the whole beautiful and good ; but the contrary, when they do not give their minds, or do not possess any. Let the bridegroom then give his mind both to the bride and to child-getting ; and in the same way let the bride give her mind to the bridegroom pre-eminently at the time when children have not yet been born to them. And let the women, whom we have chosen, be the overseers of these matters, whether many or few, just as the rulers may order, as many and at what time they please ; and let them assemble every day in the temple of Eileithuia,² and (continue there) for the third part of an hour ;³ where they shall, on being assembled, tell, if they have seen any man or woman, of those connected with child-getting, looking to any thing else than to what are ordained to be done during the sacrifices and sacred ceremonies pertaining to marriage. Let the procreation of children, and the supervision of those connected with child-getting above mentioned, continue for ten years, but not for a longer time, when there is a fecundity in generation. But should some continue unprolific for this space of time, let them, after having consulted with their kindred, and the women that are in power, be divorced for the benefit of each party. If however any dispute arises respecting what is proper and beneficial to each, let them select ten of the guardians of the law,¹ and abide by what they shall impose and ordain.¹ And let these women, entering into the houses of the young folks, partly by admonitions and partly by threats, cause them to cease from their error and ignorance. But if they are unable to do so, let them go and speak to the guardians of the law; and let these restrain the parties. If they too are unable to effect any thing, let them bring the matter before the public assembly, after having put up in writing the names of the parties, and made an affidavit that they are unable to make this or that person better. And let him, who is indicted, unless he can obtain a verdict in a court of law against the parties so putting up in writing his name, be disgraced on these points;² (namely), let him not go to weddings, nor to the rites solemnized for children;³ and should he go, let any one who wishes scourge him with stripes with impunity. And let there be the same enactments in the case of a woman. For let her not share in female out-goings⁴ and honours, and the visits made at weddings, and at the birth-rites⁵ of children, if

² Ficinus omits τῶνδε, and so does one MS. subsequently collated.

³ The Greek is τὰς τῶν παίδων ἐπιτελειώσεις: which Ast explains by saying that "there is an allusion to the sacred rites, which took place on the tenth day after the birth of a child, as we learn from Aristoph. Ὀρν. 493, and 923." For the ancients knew, as well as the moderns, that the critical period in childbirth was the ninth day; and that until it had well passed over, it was useless to make any rejoicing for the birth of the child.

⁴ It is not easy to say what is meant by ἐξοδοί, unless it alludes to the circumstance that women, who were mothers, were permitted to go out of the house, where and when they pleased, which virgins were not; for a married woman without children, would be only another kind of virgin.

she be indicted as acting disorderly, ¹and does not obtain a verdict.¹ But when they are begetting children according to law, if any man has a connexion with another woman for such a purpose, or a woman with another man, while such other parties are getting children, let the same fines be imposed upon them, as have been mentioned in the case of those ²still getting them.² After this let the man and woman, who act temperately with respect to such points, be altogether in good repute, but those who act contrariwise be held in a contrary light, or dishonoured rather. And if the majority act with moderation in matters of this kind, let such points lie in silence without being established by law; but if they act disorderly, ³let enactments be laid down in this way, and punishment enacted³ according to the laws then laid down. The first year is the beginning of the whole of life to every one; which ought to be written in the temples of their fathers, as the beginning of life, both to a boy and girl. In every Phratia⁴ too, let the number of the rulers⁵ that are numbered for a year, be written on a whitened wall, and near to them the names of those still living in the Phratia be always written; but blot out those who have departed from life. Let the limits of a marriageable age for a female be from sixteen to twenty

a dissertation, "De Veterum Solennibus Natalibus," by Schöne, Halberstadt, 1832; but whether he has thrown any light on this passage I know not, as I have never seen it.

²—² Such is the version of ἐτι γεννωμένοις. But this I cannot understand; nor could Taylor, whose version is—"when they did not beget children"—Two MSS. read ἀπρι for ἐτι, from which nothing is gained.

³—³ Ficinus has more fully "legum circumscriptione declarentur et ad eorum normam de singulis hujusmodi iudicetur atque agatur."

⁴ The Phratia was one part out of three, into which the Phylé was divided.

years of age—and let this be the longest definite time—but for a man from thirty to thirty-five; and let the time for any public office be, in the case of a woman, forty years of age; but in that of a man, thirty; but with respect to war, for a man from twenty to sixty years; but for a woman, should it appear necessary to employ her for warlike purposes, and after she shall have brought forth children, up to fifty years of age, enjoining what is possible and becoming for each.

BOOK VII.

CHILDREN then, both male and female, having been begotten, it will be most correct to speak next about their nurture and education; which it is perfectly impossible to be¹ not mentioned; and being mentioned it will appear to us to be rather like a kind of teaching and admonition than laws. For the numerous and trifling and not conspicuous matters, which happen to all privately, and in each family, since they easily take place through the pain, and pleasure, and desire of the respective individuals, will render, contrary to the advice of the legislator, the habits of the citizens all-various, and not similar to each other. Now this is an evil to states. For on account of their insignificance and frequency, to make them subject to a fine would be at the same time unbecoming and unseemly. But it destroys² even the laws already laid down in writing, if persons are accustomed to act contrary to law in things insignificant and numerous; so that it is difficult to lay down laws concerning them, and yet impossible to be silent. But what I mean to say, I must endeavour to show clearly by bringing, as it were, samples to the light; for there seems (to be) on what is now said in some respect a darkness.

Clin. You speak most truly.

Athen. Has not then this been rightly said, that a nurture perfectly correct ought to show itself able to render both bodies and souls the most beautiful and best?

Clin. How not?

¹ Ficinus has "silentio præterire"—which leads to ἔαν for εἶναι.

² Ficinus, whom Taylor follows, has "derogaret," as if his MS. read διαφθείροι δ' αὖν—in lieu of διαφθείρει—

Athen. Now the most beautiful bodies I conceive, (to speak) in the most simple style, ought, while boys are still young, to grow up in the most upright manner.

Clin. Entirely so.

Athen. What then, do we not understand this, that the first shooting forth of every animal is produced the greatest and most abundant by far; so that it has given rise to a dispute amongst many, whether the length of human bodies does or does not become by increase from the age of five years doubled¹ in the remaining twenty-five?²

Clin. True.

Athen. What then, when a great increase flows on without much and commensurate exercise, do we not know that it produces ten thousand maladies in bodies?

Clin. Entirely so.

Athen. There is need then of most exercise, when most nutriment is introduced into bodies.

Clin. What then, O guest, shall we enjoin upon the recently born, and the youngest, the greatest exertions?

Athen. By no means; but to those still prior, who are being nourished in the wombs of their mothers.

Clin. How say you, thou best (of men)? Are you speaking of those in a state of being conceived?

Athen. Yes. But it is not at all wonderful for you to be ignorant of the exercise of such as these; which, although it seems absurd, I am willing to render clear to you.

Clin. By all means (do so).

Athen. For us indeed a thing of this kind is more easy to understand through some persons playing there³ sports more than is needful. For with us not only children, but some older men, bring up the young of birds,⁴ and exercise such ¹ The modern theory is, that the body of a child at the end of the second year is generally the half of what it will be when grown up.

³ By αἰροῖσι, "there," is meant Athens.

kinds of wild animals¹ in fighting with each other, and they are far from thinking that the labours are moderate, in which by exercising they stir them up. For in addition to this,² each taking under their arms the smaller in their hands, and the larger under their arms within,³ they walk about, going many stadia, and this, not for the sake of the good state of their own bodies, but for that of the birds. And thus much they signify to the person capable of learning, that all bodies are benefited by shakings and motion, ⁴when moved without weariness, of all that⁵ are moved by themselves, or by swings,⁶ or carried on the sea,⁷ or on horseback, or borne along in any manner soever by other bodies;⁶ and through these getting the mastery over food and drink, they are able to impart to us health, and beauty, and ⁷the rest of strength.⁷

²—³ Such is the literal version of the Greek. But ὑπὸ μάλης and ὑπὸ τὴν ἀγκάλην ἐντὸς mean the same thing. Ficinus has more correctly—"minores in manibus, majores sub ulna capientes—" Hence it is easy to see that ὑπὸ τὴν ἀγκάλην ἐντὸς is an explanation of ὑπὸ μάλης, and that Plato wrote λαβόντες ἕκαστος τοὺς μὲν ἑλάττονας εἰς τὰς χεῖρας, μείζους—δὲ ὑπὸ μάλης—Aristotle and Stalbaum after him explain ὑπὸ μάλης by "secretly." But as there could be no need of secrecy, such a meaning would be here quite out of place. The German translator Schulthes too considered ὑπὸ μάλης an interpolation.

³—³ Here again a literal version best points out that something is incorrect in the Greek—κινούμενα ἄκοπα δύνανται πάντων ὅσα τε—where since two MSS. offer καὶ κινούμενα in the text, and one of them κατακινούμενα in the margin, and Stobæus πάντως for πάντων, one would prefer—δύνανται, εἰ γε κινούμενα ἄκοπα πάντως ἐστὶ, εἰ τε ὑπὸ—i. e. are benefited, if indeed, when moved, they are entirely without weariness, whether—

⁵ κατὰ θάλατταν—δχομένων—Compare Æsch. Prom. 477.

⁶ Instead of σωμάτων, which is not used indefinitely in Greek, as "body" is in English, to express any substance, one would prefer the more proper word, χημάτων.

to walk about, and to mould the infant as a thing of wax, while it is yet flexible, and to put it in swathing-clothes until it is two years old; and that we are moreover compelling the nurses by legal fines to carry the children either into the fields, or to the temples, or their acquaintance, until they are sufficiently able to stand alone; and then that they should be careful, lest by the limbs becoming distorted, while forcibly resting on them, being still young, to undergo the additional labour of carrying the infant, until it had completed its third year; and that the nurses ought to be as strong as possible; and, in addition, that unless these things take place to each child, we are to enact a fine upon those who do not act so? or is this far from being the case? For that, which has just now been mentioned, would happen to us without stint.¹

Clin. What is that?

Athen. To pay the debt of abundant laughter, through² the womanlike and servile manners of the nurses being unwilling to obey us.³

Clin. But on what account then did we say that this ought to be stated?

Athen. On this. A person, on hearing⁴ of the habits of masters and free persons in states, would perhaps come to the correct conception, that, without a proper administration of private concerns taking place in states, one would think there would be vainly any stability in the laying down of laws; and so thinking, he would make use of the laws just now mentioned; and using them correctly, he would by his administration render both his own household and the city happy.

Clin. You have spoken very reasonably.

Athen. Let us then not desist from the legislation of this kind, until we have given out the pursuits relating likewise to the souls of very young children in the same manner as we

² I have adopted πρὸς τὸ, found in the two best MSS., in lieu of πρὸς τῷ—

³ In ἀν, which is unnecessary here, lies hid ἡμῖν, answering to "nobis" in Ficinus.

began to go through the subject, when the accounts were stated relating to the body.

Clin. Perfectly right.

Athen. Let us then receive this as an element with respect to both the circumstances, ¹[the body and soul,]¹ of the very young, that the nursing and motion, taking place as much as possible all the night and day, are profitable to all, and not the least ²to the youngest; so that,² if it were possible, they may live as if always sailing on the sea. But now, ³(since this is impossible),³ it is requisite to act as near as possible to this with respect to ⁴the newly born nurslings of children.⁴ And ⁵(what ought to be done) one may conjecture⁵ from this, that both the nurses of infants, and those who are initiated in the remedies⁶ relating to the Corybantes,⁶ have adopted this from experience, and know it to be useful. For, when mothers are desirous to put to sleep their children, who sleep with difficulty, they do not bring to them a state of quietness, but, on the contrary, of motion, by shaking them ever in their arms; nor yet that of silence, but that of singing to them; and they artlessly⁷ soothe their children, as it were, by the sound of a pipe, and, as the remedies of the mad Bacchantes are employed,⁸ by making use, at the same time, of the movements in music and the dance.

Clin. What then, O guest, is especially the cause of this?

Athen. It is not very difficult to know.

³⁻³ The words between the lunes are found only in Ficinus, whom Taylor follows tacitly, "quoniam autem fieri nequit—"

⁴⁻⁴ The Greek is τὰ νεογενῇ παιδῶν θρήμματα. But θρήμμα is united to the word for the parent, not for that of the offspring. Hence for παιδῶν one would prefer ἀπ' ὠδίνων—

⁶⁻⁶ I have adopted Cousin's interpretation.

⁷ I have taken ἀτίχνως in its natural sense of "artlessly," not, as others, of "really," in Greek ἀρεχνῶς.

⁸ Although εἰσι might be understood after λάσεις, yet, I suspect, γίγνεται lies hid in ταύτῃ.

Clin. How so?

Athen. Both these passions result from fear; and there are certain terrors through a depraved habit of the soul. When therefore any one brings from without an agitation to passions of this kind, that which is from without overcomes the dreadful and insane motion within; and after overcoming, it seems to have produced a calm in the soul, and a quietness in the leaping, which had been troublesome as regards the heart of each; ¹(and) thus, (what is) altogether agreeable,¹ it causes some to obtain by lot² sleep; but others, who are awake, and dancing and soothed by the pipe under the influence of the divinities, to whom each may be supplicating and sacrificing, it causes to possess habits of sound sense in the place of a maddened state. Now this, to speak in brief, has in this way a certain probable reason.

Clin. Entirely so.

Athen. Now if these things possess thus any such power, it is requisite to consider this point as connected with them, that every soul, which has been familiar with fear from youth, would be more accustomed to be conversant with fears.³ But this every one will surely say is an exercise of timidity, and not of fortitude.

Clin. How not?

Athen. But the contrary pursuit we should say is that of fortitude, in the overcoming, even from youth, what falls upon us in the shape of fears and terrors.

Clin. Correctly so.

Athen. Let us say then, that this one thing, the all-perfect gymnastic exercise of children in motion, greatly contributes to a part of virtue¹ in the soul.

² Instead of λαγχάνειν one would prefer τυγχάνειν. But the disorder lies somewhat deeper. For Plato probably wrote ἔπνου λαμβάνειν ἀχνην, remembering the expression in Aristoph. Σφηκ. 91, ἔπνου—ἀχνην, to which the Etymol. M. alludes in Ἀχνη after Ἀχρη—where Ἀχνη is quoted from Homer in the sense of sea-foam; from Hippocrates, of the fluff of flax; from Æschylus, of the lightness of smoke; and from Aristophanes, of the lightness of sleep; while, as regards the change of λαμβάνειν and λαγχάνειν, it will be sufficient to refer to Porson on Hec. 41.

Clin. Entirely so.

Athen. And moreover, that a disposition, morose or not, in the soul² would become and be called² respectively no little part of cowardice or bravery.

Clin. How not?

Athen. In what manner then is to be implanted which of these we may wish in the newly born? We must endeavour to state how and to what extent a person may have an easy road in these matters.

Clin. How not?

[3.] Athen. I will mention then the fixed opinion with us, that luxury renders the manners of youth morose and irascible, and vehemently agitated by things of a trifling nature; but that an excessive and rustic servitude causes them to be contrary to this, abject and illiberal, and man-haters, and unfitting associates.

Clin. But how will the whole state be able to bring up those, who have as yet no perception of language, and are unable to have any taste for the rest of instruction?

Athen. Somehow in this way. Every animal, as soon as it is born, is wont to utter some sound with a loud cry, and not the least the human species; and more than the rest of animals it is affected in addition to its crying with the shedding of tears.

Clin. Entirely so.

Athen. Now nurses, looking to what infants are desirous of, make a conjecture by their presenting to them something. For they think they correctly offer that, on which being presented the children are silent; but incorrectly that, at which it sheds tears and cries out. For in the case of children tears and cries are the indications of what they love and hate, (and are) signs by no means lucky. Now this period is not less than three years, a not small portion of life to pass through badly or not badly.

¹ So Fortitude is said to be one part of virtue in the soul, in Laches § 29, and in the Statesman § 44.

²—² I have translated as if the Greek were γιγνόμενον λέγοιτ' ἀν— Ast. however, refers to iii. 4, a passage which is equally faulty, and as easily emended.

Clin. You speak correctly.

Athen. Does not a person who is morose, and by no means good-tempered, appear to you to be for the most part given to lamentation and full of moanings more than is fitting for the good to be?

Clin. It appears so to me.

Athen. What then, if a person were to endeavour, by bringing together every method, during those three years, that the nursling may be affected as little as possible with sorrow and fears and with every pains in our power, do we not think that we should render then the soul of the nursling more cheerful and kind?

Clin. It is evident, O guest; and most of all, should any one supply it with many pleasures.

Athen. In this I cannot, O wondrous man, follow Clinias. For with us such conduct would be a destruction the greatest of all. ¹For it occurs perpetually at the commencement of nurture.¹ But let us see whether we are asserting any thing.

Clin. State what you mean.

Athen. That our discourse is at present about a not trifling matter. Do you then, Megillus, look to it, and decide between us. For my assertion is, that an upright life ought neither to pursue pleasures, nor entirely to avoid pain, but to embrace the medium between them, which I have just now denominated a favourable temper; a disposition, of which, according to some voice of an oracle, we correctly speak as belonging to a deity.² This habit, I assert, that he amongst us ought to pursue, who would be divine; nor let him go wholly headlong to pleasures; for in this case he would not be free from pain; nor let him permit any other person, old or young, male or female, to suffer ³the same thing with us,³ and, as far as he is able, the newly born the least of all. For all the manners are, through custom, implanted in all the most powerfully at that period. And further still, if I were not about to appear to be jesting, I would say, that one ought to attend to women, who are carrying any thing in the womb, the most of all during that very year, so that the person pregnant may neither enjoy pleasures numerous and violent, nor, on the other hand, feel pains, but live through that period, preserving a line of conduct benignant, and good-tempered, and mild.

² This, as Ast remarks correctly, refers to the fact, that the word ἱεως is generally applied to a deity; and he quotes very opportunely Euthydem. p. 273, F., ἱεω εἶητον ἀτεχνῶς γὰρ ἔγωγε σφῶ, ὥσπερ θεῶ, προσαγορεύω.

Clin. There was no need, O guest, of your asking Megillus, which of us spoke in the more proper manner; for I agree with you, that all persons ought to avoid a life of unmingled pleasure and pain, and that they should always pursue a certain middle course. You have, therefore, both spoken and heard in a proper manner.

Athen. Very properly so, Clinias. But, in addition to these points, let us all three consider this likewise.

Clin. What?

[4.] Athen. That all these matters, which we are now going through, are by the many called unwritten laws; and that those, which they call the laws of the country, are no other than of such a kind; and further still, that the discourse, which has just now flowed upon us, how that we ought not either to call them laws, or to permit them to be unmentioned, has been spoken correctly. For these are the bonds of all polity, existing in a middle state between all laws that have been, and are, and will be hereafter, laid down in writing; and being, as it were, altogether the laws of a country, and ancient in every respect, and which, when laid down correctly and have become a custom, have invested the written laws with every kind of security; but should they advance improperly beyond what is right, they cause, like supports placed by carpenters in the buildings of houses, and gliding away from the centre, every thing to fall together to the same point, and to lie, some under others, both themselves and what has been subsequently built upon them, after the old portions have secretly given way. Reflecting upon which, it is necessary for us, O Clinias, to bind together your city new on all sides, and to the utmost of our power to omit nothing great or small which a person may call laws, or manners, or pursuits; for she be indicted as acting disorderly,¹ and does not obtain a verdict.¹ But when they are begetting children according to law, if any man has a connexion with another woman for such a purpose, or a woman with another man, while such other parties are getting children, let the same fines be imposed upon them, as have been mentioned in the case of those² still getting them.² After this let the man and woman, who act temperately with respect to such points, be altogether in good repute, but those who act contrariwise be held in a contrary light, or dishonoured rather. And if the majority act with moderation in matters of this kind, let such points lie in silence without being established by law; but if they act disorderly,³ let enactments be laid down in this way, and punishment enacted³ according to the laws then laid down. The first year is the beginning of the whole of life to every one; which ought to be written in the temples of their fathers, as the beginning of life, both to a boy and girl. In every Phratia⁴ too, let the number of the rulers⁵ that are numbered for a year, be written on a whitened wall, and near to them the names of those still living in the Phratia be always written; but blot out those who have departed from life. Let the limits of a marriageable age for a female be from sixteen to twenty

a dissertation, "De Veterum Solennibus Natalibus," by Schöne, Halberstadt, 1832; but whether he has thrown any light on this passage I know not, as I have never seen it.

¹—¹ Ficinus has strangely mistaken the sense of this passage; for his version is "si in iudicium arcessitæ damnatæ etiam fuerint," translated by Taylor, "if they are similarly condemned in a court of justice."

²—² Such is the version of ἐτι γυνωμένους. But this I cannot understand; nor could Taylor, whose version is—"when they did not beget children"—Two MSS. read ἀπρι for ἐτι, from which nothing is gained.

³—³ Ficinus has more fully "legum circumscriptione declarentur et ad eorum normam de singulis hujusmodi iudicetur atque agatur."

⁴ The Phratia was one part out of three, into which the Phylé was divided.

years of age—and let this be the longest definite time—but for a man from thirty to thirty-five; and let the time for any public office be, in the case of a woman, forty years of age; but in that of a man, thirty; but with respect to war, for a man from twenty to sixty years; but for a woman, should it appear necessary to employ her for warlike purposes, and after she shall have brought forth children, up to fifty years of age, enjoining what is possible and becoming for each.

BOOK VII.

CHILDREN then, both male and female, having been begotten, it will be most correct to speak next about their nurture and education; which it is perfectly impossible to be¹ not mentioned; and being mentioned it will appear to us to be rather like a kind of teaching and admonition than laws. For the numerous and trifling and not conspicuous matters, which happen to all privately, and in each family, since they easily take place through the pain, and pleasure, and desire of the respective individuals, will render, contrary to the advice of the legislator, the habits of the citizens all-various, and not similar to each other. Now this is an evil to states. For on account of their insignificance and frequency, to make them subject to a fine would be at the same time unbecoming and unseemly. But it destroys² even the laws already laid down in writing, if persons are accustomed to act contrary to law in things insignificant and numerous; so that it is difficult to lay down laws concerning them, and yet impossible to be silent. But what I mean to say, I must endeavour to show clearly by bringing, as it were, samples to the light; for there seems (to be) on what is now said in some respect a darkness.

Clin. You speak most truly.

Athen. Has not then this been rightly said, that a nurture perfectly correct ought to show itself able to render both bodies and souls the most beautiful and best?

Clin. How not?

¹ Ficinus has "silentio præterire"—which leads to ἐῖναι for εἶναι.

² Ficinus, whom Taylor follows, has "derogaret," as if his MS. read διαφθείροι δ' αὖν—in lieu of διαφθείρει—

Athen. Now the most beautiful bodies I conceive, (to speak) in the most simple style, ought, while boys are still young, to grow up in the most upright manner.

Clin. Entirely so.

Athen. What then, do we not understand this, that the first shooting forth of every animal is produced the greatest and most abundant by far; so that it has given rise to a dispute amongst many, whether the length of human bodies does or does not become by increase from the age of five years doubled¹ in the remaining twenty-five?²

Clin. True.

Athen. What then, when a great increase flows on without much and commensurate exercise, do we not know that it produces ten thousand maladies in bodies?

Clin. Entirely so.

Athen. There is need then of most exercise, when most nutriment is introduced into bodies.

Clin. What then, O guest, shall we enjoin upon the recently born, and the youngest, the greatest exertions?

Athen. By no means; but to those still prior, who are being nourished in the wombs of their mothers.

Clin. How say you, thou best (of men)? Are you speaking of those in a state of being conceived?

Athen. Yes. But it is not at all wonderful for you to be ignorant of the exercise of such as these; which, although it seems absurd, I am willing to render clear to you.

Clin. By all means (do so).

Athen. For us indeed a thing of this kind is more easy to understand through some persons playing there³ sports more than is needful. For with us not only children, but some older men, bring up the young of birds,⁴ and exercise such ¹ The modern theory is, that the body of a child at the end of the second year is generally the half of what it will be when grown up.

³ By αἰροῦσι, "there," is meant Athens.

[2.] Since then such is the case, what shall we say we ought to do after this? Are you willing for us to say with a laugh, that we are laying down laws for the pregnant woman imitate the bravery of two cocks, whom the army happened to see fighting with each other.

²⁻³ Such is the literal version of the Greek. But ὑπὸ μάλης and ὑπὸ τὴν ἀγκάλῃν ἐντὸς mean the same thing. Ficinus has more correctly—"minores in manibus, majores sub ulna capientes—" Hence it is easy to see that ὑπὸ τὴν ἀγκάλῃν ἐντὸς is an explanation of ὑπὸ μάλης, and that Plato wrote λαβόντες ἕκαστος τοὺς μὲν ἱλάττονας εἰς τὰς χεῖρας, μείζους—δὲ ὑπὸ μάλης—Aristotle and Stalbaum after him explain ὑπὸ μάλης by "secretly." But as there could be no need of secrecy, such a meaning would be here quite out of place. The German translator Schulthes too considered ὑπὸ μάλης an interpolation.

³⁻³ Here again a literal version best points out that something is incorrect in the Greek—κινούμενα ἄκοπα δύνανται πάντων ὅσα τε—where since two MSS. offer καὶ κινούμενα in the text, and one of them κατακινούμενα in the margin, and Stobæus πάντως for πάντων, one would prefer—δύνανται, εἰ γε κινούμενα ἄκοπα πάντως ἔστι, εἰ τε ὑπὸ—i. e. are benefited, if indeed, when moved, they are entirely without weariness, whether—

⁵ κατὰ θάλατταν—ὀχουμένων—Compare Æsch. Prom. 477.

⁶ Instead of σωμάτων, which is not used indefinitely in Greek, as "body" is in English, to express any substance, one would prefer the more proper word, χηρμάτων.

to walk about, and to mould the infant as a thing of wax, while it is yet flexible, and to put it in swathing-clothes until it is two years old; and that we are moreover compelling the nurses by legal fines to carry the children either into the fields, or to the temples, or their acquaintance, until they are sufficiently able to stand alone; and then that they should be careful, lest by the limbs becoming distorted, while forcibly resting on them, being still young, to undergo the additional labour of carrying the infant, until it had completed its third year; and that the nurses ought to be as strong as possible; and, in addition, that unless these things take place to each child, we are to enact a fine upon those who do not act so? or is this far from being the case? For that, which has just now been mentioned, would happen to us without stint.¹

Clin. What is that?

Athen. To pay the debt of abundant laughter, through² the womanlike and servile manners of the nurses being unwilling to obey us.³

Clin. But on what account then did we say that this ought to be stated?

Athen. On this. A person, on hearing⁴ of the habits of masters and free persons in states, would perhaps come to the correct conception, that, without a proper administration of private concerns taking place in states, one would think there would be vainly any stability in the laying down of laws; and so thinking, he would make use of the laws just now mentioned; and using them correctly, he would by his administration render both his own household and the city happy.

Clin. You have spoken very reasonably.

Athen. Let us then not desist from the legislation of this kind, until we have given out the pursuits relating likewise to the souls of very young children in the same manner as we

³ In ἀν, which is unnecessary here, lies hid ἡμῖν, answering to "nobis" in Ficinus.

Clin. Perfectly right.

Athen. Let us then receive this as an element with respect to both the circumstances, ¹[the body and soul,]¹ of the very young, that the nursing and motion, taking place as much as possible all the night and day, are profitable to all, and not the least ²to the youngest; so that,² if it were possible, they may live as if always sailing on the sea. But now, ³(since this is impossible),³ it is requisite to act as near as possible to this with respect to ⁴the newly born nurslings of children.⁴ And ⁵(what ought to be done) one may conjecture⁵ from this, that both the nurses of infants, and those who are initiated in the remedies⁶ relating to the Corybantes,⁶ have adopted this from experience, and know it to be useful. For, when mothers are desirous to put to sleep their children, who sleep with difficulty, they do not bring to them a state of quietness, but, on the contrary, of motion, by shaking them ever in their arms; nor yet that of silence, but that of singing to them; and they artlessly⁷ soothe their children, as it were, by the sound of a pipe, and, as the remedies of the mad Bacchantes are employed,⁸ by making use, at the same time, of the movements in music and the dance.

Clin. What then, O guest, is especially the cause of this?

Athen. It is not very difficult to know.

Athen. That our discourse is at present about a not trifling matter. Do you then, Megillus, look to it, and decide between us. For my assertion is, that an upright life ought neither to pursue pleasures, nor entirely to avoid pain, but to embrace the medium between them, which I have just now denominated a favourable temper; a disposition, of which, according to some voice of an oracle, we correctly speak as belonging to a deity.² This habit, I assert, that he amongst us ought to pursue, who would be divine; nor let him go wholly headlong to pleasures; for in this case he would not be free from pain; nor let him permit any other person, old or young, male or female, to suffer³ the same thing with us,³ and, as far as he is able, the newly born the least of all. For all the manners are, through custom, implanted in all the most powerfully at that period. And further still, if I were not about to appear to be jesting, I would say, that one ought to attend to women, who are carrying any thing in the womb, the most of all during that very year, so that the person pregnant may neither enjoy pleasures numerous and violent, nor, on the other hand, feel pains, but live through that period, preserving a line of conduct benignant, and good-tempered, and mild.

² This, as Ast remarks correctly, refers to the fact, that the word ἡλεως is generally applied to a deity; and he quotes very opportunely Euthydem. p. 273, F., ἡλεω εἶπτον ἀτεχνῶς γὰρ ἔγωγε σφῶ, ὥσπερ θεῶ, προσαγορεύω.

Clin. There was no need, O guest, of your asking Megillus, which of us spoke in the more proper manner; for I agree with you, that all persons ought to avoid a life of unmingled pleasure and pain, and that they should always pursue a certain middle course. You have, therefore, both spoken and heard in a proper manner.

Athen. Very properly so, Clinias. But, in addition to these points, let us all three consider this likewise.

Clin. What?

[4.] Athen. That all these matters, which we are now going through, are by the many called unwritten laws; and that those, which they call the laws of the country, are no other than of such a kind; and further still, that the discourse, which has just now flowed upon us, how that we ought not either to call them laws, or to permit them to be unmentioned, has been spoken correctly. For these are the bonds of all polity, existing in a middle state between all laws that have been, and are, and will be hereafter, laid down in writing; and being, as it were, altogether the laws of a country, and ancient in every respect, and which, when laid down correctly and have become a custom, have invested the written laws with every kind of security; but should they advance improperly beyond what is right, they cause, like supports placed by carpenters in the buildings of houses, and gliding away from the centre, every thing to fall together to the same point, and to lie, some under others, both themselves and what has been subsequently built upon them, after the old portions have secretly given way. Reflecting upon which, it is necessary for us, O Clinias, to bind together your city new on all sides, and to the utmost of our power to omit nothing great or small which a person may call laws, or manners, or pursuits; for by all things of this kind a state is bound together ; but none of these can be stable without each other ; so that one need not wonder, if many and at the same time trifling things, appearing to us to be enactments, or even customs, should, when flowing to the same point, cause the laws to become of a greater length.

Clin. Both you speak properly yourself, and we too shall reflect in this manner.

Athen. If then, in the case of a boy and girl of three years old, any one should bring these matters accurately to an end, and make use of what has been said in not a careless manner, they will be of no small advantage to those recently brought up. But there will be a need of sports¹ for the habits of the soul at three, and four, and five, and even six years of age. But we must already remove them from luxury, by chastising them, not in an ignominious manner, but, as we said on the subject of slaves, by chastising not with insults so as to encourage an angry feeling in them, when so chastised, nor a feeling for licentiousness by suffering them to go unpunished, we must do the same in the case of the free-born. Now the sports of persons of that age are self-produced ; and which, when they come together, they almost invent themselves.² All children then of this kind ought to come together at the temples distributed through the villages, from three to six years of age, each of those belonging to the same village to the same spot in common ; and let the nurses take cognizance of their orderly behaviour and licentiousness ; ³ but of the nurses themselves and their whole pack, let one of the twelve women be appointed to each to regulate for the space of a year, of those of the before-mentioned, whom the guardians of the law may have ordained.³ And let the women, who have full powers over the care of marriages, choose them, one out of each ward, and of the same age with themselves; and let her, who is appointed, perform her office, by going each day to the temple, and ever punishing the person who does wrong, a male and female slave, and a stranger, male or female, herself, (or)¹ by means of certain domestics² of the state; and let her take a citizen, when disputing about his punishment, before the City-Stewards for trial; but let her punish herself, even a citizen, when there is no dispute. After six years of age, let each sex be separated; and let boys pass their time with boys, and girls in like manner with each other; and it is meet for each to be turned to learning, the males from the teachers of horsemanship, and archery, and the hurling of darts, and the using of slings, and the females too, if they consent so far as to learn especially what relates to the use of arms. But what is at present established on matters of this kind, is unknown to nearly all.

² Such may have been the case in Greece, and in the time of Plato. But in other countries and more recent periods the sports of children, so far from being invented by themselves, have been handed down from age to age ; and, as Paley once remarked, while empires have flourished and decayed, the sports of children have remained unchanged by time ; for they still ride on sticks, and play at odd and even, as Horace tells us they did in his day ; and make horses and carts out of orange peels, as Aristophanes states they did more than 2000 years ago.

Clin. What is that?

[5.] Athen. That what relates to the right and the left hand differs naturally,³ with respect to their use in the several actions pertaining to the hands; especially since there appears in what relates to the feet and the lower limbs no difference as regards labour. But in the case of hands we each of us tempore imperatura, prout legum custodes ordinaverint;" as if he had found in his MS. τῶν δὲ τροφῶν καὶ ἀγίλης, ἐκάστης ἐκ τῶν δώδεκα γυναικῶν μίαν τετάχθαι κοσμοῦσαν κατ' ἐνιαυτὸν, ὡς ἂν τάξωσιν οἱ νομοφύλακες, with the omission of ἐμπάσης after ἀγίλης, and τῶν προτερημένων after ἐνιαυτὸν, and the change of ἄς, found in six MSS., into ὡς, read in one. What Plato in reality wrote might perhaps be recovered by merely rearranging the different members of the sentence. Cousin however has penned a long note here, but produced nothing satisfactory.

¹ All the MSS. but one read αὐτῇ for αὐτῆν, in which lies hid αὐτῇ ἡ, as I have translated.

² Instead of the strange expression τινων τῆς πόλεως οἰκετῶν, one would have expected ὑπηρετῶν: or, as they were called at Athens, τοξότων, similar to the "tipstiffs," or rather "javelin-men," that still attend upon the High Sheriff of a county in England.

become, as it were, lame, through the (folly and)¹ ignorance of our nurses and mothers. For while the nature of our limbs on each side² is nearly balanced, we have ourselves, by not using them correctly, made them, through habit,³ different. In such employments as where there is no great difference, it is of no consequence, whether a person makes use of a lyre with his left hand and of the plectrum⁴ with his right, and whatever else is of a similar kind. But to make use of these examples in other cases, ⁵where there is no need of using it,⁵ is nearly a folly. This fact has the law of the Scythians pointed out, where a person does not push from him the bow with his left hand (merely), and draw to himself the arrow with his right merely, but he makes use of either similarly for both purposes. And there are very many other examples of this kind in charioteering and other things. From which one may learn, that those, who make the left hand weaker than the right, act contrary to nature. This, as I have said, is of no great moment in the case of plectra made of horn, and such like instruments; but in war, when it is necessary to use weapons of iron, and bows, and spears, ⁶and each of these,⁶ it matters much; but it is of the greatest moment by far, when it is necessary to use shields against shields. There is too a great difference between a person learning and one not learning, and between one, who exercises himself, and one, who is not exercised. For as he, who is perfectly exercised in the pan-

¹ As some MSS. read ἀνοία, and others ἀγνοία, I suspect that Plato wrote both, as I have translated.

² I have translated, as if the Greek were ἐκατέρωθεν, similar to "in utramque partem," in Ficinus, not ἐκατέρων, which to me at least is unintelligible.

³ I have adopted, with Stephens and others, ἔθῃ for ῥῥῥῃ, suggested by "consuetudinem," in Ficinus.

⁴ The "plectrum," used for the lyre, answered the purpose of the quill, by which the string was struck in the old-fashioned harpsichord; while from a subsequent remark it appears it was made of horn.

⁵ The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus, and after him by Taylor.

⁶ The words between the numerals, not very easy to understand, are omitted by Taylor. Ficinus has what is more intelligible, "cæterisque hujusmodi," unless it be said that the correct translation is, "But when it is requisite to make use in war both of bows and javelins, and each of these made of iron."

cratium,¹ or in boxing, or wrestling, is incapable of combating with his left-hand limbs, and becomes lame, and drags himself along in a superfluous manner,² when any one, causing him to change his position, compels him to exert himself on the other side, so the same thing, I conceive, one must expect in the case of shields, and in all the rest of weapons, that it behoves him, who possesses doubly the arms by which he can defend himself and attack others, not to suffer, to the utmost of his power, either³ of these to remain idle, and without skill;⁴ but if any one were born, possessing the nature of Geryon or Briareus,⁵ he ought to be able with their hundred hands to hurl a hundred darts. Of all these matters it is meet for the care to be under the female and male rulers; the former being superintendents over the sports and nurture (of the children), but the latter over their education, in order that all the boys and girls by having the perfect use of their feet and their hands may do, to the best of their power, no injury to their natures by their habits.

[6.]⁶ But a twofold education, so to say, it will happen to make use of;⁶ one, of gymnastics, relating to the body; the other, of music, for the sake of a good state of the soul. Again, those of the gymnastics are twofold; one dancing and the other wrestling. And of dancing one kind imitates the

¹ The pancratium was a contest of boxing and wrestling united.

³ In lieu of μηδὲν the sense requires μηδέτερον, "neither," as translated by Taylor.

⁵ These two giant sons of Heaven and Earth are similarly united in Euthyd. p. 299, C.

diction of the Muse,¹ preserving the gorgeous at the same time with the liberal; but another kind is for the sake of a good habit of body, and lightness, and the beauty of its limbs and parts, their own harmonious motion being imparted to each, (according to)² what is becoming in their bending and extending,³ and, at the same time, scattered through and following upon every kind of dancing sufficiently.³ The wrestling, however, which Antæus⁴ or Cercyon⁵ placed among their arts, for the sake of useless contention, or the boxing, which Epeius⁶ or Amycus⁷ did likewise, do not deserve to be graced by a discourse, as being of no use in the fellowship of war. But what relates to a stand-up wrestling, and the untwisting of the neck, and the hands, and the sides, when the labour is accompanied with a spirit for contention and a well-framed arrangement of body, for the sake of strength and health, these, as they are useful in every way, are not to be omitted; but we must enjoin upon disciples and masters at the same time, that when we come to that point of our laws, the latter are to impart with a good will all information of this kind, and the former to receive it with thanks. Nor must we omit such imitations in dances as are fit to be imitated; as regards this place, the armed sports of the Curetes,⁸ and, as regards Lacedæmon,

² I have translated as if καὶ, preserved in five MSS. after ἐκτάσειω, were a corruption of κατὰ, and had dropt out before τὸ προσῆκον.

⁶ Epeius, the maker of the Trojan horse, was the victor in boxing at the funeral games in honour of Patroclus.

⁸ These were called the Pyrrich dances; see the authors quoted by Ast.

those of the Dioscuri.¹ Our virgin too and mistress (Athéné) being delighted with the amusement of the dance, does not think fit to sport with empty hands; but, being adorned with a complete suit of armour, goes in this manner through the dance;² which acts it will be proper for the boys and girls to imitate, and to do honour to the kindness of the goddess shown during the needs of war, and in behalf of festive days. It will likewise be proper for the boys forthwith,³ and for as long a time as they shall not have gone out to war, to make to all the gods processions and pomps, with the adornment of arms and horses, and to perform their supplications to the gods and the sons of the gods, swifter and slower, with dances and marches; and to enter into contests, and preludes of contests, if for any purpose, for not other than these. For these, both in peace and war, are useful for a polity and private households. But the rest of labours, and sports, and pursuits relating to the body are not, Megillus and Clinias, suited to free-men. And thus the gymnastic, which I said in our former discourse ought to be gone through, I have almost gone through at the present moment, and the subject is finished. But if you have any thing better than this, lay it down as a common topic and speak upon it.

Clin. It is not easy, O guest, to put these on one side, and to have any thing better to say about gymnastics and contests.

Athen. With regard then to the gifts of the Muses and Apollo, which is the sequel to the preceding, we formerly thought that, as having said 'all correctly' (about them), we should have to leave only the subject relating to gymnastics;

³ I scarcely understand εὐθὺς thus by itself. It is omitted by Ficinus.

⁴ I have translated, as if the Greek were εὖ πάντα, not ἅπαντα. Ficinus has "de quibus ita satis dictum esse putabamus;" as if his MS. read εἰρηκότες ἱκανῶς, without ἅπαντα—but now it is evident that there is something which should be first mentioned before all. Let us then speak of it in order.

Clin. It must by all means be spoken of.

Athen. Hear me then, although you have heard previously. Nevertheless it is requisite for both the speaker and hearer to be cautious as to what is very strange and unusual ; and now too, although I am going to tell a tale not to be spoken without fear, I will nevertheless take courage, and not stand aloof.

Clin. What mean you, O guest, by this ?

[7.] Athen. I mean that in all states it is a thing unknown to all, that the family of games is of the greatest power in the laying down of laws, as to whether what are laid down will remain or not. ¹ For if it is so ordered, that the same persons shall always use the same (sports),¹ and according to the same, and in a similar manner,² and be delighted with the same playthings, it permits the institutions laid down with seriousness to remain quiet. But when the sports are disturbed, and innovations made in them, and they are affected constantly by changes, the young never speaking of the same things as being dear to them, and neither in the bearing of their own bodies, nor in the rest of their dresses, the becoming and the unbecoming are laid down as acknowledged by them, and when the person, who is ever making some innovation, and introducing something different from what is customary, as regards shape and colour, and every thing of that kind, is pre-eminently held in honour, we should, by saying that no greater bane could happen to a state than by such a thing, speak most correctly ; for he is secretly changing the morals of the young, and causing what is old to be dishonoured, and what is novel to be held in honour. Than this, both an assertion and a fixed opinion, I assert again, there is not a greater bane to all states. Hear, then, how great an evil do I say it is.

² On the phrase τὰ αὐτὰ κατὰ τὰ αὐτὰ καὶ ὡσαύτως καὶ ἀεὶ, expressive of what exists for ever and the same and under similar circumstances, Ast refers to Wytttenbach on Phædon, p. 198.

Clin. Do you mean the circumstance, that what is old in states is found fault with?

Athen. Entirely so.

Clin. You will then have in us no ordinary auditors, with respect to this very discourse, but the best disposed possible.

Athen. It is likely.

Clin. Only speak then.

Athen. Come then, let us hear it ¹more attentively than we usually do,¹ and thus speak to each other. For we shall discover that a change in all things, except the bad, causes us to stumble the most, in the case of all seasons,² and winds,² and in the diet of bodies, and in the manners of souls, and not merely, so to say,³ in some, but not in others,⁴ but in what⁴ I have just now said, in things bad. ⁵So that (any one will see), if he looks to⁵ bodies, how, being accustomed to all kinds of food and all kinds of drink and labours, they do, although they are at first disturbed by them, in time generate from those very substances flesh, kindred to such substances, and by becoming friendly and accustomed to, and acquainted with, all that diet, they exist in the best way as regards pleasure and health. But if at any time a person⁶ is compelled by necessity to change any part of the approved diet, he is at first disturbed by diseases, and with difficulty is set on his legs

²—² The words ἐν πνεύμασιν are omitted by Taylor. For finding in Ficinus "inventis," and not looking to the Greek, he did not see that "inventis" did not mean "in inventions," as he probably fancied, but "in winds."

³—³ On the phrase οὐ τοῖς μὲν, τοῖς δ' οὐ, see at Phileb. § 32, n. ³—³.

⁴ I have adopted ὁσπερ in lieu of ὅτι περ, as suggested by Bekker, for the sake of the syntax.

⁵—⁵ The Greek is ὥστε, εἴ τις ἀποβλέψει πρὸς σώματα, where Ficinus has omitted all but σώματα. For those words were either wanting in his MS., or, what is more likely, he saw that, if they were retained, there would be required something to complete the sense, in some other part of the sentences following. I have therefore translated, as if the Greek were ὥστ' εἰσεταί τις, εἰ ἀποβλέψει—For ὥστ' εἰσεταί τις εἰ might have been easily corrupted into ὥστε εἰ τις—

again,¹ ² after acquiring again a familiarity with his food.² The same thing, it is meet to think, takes place as regards the ideas of men, and the nature of their souls. For every soul has a reverence for the laws in which it may have been brought up,³ and which have, by a certain divine good fortune, remained undisturbed ⁴ through time (so) long and much, that ⁴ no one either recollects or has ever heard of their having been otherwise than they are at present, and it fears to disturb any of those then existing. The legislator then ought to devise from some quarter a plan as to the manner in which this may take place in a state. In this way then do I discover it. All men, as I have said before, consider the sports of youth, when they are disturbed, to be in reality sports, and not that the greatest seriousness and mischief arise out of them; so that they do not avert (the change),⁵ but comply with and yield to it; nor do they consider this, ⁶ that the children, who engage in these new sports, must necessarily become men different from those who were children in the former period;⁶ and that, becoming different, they will seek a different life; and so seeking will be desirous of other pursuits and laws; and no one fears that, after this, there will come upon states what has been just now called the greatest evil. But other changes would effect lesser evils;⁷ such at least as relate to fashions would suffer a thing of this

³ Instead of ἐντραφῶσι, both sense and syntax require ἐντραφεῖσ' ἦ, as I have translated.

⁶⁻⁶ For the sake of perspicuity, Ficinus has supplied some words wanting in the Greek. His version is, "quod necesse est, pueros diversis ac priores ludis gaudentes diversos differentesque a prioribus vivis fieri."

⁷ The Greek is ὅσα περὶ σχήματα πάσχει— But one MS. has πάσχει, which leads to ὅσα γε περὶ σχήματ' ἂν πάσχοι— as I have translated.

kind. But whatever alterations occur frequently with respect to praise and blame, touching the question of manners, these would, I think, be the greatest of all, and require the most caution.

Clin. How not ?

[8.] Athen. What then, do we still believe in our former assertion, in which we stated that the matters relating to rhythm and every kind of music are imitations of the manners of men better and worse ? Or how ?

Clin. Our fixed opinion would be in no respect otherwise than this.

Athen. We assert then, that we must contrive every kind of plan in order that the children in our state may not hanker after other imitations in dancing and singing, nor any one persuade them (to an innovation)¹ by introducing pleasures of various kinds.

Clin. You speak most correctly.

Athen. Has then any one of us any art better for this purpose than that of the Egyptians ?

Clin. What art do you mean ?

Athen. Of making holy every kind of dancing and melody, by ordaining, in the first place, festivals, after calculating² for the year, what ought to take place, and at what time, and in honour of what gods respectively, and the sons of gods, and dæmons ; and after this, what ode ought to be hymned at each sacrifice of the gods, and with what dances to honour the then sacrifice : ³which when they are ordained,³ (it is meet to) ordain some other things, so that all the citizens may in common make sacrifices (and)⁴ libations to the Fates, and to all the other deities, (and) consecrate their several odes to the gods severally, and to the others.⁵ But if any person intro-

² Ficinus omits συλλογισαμένους, and so, after him, does Taylor.

³ Before the words ἃ δ' ἂν ταχθῇ the text has τάξαι μὲν πρῶτον τίνος, out of which as Ficinus could make no sense, he has omitted them ; and so, after him, has Taylor. Stephens too was at a loss ; and hence he proposed to read τινας, suggested by "aliquas" in Cornarius. Plato wrote, I suspect, ἃ δ' ἂν ταχθῇ, τάξαι μὲν ἑτέρ' αὐτῶν, ὥστε—as I have translated.

⁴ I have inserted "and" ; for καὶ might easily have dropt out before σπένδοντας.

⁵ Ficinus has, instead of καὶ τῶν ἄλλων, "eorumve filiis et dæmoduces in honour of any god other hymns and dances besides those which are instituted by law, let the priests and priestesses, together with the guardians of the laws, restrain him in a holy manner, and according to law; and let him, who is restrained, if he is not willingly restrained, (suffer) the punishment of his impiety through the whole of life from any one who is willing to inflict it.

Clin. Right.

Athen. But since we are now engaged on this subject, let us be affected in a manner befitting us.

Clin. About what are you speaking?

Athen. Every young person, not merely the old, on seeing or hearing any thing out of the way, and by no means customary, would not immediately 'run thus' and concede what is the doubtful point respecting them, but he would stand still; and, as if being where three roads meet, and not knowing very well the road, whether he happened to be travelling alone, or in company with others, he would inquire of himself and the others, and not proceed before he had settled the question in his mind, as to whither the road would lead him. And we must act in a similar manner at present. For a strange conversation having now fallen upon us on the subject of laws, we ought necessarily to make every inquiry; and, being of such an age, to speak not readily on matters of such moment, insisting with vehemence, that we have it in our power to say something clearly on the instant.

Clin. You speak most truly.

Athen. We will, therefore, give the subject time, and decide then firmly upon it, when we shall have considered it sufficiently. But in order that we may not be prevented from going through in vain the arrangement consequent upon the laws, let us proceed to the end of them. For, perhaps, if god wills, this very digression will obtain wholly its completion, and point out sufficiently what is at present a matter of doubt.

Clin. You speak most excellently, O guest, and we will do as you say.

nibus," found just before. Taylor's translation is "and their attendants," which he got from I know not whence.

¹ I cannot understand ἐπιδραμὼν οὕτως—I could have understood ἐπιδραμὼν ἀνοήτως, i. e. "run thoughtlessly towards—" For thus "the running towards" would be opposed to "the standing still."

Athen. Let then, we say, this strange thing be decreed, that odes exist for us as laws, [and]¹ just as the ancients gave such a name, as it seems, formerly² with respect to playing on the harp;³ so that, perhaps, not even they would have entirely dissented from what is said by us at present; and some one has surely, as if either in a night dream or with his eyes open in the day, imagined and prophesied this. Let this then be the decree respecting it. Let no one utter any song besides the public and sacred songs, or move in any dance, contrary to the whole dancing of the young men, any more than (he would act) contrary to any other law: and let him, who is such,⁴ be dismissed without a fine; but let, as was said just now, the guardians of the laws, and the priests and priestesses, chastise him, who does not obey. Let then this be held to be laid down by us in our discourse.

Clin. Let it be laid down.

[9.] Athen. But in what manner can any one, so laying them down as laws, not be altogether a laughing-stock?⁵ Let us still consider something of this kind respecting them.⁶ It is the safest course to mould for them, as it were, certain impressions in our discourse. Now I assert that one of the impressions is something of this kind. The sacrifice having taken place and the victims burnt according to law, if some person, a son, we say, or a brother, should⁷ as a private person stand by the altars and sacred rites, and blaspheme with every kind of blasphemy, should we not say that he gave vent to a want of thought, and imposed an evil omen and prophecy both against his father and the rest of his kindred?

Clin. How not.

Athen. ⁶Now this is occurring in the places with us, the ¹ The word kai, which has no meaning here, is properly omitted by Ficinus.

²⁻³ Not only formerly, but in more modern times, the same word has been taken in a legal and musical sense. Thus the French "loix," a law, and "lais," a tale or song, are evidently of the same origin, and derived from the Latin "leg-o," I read, either letters or notes.

³ Ficinus has, more intelligibly, "qui parat," adopted by Taylor.

⁴⁻⁵ All between the numerals is omitted by Taylor.

states, so to say, nearly all by a little.⁶ For when any magistrate shall have performed any sacrifice publicly, after this there comes not one choir, but a multitude of choirs; and standing not far from the altars, but sometimes close to them, they pour forth every kind of blasphemy against things sacred, putting on the stretch¹ the souls of the hearers with words, and rhythms, and the most doleful harmonies; and he who causes the city, after it has made the sacrifice, to weep the most on the instant, carries off the victory.² Do we not reject by our votes this law? And if at any time it is requisite for the citizens to hear sorrows of this kind, it should be, not when the days are clear of any stain, but of an inauspicious³ kind rather; and then it is proper for some dancers (and)⁴ singers to be hired from abroad, just as those, who are hired at funerals,⁵ send forward⁶ the dead⁷ with some Carian strain. A thing of this kind would properly take place about such odes⁸ as these. Moreover a robe will be proper for funeral odes,⁹ could not thus follow τοῖς τόποις, nor ὀλίγου be united, after ὥς ἔπος εἰπεῖν, to σχεδὸν and πάσαις. Plato probably wrote τοῖς τε παρ' ἡμῖν—ταῖς τε ἄλλαις πόλεσι—ὀλίγου πάσαις; while σχεδὸν would be the explanation of ὀλίγου, although σχεδὸν ὀλίγου πᾶσα is found in p. 805, A. § 11. Ficinus avoids all the difficulty by his version, "In nostris civitatibus ferme omnibus, ut breviter dicam, hoc ita fit."

² In the preceding words there is evidently an allusion to the tragedies performed at or near temples, in which the characters, especially in the plays of Euripides, frequently gave vent to blasphemous expressions.

⁴ Ficinus alone has "externique cantores," who found, no doubt, καὶ before ψδοῦς in his MS.

^{5, 6} I cannot believe that Plato wrote περὶ τοὺς τελευτήσαντας—τοὺς τελευτήσαντας. He might have written, περιττῶς τίλη λύσαντας, i. e. "having paid sums extravagantly," and inserted those words after προπέμπονσι.

⁷ A similar custom of hiring mourners still exists in England, while the Carian howl of sorrow was no doubt the counterpart of the wake at an Irish funeral.

⁸ In lieu of ψδαῖς, which is evidently an absurdity, and omitted in one MS., Plato wrote as evidently ῥας, "seasons."

⁹ Here too ψδαῖς has again ousted the correct word ἀνδής—For it should be told, of what kind was the robe. Hence Ficinus, who acknowledges ψδαῖς, inserted, probably out of his own head, "lugubris" before "vestis."

and not crowns, or golden ornaments, but every thing the contrary, that I may be freed as quickly as possible from speaking on these matters. But thus much do I ask of you again, whether of the impressions relating to odes it is agreeable¹ to you for this first one to be laid down?²

Clin. Of what kind.

Athen. As a good omen; and moreover, let the genus of the ode be every where, and in every respect, a good omen to us. Or shall I not ask you at all, but lay it down thus?

Clin. Lay it down by all means; for by all votes this law is the victor.

Athen. What then, after this good omen, shall be the second law of music? Will it not be for prayers to be (offered) to the gods, to whom we on each occasion sacrifice?

Clin. How not?

Athen. But the third law, I think, will be, that it behoves poets, when they know that³ prayers are requests from men to the gods,³ ever⁴ to direct their mind very carefully to this point,⁵ that they may not unconsciously ask for what is an evil, as if it were a good.⁶ For the condition of a prayer of this kind taking place, would, I think, be ridiculous.

Clin. How not?

Athen. Were we not a little while ago convinced, that a Plutus, neither of silver nor of gold, ought to dwell in a state, as if settled there?

Clin. Entirely so.

Athen. Of what then shall we say that this discourse has been spoken as the pattern? Is it not of this, that not every race of poets is competent to know thoroughly things good and evil? Some poet then surely, having composed either in ^{1, 2} The Greek is ἀρεσκον κείσθω. But the imperative could not thus follow—ἐπανερωτή—ei— The syntax evidently requires, as I have translated, ἀρεσκοὶ κείσθαι—similar to “utrum placeat—adhiberi”—in Ficinus.

^{3—5} The Greek is εὐχαὶ παρὰ θεῶν αἰτήσεις εἰσι—which is evidently incorrect. Ficinus has “preces ipsas petitiones hominum a diis”—who found in his MS εὐχαὶ αἰται παρ’ ἀνῶν θεῶν αἰτήσεις εἰσι—as I have translated, omitting αἰται, which is unnecessary.

⁶ On mistakes of this kind, see Alcibiad. ii. § 1.

prose or 'verse, on a mistaken subject,¹ (so that)² our citizens make their prayers not correct respecting matters of the greatest moment, ³will not do all with impunity,³ especially since, as we have already said, we shall not find many mistakes greater than this. Let us then lay down this as one of the laws and forms respecting the Muse.

Clin. What one? Speak to us more clearly.

Athen. That a poet shall not compose any thing, either beautiful or good, contrary to what is lawful and just in the state; nor shall he be permitted to show what he has composed to any private person, before it shall have been shown to the judges and guardians of the law, appointed for this purpose, and approved of by them. Now they have been almost marked out, whom we have chosen as the lawgivers relating to music, and the guardian likewise of education. What then, as I have often asked, shall this be laid down⁴ as a law, and a type, and a third impression? Or how seems it?

Clin. Let it be laid down; how not?

[10.] Athen. After these there should be sung hymns to, and praises of, the gods accompanied with prayers; and after the gods in like manner, there should be prayers with praises to the dæmons and heroes, and suited to all of them.

Clin. How not?

Athen. And after these there should take place this law without any stint. Such of the citizens as may have come to the end of life, after having performed works honourable and laborious relating to the body and soul, and have been obedient to the laws, it shall be fitting for these to meet with praises.

Clin. How not?

Athen. But to honour those still living with praises and

¹—¹ I have translated as if the Greek were μέλος τι, τὸ ἡμαρτημένον, not μέλος τοῦτο τὸ ἡμαρτημένον—

² To support the syntax, which Ast has been unable to explain satisfactorily, I have supposed that ὥστε has dropt out.

hymns, it is not safe, ¹ before a person after having run through the whole of life, shall stand (still) at an honourable end.¹ Let all these be common to men and women, who have been conspicuously virtuous. But it is necessary for odes and dances to be established in this manner. There are many ancient and beautiful poems of old writers relating to music, and similarly to dancing for bodies.² Against choosing out of these what is becoming and suited to an established polity, there is no objection. Of these let the persons selected³ as examiners, being not less than fifty years old, make a selection. And let them select whatever of the ancient poems appears to be all-sufficient; but whatever is defective, or altogether unsuitable, let it be rejected entirely; or let them take poets and musicians, and employing their powers of poetry, adapt it to a new rhythm after it is corrected;⁴ but let them not give way to pleasure or desire, except in some few cases; but, interpreting the intention of the legislator, establish dancing and singing, and every dancing⁵ according to their own good sense. For every occupation relating to music, which adopts order, is infinitely better than that without order,⁶ even when the pleasant in music is not added. Now the pleasant is common to all music. For that music, with which a person has lived from childhood to a staid and intelligent age, ⁷(he considers to be pleasant,)⁷ inasmuch as it is temperate and in order. But on hearing a

² This introduction of "bodies" seems very strange, and has been omitted by Ficinus.

³ In lieu of ἐλομένους, one MS. has ἐνημένους, which leads evidently to ῥημένους—as I have translated.

⁴ Instead of ἐπανερόμενους in Ald., all the MSS. read ἐπανερόμενον: from which Ast happily elicited ἐπανορθούμενον, similar to "corrigant" in Ficinus.

⁵ As no one, I suspect, can explain the difference between δρχησιν and χορείαν, I cannot believe that Plato wrote here χορείαν, in lieu of which one would prefer χαρὰν, "joyousness."

contrary kind, he dislikes it, and calls it illiberal. But if he has been brought up in that, which is pleasant and common, he says that the contrary to this is frigid and unpleasant. So that, as I just now said,¹ what relates to the pleasant or the unpleasant does not exist about either as a superabundance, but from a superfluity the one makes those, who have been brought up in it on each occasion better, the other worse.¹

Clin. You have spoken well.

Athen. Further still, it will be meet to separate the songs suited to females and males, by defining them under a certain type, and necessary moreover to adapt them to harmonies and rhythms. For it is a shocking thing for the whole of harmony to be a discord, or rhythm to be out of tune, and thus to attribute to melodies nothing adapted to each of them.² It is necessary then to lay down by a law the figures of these. And it is necessary to attribute both constrained to both, but those of the females, by the difference of the nature of each, by this it is meet to mark out clearly.² Now that which is gorgeous and verges to fortitude, must be called manly; but that which more inclines to the ornamental and the moderate, must be handed down, both in law and in discourse, as more feminine. This, then, is the order. After this, let the teaching and handing down of them be detailed, as to the manner how, and the persons by whom, and the time when it is requisite to perform them. (And) as a shipwright,³ when he lays down the keel timbers, as the commencement of the ship-building, draws the form of vessels,³ I appear to myself to do the same thing,

²—² Such is the literal version of a passage which, as Sydenham and Ast truly observe, is evidently corrupt; but which neither have been able to correct satisfactorily. Ficinus has, what is adopted by Taylor, and is indeed intelligible; but it cannot be got out of the Greek, as existing at present—“Horum igitur formæ necessario legibus statuendæ sunt, utrisque convenienter attribuendæ; et quid virum quidve mulierem, deceat, ex ipsa utriusque naturæ differentia declarare.”

by endeavouring to distinguish the figures of lives according to the manners of souls, (and) in reality to lay down their keel-timbers, (and) very properly to consider by what device, and after what manner, we may live together and be carried the best during this voyage¹ of life. Human affairs, indeed, are not worthy of great attention; yet it is necessary to attend to them. This indeed is not a fortunate circumstance. But since we are here, if we can somehow accomplish this in a fitting manner, it will perhaps be within our measure. ²But what am I saying? This very point perhaps some one would take up, and rightly so.²

Clin. And very much so.

Athen. I say then, that to a serious thing we ought to pay a serious attention, but to a not serious one none at all; and that the deity is naturally worthy of every blessed³ attention, but that man, as I said before,⁴ has been devised as the plaything of a deity, and this is truly his best attribute. It is necessary then for every man and woman to pursue this mode, and, by engaging in the most beautiful sports, to pass thus through life with thoughts the reverse of what they think at present.

Clin. How?

Athen. At present indeed they think that serious pursuits ought to exist for the sake of sports. For they consider that they ought to well dispose the serious pursuits relating to war for the sake of peace. But in war there never has been naturally either sport or instruction worthy of mention, nor is there, nor will there be. But this we say is a thing to us the most serious, (that) every one ought to pass through life for the most part and the best in peace. What then is the proper manner, (in which)⁵ a person may pass through life in sport? and what are the sports for a person to engage in, while sacrificing avoids the difficulty by his abridged version, "quemadmodum vero navium faber carinulas primum ad navis formam supponit."

¹ Ficinus, followed by Taylor, has "per hæc maria."

²—³ Ficinus, whom Taylor follows implicitly, has "sed quid dicam, recte fortassis aliquis queret."

³ I hardly understand μακάριον here.

⁴ In i. § 13.

⁵ The Bipont editor was the first to insert here ῥ for the sake of the sense and syntax; and so after him Ast, to whom Stalbaum attributes the correction. Winckelmann, with Stephens, prefers τι πάλαιοντα— and singing and dancing, so as to be able to render the gods propitious to him, and to repel foes, and to be the victor in battle? Now by what singing and dancing a person may accomplish both these things, a portion of the type has been detailed, and the paths, as it were, have been cut, in which the person is to proceed, who thinks that the poet has well said, (in Od. iii. 26,)

“Some things, Telemachus, thou wilt thyself
Find in thy heart; but others will a god
Suggest; for I do not conceive thou hast
Been born or brought up 'gainst the will of gods.”

The same ought our nurslings likewise to bear in mind, and to consider that some things have been stated sufficiently, but that others a dæmon and a deity will suggest to them respecting sacrifices and dances in honour of what divinities and at what time they will by playing, each for each, render them propitious, and live themselves according to the manner of their nature, while they are for the most part things to stare at, yet partake in certain small particles of truth.

Megil. You are vilifying, O guest, in every respect the human race.

Athen. Do not wonder, Megillus, but pardon me. For, looking to the deity, and being affected (somewhat),¹ I have said what I have just [now]² said. But let our race be not a vile thing, if it so please you, but worthy of some serious attention.

[11.] With regard to the subject next in order after these, mention has been made³ of public schools, situate in a tripartite manner in the middle of the city; but out of and around the city the exercising grounds for horses have been (assigned) in a tripartite manner, and ample places put into order for the sake of the young men, learning and practising themselves in archery and other hurlings of missiles. But if they were not then spoken of sufficiently, let them now be mentioned in our discourse together with the laws.

In all these cases let masters in each art be induced by wages to reside as strangers, and to teach every one, who frequents their school, the learning that relates to war, and likewise to music; not only the youth, who comes to school, because his father wishes it, but him too who, because (his father) does not (wish), neglects his education, but, as the saying is,¹ every man and boy must by compulsion be instructed as well as they can, since they belong rather to the state than their parents. The very same things my law would mention relating to females, as it does to males. ²(For) it it is meet³ to exercise equally the females likewise. And I should fear to say respecting this subject of horsemanship and gymnastics, that they are becoming indeed to men, but not to women. For by hearing stories of the olden time have I been persuaded. And even at present, I know that there are, so to say,³ countless myriads of women about Pontus, whom they call Sauromatides,⁴ on whom there has been enjoined an exercise in common with, and perhaps equal to, that of men not only upon horses, but in bows likewise, and in the rest of arms. But I have, moreover, a reason for this, of some such kind as this. I say then, that if it is possible for these things to happen in this manner, of all things is that, which now takes place in our countries, the most silly, in the men not pursuing all together, and with all their might, and with one mind, the same pursuits as the women. For thus the whole state is and becomes but the half, instead of being the double, from the same expense and labour. And wonderful would this very error be to (any) legislator.

² In the formula $\epsilon\iota\pi\omicron\nu$, $\delta\pi\epsilon\rho$ $\epsilon\iota\pi\eta\kappa\alpha$, there is not elsewhere found $\nu\upsilon\nu$. See a host of examples collected by Abresch and Blomfield on Agam. 67, to which I could add as many more.

²—³ The Greek is ἴσα καὶ—δεῖν. But I have translated as if it were ἴσα γὰρ καὶ—δεῖ, where δεῖ is due to one MS.

³ Ficinus omitted ὥς ἱστος εἰπεῖν, for he did not remark that the phrase is to be referred to μυριάδες ἀναριθμητοί.

⁴ The women called here Sauromatides are better known by the name of Amazons. See Herodotus iv. 11, and the other authors quoted by Ast.

Clin. It seems so. Very much however of what has been asserted by us at present is, O guest, contrary to customary politics.

Athen. But I have said¹ that it is meet to permit² (us) to go through the discourse properly, and, when we have gone through³ it, to select⁴ thus what seems (the best).⁴

Clin. You have spoken very elegantly, and caused me to reproach myself for what I just now said. Speak therefore on this point whatever is agreeable to yourself.

[12.] Athen. This very thing (is agreeable)⁵ to me, Clinias, what I said above, that, if these matters are not sufficiently proved by deeds, that they can take place, it would be possible perhaps to gainsay them by words. But now something else must be sought for by him, who does not admit this law at all; but our exhortation will not in this case be extinguished, so that we should say that the female sex ought not to partake as much as possible in education and other studies in common with the male sex. For it is required that we⁶ think on these points in some such way as this. Say then, if women do not share in common with men in the whole of life, is it not necessary for some other arrangement to be assigned to them?

Clin. It is necessary.

Athen. What arrangement⁷ then among those, which are exhibited at present, shall we assign them in preference to this very partnership, which we are assigning to them? Is it

² In lieu of ἵασθαι one MS. has ἱάται: which seems to lead to πάντα, found perhaps in the MS. of Ficinus. For his version is, "totam disputationem," from whence Ast was led to say that if πάντα had been confirmed by a MS. he would have adopted it.

³ Instead of διελθόντος, which is without regimen, Ast would read, what I have adopted, διελθόντας, agreeing with ἡμᾶς understood.

⁴—⁴ The Greek is οὐρῶ αἰεῖσθαι τὸ δεκοῦν: where I cannot understand οὐρῶ, nor could Ficinus, who has omitted it in his version, "quod potissimum videtur, eligere," and added, what the sense requires, "potissimum."

⁵ Ficinus alone has "Hoc ipsum mihi placet."

⁶ I have adopted ἡμῖν, read in one MS., instead of οὖν.

that, in which the Thracians and many other nations employ their women, to cultivate the ground, and to tend cattle and sheep, and to minister to them in no way different from slaves? Or, as we do ourselves, and all around that place?¹ ²for what happens at present with us, is in this way.³ For having brought together into one dwelling, according to the saying, ³all our chattels,³ we hand over to the women the power to act as stewards, and to rule over the shuttles and all kinds of working in wool. Or shall we, Megillus, speak of a medium between these, adopted in Laconia? so that the virgins should live, partaking in gymnastic exercises and music, but the married women be unemployed in wool-work,⁴ but, weaving a kind of active life and in no respect mean or worthless, arrive at some middle point in the duties of attendants and stewards and bringers up of children; but not to take a part in warlike concerns, so as not to fight, even should a necessity arise from any accident to do so, in behalf of their city and children, nor be able with skill to take a part in the use of bows, like certain Amazons, or in any other kind of dart-hurling;⁵ nor yet, seizing the spear and shield, to imitate the goddess, and standing up nobly for their country, while it is laid waste, ⁶strike terror at least, if able to do ⁶nothing more, into the foe, when they are seen drawn up in a kind of array. And yet living even in this manner, they would not dare to imitate at all the Sauromatides, who would appear, as compared with them, to be men. Let then the person, who is willing to praise your legislators on these points, praise them; but my opinion will not be given otherwise. For a legislator ought to be a perfect and not a half one, who permits the female sex to

³⁻³ See in § 11, n.

⁶⁻⁶ The Greek is φόβον γε, εἰ μηδὲν μείζον, πολεμίοισι δύνασθαι παρᾶσχῆν—I have translated, as if it were—μείζον δύνασθαι, πολεμίοισι παρᾶσχῆν.

indulge in luxury and waste by making use of an unregulated living, and who, by taking a complete care of the male sex, leaves to the state nearly the half instead of the double of a happy life.

Megil. What shall we do, Clinias? Shall we permit our guest thus to run down our Sparta?

Clin. Certainly. For, since a liberty of speech has been given to him, we must permit him, until we shall in every way have gone through the laws sufficiently.

Megil. You speak correctly.

Athen. Is it not then nearly my business to endeavour to unfold what follows upon this?

Clin. How not?

[13.] Athen. What then will be the mode of life amongst men, for whom what is necessary may be procured in moderation, and the affairs of art handed over to others, and agriculture committed to slaves, who are to pay the first-fruits of the earth, sufficient for persons who live in a moderate manner; and common meals adopted, the men being placed apart, but their household kept near them,¹ and the female children likewise,¹ and their mothers; and where all these common meals are regulated by male and female governors, so that, after having inspected them daily, and seen the behaviour of those taking the common meals,^{2 3} they may on each occasion dismiss them;³ and after this, that the governor and the rest, after making libations to the gods, to whom that day or night is dedicated, may go home⁴ thus in this manner.⁴ By per-

^{1—1} Such is the literal version of the original. One would however expect that, as the girls are mentioned with their mothers, so would the boys, after a certain age, be with their fathers. Hence Plato wrote, I suspect, τὰ τῶν ἀνδρῶν παίδων τ' ἐν ἡβῃ ἰγγύς, ἔχόμενα δὲ τὰ τῶν αὐτοῖς οἰκίῳν θηλειῶν τε, in lieu of παίδων τε ἅμα θηλειῶν— And thus too we shall get rid of the tautology in ἰγγύς ἔχόμενα, to which Ast justly objects.

² In lieu of συσσιτίων, Schulthes first proposed συσσίτων, similar to “those that eat in common,” in Taylor’s translation.

^{3—3} The words λύειν ταῦτ' ἐκάστοις are without regimen placed between προστεταγμένα and τὰ ξυσσίτια— Ficinus found them transposed in his MS. after συσσιτίων, as shown by his version, “in eis observent quotidie animadvertentque singula, deinde cætus ipsos dissolvant—” Hence, to complete the sense and syntax, I have translated as if the Greek were, ὥστε, τὰ ξυσσίτια—ξυσσίτων, λύειν ταῦτα ἐκάστοτε—

^{4—4} In the words κατὰ ταῦτα οὕτως, omitted by Ficinus, as being with-sons under such regulations no work that is necessary, and in every way fitting, is left undone. But must each of them live after the manner of cattle, and grow fat? This, we say, is neither just nor honourable; nor is it possible for a man, who lives in this manner, not to fail in what is fitting. But it is fitting for an animal idle and grown fat through indolence to be almost torn to pieces by another animal amongst those greatly worn down by fortitude¹ and labours to boot.¹ If then we investigate these matters with sufficient accuracy, as we are doing now, they will perhaps never take place, as long as women, and children, and dwellings² remain private property, and every thing else is made such by each of us.² But those things, which have just now been mentioned as secondary to these, if they take place at all, would take place in a very moderate manner. We say then that to those, who live thus, there is left a work, neither the least nor vilest, but the greatest of all ordained by a just law. ³ For while the life of him, who is eager for victory in the Pythian or Olympian games, supplies a want of leisure for all other business,³ that life is filled with a double, or more than a double want of leisure,⁴ which has chosen most correctly the care of the body and soul altogether relating to virtue,⁴ for there ought to be nothing in the shape of a by-work as an impediment to the other works suited to the body, as regards the emolument⁵ from labours out any definite meaning, lies hid, I suspect, κατὰ πάντα εὐτάκτως, "in every respect in good order."

²—² Ficinus has briefly "et reliqua propria cuique erunt?" For he could not perhaps understand, nor can I, ἴδιαι καὶ ἰδίως ἄπαντ' ᾗ— I have therefore translated as if the Greek were ἴδιαι οὐσίαι ὡς καὶ πάντ' ᾗ—

and bringing up, nor in the case of the soul, from education and habits. Indeed the whole of the night and day is scarcely sufficient for a person, who is doing this very thing, to extract from them what is perfect, ¹ or even something sufficient.¹ Since then such is naturally the case, there ought to be to all free-men an order in the employment of all time, beginning almost ² from the morning until the other, ever continually both morning and sunrise.³ A lawgiver would indeed appear to be ill-conditioned, who speaks of many and frequent and trifling matters relating to the management of an household, ³ and the other things and whatever about sleeplessness³ it is becoming for those, who are about to watch completely over the state carefully. For that any citizen whatever should pass the whole of any night whatever in sleep, and not be seen by all his domestics, as being awake and getting up the first, this ought to be considered by all a disgraceful act, and not that of a free-man, whether it is meet to call it a law or a fashion. So too for a mistress to be called up by any servants, and reading, ἐπίδοσιν, which was evidently the conjecture of some scholar, probably Victorius; from which however nothing is gained. Opportunely then does one MS. offer ἀπόδον: from which and ἀπόδοσιν united it is easy to elicit πρόσοδον ἀπὸ—as I have translated, similar to the subsequent ἐκλαμβάνειν. From the loose translation of Ficinus it is impossible, as remarked by Stephens, to ascertain what he found in his MS. His words are, “nihil enim exercitationis corporeæ, nihil doctrinarum animi morumque propter alia negotia negligendum est.”

not for herself to first call up them, it is meet for the male and female slaves and house-lad to speak of amongst themselves, and, if it were possible, the whole household together, as a disgraceful thing. It is meet then for all to get up by night, and to perform their many parts in the business of the state and household; the rulers, as regards the city, and the mistresses and masters in their own families. For much sleep is not naturally suited to our bodies or souls, or to the actions relating to them. For he, who is asleep, is not of any more worth at all than he, who is not alive. But whoever amongst us is careful to live (well),¹ and to be the most wise, keeps awake for the greatest part of his time, reserving only what is necessary for his health. But ²it is not much going well to a habit.³ Now magistrates, who are awake by night in states, are a terror to evil-doers, whether enemies or citizens, but are admired and honoured by the just and the wise, and a benefit both to themselves and to the whole state.

[14.] The night, when passed through in this manner, supplies, in addition to all the above-mentioned (advantages), a certain fortitude to the souls of each of those who are in the state. But on the return of day and the early dawn, it is requisite for the boys to turn their steps to their teachers. For neither sheep nor any thing else ought to live without a shepherd, nor boys without some boy-leaders, nor slaves without masters. Now a boy is of all wild beasts the most difficult to manage. For by how much the more he has the fountain of prudence not yet fitted up,³ he becomes crafty and keen, and the most insolent of wild beasts. On this account it is necessary to bind him, as it were, with many chains;⁴ first by

²⁻³ Ficinus has—"ad hanc vero non multo opus est somno, si bene assueveris." The Greek is ἐστι δ' οὐ πολὺ καλῶς εἰς ἔθος ἰόν: it was, I think, ὅ ἐστι δὴ οὐ πολὺ, εἰ καλῶς τις εἰς ἔθος τοῖ— i. e. "which is not much if a person gets well into a habit."

boy-leaders, as soon as he is freed from his nurse and mother, ¹on account of his childishness and infantine state; ¹and still again by those who teach him ²any thing whatever, and by instructions ²as a free-born youth; but as being a slave, let it be lawful for any free-born man to punish the child, boy-instructor, and master, whenever any one of these commits any sin. But if any one, who happens to be present, does not punish the offenders according to justice, let him in the first place be subject to the greatest reproach; and let that one of the guardians of the law, who has been chosen to preside over the boys, look to the party who was present at the deeds of which we have spoken, and did not chastise (the offenders) when it was fit to chastise them, or did not chastise them in a proper manner; and looking with a keen eye, and pre-eminently regarding the bringing up of the boys, let him regulate their dispositions, by ever turning them to what is good according to the laws. But how shall our law itself sufficiently instruct that very person? For this it has not at present stated at all in a clear and sufficient manner, but only in some things, and some not. It is however necessary, to the utmost of our power to leave nothing for him (to do); but to explain the whole reason, in order that he may be to others both an interpreter and a bringer up. Now something has been already said about a ³choir, and melodies, and dancing, ³and possessing what type they are to be selected, and corrected, and made holy. But as regards what is written out of metre, we have not stated of what kind and in what manner it is meet for the boys brought up under thee, thou best guardian of the boys, to handle them. And yet you understand by our discourse what subjects relating to war it is meet for them to learn and to practise; but what relates to letters first and secondly ¹to the lyre, and about calculations, of which we said there is a need, and whatever it is requisite for each to learn relating to war, and house-regulation; and the administration, as respects the state, and relating to the very same things still useful of those in the revolutions of divine things, and respecting the stars, and sun, and moon, whatever it is necessary to regulate about these things in every state. But of what things am I speaking? Of the order of days according to the revolutions of months, and of months according to each year, in order that seasons, and sacrifices, and festivals, receiving each what is suited to them, by being celebrated according to nature, may render the city alive and awake, and pay to the gods the honours due, and cause men to be more intelligent respecting them ¹—all these matters, my friend, have been thus ²sufficiently discussed for you by the legislator. Direct therefore your mind to what is about to be said after this. Now we have said that you do not sufficiently understand what is the first thing respecting letters, ³while we were finding some fault with the conversation on this point, that it has not been as yet clearly stated to you, whether he, who is about to become a moderate citizen, should betake himself to an accuracy in learning, or not betake himself at all. And so too in the case of the lyre. ⁴We say then that he ought to betake himself. ⁴For learning

¹—¹ Such is the literal version of the mass of incoherent words existing at present in the Greek text; of which it would have been impossible to guess even at the meaning, had not Ficinus fortunately made his translation from a MS. far superior to any collated subsequent to his time; unless it be said, that he not only cut out, what he could not understand, but inserted out of his own head, what he conceived to be necessary for the sense. His version, adopted partially by Taylor, is to this effect—"quæ ad lyram, a legislatore dictum est, præter ea quæ ad computationem numerorum spectant, quibus opus esse diximus; et omnino quæcunque ad bellum ac rem familiarem publicamque conducunt; item quæ ad divinorum, astrorum, solis lunæque circuitum perquirendum, ut universa civitas non ignoret ordinem dierum in mensem mensiumque in annum; atque ita tempora, solemnitates, sacrificia, ut decet disposita naturali quodam ductu, vivam civitatem vigilantemque reddant, et diis honorem tribuant et homines ad hæc prudentiores efficiant."

³ By γράμματα in Greek was meant not simply letters or writing, but both united, what we call "reading and writing."

⁴—⁴ The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus, and after him by Taylor.

to read and write three years would do for a boy ten years old. But to those, who are thirteen, three years for handling the lyre would be a moderate time. Nor let it be lawful for ¹a father (to permit), or his son of his own act ¹to make his application to these studies more or less, and for more or less years than these ²whether desirous to learn or hating it.² And let him, who disobeys (the law), be deprived of those youthful honours, which are to be mentioned shortly afterwards. But hear this first, what the youths ought to learn during this period, and what the masters to teach. They ought to labour at letters until they are able to write and read. But let us leave those unregarded, whom nature has not urged on to become, ³with respect to quickness and beauty,³ proficient within the years enjoined. But in the case of the lyreless learning⁴ of poets preserved in writings, some in metre, and others without metrical⁵ divisions, ⁶which are called merely compositions in prose⁶ destitute of rhythm and harmony, there have been left to us unsafe writings⁷ by some such men, the majority⁷ of

³—³ On the phrase πρὸς τάχος or πρὸς κάλλος with γράφειν, see the Commentators on Thom. Mag. p. 274, with whose notes had Badham been conversant, he would not have proposed in Præf. Iph. T. p. 19, to read εἰς καλὰς τύχας for εἰς κάλλος τύχας in Eurip. Troj. 1202.

⁵ I have adopted ρυθμικῶν for ρυθμῶν, proposed by the Bipont editor.

⁶—⁶ The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus, who is followed by Taylor. They are evidently an interpolation.

⁷—⁷ Such is the literal version of the Greek παράτινων τῶν πολλῶν τοιούτων ἀνθρώπων: which I cannot understand, nor could Ficinus; who omits τῶν πολλῶν—Perhaps Plato wrote παρά τινῶν ὄντως ἀπλῶν which, ye best of all guardians of the laws, how will ye make any use? Or how would a lawgiver, ordering you to use them, correctly order? I expect he would be much at a loss.

Clin. ¹What is this, guest, which you seem to say, as regards yourself, as being in reality at a loss.¹

Athen. You have taken me up correctly, Clinias. But before you, who are associates with me on the subject of laws, it is necessary for me to state ²what seems to be an easy matter, and what does not.²

Clin. What then, do you now say, ³and what has been your state,³ with respect to these matters?

Athen. I will tell you. For it is by no means easy to speak what is opposed to many myriads of mouths.

Clin. But what, does it (not) ⁴seem to you that the few and trifling matters, previously mentioned by us relating to laws, are somewhat opposed to the multitude?

Athen. You have spoken this with the greatest truth. ⁵For, as it seems to me, you are exhorting me to proceed confidently in this road, although it is arduous and odious to many, and to advance through the path of laws, which our present discourse has laid open, without omitting any particular, when perhaps a journey of this kind will be pleasing to others not fewer in number, and, if fewer, not worse.⁵

ἀνοήτων τ' ἀνθρώπων, i. e. "by some persons really simpletons and un-intellectual."

²—² Ficinus, followed by Taylor, almost literally, has "quæ certa et quæ dubia mihi videntur."

³—³ Here again Taylor has followed Ficinus, "quid te movit."

⁴ In lieu of ὀλίγα four MSS. offer ὀλίγον, which evidently leads to ὀλίγ' οὐ—

⁵—⁵ From this version made by Taylor, it is shown beyond all doubt that he looked merely to the Latin of Ficinus, and not to the Greek; which is literally—"For you are indeed exhorting me, as it seems to me, while the same road has become hateful to many, and perhaps agreeable to others not fewer, and if fewer, not the worse at least, with whom you are exhorting me to run a risk, and with confidence to march along the road of legislation, now cut out by the present conversation, and to be remiss in nothing." Here although Ast would supply the want of the apodosis in the latter part of the sentence by repeating διακίλευει after κελεύει, yet Ruhnken on Timæus, 128, felt disposed to adopt the correction of a critic in Miscell. Observ. ii. 2, p. 307, who proposed to read; what the sense requires in part, ὁδοῦ ἔχουσαι ἐχθοδοποῦ—while no one has hitherto seen that Plato certainly wrote ταυτῆς τῆς ὁδοῦ, "this road," not τῆς

Clin. How not?

[15.] Athen. I am not then remiss. I assert indeed, that there are very many writers of poetry amongst us, in hexameters and trimeters,¹ and all the so-called measures,¹ some having aimed at seriousness, others at fun; in whose writings very many myriads assert that we ought to bring up such of the youths as are properly instructed, and to render them full even to satiety, by making them to be frequent hearers at the reading of them, and very learned in them, through having got whole poets by heart. But others say that, selecting the heads from all, and bringing to the same point entire sentences, they ought to learn them well² by committing them to memory, if any one among us is about to be a good man and wise through much experience and much learning. Do you, then, exhort me with a freedom of speech to show to them what they say correctly or not?

Clin. How not?

Athen. By saying what then upon all these points shall I in one word say what is sufficient? I think it nearly something of this kind, in which every one would agree with me, that each of those³ (the poets) have said many things beautifully, and many the reverse. And if this be the case, I assert, that much learning is bringing danger to youth.⁴

Clin. How then, and what would you advise the guardian of the law to do?

Athen. Of what are you speaking?

Clin. By looking to the pattern of what thing would he permit all the youths to learn one subject and forbid them another? Speak, and do not shrink from speaking.

αὐτῆς ὁδοῦ, "the same road," and probably ἔχουσιν ἀποδοῦς πολὺ, to balance the subsequent προσφιλοῦς, and διὰ καλοῦ δεῖ, in lieu of διακελεύει: for thus πορεύεσθαι would be governed by δεῖ, and διὰ καλοῦ show that the march was for the sake of what is honourable.

¹—¹ The words between the numerals are omitted by Taylor, who followed Grynæus, who threw them out of the translation of Ficinus, because there was nothing to answer to them in the then existing Greek text, which has been subsequently supplied by six MSS.

² As ἐκμανθάνειν means by itself "to learn by heart," to avoid the tautology in εἰς μνήμην τιθεμένους, I have translated as if the Greek were εὖ μανθάνειν—

³ Ficinus has "poetis," as if his MS. read τῶν ποιητῶν, not τούτων—

⁴ This was the doctrine of Heracleitus, who said ἡ πολυμαθὴ νόν οὐδὲν δίδασκει.

Athen. My good Clinias, I seem almost in a certain manner to have been fortunate.

Clin. About what?

Athen. In not being entirely in want of a pattern. For now, after looking to the discourse, which we have gone through, from the morning up to the present moment, not without the inspiration of some god, as we appear to myself, ¹I fancy, by Zeus, that something has been said by a person in his senses ¹altogether similar to a kind of poetry. Nor has perhaps any wonderful event fallen upon me, in being delighted with looking upon our own discourse, as being collected together.² For of the very many discourses in poems, or spoken thus in prose, which I have learnt and heard, they have appeared to me to be the most moderate of all, and the most fit for youths to hear. Hence I conceive I could not have to mention to a guardian of the laws and an instructor a pattern better than this, or to exhort the masters to teach boys these subjects, and what are next and similar to these, whether a person happens to be going through the compositions of poets, or what has been written in prose, or spoken thus nakedly, without being written, as being the brothers of these discourses, so as not to neglect them in any way, but to write them down; and in the first place to compel the teachers themselves to learn and praise them; ³and not to employ as co-workers the teachers, to whom they are not acceptable; but that such a person may find giving their votes for praise, let him make use of these, and hand over to them the youths to teach and to instruct. Here then and thus let my tale be brought to an end, after having been told as regards the teachers of letters and letters likewise.³

Clin. ⁴As regards the argument,⁴ stranger, we do not ap-

² I must leave for others to understand, what I cannot, οἶον ἀθρώους. From the preceding allusion to the inspiration of some god, it is quite evident, to myself at least, that Plato wrote οἶον ἐνθίους—"as if god-inspired." On the corruption of ἐνθεός see myself on Eumen. 17.

⁴—⁴ The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus, and after him by Taylor.

pear to myself at least to have wandered from the subject proposed. But whether we are right upon the whole or not, it is perhaps difficult to assert positively.

Athen. But this, Clinias, will then become more clear, as is reasonable, when, as we have often said, we arrive at the end of this digression respecting the laws.

Clin. True.

[16.] Athen. After the grammar-master is not the harp-master to be spoken of?

Clin. How not?

Athen. I fancy that, if we recollect our previous discourse, we assigned to the harp-masters what was suited to the teaching and the whole of education in things of such a kind.

Clin. Of what kind of things are you speaking?

Athen. We said, I think, that the Dionysiacal singers of sixty years of age¹ ought to have pre-eminently a fine perception of rhythms, and the compositions of harmonies, in order that² (some one, through knowing well) the imitation by melodies, when it is well or ill done, at what time an affection how violent soever may happen to the soul,³ may thus,⁴ by being able to select the resemblances of the good (soul) and those of the contrary one, reject the latter, but bring forward the former, and⁵ hymn to and enchant the souls of the young,⁶ and invite each of them, while following him on account of the imitations, to be led on⁷ to the possession of virtue.

Clin. You speak most truly.

Athen. For the sake then of these matters, it is requisite

¹ This mention of singers of sixty years old, having a fine perception of rhythms, seems very strange. For at that period of life all the finer perceptions have generally ceased to exist, at least in northern climates, and still more in the southern; where the faculties of man are more early developed, and more early decay. In ii. p. 670, B. § 11, the age is fifty years.

²⁻³ For the sake of the syntax, without which it is impossible to get satisfactorily at the sense of an ancient author, I have translated as if, instead of ἐν τοῖς παθήμασιν ὅταν ψυχῇ γίγνηται—the Greek were originally ἐγγονός, πάθημ' ὅσον ὅταν ἐν ψυχῇ γίγνηται—

³ In lieu of ὦν τις, the sense seems to lead, as I have translated, to ὦν, οὕτως—

⁴⁻⁵ The Greek is ὑμνῇ καὶ ἐπάδῃ ταῖς τῶν νέων ψυχαῖς. Ficinus has “adolescentium auribus concinant trahantque eorum animos—”

for both the harper and his pupil to use the sounds of the lyre, ¹ for the sake of the clearness of the chords, by bringing out sounds in accordance with sounds.¹ But (as regards) the difference and variety of the sounds of the lyre—the chords producing some melodies, and the poet who composes the strain others—and moreover² others by their making the thick³ and the thin, the swift and the slow, the sharp and the flat, agree with or opposed to each other respectively, and by adapting similarly all the varieties of rhythms to the sounds of the lyre, it is not lawful⁴ to bring all such things as these before those, who are about to extract quickly in three years what is useful in music. For contraries, confusing each other, produce a difficulty in learning. But it is requisite that the young should be as quick as possible to learn. For the subjects of education enjoined upon them are of necessity not trifling or few. However, our discourse, as it proceeds, will, together with time, point them out. To such matters relating to music, let the teacher thus attend. But the melodies and words, of what kind and what it is meet for the choir-masters to teach, have been all previously discussed; and we have said that, by being consecrated and adapted each to festivals, they ought to be of service to the state, by contributing to a pleasure of a happy kind.⁵

Clin. And this too have ⁶you discussed with truth.

Athen. Most truly indeed.⁶ And let him, who is chosen the ruler as regards music, receive these rules from us, and let him

² From the words καὶ δὴ καὶ is evident that some participle has dropt out of the sentences preceding.

³ By πυκνότης is meant, says Martianus Capella, ix. p. 320, quoted by Ast, “a certain quality composed of three sounds,” which I must leave for musical Greek scholars to explain.

⁴ The Greek is πάντ' οὖν τὰ τοιαῦτα μὴ—But one MS. for μὴ reads μὲν—where νόμιμον lies hid; and hence I have altered οὖν into οὐ— attend to them with a kind fortune. ¹ But let us deliver them relating to dancing and the whole of the gymnastics pertaining to the body, in addition to what has been stated previously; (and) as we have delivered the instruction, that remained respecting music, let us act in a similar manner with regard to gymnastics. For it is meet for boys and girls to learn to dance and to practise gymnastics likewise.¹ Is it not?

Clin. Certainly.

Athen. Now for the boys dancing-masters, but for the girls dancing-mistresses, would be the better fitted² for going through the occupation.

Clin. Be it so.

Athen. Again, let us call the man, who has the most to do, the curator of youth; and who, since he attends to the subjects relating to music and gymnastics, will not have much leisure.

Clin. How then is it possible for a person, advanced in years, to attend to so many things?

Athen. Easily, my friend. For the law has allowed and will allow him to take to himself as his associates³ in such an employment, whomever of the male and female citizens he pleases; and he will know whom he ought (to take); and he will be desirous⁴ not to do wrong in these matters⁴ while⁵ prudently knowing and reverencing the importance of his office, and⁵ being conversant with the reasoning⁶ that, when youths

^{1—1} Such 'is the literal version of the Greek. Ficinus has thus transposed the sentences, "nos vero, sicut musicæ docendi modum, qui restabat, adjecimus, ita nunc saltationi et universæ corporis gymnasticæ, cum idem reliquum sit, idem quoque adjiciamus:" while Taylor has adopted the transposition and thus abridged the original, "But as we have delivered what remained to be discussed respecting music, we shall do the same respecting dancing, and the whole of the gymnastic pertaining to the body."

² I have translated as if the Greek were ἀνεπιτηδείστεροι, not ἀνεπιτηδέϊστερον.

³ On this sense of προσλαμβάνειν, see at Æsch. Prom. 225.

^{4—4} The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus, and after him by Taylor.

^{5—5} I have followed, as Taylor does likewise, Ficinus in transposing the order of the words αἰδοῦμενος ἐμφρόνως καὶ γινώσκων into γινώσκων ἐμφρόνως καὶ αἰδοῦμενος.

⁶ The Greek is λογισμῶ — ξυνῶν, where Ast would read ξυνυῖς — Ficinus has "ignoret." Taylor, "being well convinced."

have been and are properly brought up, every thing will sail on prosperously ¹(over the sea of life);¹ but if not,² it is not fit to state, nor do we state (what will follow)³ through our venerating the great lovers of prophets in a new city.⁴

[17.] Much then has been said by us on the subjects relating to dancing and all the movements of gymnastics. For under gymnastics we place all the exercises relating to war in archery and every kind of hurling, and the use of the small shield, and all the fighting with the large shield, and the tactics of sallying out, and all the marching of armies, and their conduct in camps, and whatever relates to cavalry regulations. For all these subjects there ought to be teachers in common, obtaining their pay from the state, and having both men and boys as their pupils, and girls and women skilled in all these matters—those who are still virgins practising every kind of dancing, and fighting in armour, but the women laying hold of the science of sallying out,⁵ and of laying down and taking up arms, if for nothing else,⁶ at least for this, that should there be a necessity at any time for those, who had been guarding⁷ the children and the rest of the city, to leave the town with their whole force,⁸ and to march to a distance from it, the women may be sufficient for so much⁹ as this. Or, on the contrary,

² The Greek is πλεῖ, μὴ δέ—But an aposiopesis cannot be expressed by a prohibitive formula. Plato wrote πλεῖ, εἰ δὲ μὴ—as I have translated.

³ Ficinus adds, what the sense requires, "quid sequatur," as if his MS. read τὸ ἐπὶ for ἐπὶ before καὶ νῦν πόλει.

⁵ The Greek is διεξόδων καὶ τάξεων. It should be διεξόδων τακτικῶν, as just before.

⁶ Ficinus, "si nullius rei alterius gratia, attamen," as if his MS. read εἰ μηδενὸς ἕνεκα ἄλλου, ἀλλ—as remarked by Stephens.

⁷ I have adopted φυλάξαντας, found in four MSS., in lieu of φυλάξον-τας, which Ast says may be referred to the women. But then Plato would assuredly have written φυλαξούσας. Ficinus has, in an abridged form, "si res cogat, ut in militiam viri omnes profisciantur, possint ipsæ inter-irim, si quid adversi acciderit, civitatem defendere."

⁸ Unless I am greatly mistaken, πάσῃ τῇ δυνάμει is an explanation of πανδημει.

⁹ As to defend the town.

(should it happen,) ¹ ² what is not at all denied to be possible, ³ that enemies from without fall upon it with some mighty power and force, whether Greeks or Barbarians, and furnish the necessity for a battle to take place for the state itself, it would surely be a great fault in a polity for the women to have been brought up in so shameful a manner, as not to fight, as even birds do in behalf of their offspring with the strongest of wild animals, ³ nor to be willing to die, and to expose themselves to every danger; but straightway to hurry ⁴ to sacred places, and to fill all the altars and temples, and to bring down upon the race of women the bad repute ⁵ of being the most cowardly of all animals.

Clin. ⁶ By Zeus, O guest, this would be by no means seemly, independent of the cowardice, in any state, where it might take place. ⁶

Athen. Let us then lay down the law so far as this at least, that warlike concerns ought not to be neglected by women, but that all the citizens, both male and female, ought to attend to them.

Clin. I agree with you.

Athen. With respect to wrestling, then, we have said something; but that which is, as I should say, the greatest thing, we have not spoken of; nor is it easy to speak of it, without pointing it out with the body, as well as by word of mouth. This then we will determine, when our language, following out acts, shall indicate something clear about the other points of which we have spoken; and that such a wrestling is in reality of all motions allied the nearest to a personal encounter in battle; and, moreover, that it is requisite to attend to this for the sake of that, but not that for the sake of this.

¹ Stephens was the first to see, that as there is nothing to govern the infinitive παρασχεῖν something has dropt out here. The missing word was, I suspect, τυχόν, as I have translated.

^{2—3} So Ast explains ἀνέμωρον. With regard to the syntax in ὣν οὐδὲν ἀνέμωρον, Stephens suggested, what Ast has adopted, ὃν οὐδὲν ἀνέμωρον. But the sense requires rather ὃ οὐδ' αὖμ' ἀνέμωρον—

⁵ Faehse aptly compares Æsch. S. Th. 165.

⁶ The Greek is καὶ δόξαν. I have translated as if it were, καὶ ἀδοξίαν, similar to ἀλσος ἔχει in Hom. Od. A. 432, and the passages quoted on Menexenus, § 14.

^{6—6} Such is the literal version of the Greek. Ficinus, whom Taylor follows to the letter, has, "Per Jovem, hospes, et dedecori hoc et detrimento est civitati."

Clin. Beautifully indeed do you say this.

[18.] Athen. Let then thus much be held to have been said up to the present moment on the subject of wrestling. But with respect to the other motions of the whole body, the greatest part of which a person would, by calling it a certain dancing, call it correctly, it is proper to consider as of two kinds; one imitating the solemn in the more beautiful bodies, but the other the depraved in baser bodies. And again, of the depraved there are two species, and two of the serious. Of the serious motion one kind exists, when bodies of beauty and a soul of bravery become implicated in war and violent exertions: but the other, when a temperate soul (being mixed up) with a prosperous state and moderate pleasures. Now he who calls a dancing of this kind pacific, calls it according to its nature. ¹ But the warlike, on the other hand,¹ which is entirely different from the pacific, a person would correctly call Pyrrhic; which imitates the careful guarding against all blows and hurlings by leanings away,² and by every kind of yielding and leapings on high, together with a lowering of the body; and the contrary to these, which are borne along to active gestures in the shooting of arrows, and the hurling of javelins, and which attempt to imitate the infliction³ of all kinds of blows. ⁴ But that which is erect and braced up in these, when an imitation takes place of good bodies and souls, becoming straightforward for the most part of the limbs of the body, receiving a thing of this kind as right, but the contrary as not

² Ast and others explain ἐκνεύσεις by “inclining away.” But that would be ἀπονεύσεις: and so perhaps Plato wrote. For ἐκ and ἀπ are constantly confounded in MSS. See Porson Miscell. Crit. p. 181.

⁴—⁴ Such is the literal translation of the Greek, out of which Ast has been unable to make any thing satisfactory; and I am equally in the dark. Ficinus has “in his omnibus arbitrari oportet, quando intrepidus et constans habitus in membrorum rectitudine et fortitudine adhibetur, recte fieri; quando vero, non recte.” What Plato wrote, might, however, be right.⁴ In this way, on the other hand, we must look upon the pacific dancing of each,¹ whether a person lays hold or not of the beautiful dancing, and conducts himself in a becoming manner in the dances of men, acting according to law. It is necessary, then, to separate first the dancing about which there is a doubt from that about which there is not a doubt. Now what is this? And how must we separate them? Such then as is Bacchic, and belongs to those that follow the Bacchants, whom some persons,² calling by the name of Nymphs, Pans, Silenuses, and Satyrs, say that they imitate, and,³ drunk with wine, perform⁵ purifications and certain mystic rites, the whole of this kind of dancing it is not easy to define, as being neither pacific, nor adapted to war, or (to say) what it means. But it seems to me that it is nearly the most correct to define it in this way, by placing the warlike dancing apart, and apart too the pacific, and to assert that this kind of dancing is not adapted to a civil⁴ life. Leaving it, therefore, to lie down lying there,⁵ let us return to the warlike and pacific dancing, as being indubitably ours. Now the kind of the unwarlike Muse, and that which honours⁶ the gods and the sons of the gods by dancing,⁷ will become altogether one kind,⁷ when it takes place in the reputation⁸ of doing well. And we could recovered by a bold conjecture, which it is unnecessary to bring forward.

²⁻³ In lieu of ἱκονομάζοντες ὥς φασι μιμῶνται, where ὥς is omitted by Ficinus, I have translated as if the Greek were, ἱκονομάζοντες τινες, φασὶν ὅτι μιμῶνται, καὶ—

⁴ Instead of πολιτικοῦ, Taylor has “to war,” misled by the preceding πολεμικοῦ.

⁵ Since κείμενον—κείσθαι are not, I believe, thus united elsewhere, in δε κείμενον lies hid perhaps δ' ἐκβαλλόμενον, “rejected.” Compare Axioch. § 12, δήμου παίγνιον ἐκβαλλόμενον.

⁶ I have with Stalb. adopted τιμῶν, first suggested by Stephens, and subsequently found in five MSS.

⁷⁻⁷ The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus, and after him by Taylor.

make of this a twofold division; the one, possessing greater pleasures, after we have escaped¹ from certain labours there¹ and dangers to what is good; but the other, when there is a preservation and increase of former good things, possessing pleasures milder than them;² since in matters of this kind, every one is affected with greater movements in the body, when the pleasures are greater, but with less, when they are less; and he, who is more orderly, and more exercised in fortitude, exhibits less changes of movement; but he, who is timid, and unexercised in temperance, the more vehement; and generally every one, who emits a sound, whether in singing or in speaking, is not entirely able to exhibit tranquillity in his body. Hence an imitation of what has been said, taking place by gestures has produced the whole of the art of dancing. In all these occasions, one person amongst us moves elegantly, but another inelegantly. Now it is fitting for him, who reflects, to praise many others of the old names, as being assigned correctly, and according to nature; and to one of them, relating to the dancings³ of those who are doing well, and are moderate in their pleasures,³ how correctly and at the same time musically did he, whoever he was, give a name. For⁴ assigning to them taken all together a name according to reanus was, I suspect, the whole passage from τὸ δὴ τῆς ἀπολέμον to διαιροῖμεν ἂν. For he has thus abridged it in his version, "genus autem illud musæ, quo in pace et prosperitatis opinione utimur, deos deorumque filios honorantes, bipartito distinguitur."

²—² Here too Ficinus appears to have been in the dark, and so am I, as to the meaning of ἐκείνων: which he has omitted, and supplied the words "peragi solet," wanting to complete the sense, as if his MS. read κινούρ' ἂν in lieu of ἐκείνων.

⁴ After καὶ there is evidently wanting γὰρ—son, he called it Emmeleia.¹ and established two kinds of beautiful dancings, one warlike, called Pyrrhic, the other pacific, called Emmeleia, assigning to each a becoming and fitting appellation. These matters it behoves the lawgiver to explain by types, but the guardian of the laws to seek out; and having sought out, to combine dancing with the rest of music, and to distribute at all festivals that which is suited to each of the sacrifices; and having thus made them all holy in their order, hereafter to disturb nothing connected with dancing or singing. ²For it is requisite that the same city and the same citizens should pass their time as far as possible equally in the same pleasures,³ and live really³ well and happily.

[19.] The matters then relating to the dancings of beautiful bodies and souls, of what kind it has been said they ought to be, have been gone through. But it is necessary to look into and know those relating to disagreeable bodies and thoughts, and of those that are directed to the comicalities of laughter, as regards the language, and the song, and the dance, and the imitations of all these, done in a comical way. For it is not possible to learn serious things without the laughable, nor the converse of any thing without its contrary, if a person is about to be intellectual; but to do both it would be not possible, if a person is on the other hand about to have even a little share of virtue. But it is meet to learn them for the sake ⁴of this very thing,⁴ namely, the not doing or saying at any time through ignorance what is ridiculous, when there is

no need of it; but (it is proper)¹ to order slaves and hired strangers to imitate things of this kind; but for no serious study of them to exist at any time, or for any free person, either woman or man, to be seen learning them,² but for some novelty of imitations about them to always appear.³ Thus then let whatever are the sports pertaining to laughter, which we all call comedy, be laid down both by our language and law. But should any of the serious poets, who, they say, are occupied on tragedies, come to us and ask—Shall we, O strangers, come to your city and country, or not, and bring our poetry and act³ it? or how is it decreed for you to do in matters of this kind? what answer to this should we correctly give to these divine men? This to myself indeed it seems good to say—O most excellent of strangers, we are ourselves, to the utmost of our power, poets of a tragedy the most beautiful and best. For the whole of our polity consists in an imitation of a life the most beautiful and best, which we say is in reality the truest tragedy. You, therefore, are poets, and we too are poets of the same kind, being your opponents in art, and antagonists in the most beautiful drama, which true law alone has naturally completed,⁴ as is the hope in us. But do not think that we shall so easily suffer you to fix your scenes in

^{2—3} Such is the literal version of the Greek, καινὸν δὲ δεῖ τι περὶ αὐτὰ γίγνεσθαι τῶν μμημάτων: where since τῶν μμημάτων is plainly superfluous after αὐτὰ, Plato wrote, I suspect, καινὸν δὲ δεῖ ποτε περὶ αὐτὰ γίγνεσθαι, ὅτων μμήματ' ᾗ: i. e. "but to ever appear new to the subjects of which these are imitations;" where καινὸν would apply to a person and not to a thing. Ast indeed says that the reason for the novelty in the imitations is, that, if the same subjects were repeated, people would become accustomed to them; for he perhaps remembered the lines of Pope, who says that,

"Vice is a monster of such hideous mien,
That to be hated it needs but be seen;
But seen too oft, familiar with its face,
We first endure, admire, and then embrace."

But so far was Plato from patronizing any novelty in ludicrous imitations of comedy, that he would not admit even the serious ones of tragedy.

⁴ Instead of ἀποτελεῖν πέφυκεν, one would have expected ἀποτελεῖν κατὰ φύσιν ἔχει, similar to "potest perficere" in Ficinus.

our place of meeting, and, introducing players with beautiful voices, and who talk louder than we do, to speak in public before our children and wives and all the masses not the same things as we do about pursuits, but for the most part even the most contrary. For we should be ourselves nearly quite mad, and the whole state too, should it permit you to do what has been just now mentioned, before the magistrates shall have decided whether you have composed what is to be spoken and fit to be brought forward or not. Now then, ye children,¹ offspring of the tender Muses, we will, after first showing your odes² by the side of ours to the rulers grant you a Chorus; if what has been said by you shall appear to be the same as, or better than³ that by us, but if not, we shall never, friends, be able to do so. Let then these be the customs, ordained by laws, relating to all kind of dancing and the teaching of them, that separate are the affairs of slaves, and separate those of masters, if so it seems good to you.

Clin. How does not this seem good, at least for the present?

[20.] Athen. Three things however still remain for the free-born to learn; one is computation, and what relates to numbers; but that, which measures length, breadth, and depth, is a second one;⁴ and the third that, which (measures) the orbits of the stars, (and) how they naturally march with re-

² As the Athenian speaker and his friends were not the Archons, they could not say of themselves that they would grant the writers of tragedy a chorus, or refuse one. Hence there is evidently some error in δῶσομεν and δυναίμεθα: which it is easy to correct, if we bear in mind that Plato has merely put into prose, what he found in verse, probably in the Μαλθακοί of Cratinus, to this effect: Νῦν δ' ἴτε, παῖδες μαλακῶν Μουσῶν, Ἐπιδείξαντες τοῖς ἄρχουσιν Πρῶτον τὰς ὑμετέρας ψάδας. Κἂν μὲν ταῦτ' ἡ καὶ βελτίω τὰ παρ' ὑμῶν λεχθέντα γένηται, Δώσουσ' ὑμῖν χορόν· εἰ δ' αὖ μὴ, Διδόναι ποτ' ἂν οὐχὶ δύναιντ' ἂν: where most opportunely one MS. according to Bekker reads γένηται in lieu of φαίνεται, and another according to Stalbaum omits λεγόμενα. The verses of Cratinus were spoken probably by the Chorus at the end of the play, where the author anticipated a victory, and gave the audience to understand that he had ready for production other comedies as good as, if not better than, the present one.

³ Ficinus alone has what the sense requires, "nostris," i. e. βελτίω ἢ τὰ παρ' ἡμῶν, instead of βελτίω τὰ παρ' ὑμῶν.

lation to each other. On all these it is not requisite for the many to labour to a nicety, but only some few; of whom, as we advance, we will speak towards the end (of our discussion).¹ For so it will be becoming.¹ But such as are necessary for the masses, it has been very correctly said even by boys,² that it is shameful for the many not to know. However it is neither easy nor altogether possible to search into all things accurately; but whatever is necessary among them, it is not possible to throw aside. And it seems that he,³ who first spoke proverbially of the deity, that not even a god will ever at any time be seen contending against necessity, (said so) looking to this, namely, such necessities⁴ as, I conceive, are at least⁵ divine; since, (if he said so) of human necessities, to which the multitude look when, speaking in this manner, it would be the most stupid by far of all their speeches.

Clin. What then are those necessities for instruction, O guest, which are not such, but divine?

Athen. I think they are those, which he, who does not practise, nor in any respect learn, will never become either a god, a dæmon, or a hero among men, competent⁶ to undertake the care seriously of mankind. And he would want much of being a divine man, who is unable to tell either one, or two, or three, or, in short, even and odd, or in any respect to know how to number, or to reckon nights and days, and is unskilled in the revolutions of the moon, the sun, and the other stars. There is then much folly in the notion that all this education is not necessary for him, who is about to know the most beautiful subjects of instruction. But of what kind is each of these, and how many they are, and when they are to be learnt, and what with some, and what apart from others,

² In lieu of καὶ πῶς, to which Ast objects, I have translated as if the Greek were καὶ παρὶν—Compare “pueri ludentes, Rex eris, aiunt, Si recte facies,” in Horace.

³ Namely Simonides, as shown by iii. § 12, n.

⁴—⁴ Stephens was the first to suggest ἀναγκῶν, subsequently found in two MSS., in lieu of ἀναγκαίων. For Ficinus has “divinis necessitatibus.”

⁶ I have omitted δυνατός, which Ast acutely saw was the explanation of ολος.

and the whole combination of them, these are the subjects, which a person ought to learn the first; and, with this instruction as the guide, to go on to the rest. For thus a necessity has overtaken him naturally, with which we say no divinity contests at present, or ever will contest.

Clin. What has been asserted at present, O guest, seems to have been somehow truly asserted, and you speak according to nature.

Athen. Such is the case, Clinias. But it is difficult for a person, who has previously arranged thus for himself, to lay down laws in this manner. But if it seems good to you, we will lay down laws for ourselves in a more accurate manner at some other time.

Clin. You seem to us, guest, to fear our habit of ignorance on matters of this kind. You do not, however, justly fear. Endeavour then to speak, concealing nothing on this account.

Athen. I fear the very things you are now speaking of; but I fear much more those, who have indeed laid hold of these points of education, but have laid hold of them improperly. For an ignorance of all things is by no means a dreadful thing nor slippery,¹ nor yet the greatest evil; but much skill and great learning united to an improper education, is a calamity much greater than these.²

Clin. You speak the truth.

[21.] Athen. It is necessary then to say that the free-born ought to learn of each of these subjects so much as the great mass of boys in Ægypt learn together with their letters. For, in the first place, the rules relating to reckoning have been so artlessly devised for children, that they learn it in sport, and with pleasure; (for there are)³ distributions of certain apples

¹ I have translated as if the Greek were not ΣΦΟΔΡΟΝ, but ΣΦΑΛΕΡΟΝ.

³ In the whole of this description of the manner, in which the boys in Ægypt were taught numeration, there is a sad want of perspicuity; so much so that Athenæus, in xv. p. 671, F., has taken upon himself to solve what he calls a Platonic problem, by saying, that in the allusion to the apples and chaplets, the philosopher meant something of this kind: "He wanted to discover a number, by which all might have an equal share, until the last guest had entered, either of apples or chaplets. I assert then, that the number 60 divided into 6 fellow-drinkers, is able to complete the equality. For I know that towards the beginning (of our discourse), [i. p. 4, E.] we stated that not more than five persons supped and chaplets, the ¹ the same numbers being adapted to more and at the same time to fewer :¹ and in the case of pugilists and wrestlers, ²the assessorships and co-allotments² in turn and in successive order,³ and ⁴how they exist naturally;⁴ and, moreover, when playing, ⁵they mix phials of gold, and copper, and silver, and other things of this kind, and some distribute them whole,⁵ adapting, as I said before, to their sports the use of necessary numbers; and thus they benefit those, who are learning to draw up and lead out armies, and to arrange encampments,⁶ and to regulate a household, and cause in short the men⁷ to be more useful together; but that we are as many as the grains of sand, is evident. Now the number 60 will commence in this way, when the drinking party is filled up to six. The first comer to the meeting receives 60 chaplets, half of which he gives to the second, and each has therefore 30; and dividing them all again with the third comer, each has just 20; and, sharing again in like manner with the fourth, just 15; with the fifth, just 12; and with the sixth, just 10. And thus is completed the equality of the chaplets." In which passage I have every where changed EK into EIC, and omitted γίνονται after δεκαπέντε. But as there is not a word in Plato about the number 60, the whole of this explanation is evidently the fanciful interpretation of some over-clever commentator. But for the express quotation in Athenæus of μήλων τέ τινων διανομαί, I should have said that Plato wrote μήλων τετμημένων διανομαί καὶ στεφάνων ὄλων. For thus the apples cut up and the whole chaplets would answer to numbers fractional and integral.

²—² Ast says that in ἐφεδρείας and συλλήξεως there is an allusion to the custom of appointing by lot a third combatant, who was to contend with the conqueror in a preceding contest, as shown by Aristoph. in Βατρ. 791.

³—³ The Greek is ἐν μέρει καὶ ἐφεξῆς καὶ— But one MS. omits καὶ ἐφεξῆς correctly. For the two expressions mean the same thing. Correctly too one MS. omits καὶ.

⁴—⁴ How the ἐφεδρεία and σύλληξις can be said to take place naturally, I cannot understand.

⁶ In lieu of καὶ στρατείας, omitted by Ficinus, two MSS. read στρατοπεδείας, which leads to στρατοπεδεύσεις, as in p. 813, E.

⁷ Here again Ficinus omits τοὺς ἀνθρώπους, as being superfluous at least, and scarcely intelligible. The antithesis in ἐργηγορότας seems to lead to μᾶλλον ἢ τοὺς νωθροτέρους, "more than the indolent."

themselves to themselves, and awake ; and after this in the case of measurements, relating to length, breadth, and depth, (since they say)¹ that there is naturally inherent in all men a certain ridiculous and disgraceful ignorance on all these points, they liberate them from this.

Clin. What and what kind of ignorance do you mean ?

Athen. My dear Clinias, I too, having altogether late in life heard how we are affected on these points, have felt a wonder ; and it seems to me, that it is the situation not of human beings, but rather of certain swine-like animals ; and I have been ashamed not only of myself, but of all the Greeks.

Clin. About what ? Tell us, guest, what you mean.

Athen. I will tell you ; or, rather, I will point it out to you by asking a question. And do you give me a short answer. You surely know what length is ?

Clin. How not ?

Athen. And what breadth is ?

Clin. Entirely so.

Athen. And that there are these two things, and that a third of these² is depth ?

Clin. How not ?

Athen. Does it not, then, seem to you, that all these may be measured by each other ?

Clin. Yes.

Athen. I mean length by length, and breadth by breadth ; and that depth is naturally capable of being measured similarly ?

Clin. Very much so.

Athen. But, if some of these can do this neither³ violently nor quietly,³ but some can, and others not,⁴ and yet you imagine that all (can), how do you conceive yourself to be situated with respect to these ?

Clin. Badly, it is evident.

¹ I have inserted "since they say," to complete the sense. The Greek is περι πάντων—φύσει. But ἐπεὶ might easily have dropt out before περί, and φασὶ corrupted into φύσει.

² In lieu of τούτων, which I cannot understand, Plato wrote I imagine ἐν αὐτῇ δυνάμει—

³ That is to say, some quantities are incommensurable, and others not. T.

Athen. But again, as regards length and breadth against depth, or length and breadth against each other, do not all of us the Greeks think, touching these questions, thus, that they can be measured against each other in some way?

Clin. Entirely so.

Athen. But if this be at no time and by no means possible, and yet all the Greeks, as I have said, think it is possible, is it not fit, that, being ashamed of them all, we should thus address them,—O ye best of Greeks, this is one of the things, which we said it was base not to know. But is it not altogether beautiful to know things necessary (to be known)?

Clin. How not?

Athen. And in addition to these, there are other things allied to them, in which many errors, the sisters of those [errors],¹ are produced in us.

Clin. What are these?

Athen. Those relating to quantities that are commensurable and not commensurable, by what nature they exist. For it is necessary that he, who reflects upon them, should distinguish them, or be altogether a person of no mark; and it is meet² by throwing out problems to each other, and, being engaged in an amusement more agreeable than the pebble-game³ of old men, to have a love for contention in a pursuit worthy of all attention.⁴

Clin. Perhaps so. At least it seems that the pebble-game and this education are very⁵ different from each other.

Athen. These subjects then I assert, Clinias, the youths ought to learn. For they are neither hurtful nor difficult; and ¹ Ast has properly rejected ἀμαρτημάτων as an interpolation.

² In lieu of AEI the sense requires ΔΕΙ, as I have translated.

³ So I should have translated πεττεία at Charm. § 47, Alcib. i. § 15, and here in v. § 9. For though the modern draughts is the nearest approach to the Greek πεττεία, yet there seems to have been some difference in these two games. Wrongly therefore have I translated πεττείαν, "a game of dice," in the Statesman, § 38, as shown by Phædr. p. 274, D. πεττείας τε καὶ κυβείας.

when they are learnt, combined with sport, they will do a benefit, but never a hurt, to our state. But, if any one says otherwise, let us hear him.

Clin. How not?

Athen. If then these things appear to be so, it is evident that we shall decide in their favour; but appearing to be not so, they will be decided against.

Clin. Evidently so. How not?

Athen. Let then these be laid down as belonging to necessary instructions, in order that what relates to the laws may not be (done) by us in vain.

Athen. ²(For they are) as it were pledges from the rest of the polity, which may be dissolved,² if they should in no respect receive kindly³ us, who propose them, or you, who establish them.

Clin. The condition you propose is just.

[22.] Athen. After these then look to the instruction relating to the stars, whether this being chosen for youth pleases us, or the contrary.

Clin. Only speak.

Athen. And yet there is respecting them a subject of great marvel, and to be endured at no time and by no means.

Clin. What is this?

Athen. We say that we ought not to search after the greatest god,⁴ and the whole order of the world, nor to be busy in explaining the causes (of things); for it is not holy. It seems indeed, that, if the very contrary took place, it would take place correctly.

Clin. How say you?

Athen. What is stated is a paradox, and some one may think it is not suited to old men; but when any one conceives

²—³ I confess I cannot understand the words between the numerals.

³ Ast says that φιλοφρονῆται means "be agreeable." But φιλοφρονεῖσθαι has always elsewhere an active sense. Hence I am at a loss here for the real meaning of the whole sentence.

⁴ On this celebrated saying of Plato Ast has referred to a host of writers, who have alluded to it, from Cicero De N. D. i. 12, to Theodoretus.

that instruction is something beautiful, and true, and advantageous to a city, and likewise in every respect acceptable to the deity, by no manner of means is it possible not to mention it.

Clin. You say what is reasonable. But shall we find an instruction of this kind in the case of the stars?

Athen. All we Greeks, so to say, tell, O ye good men, a falsehood respecting those mighty divinities the Sun and Moon.

Clin. Of what kind is the falsehood?

Athen. We say that they never proceed in the same path, and that there are some other stars with them, to which we give the name of planets.

Clin. By Zeus, you are saying, guest, the truth. For in the course of my life, I have often seen myself the morning and the evening star, and certain other stars, never proceeding along in the same track, but wandering entirely. And we all know that the Sun and Moon ¹are perpetually doing so.¹

Athen. These then are the things, Megillus and Clinias, which I assert our citizens and youths ought to learn respecting the gods in heaven, so far as this ²about all these matters, so far² for the sake of not blaspheming them, but of offering sacrifices ever with good-omened words, and piously in prayers approaching³ them.

Clin. This indeed is right, if, first, it is possible to learn that, of which you are speaking; and next, if we are not at present speaking properly about them, yet after learning, we shall speak so of them. Thus much do I go along with you; and that a thing of this kind must be learnt. Do you, then, endeavour to explain entirely that these things are so, and we will together follow you as your disciples.

² The Greek is περὶ πάντων τούτων μέχρι—where μέχρι is repeated unnecessarily, whatever Ast may say to the contrary; and περὶ πάντων τούτων, omitted by Ficinus, have nothing to which they can be referred. I suspect that we ought to transpose them after εὐφημεῖν δὲ, and read περὶ πάντων τούτων ἐν χάρι—

³ I have translated as if the Greek word was formerly ἐρχομένους, not, as at present, εὐχομένους.

Athen. It is not easy to learn what I am saying, nor is it on the other hand altogether difficult, nor is it a matter of a very long time. And the proof is, that, although I myself have heard these things, neither recently¹ nor formerly, I am able to render them manifest in a little time. And yet had they been difficult, I, who am in years, would not have been able to explain them to you, who are in years.

Clin. You say what is true. But what is the instruction, which you call marvellous; but which you say it is fitting for the youths to learn, and yet we are ignorant of? Endeavour to speak about it, at least to this extent, with the utmost perspicuity.

Athen. I must endeavour. The notion then, thou best of men, respecting the Sun and Moon and the other stars, that they are planets, is not correct; but the very contrary is the case. For each of them perpetually traverses the same path, being not many, but one, in a circle; but they appear to traverse many. And that, which is the most swift of them, is not rightly thought to be² the slowest, and contrariwise the contrary. Now if such is the case naturally, but we do not think so, if we had such notions respecting the horses, that run at Olympia, or of men contesting in the long course, and we called the swiftest the slowest, and the slowest the swiftest, and, passing our encomiums, celebrated the vanquished as the victor, I think we should not attach our praises properly, nor in a manner agreeable to the racers, ³being men.³ But now, when we err in the very same manner respecting the gods, do we not think that, what,⁴ when it took place there, would be then ridiculous and incorrect, takes place here at present (not well) in the case of the gods.

Clin. Ridiculous, I am aware, entirely.⁵

² I have translated as if the Greek were εἶναι, not αὖ—

⁴ I have translated as if the Greek were οἶδ', ὅλως, not οὐδαμῶς—

⁵ I have adopted the notion of Ast, that Plato wrote οἶομεθ' ὅ—not οἶομεθα—He should have elicited likewise ἐντραυθοὶ οὐκ ἐβ' from ἐντραυθοὶ καὶ—as I have translated.

Athen. It is not then an act acceptable to the divinity, when we hymn to the gods what is false.

Clin. Most true; if such is the case.

Athen. If then we can show that such is the case, all these subjects are up to this point to be learnt; but, if we cannot show it, we must dismiss them; and let this be thus laid down.

Clin. By all means.

[23.] Athen. It is then proper to say now, that the legal institutions relating to the instruction of childhood, have reached their end. And it is requisite to reflect in a similar manner upon hunting and every thing else of this kind. ¹ For it appears that the office of a lawgiver is not merely that of laying down laws; but that he ought to make use of what is a mean between admonition and laws; ¹ an idea that has often occurred to us during our discussion; for instance, (when we were speaking) about the bringing up of the very young. For we said there were things not to be mentioned; and that, speaking of them as laws laid down, we thought the notion ² to be full ³ of folly; but laws having been written in this way, and the whole of a polity (laid down), ⁴ the praise of a citizen pre-eminent in virtue is not then perfect, when any one says that he, who ministers the best to the laws, and obeys them the most, is the good man; but this would be said more perfectly, that he is so, who leads a life without stain, ⁵ through being obedient to the writings of the party, who lays down the laws and distributes praise and blame. This is the most correct language for the praise of a

² In lieu of εἶναι, which I cannot understand, nor could Ast, as is evident from his unsatisfactory explanation, I have translated as if the Greek were ἐννοίαν—For there would be thus a Platonic play upon ἐννοίαν—ἀνοίαν γίμειν— See at Phileb. § 57, n. 56. Ficinus has, what Taylor adopted, "idque tentare dementis esse."

⁴ Ficinus alone has "republica constituta," required by the sense.

citizen ; and the legislator in reality ought not only to write down his laws, but in addition to the laws to write down, interwoven with them,¹ what seems to him to be beautiful and not beautiful ; and the tip-top citizen should establish firmly these no less than what are bound down by fines imposed by the law. And we adduce as a witness the subject of our present discussion ; for it will show more clearly what we mean. For hunting is a thing of wide extent, comprehended at present under nearly one name. For there is much hunting of aquatic animals ; much of those that fly ; and still more of those on land, not only of wild beasts, but that which² it is fit to consider as the hunting of men, I mean³ in war, and much too is the hunting in the way of friendship, of which one part brings praise, the other blame. The thefts too of robbers and armies are huntings. The legislator, therefore, who establishes laws about hunting, can neither leave these unnoticed, nor, by imposing regulations and fines on all, lay down laws of a menacing kind. What then is to be done in cases of this kind ?⁴ On the one hand, the legislator ought to praise and blame the business of hunting,⁴ relating to the labours and pursuits of youth ; and on the other hand, the young man ought to hear and obey, and neither pleasure nor labour ought to prevent him (from doing so) ; but let him honour what is mentioned with praise, rather than what has been laid down by law, and are accompanied with threats, united to fines relating to each,⁵ and perform what is enjoined.⁵ This being premised, the praise and blame of hunting will follow in a becoming manner. For that, which makes the souls of young men better, belongs to the person praising, but to the party blaming that, which (effects) the contrary. Let us then speak of what follows in order, addressing the young men by a prayer—O friends, never may any desire or love of fishing by sea, or of fishing with a hook, seize you ; nor, generally, of labouring to catch

³ Stephens correctly suggested τῇν γε—in lieu of τῇν τε—

⁴ Ficinus, whom Taylor follows, has “oportet ut legislator, quæ in venatione, laudanda sunt, laudet ; quæ contra, vituperet.”

⁵ The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus, and after him by Taylor.

any aquatic animals with an osier net,¹ either when you are awake or asleep!² May no desire ever come upon you to catch men at sea, nor to rob them, which would make you cruel and lawless hunters! And never may it come into your farthest thoughts³ to commit thefts in the country and city; nor let a desire, ⁴full of cleverness, but not a very liberal one,⁴ come upon any young person to catch birds. The hunting then and catching of land animals alone remains for our athletes; of which, one kind, performed by those sleeping⁵ ever⁶ in turn, and called nocturnal, belongs to sluggish men, and is not worthy of praise; nor yet the other (of those awake),⁷ which, enjoying a remission from labour, does by nets and snares, and not by the victory of a soul fond of labour, get the savage strength of wild beasts into its power. That hunting then of quadrupeds alone remains as the best of all, performed with horses and dogs, and by the bodies of the parties themselves; over all of which animals they get the mastery by running them down, and inflicting blows, and hurling darts, the parties themselves, to whom there is any care of possessing a godlike bravery, being engaged with their own hands in the hunt. Of all these matters then in the shape of praise or blame, let this discourse have been spoken; and let this be the law. Let no one hinder these truly sacred hunters from hunting, wherever they please. But no one shall ever suffer any person at any place to engage in nocturnal hunting with dogs⁸ and ropes. And let him not prevent ¹ The nets, to which Plato alludes, are still in use in England for catching eels especially, and are called eel-baskets.

² This allusion to catching fish, when the fisherman is asleep, will be best understood by knowing that nets are generally set over-night; when fish are more eager in their search for food than during the day.

⁵ Ficinus seems to refer τῶν εὐδόντων to the animals.

⁶ In the unmeaning ad lies hid ἀεὶ—as I have translated.

⁷ Instead of τῶν διαπαύματα, Winckelmann suggests τῶν ἐγρηγορότων διαπαύματα—what I have adopted.

⁸ In lieu of κυσι Grou proposed to read ἀρκυσι, whom Ast and the Zurich editors have followed.

fowling in uncultivated places and in mountains; but any one who may be present shall forbid it in cultivated and 'sacred holy' places, and a person catching fish, except in ports or sacred rivers, and marshes or pools; but in other places let it be lawful for him to catch them, provided he does not use a mixture of juices.² Now, therefore, it is proper to say, that the legal institutions respecting education have arrived at their end.

Clin. You may well say so.

BOOK VIII.

[1.] CLOSE upon these it is for us to regulate and lay down by law, in conjunction with the Delphic oracles, festivals, (and)³ what (are to be) the sacrifices and the divinities,⁴ to whom it will be better and more advisable for the state to sacrifice, and at what time, and how many in number. Of these matters,⁵ I think⁶ it will be perhaps nearly our business to lay down some by law.

Clin. Perhaps so, as regards the number.

Athen. Let us then speak first as regards the number. ⁷For let there be⁷ of three hundred and sixty-five ⁸nothing wanting;⁸ so that some one⁹ of the magistrates may always sacri-

² This is the earliest allusion to the custom, still prevalent in England, of catching fish by putting poisonous or stupifying drugs into the water.

³ I have translated as if καὶ had dropt out before αἱ τινες, and thus met the objection first started by Stephens against the want of syntax.

⁴ Although θεοῖς ὁλοσίου might be defended by the passages produced by Lobeck on Ajac. 801, ed. 1, yet here one would prefer θεοὶ, ὁλοσίου—and so in Aristoph. Barp. 889, "Ἐρεποι γὰρ εἶσιν, ὁλοῖν εὐχόμεαι θεοῖς"—Brunck correctly adopted θεοὶ, found in some MSS.

⁵ In lieu of ἐνὰ γ' αὐτῶν, where γε is useless, Plato wrote, I suspect, τούτων, as I have translated.

⁶ One MS. has ἀν εἶναι νομοθερεῖν, evidently an error for ἀν οἷμαι νομοθερεῖν, which I have adopted.

⁷—⁷ Instead of ἱστῶσαν, Ficinus has "oportere censeo," translated by Taylor, "I should establish."

⁸—⁸ The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus, and after him by Taylor.

⁹ In lieu of ὅπως ἀν μία γέ τις, I should prefer ὅπως ἀν ὁσημέραι τις—

fice to some god or dæmon in behalf of the city, and the people,¹ and their property. And let the (holy) interpreters, and the priests, and the priestesses, and the prophets, being assembled together, with the guardians of the laws, ordain what it was necessary for the legislator to omit. ²For it is requisite that these should take notice of things omitted.² For the law will say that there are twelve festivals to the twelve gods, from whom each tribe has its name, and that persons are to make to each of these monthly sacrifices, and dances, and musical contests, and to assign the gymnastic exercises, in a manner befitting both to the gods themselves, and the several seasons; and to distribute the female festivals likewise, such as ought to be separated from the men, and such as ought not. Moreover, the festivals of the gods below, and such as are to be called celestial, and what is attendant on these, must not be mixed together, but must be separated in the twelfth month, sacred to Pluto,³ by persons paying rites according to law: nor must persons feel, like enemies, an ill will towards that god, but they must honour him, as being even the best to the race of men. ⁴For the communion between soul and body is not better than the separation, as I affirm, speaking seriously.⁴ Besides, it is re-

For Plato meant to say that there ought to be a sacrifice daily; for he knew that the year consisted of 365 days. With regard to the word ὁσημέραι, it is found twice in Aristophanes, and is to be restored again for σήμερον, as I remarked in the Cl. Jl., No. 37, p. 130, although μία γε τις might be supported by at least a dozen passages.

³ In like manner during the 12th month the Saturnalia were celebrated in ancient Rome.

⁴⁻⁴ I must leave for others to explain the relevancy of the sentiment between the numerals. It is beyond my comprehension. Unless I am greatly mistaken, there is a lacuna here, in which it was shown that the union of body and soul was effected by the agency of the celestial gods, and the separation by that of the infernal; and that both were equally kind quisite for those, who are about to distinguish these sufficiently, to have this notion, that this our city is such, as no one will find another like it, of those at present, as regards the leisurely employment of time, and the power over things necessary for existence. But it ought, like a single individual, to live well. Now to those living well, it is necessary for this to be present the first, namely, ¹ that persons should neither injure others,¹ nor be injured by others. Now of these, the former is not very difficult; but it is very difficult to possess the power of not being injured; nor is it possible to perfectly acquire it otherwise than by becoming perfectly good.² The same thing also takes place in a city, to which, when it is good, there is a life of peace; but of war from without and within, when it is wicked. And as this is the case nearly every where,³ each must exercise themselves in war, not during a war, but during a life of peace. It is necessary then for a city, endued with intellect, to exercise itself in war, for not less than one day in each month, but for more as it may seem fit to the rulers, without taking thought of cold or heat, both the men, and the women and the boys, ⁴ in order that all may be prepared,⁴ when it shall somehow⁵ seem good to the rulers to lead forth the people in a mass,⁶ and sometimes in portions.⁶

to man, while living and dead, if he only acted during life piously towards both. With regard to the sentiment that death is not inferior to life, Stobæus will furnish plenty of passages in Tit. cxx.

² For a perfectly good man cannot be injured; because he, who is injured, is deprived of some good. Now virtue is the property of a perfectly good man; but this cannot be taken away. T.

³ I have translated as if the Greek were πάντη, not ταύτη—

⁴—⁴ The words between the numerals have been adopted by Taylor from the Latin alone of Ficinus, “ut omnes parati sint.”

⁵ The Greek is ὥς πανδημίαν: where ὥς is unintelligible. Ficinus has “quodammodo—” which leads to πως. Winckelmann suggests πανδημία—

And it is meet¹ to devise some beautiful sports, together with sacrifices, that certain festival-battles² may take place, imitating as distinctly as possible the battles in war; and it is meet to distribute rewards of victory and valour to each of these, and to make encomiums upon, and abuse of, each other, according as each may conduct himself in the contests, and through the whole of life, ³by decking the party, who has been thought to be the best, and dispraising him, who has not.³ But, in the first place, let not every one be a poet on such subjects, but let him be a person not less than fifty years of age; nor, in the next place, such of those, as possess poetry and music sufficiently in themselves, but have never done any honourable and conspicuous act, but such as are good men themselves and held in honour by the state, and have been the doers of honourable deeds. (And)⁴ let the compositions of such persons be sung, even although they may not be naturally musical. But let the decision on these matters be with the instructor of youth, and the other guardians of the laws; and let them⁵ assign, as an honour to them⁶ alone, a freedom of speech in songs; but to the others let there not be this liberty; nor let any one dare to sing a song, which has not been approved of by the guardians of the laws, who are to decide, not even if it be sweeter than the hymns of ⁷Thamyris and Orpheus;⁷ but such sacred poems as have, after being decided upon, been dedicated to the gods; and such as, being the poems of worthy men, scattering blame or praise on certain parties, have been adjudged to do a thing of this kind with moderation.

[2.] The same things, I assert, ought to take place similarly, both among men and women, respecting war, and the liberty of speech in poetry. But it is meet for the legislator to bring the question before himself, and to cast about it with this discourse—Come, what citizens shall I, after having ³⁻⁵ The words between the numerals are omitted by Taylor.

⁴ I have translated as if kai had dropt out after καλῶν—

⁵ I have adopted οὔτοι δὲ, suggested by Ast, for τούτοι—

nourished the whole state properly, bring up? Ought they not to be the combatants in the greatest contests, to whom there are ten thousand antagonists? Entirely so, some one speaking with propriety may say. What then, if we had brought up boxers or combatants in boxing and wrestling united, or persons contending in any other contests of this kind, should we have met¹ them in the contest itself, not having ourselves fought with any one at a former time? Or, if we were pugilists, should we not have learned to fight many days previous to the contest, and laboured hard in imitating all such things as we should be about to adopt at that period,² when we were contending for victory? And should we not, with the view of coming the nearest possible to what is similar, have put on boxing-gloves³ instead of the cestus, in order that the blows and the avoidance of blows might be practised as sufficiently as possible? And should there have happened to be a deficiency of fellow-combatants, should we not, through dreading the laughter of the senseless, have dared to hang up an inanimate image,⁴ and practise ourselves against it? And if we were in want both of animate and inanimate adversaries, should we not have ventured, in some desert spot, to fight even with a shadow⁵ against ourselves? Or, for what else would any one say that this practice in moving the hand took place?

Clin. For nearly nothing else, O guest, than the very one you have just now mentioned.

Athen. What then, will the warlike portion of the city dare

² Instead of εἰς τόρε, Ficinus seems to have found in his MS. ἐν τῷ ὄντι, for his version is "in vero certamine," adopted by Taylor.

⁴ Such was the practice of the Romans, as we learn from Juvenal vi. 246, Senec. Epist. xviii. 6, and Vegetius de Re Milit. i. 11, ii. 23, quoted by Ast; who might have referred to the Laches, § 1, where the fighting in armour was probably something of a similar kind.

on each occasion to go to the greatest of contests, worse prepared than combatants of this kind, when it is about to fight for life, and for children, and property, and the whole of the state. And will not then the legislator, fearful lest these gymnastic exercises with each other should appear to some persons ridiculous, lay down a law, and ordain that persons are to act the soldier each day in a little way without arms, and cause the dances, and the whole of gymnastic exercise, to tend together to this point? and will he not likewise ordain that some of the gymnastic exercises for instance,¹ either greater or less, ²are to last for not less than a month; and that persons are to enter³ into contests with each other through the whole country in seizing upon places, and making ambuscades,³ and by imitating the whole of war in reality,⁴ to fight with boxing-gloves, and to make use of darts somewhat dangerous, and as near as possible to the hurling of real ones; in order that the sport may not be altogether without a fear from each other, but cause some terror, and thus, after a manner, show who is the man of mettle, and who is not; and by distributing correctly honours to some, and disgrace to others, he may render the whole state through its (whole) life useful for a real contest. And moreover, should any one happen to die in these contests, that, as the death was involuntary, he may lay down that the homicide shall, after being purified according to law, be pure in hand; reflecting that when not many men die, others will be born again not inferior; but when fear, as it were, dies, in all these cases he will no longer

¹ This is the only passage I remember to have met with, where οἶον or any word is introduced between οἱ δὲ and τινες—and even here it is omitted by Ficinus; whose version however is not sufficiently close to enable us to see what he found in his MS.

^{2—3} Ast would reject τε καὶ ἐλάττους, as being not only at variance with the train of thought, but omitted likewise by Ficinus. But he forgot that in μείζους καὶ ἐλάττους, for τε is properly omitted by one MS., there is an allusion to the πανδημία ἢ κατὰ μέρη mentioned in § 1, and that καὶ is to be taken in the sense of ἢ, as shortly afterwards καλλίω [τε] καὶ ἀσχημονεστίαν. For other examples see my Poppo's Prolegom. p. 173.

be able to discover a test of the better and the worse ; which is, in no small degree, a greater evil to a state than the other.¹

Clin. We will agree with you, O guest, that he ought to lay down matters of this kind by law, and direct the attention of the whole state to them.

[3.] Athen. Do we then all of us know the reason, why in cities at present no such dancing and contest exist, scarcely at any time or in any manner, except to a very small extent ? Shall we say that this happens through the ignorance of the masses, and of those who have laid down laws for them ?

Clin. Perhaps so.

Athen. By no means, O blessed Clinias. But it is proper to say that there are two causes of this, and very sufficient too.

Clin. What are they ?

Athen. One is, that, through the love of wealth making the whole of time to be without any leisure² for the care of other things except private property, on which the soul of every citizen is hanging, it can have no care for other things but of daily pecuniary gain ; and whatever learning or pursuit leads to this, every one individually is most ready to learn and to practise, but he laughs down all the rest. It is proper therefore to mention this as one reason, why a state is unwilling to engage seriously in this or any other honourable and excellent pursuit ; but through an insatiable desire of silver and gold is willing for every man to undergo every art and artifice, both the more beautiful and the more base,³ if he is about to become wealthy, and to engage in a line of conduct holy and unholy, and thoroughly disgraceful, and to feel no annoyance, if only he possesses the power, like a wild beast,⁴ to eat all

² From hence it is evident that the favourite doctrine of the Political Economists of the present day, that "time is money," is older than they are probably aware of.

³ With this passage may be compared the celebrated one in Horace i. Ep. i. 65, "rem facias, rem, Si possis, recte ; si non, quocunque modo, rem."

kinds of things, and drink likewise,¹ and to obtain all satiety in all forms of venereal enjoyments.

Clin. Right.

Athen. Let this then be put down as one reason, which I assign, as preventing states from practising² any thing else that is honourable or what relates to war sufficiently; but by causing the naturally well-ordered to become merchants, and ship-owners, and servile ministers, and the brave to be robbers, and house-breakers, and guilty of sacrilege, and fond of war, and tyrannical, it destroys, and greatly so³ sometimes, those who were well-disposed but unfortunate.

Clin. How say you?

Athen. Why should I not call those in every respect unfortunate, to whom there is a necessity by feeling hungry through the whole of life and neglecting their own soul to be perpetually engaged in a contest?⁴

Clin. This, then, is one reason. But what do you assign, O guest, as the second?

Athen. You have very properly reminded me.

⁵ Clin. This insatiable search (after wealth)⁶ that makes each person to be without leisure, is, as you say, one impediment to each practising what relates to war. Be it so. But tell us the second.

Athen. Do I seem to have not spoken, but to have wasted time through a want of readiness?

Clin. You do not. But you seem to us to reprobate, as through hatred, a custom of this kind more than is becoming,⁷ in the language which has just now fallen from you.⁷

² I have omitted here ἑῷσα, which is evidently out of its place, and translated as if ἑῷσι, "neglecting," followed τὴν ψυχὴν αἰεὶ τὴν αὐτῶν in the next speech of the Athenian.

^{3—3} The Greek is ποιοῦσα καὶ μάλ' ἐνίστε— But ποιοῦσα is evidently superfluous after the preceding ἀπεργαζομένη. Plato wrote, I suspect, what I have translated, ἀπόλλυσι καὶ μάλα ἐνίστε—

⁴ Instead of διεξελεθῆν, Ficinus found some word answering to his "cruciare," probably διεξαθλεύειν.

⁵ This speech belongs rather to Megillus. For otherwise Clinias will be found to repeat his previous request.

⁶ Ficinus alone has, what is required by the sense, "divitiarum—"

^{7—7} The words between the numerals are omitted by Taylor.

Athen. You find fault with me, guests, most correctly ; and you shall hear, as is reasonable, what is after this.

Clin. Only speak.

Athen. I say, then, that the not-polities, of which we have often spoken in our previous conversation, namely, a democracy, an oligarchy, and a tyranny, are the causes of this. For in these there is not a single polity ; but all may most justly be called states of sedition. For not one willingly rules over the willing, but willingly over the unwilling, and this always with some compulsion. And as the governor fears the governed, he never at any time willingly permits a person to be handsome, or wealthy, or strong, or brave, or altogether warlike. ¹ These two then are nearly pre-eminently the causes of all things, but of these they are really the pre-eminent.¹ But the polity for which we are now giving laws, avoids both these. For it leads a life of the greatest leisure ; and (the people) are free from each other, and will, I think, become from these laws the lovers of money the least. So that such an establishment of a polity would alone of all existing at present, probably and according to reason receive at the same time the instruction that has been gone through, and the warlike sport, which has been perfected correctly at least by description.

Clin. Correctly (said).

[4.] Athen. Is it not then next in order to these for us to have a recollection of all gymnastic contests, so that we may attend to such of them as appertain to war, and lay down the rewards of victory, but to bid farewell to such, as do not appertain. But what they are, it is better for them to be detailed from the beginning, and to establish by law. And, first, must we not lay down what appertains to running and swiftness ?

Clin. We must lay them down.

Athen. Now the quickness of the body is altogether of all things the most appertaining to war ; one kind connected with the feet, and the other with the hands ; that of the feet being required for running away and overtaking, but (of the hands)

¹ Such, according to Ast, is the literal translation of the Greek : but of their meaning he says nothing, nor can I explain what he understood by them. What Plato really wrote, might, I think, be recovered by a conjecture. To my mind he certainly did not write what is found in the text at present. Ficinus has "Hæ duæ omnium quidem quodammodo, horum certe præcipuæ causæ sunt."

¹ the fight in close conflict and the standing up together requiring strength and vigour.¹

Clin. How not?

Athen. But neither of them without heavy arms possesses the greatest utility.

Clin. For how should they?

Athen. The crier, then, shall first invite the runner in the stadium, as he does now at the games. And the runner will enter, having a shield; for we do not put down rewards for the light-armed soldier. He, who is about to contend by running in the stadium,² will enter the first with his arms; but the second, he (who is to run) the doubled course; the third, he (who is to run) the horse course; the fourth, moreover, he (who is to run) the long course;² and the fifth,³ whom we shall start the first with his arms on,³ is to run a distance of sixty stadia¹ to a certain temple of Mars; and again calling by name (another) heavier armed to contend in a (shorter and) smoother road; and again, another who is an archer, and having all the dress of an archer, (to run) a hundred stadia while engaged in the contest, through mountains and all kinds of country, to a temple of Apollo and Artemis; and after establishing the contest, we will wait for them, until they arrive, and we will then bestow upon each victor the prize.

¹⁻¹ Ast, justly objecting to the omission of χειρὸς or χειρῶν, required to balance ποδῶν, proposed to expel ἰσχύος, as being superfluous before ῥώμης, and to insert in its place χειρὸς. But Schæfer has shown that those two words are frequently united. To myself the error seems to be rather in μάχη καὶ σύντασις, for which I would read ἀψιμαχία καὶ σύστασις, where ἀψιμαχία would necessarily carry with it the idea of a fight at close quarters. Suidas has opportunely Ἀψιμαχία συναφή μάχης. Ἀππιανός.

²⁻² According to Ast, the whole course was divided into four parts. The first was called the Στάδιον, consisting of 125 paces = 625 feet; the second was called Δίαυλος, because the distance being a straight line, like a pipe, was the double of the stadium, and persons run from the starting post of the stadium to its winning post, and back again; the third called Δόλιχος, was six times the length of the stadium, and sometimes seven, as may be inferred from Soph. El. 717; the fourth, Ἰππειος, was, according to Pausanias, twice the Δίαυλος, or four times the length of the stadium. Now if such was the case, it seems strange that the Ἰππειος should be mentioned after the Δόλιχος, and still more strange that if the course was called Ἰππειος, as it seems to have been from Euripides in Electr. 824, that Plato should call it ἐφίππιον: from whence Ficinus was led to render καὶ τρίτος, ὁ τὸν ἐφίππιον, by "tertius, qui equis," as if the question were here about a person riding on horseback, as well as running on foot, an interpretation at variance with the whole train of thought.

Clin. Right.

Athen. Let us then consider these contests as of three kinds; one of boys, another of beardless youths, and a third of men. And for the beardless youths we will lay down two thirds of the whole course; but for boys the halves of these,² when contending with archers and armed men.³ With respect to females, for girls not yet arrived at puberty and undressed,³ (we will establish) the stadium, and dialulum,⁴ and horse-course, and the long course,⁴ for them to contend⁵ in the course itself,⁶ but to those, who are thirteen years of age, the communion remaining until marriage, for a period not longer than twenty years, nor less than eighteen.⁶ And clothed with a fitting dress let them descend to the contest in these courses.

And thus much concerning the contests of men and women answer to the following τὸν δὲ ἄλλον, and "brevius,"—likewise, which if not absolutely necessary, certainly renders the sentence more elegant. With regard to Ast's explanation of the common text, it is not such as will, or indeed should, satisfy any one.

²⁻³ The German translator Schulthes, as I learn from Ast, found some difficulty here, which Ast has endeavoured to master by rendering the Greek as if it were εἴτε τοξόταις ὥς εἴτε καὶ ὀπλίταις ἀμυλλωμένοις, i. e. "whether contending as archers or heavy-armed."

⁴⁻⁴ I suspect the words between the numerals are an interpolation.

⁵ I cannot understand ἐν αὐτῇ τῇ δρόμῳ. Plato probably wrote ἐν αὐτῶν τῇ δρόμῳ, "in their own course." From which it would be seen that the females had a course of their own.

⁶⁻⁶ Such is the literal version of the Greek, which Ast has endeavoured vainly, I think, to explain. I cannot understand it.

in running. With regard to trials of strength, in the place of wrestling, and such things, we will establish what are now considered heavy contests, namely, the fighting in heavy armour, by one contending with one, and two with two, and up to ten with ten. But what and to what extent it is requisite for a person not to suffer, or to do, to gain the victory, just as recently in the case of wrestling, the parties conversant with that exercise have laid down laws, relating to what is the work of a person wrestling well, or not; so it is requisite to invite parties skilled in fighting with arms, and to request them to lay down laws, as to who is justly the victor in contests of this kind, and what regulation shall determine likewise the defeated party. And let the same laws be laid down respecting the females up to the time of marriage. And it is requisite for us to oppose to the contest in boxing and wrestling united the whole of the art of the light-shield soldier, where parties contend with bows, and light shields, and short spears, and in the hurling of stones from the hand and from slings; and to lay down laws on these matters, (and)¹ to distribute legal honours² and victories² to the party conducting himself³ the best on these points. After this it would be in the order of events for laws to be laid down respecting equestrian contests. There is not, indeed, much need of horses, nor many of them, at least in Crete; so that of necessity there is less attention given to the rearing of horses, and the contests with them. For not one of you⁴ is in any respect⁵ the rearer of a chariot,⁵ and there would be no ambition founded on reason to any one on this point: ⁶so that for us to establish competitors in a pursuit, which does not belong to the country, would be for us to have no mind, and to seem not to possess it.⁶ But by proposing rewards for single horse contests, and for colts, that have not shed their first teeth, and for those that are between

² The words kai τὰς νίκας I suspect are an explanation of τὰ γέρα.

⁴ Stephens reads ὑμῖν for ἡμῖν, from "vestram" in Ficinus.

full-grown horses and colts, and to those that are full-grown, we should introduce an equestrian amusement, suited to the nature of the country. Let then there be on these points, according to law, a contest and a love of contests, and let there be granted to the Phylarchs and Hipparchs a decision in common respecting all the courses themselves and those, who descend into them as competitors with their arms on. But by establishing contests either in gymnastic exercises or for those without arms here, we shall not correctly lay down the law. But as an archer on horseback, or a javelin-hurler, a Cretan is not useless, so that there will be¹ for the sake of sport a strife and contest in these points. But it is not fit to force females by laws relating to these matters and by ordinances touching a sharing in common. But if from their previous education, proceeding to a habit, their nature admits of it, and there is no reluctance in boys² and virgins to take a share, (it is proper) to permit them and not to blame.

[5.] Here then has there now completely come to an end the plan for contending and the learning of gymnastics on such points, as we labour in contests, and such (as we learn) under³ masters day by day. And of music, moreover, the greater part has been gone through in like manner, and the matters relating to the Rhapsodists, and those that follow after them, and whatever contests of choirs necessarily occur at festivals, and will be orderly arranged in the months, and on the days, and in the years,⁴ assigned to the gods and those with them,⁵ whether they are distributed into triennial periods, or quinquennial, or in whatever way or manner the gods have given an idea respecting their arrangement. At that period too it is meet to expect that the contests of music will take place, when ordered by the prize-distributors and the instructor of the youths, and the guardians of the laws; who, on meeting

³ To support the syntax, Stephens was the first to read ὑπὸ διδασκάλων, suggested by "sub magistris," in Ficinus. The idea has been adopted by Ast and Stalb. I should prefer καθ' ἡμῖραν ἐν διδασκάλων, with the usual ellipse of οἴκῳ. And so Winckelmann, who refers to Protagor. p. 325, F. and Alcibiad. i. p. 110, B.

⁵ Instead of μετὰ θεῶν, Ficinus has "dæmonibus"— together at a common spot, touching those very matters, shall become themselves the lawgivers, as to the time when, and the persons who, and with whom, they shall make the contests relating to all choirs and dancing. But of what kind each of these ought to be, both with respect to the language, and songs, and harmonies mingled with rhythms and dancing, has been often said by the first legislator; according to which the second legislators ought, by following in their steps, to distribute the contests in a manner befitting the several sacrifices at proper periods, and to permit the city to enjoy its festivals. With respect to these and other such like points, it is not difficult to know what kind of a lawful arrangement they should obtain by lot;¹ nor would the placing them here and there bring any great gain or loss to the state. But what is of no small consequence, and difficult to effect by persuasion,² would be the work especially of a god;² if indeed it is possible for the regulation to exist from him; but now there seems almost to be the need of some bold man to do honour pre-eminently to the liberty of speech, and to state what seems to be the best for a city and citizens, by enjoining upon souls, that have become corrupt, what is becoming and consequent upon the whole polity, and by speaking in opposition to the greatest desires, and this without having a human being as an ally, but solely following reason alone.

Clin. Of what reason are you now speaking, guest? for we do not understand you.

Athen. Very likely. But I will endeavour to speak to you in a yet clearer manner. For when I arrived in the discourse at education, I perceived the lads and lasses associating with each other in a friendly manner. And it came, as was natural, upon me to be alarmed, when I considered how a person would use a state of that kind, where young men and women are delicately brought up, and unoccupied in those violent and vulgar labours, which very greatly extinguish rudeness, and where sacrifices, and festivals, and choirs are a care to all through the whole of life. By what means then in such a state will they abstain from those desires, which hurl many men and many women into the worst state, ¹ from which should reason order them to abstain, a law is attempting to become.¹ Indeed it is not wonderful, if the laws previously ordained obtained a mastery over the majority of desires. For the not permitting a person to be excessively wealthy, is a no trifling advantage towards being temperate; and the whole of education has adopted laws in moderation for objects of this kind. Added to this, the eye of the rulers is compelled not to look elsewhere, but to regard even the young. ² These then, such at least as relate to man, possess moderation, as compared with the rest of desires.² But against the (unnatural)³ love for boys and girls, and for women (as if they were)⁴ men, and for men (as if they were)⁵ women, whence innumerable evils⁶ arise both to men individually and to whole cities, how can any one be on their guard? and ⁷by cutting what remedy⁷ for each of these will a person discover an escape from such a danger? This is by no means easy, Clinias. For in other things not a few the whole of Crete and Lacedæmon will properly⁸ contribute no small assistance to us, while laying down laws alien to the manners of the majority; but in matters of love—since we are alone,⁹

¹ In lieu of λαγχάνειν one would prefer τυγχάνειν, "meet with." For the idea of obtaining by lot a lawful arrangement is scarcely intelligible.

²—² I have translated as if the Greek were θεοῦ μὲν μάλιστα ἂν ἔργον εἶη, εἰ—not θεοῦ μάλιστα ἔργον, εἰ—

³ Ficinus alone inserts “contra naturam,” requisite for the sense.

⁴, ⁵ Ficinus has “pro feminis” and “pro viris,” as if his MS. read ἀντ’ ἀνδρῶν and ἀντὶ γυναικῶν, instead of ἀνδρῶν and γυναικῶν without the preposition.

⁶ The word κακὰ, omitted in all the MSS., is found only in Ald., and acknowledged by “mala” in Ficinus. Ast refers to Propertius, i. 14.

⁷—⁷ On the phrase τέρμινει φάρμακον, repeated in xi. § 4, p. 919, B., and Epist. vii. p. 353, E., see Blomfield on Æsch. Agam. 16.

⁸ One MS., and Ficinus, and after him Taylor, omits ἐπιεικῶς.

(I say it,) they are entirely opposed to us.¹ For, if any one, following nature, should lay down the law, which was prior to the time of Laius,² and assert it was proper not to have an intercourse with men and boys, as if they were females, and bring forward as a witness the nature of wild beasts, and show that for such purposes the male does not touch the male, through its being unnatural, perhaps he would make use of a probable reason; but he would by no means accord with your cities. ³Moreover he would not agree with them in that point,³ which we have said the legislator ought always to observe. For we ever seek⁴ in the laws laid down what contributes to virtue or not. Come then (say), should we agree that this may be at present laid down legally as something beautiful, or at least as not base, what part of it would aid us in the road to virtue? Whether, when it takes place, will the habit of fortitude be produced in the soul of him, who is persuaded? or a kind of a temperate form in the soul of him who persuades? Or would no one be persuaded on these points? but rather in every way the contrary of this. Will every one blame the soft disposition of him, who yields to pleasures, and is incapable of self-control? But will not every one blame on the other hand the likeness of the image in him, who proceeds to an imitation of the female sex? What man then will lay down as a law such a thing as this? Scarcely not one, who has true law in his mind. How then do we say that this is true? It is necessary for a person to see the nature of friendship and desire at the same time, and of the so-called loves, if he would reflect upon these matters correctly. For they are two, and there is another and a third kind arising from both, and which, comprehended under one name, produces every doubt and darkness.

Clin. How?

² On the story of Laius, see Valckenaer in Diatrib. p. 23.

³—³ The Greek is πρὸς δὲ τοῦτοις—τοῦτο ἐν τοῦτοις οὐχ ὁμολογεῖ, where the same pronoun is repeated very inelegantly. Plato wrote, I suspect, τοῦτ' ἂν αὐτοῖς οὐχ ὁμολογοῖ—For Ficinus has “quod minime assequetur.”

[6.] Athen. We surely call a friend one, who is like to like and equal to equal, as regards virtue. ¹And on the other hand, a friendly thing that, which is in want of what has become wealthy, although it is the contrary in sex.¹ But when each of these friendships becomes vehement, we call it love.

Clin. Right.

Athen. The friendship, then, which arises from contraries is horrible and coarse, and does not often possess any thing in common; but that which arises from similars is mild and common to both parties through life. But as regards that, which is mixed up with these, it is not, in the first place, easy to learn thoroughly what the person, who possesses this third love, would wish to happen to himself; and, in the next place, being drawn by both to a contrary point, he is in a state of doubt; the one exhorting him to enjoy the prime of youth, and the other forbidding him. For he, who is a lover of the body and hungers after its ²beauty, as if it were a ripe grape,² exhorts himself to be filled with it, and pays no honour to the moral feeling in the soul of his beloved. But he, who holds the desire of the body as a thing of secondary importance, and ³looks rather than loves³ with his soul, is wont, after feeling a desire for the soul in a becoming manner, to consider the satiety relating to the body⁴ as an insult; but, reverencing, at the same time, and worshiping temperance, and fortitude, and what is highly becoming,⁵ and prudence, he would wish to live ever chastely with the object of his love. But the love, which is mixed up with both these, is the love, ¹—¹ In the words between the numerals Plato alludes to the love supposed to exist between those, who sell and who buy the beauty of body.

²—² On this comparison of beauty to a ripe grape, see my note on Æsch. Suppl. 994. Add Ælian. Epist. 8, τὸ κάλλος τῶν σωματῶν ὁπώρα ἔοικε. Himerius, quoted by Photius, p. 1131, ἀναμενεῖς τὴν ὥραν τὴν τῆς ὁπώρας ὁμώνυμον.

⁴ I have followed Ast in rejecting τοῦ σώματος as an explanation of τὴν περὶ τὸ σῶμα. Perhaps however Plato wrote—τὴν περὶ τὸ ἄσωτον τοῦ σώματος πλησμονήν. See at viii. § 3.

which we have just now detailed as the third. Since then there are these so many in number,¹ ought the law to forbid all of them, and prevent them from subsisting in us? or, is it not manifest that we should wish for the love, which is of virtue, and which is desirous of a young person becoming the best possible, to exist in the state? and, if it were possible, that we would prevent the other two? Or how shall we say, friend Megillus?

Megil. You have spoken, guest, on these very matters in a manner perfectly beautiful.

Athen. I was likely, as I conjectured, friend, to meet with your accordance in sentiment. And there is no need for me to examine what your law intends on points of this kind, but for me to receive your agreement with my reasoning. But after this, I will again endeavour to persuade Clinias by a kind of enchantment² to be of our opinion. Let then, what has been conceded by you to me, be dismissed, and let us now go through entirely the laws.

Megil. You speak most correctly.

Athen. For laying down law itself³ I possess a certain art, which at present is partly easy, and partly in every respect the most difficult possible.

Megil. How say you?

Athen. We know even at present very many men, who, although they act contrary to law, yet are restrained properly and carefully from an intercourse with beautiful persons, not unwillingly, but as much as possible willingly.

Megil. When, say you?

Athen. When any one has a beautiful brother or sister; and in the case of a son or daughter, the same law, although unwritten, defends as sufficiently as possible (a person)⁴ from sleeping with (them) either openly or in secret,⁵ or in any other way from embracing and touching them.⁵ Nor does even the desire of this intercourse come at all upon the masses.

² Ficinus omits ἐπαίδων, and so after him does Taylor.

³ I have adopted αὐτοῦ, found in one MS., in lieu of τούτου.

⁴ Ast says that συγκαθεύδοντα, and ἀσπαζόμενον are used indefinitely. But the mention of the son and daughter would require a distinct mention likewise of the parents, which Taylor has introduced.

⁵—⁵ Ficinus, whom Taylor has followed as usual, has omitted the whole clause, because, I suspect, he could make no sense out of it. For he Megil. True.

Athen. Does not then a small word extinguish all such pleasures?

Megil. What word do you mean?

Athen. The assertion that these acts are by no means holy, but hateful to the gods, and of [all]¹ base acts the most base. And is not this the cause, that no one even speaks of them in other terms? but that each of us immediately from our birth² hear persons speaking of these acts at all times and in all places, both in fun and oftentimes in all the so-called seriousness of tragedy, when persons introduce³ Thyestes, or some Œdipuses or Macareuses,⁴ who have had secretly a connexion with their sisters,⁴ but on being detected have readily inflicted death as the punishment of their wickedness upon themselves?

Megil. You have spoken most truly so far as this, that fame⁵ has some wonderful power, since no one attempts even to breathe in any other manner⁶ contrary to law.

[7.] Athen. That, therefore, which we just now said was right, that for a legislator, desirous of bringing under subjection some one of those passions, which pre-eminently get the mastery of men, it is easy to know in what manner he should take this in hand. For by making this (evil) report a doubtless knew that πως ἄλλως could not be written in the place of ἄλλως πως; and if it could, that there is nothing to which that phrase could be referred by way of an antithesis; and that τούτων could not be used for αὐτῶν, and still less for ἐκατέρων, what correct language would require. Perhaps Plato wrote τὸν πατέρα, ἀσελγῶς ἀσπαζόμενον ἄπτεσθαι τοῦ ἡ τῆς—i. e. "the father libidiously embracing and touching one or the other."

² To avoid the absurdity of supposing, that persons from their birth understand what is spoken, Ficinus has "statim ab ineunte ætate."

³⁻⁴ On such plural proper names see at Menexen. § 17.

⁴ This assertion is applicable only to Macareus, who had a son by his sister Canacé. In the case of Thyestes, the act of incest was with his daughter; and in that of Œdipus, with his mother.

holy thing amongst all the slaves and free-born and children¹ and women, and the whole city, he will² in the same manner³ thus work out the greatest stability relating to this law.

Megil. Entirely so. But (consider)³ how it will be possible to make all persons willingly speak in this manner.

Athen. You have taken me up correctly. For this is what was stated by myself, that I possess an art, relating to this law, of making use of an intercourse according to nature for the procreation of children, by persons abstaining from a connexion with males, and not designedly destroying the race of man, nor sowing upon rocks and stones that, which,⁴ even if it takes root, will never obtain its naturally productive power; and by abstaining from every female field,⁵ in which what is sown is unwilling to germinate. This law then, by becoming perpetual and in power at the same time, as it is now in power in the case of the intercourse amongst parents, would,⁶ if it prevailed in other connexions justly,⁶ produce⁷ benefits innumerable. For, in the first place, it is laid down according to nature. And, next, it causes persons to restrain from the fury and madness of love, from all adulteries, and all the immoderate use of meats and drinks, and to be familiar with and friendly to their wives; and many other benefits would arise⁸ if any one could be the master of this law.⁸ But, perhaps, some violent and young man, who is brim-full of seed, would,

³ On the ellipse of ὅρα before ὅπως ἔσται see Matth. Gr. Gr. § 520, 4.

⁴ Instead of οὐ μήποτε, which is without regimen, Ast suggested οὐ οὐ μήποτε—He should have elicited rather ὅ γ' οὐ μήποτε from ὅ τι in Clemens Alexandr. Pædag. ii. 10, p. 224, ed. Potter.

⁵ On this metaphor Ast refers to numerous passages collected by himself and others. He has however neglected to observe that Plutarch in Præcept. Conjugal. § 42, alludes to this place in the words ἐξ ὧν οὐδὲν αὐτοῖς φέσθαι θέλωσιν.

⁶⁻⁶ Ficinus omits ἰάν-νικήσῃ δικαίως—correctly.

on hearing this law laid down, immediately abuse (us) for framing laws foolish and impracticable, and would fill every place with his vociferations. It was then through looking to this, that I said I possessed a certain art, in part the easiest of all, and in part the most difficult, for perpetuating this very law, when laid down. For it is very easy to understand that this is possible, and in what way it is so. For we have said that, when this legal institution shall have been sufficiently made holy, it will bring under subjection every soul, and cause them through fear to be entirely obedient to the laws laid down. But matters at present have come to such a pass,¹ that it appears it never can take place; just as the practice of common meals is believed to be a thing impossible for a whole state to practise through its whole life and to exist;² and though it has been proved by the fact, that it does take place amongst you, yet as regards the female sex, it does not seem even in your states³ to have the nature of being able to exist (for ever).³ Hence through the strength of this unbelief, I said it was very difficult for both of these to remain according to law.

Megil. And you were right in saying so.

Athen. Since then it is not above the power of man, but it may indeed take place, are you willing that I should endeavour to tell a tale bordering on credibility?

Clin. How not?

Athen. Will then a person abstain more easily from venery and be willing to do, what is enjoined, respecting it, in a moderate manner,⁴ when he has his body in a good condition, and not like an ordinary person,⁴ or when in a bad one?

Clin. By much the most, when it is not like an ordinary person.

Athen. Do we then not know by hearsay of Iccus⁵ of Taren-

¹ The Greek is προβέβηκε νῦν. One MS. has προβέβηκεν αὐ νῦν, which leads to προβέβηκε τὰ νῦν—

² I have omitted with Ficinus δύνασθαι, which could not be inserted after μὴ δυνατὸν εἶναι, whatever Ast may say to the contrary.

³⁻³ The Greek is φύσιν ἔχειν γίγνεσθαι. Ficinus has “fieri posse putatur,” from which it is evident that he found here δύνασθαι γίγνεσθαι. But the syntax requires τοῦ before δύνασθαι, and the sense αἰ after γίγνεσθαι.

⁴⁻⁴ As ιδιώτης is opposed to ἀσκητής in Xenophon quoted by Ast, one would prefer here ἀσκητικῶς τὸ σῶμα, instead of εὖ τὸ σῶμα—

⁵ This Iccus is spoken of again by Plato in Protagoras, p. 316, D., where the Scholiast brings forward the names of the three others men—

tium, how,¹ for the sake of his contests at Olympia and the rest,² he did, from his love of contest and his art and his possessing in his soul fortitude combined with temperance, never, as the story goes, touch any woman or a boy during the whole period of his practice.³ And the same account is told of Crysson, and Astylus, and Diopompus, and very many others; although they were much worse educated as to their souls than my fellow-citizens and yours too, Clinias, and had their bodies swelling much more with carnal desires.

Clin. In this you speak the truth that, what has been stated by persons of old respecting those athletes, did really take place.

Athen. What then, did they for the sake of victory in wrestling, and in running, and such like things, dare to abstain from that, which is called happiness by the masses? and shall our youth be unable to have a mastery over themselves, for the sake of a far more excellent victory? which we tell them from their very childhood is the most beautiful, and in fables in prose, and by singing in verse, charm them, as is natural.

Clin. What victory?

Athen. The victory over pleasure; (so that)⁴ by being masters of themselves they live happily; but by being mastered, the very reverse. In addition to this, will not the dread of its being at no time and by no means a holy act give them the power to be the masters over those things, which others, worse than them, have mastered?

Clin. It is probable.

[8.] Athen. Since then we have arrived thus far on the subject of this law, but have fallen into a difficulty through the wickedness of the many, I assert (with confidence),⁵ ⁶ that tioned here; of whom nothing seems to be known with the exception of Astylus, who Pausanias says, was a victor in the dialum.

¹ I have adopted ὥς for ὧν, as suggested by Heindorf on Protagoras, p. 489.

² The Greek is καὶ τοὺς τε ἄλλους—where καὶ—τε could not thus follow καὶ—Plato wrote, I suspect, καὶ πολλοὺς ἔτ' ἄλλοι—

³ Ast quotes opportunely Horace in A. P. 412, "Qui studet optatam cursu contingere metam—Abstinnit Venere et vino."

⁴ I have translated as if ὥστε had dropt out after νικῆς—

⁵ Ficinus, whom Taylor follows, has alone "audacter"—as if his MS. read φημι θαρρῶν—

⁶—The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus, and after him by Taylor.

our legal institution ought to march on without disguise, and to say on these points,⁶ that our citizens ought not to be worse than birds, and many other wild animals; who, produced in large herds,¹ live without intercourse, and pure, and chaste, up to the time of procreation; but when they arrive at that period, the male for its gratification pairing with the female, and the female with the male, they live for the remainder of their time in a holy and just manner, firmly abiding in the first compacts of friendship. It is requisite then for them² to be better than wild beasts. If however they are corrupted by the other Greeks, and the greatest number of the Barbarians, and on seeing what is called the unregulated Aphrodité, and on hearing that it has the greatest power, are thus unable to have a mastery over it, there will be a need for the guardians of the laws to become legislators, and to devise for them a second law.

Clin. What law would you advise to be laid down for them, if the one now laid down escapes them?

Athen. Evidently, Clinias, that which follows upon this.

Clin. What law do you mean?

Athen. That they should especially cause the strength of pleasures to be not exercised, by turning, by means of labours, to other parts of the body the course of their overflow and feeding.³ And this will take place, if in the use of venereal pleasures there is no shamelessness. For they, who, through shame, make a rare use of a thing of this kind, will have their mistress of less power,⁴ [by using it seldom].⁴ ⁵Let it then be held by custom and an unwritten law, that to do any of these lawful things secretly, is honourable; but not secretly, is disgraceful;⁵ ⁶but not to do it, not at all; thus this would lie

² Instead of ἀνθρώπους I should prefer ἀστροφούς—"citizens."

³ In lieu of τροφήν one would have expected τροφήν, "luxuriousness."

⁴—⁴ The words between the brackets are evidently superfluous, and correctly omitted by Ficinus, and tacitly after him by Taylor.

⁵—⁵ Such is the literal version of the Greek. Ficinus, whom Taylor follows implicitly, has—"Clam ergo consuetudo et lex non scripta hæc fieri suadeat, contra autem fieri, velut turpe, dissuadeat."

⁶—⁶ Stephens was the first to see that the Greek, of which I have given a literal translation, concealed some error, which he confesses his in our law as being disgraceful on the other hand, and honourable secondly possessing a second rectitude.⁶ And thus one genus, comprehending three genera, would compel those, who are corrupted in their nature, (and) whom we have spoken of as being inferior to themselves, not to act contrary to the law.

Clin. What are these?

Athen. The god-worshipping (genus), and the honour-loving, and that which is produced from the desire not of beauties in the body but of those really existing in the manners of the soul. And these matters perhaps, now detailed by us, are like prayers¹ in a fable; but they will be by far the best, should they perchance exist in all states. Perhaps, too, if a god pleases, we may compel one of two things to take place in matters of love; either that no one shall dare to touch any free and well-born woman, besides his married wife, or sow the seed, for which there has been no sacrificial rite,² and which is illegitimate, amongst harlots, nor that, which is barren, amongst males, contrary to nature; or we will take away entirely the intercourse of males; but with respect to females, if any one has an intercourse with any one, except those who come to his house, together with the gods, and sacred marriages, whether such women are bought, or acquired by any other means,³ and he does not lie hid from all men and women,³ to such a person we should, if we caused him by law to be disfranchised of the privileges⁴ in the state, perhaps appear to have acted by law correctly, as being one who is truly like a foreigner. Let this law, whether it is one, or we ought to call inability to correct; and so do I; nor has the long note of Cousin thrown, I think, any light on the passage. Ast, however, has suggested some alterations, from which nothing appears to be gained. Ficinus, "turpeque sic non omnino agere; sic enim et secundo servabimus honestum loco."

² This alludes to the fact that sacred rites preceded a marriage, as shown by μετὰ θεῶν καὶ ἱερῶν γάμων. Ast quotes opportunely Iamblich. Vit. Pythag. § 195, ἀθυτος καὶ νόθη συνουσία. But the ἀθύτους τε καὶ ἀγάμους γάμους, mentioned by Suidas in Ἀθύτους and Διαξαίνειν, related to what Persius calls "fædos hymenæos," as may be inferred from the expression τὴν ἀνδρῶν ἀπειπάμενος φύσιν.

³⁻³ I confess I hardly understand this clause.

⁴ I do not remember to have met elsewhere with the phrase of ἀτιμον ἐπαίνων. Ficinus has "infamis lege omnibusque civitatis honoribus," as if his MS. read ἀτιμον αὐτὸν πασῶν τῶν ἐν τῇ πόλει τιμῶν.

them two, be laid down respecting all venereal and amatory matters, which, through having an intercourse with each other from desires of such a kind, we transact both in a proper and improper manner.

Megil. Even now,¹ O guest, I would vehemently accept this law from you ; but let Clinias here tell us himself, what he thinks on these points.

Clin. So shall it be, Megillus, when it appears to me that a fitting opportunity presents itself ; but, for the present, permit our guest to proceed forward in the matter of his laws.

Megil. Right.

[9.] Athen. But having proceeded so far, we are almost at the establishment of common meals, which we said would with difficulty exist elsewhere ; but in Crete no one else² would suppose that it ought to be adopted. But after what manner ? whether as here, or as at Lacedæmon ? or is there a third kind of common meals beside these, which would be better than both ? This it seems to me it is not difficult to discover ; and when discovered, to work out not a great good. For what has been now prepared is in an elegant condition.

Following upon these is the preparation for livelihood,³ in what manner it ought to follow them.³ Now a livelihood in other states would be of various kinds and many, and especially from the double sources of what there would be to these. For what relates to food is obtained by most of the Greeks from the earth and sea ; but by these from the earth alone. This therefore will present a more easy task for the legislator. ⁴For not only will half the laws be moderate, but much fewer,⁴ and still befitting free-men. For the legislator

² Instead of ἄλλως, rendered “frustra” by Ficinus, all the other MSS. read ἄλλος—an error I presume for ἄνός, i. e. ἄνθρωπος. Taylor has “but no one will suppose but that it ought to be adopted in Crete.” From which I have been led to suggest—οὐδ’ εἰς ἄλλ’ ἢ ὡς δέον ὑπολάβοι ἂν γίνεσθαι ; unless it be said that the sense is—“But in Crete no one would think that it is adopted in vain.” But in that case δεῖν ought to be omitted.

of this state is freed for the most part from matters relating to ship-owners, and foreign merchants, and retail dealers, and inn-keepers, and tax-collectors, and miners,¹ and money-lenders, and usurers at compound interest,¹ and ten thousand other things of this kind, and bids them all go hang; but he will lay down laws for the tillers of land, and shepherds, and the breeders of bees, and the guardianship and the superintendents of the operations connected with such matters, after having laid down laws on subjects of the greatest moment relating to marriages, and the procreation and the bringing up of children, and still further, their education, and the establishment of magistracies in the state. But at present it is necessary for the legislator to turn himself² to (the laws), relating to feeding² and to those, who labour for it. Let the laws then, called Agricultural, be first laid down. And let this be mentioned as the first law relating to Zeus, who presides over boundaries. Let no one remove the landmarks, either of a fellow-citizen, who is a friend, or of a neighbour,³ while possessing himself at the extremities he is a neighbour to another stranger,³ thinking that this is truly "To remove what is not to be removed."⁴ But let every one be desirous to attempt to remove the greatest other⁵ [except a boundary] stone⁵ rather than a small stone, which is the boundary πολὺ δ' ἱλάττους, which Ficinus, whom Taylor follows in part, has thus abridged, "multo enim major quam dimidia pars legum sufficiet." For he probably saw that αὐ had no meaning here, and knew that after οὐ μόνον correct Greek would require ἀλλὰ καὶ, not πολὺ δέ—I have translated as if the words were ἀν γίγνοιτο: but I cannot correct the error in πολὺ δ' ἱλάττους.

²—² I have translated as if the Greek were ἐπὶ τοὺς νόμους τὴν τροφήν περὶ καὶ ὅσοι—and not ἐπὶ τοὺς τὴν τροφήν καὶ ὅσοι περὶ—For Ficinus has "ad leges de victu deque iis qui—"

⁴ On this saying see Ast at iii. § 6, p. 684, D.

of friendship and hatred sworn before the gods. For Zeus, who presides over a kindred-clan, is the witness of the one, and he who presides over hospitality, of the other; which deities¹ are excited together with the most hateful wars.¹ Now he, who is obedient to the law, will have no perception of the ills, that come from it: but let him, who despises it, be exposed to a double punishment, one, and the first, from the gods, but the second, under the law. For let no one voluntarily remove the landmark of his neighbour; and against him, who does remove them, let any one, who is willing, inform the landowners; and let them bring him into court; and if any one has to pay damages on the charge of his having made privately and by force the land to be without a division,² (respecting) the party so having to pay,³ let the court fix the penalty, as to what he is to suffer (in person) or in purse after being defeated. After this, many and small injuries from neighbours do, through their frequency, beget a great weight of enmity, and cause a neighbourhood to be disagreeable and excessively bitter. Hence it is requisite for a neighbour to take every care not to cause any differences with his neighbour; and to be particularly cautious in other matters, and especially as regards the cultivation of grounds, which they have a mutual right to till. For to do an injury is by no means difficult, but is in the power of every man; but to do a benefit is not in the power of every one. Let him then, who, stepping over his own boundary, secretly tills³ his neighbour's land, pay for the mischief done; and, on account of his shameless and sordid conduct, pay another sum, the double of the mischief to the injured party. Of these and all such like matters let the Land-Stewards take cognizance, and act as judges and fix the fine;

πον, but what we are to read for ΑΑΑΟΝ, I am unable to state, unless it be ΙΔΑΙΟΝ. Cornarius has "quam terminum aut parvum lapidem," as if he wished to read μάλλον τιν' ὄρον ἢ μικρόν λίθον—

² Aστ, whom Stalbaum follows, would reject τοῦ ὀφλόντος, as an interpolation. I have translated as if περὶ had dropt out between ποι-οῦντος and τοῦ ὀφλόντος—and over the greater suits, as it has been stated before, let the whole order of the twelfth part (preside); but of the lesser, the chiefs of the guardians of these. And if any one ¹pastures his flocks over (his neighbours' grounds),¹ let those who witness the injury, decide upon it and fix the fine. And if a person appropriates to himself the swarms of bees belonging to another, ²by following the pleasure of the bees, and making a noise, by beating them down² thus makes them his own, let him pay for the injury done. And if any one sets fire to his own wood, and takes no thought of his neighbour's, let him be fined according to the damage decided on by the rulers. And if in planting he does not leave a proper distance from his neighbour's land, (let him pay,)³ as has been stated even by many legislators sufficiently;⁴ of whose laws it is meet to make use, and not to think that the greater regulator of a state is to lay down laws for all matters, both great and small, and such as belong to a casual legislator. Since relating even to water laws of the olden time, and those beautiful too, have been laid for the tillers of the ground, which it is not proper ⁵for us to use (like water-channels) in our discourse.⁵ But let him, who will, lead water to his own ground, commencing from common streams, and not cutting off the sources, evidently belonging to a private person; and let him lead it

¹—¹ Such is the meaning of ἐπινέμω, which Ficinus renders "pascuis noceat;" and Taylor, "distributes cattle—"

²—² Such is the literal version of the Greek. Ficinus has, what is far preferable, "si aliena examina quis persequitur, atque æra pulsans delectatione apes ad se trahit." But whether he found in his MS. the counterpart of his translation is another question. By the aid however of the gl. in Photius and Suidas, Μελιττοπηχύν τὸ κρούοντας φόβον ποιεῖν, ἵνα μὴ αἱ μέλισσαι προπέτῳνται, or as it should be read, Μελίττειόν τι ἤχρην—ἵνα μὴ—παραποπέτῳνται, i. e. "To sound something suited to bees, in order that they may not fly away"—one may hazard a conjecture that Plato wrote something to this effect—τῇ τῶν μελιττῶν πτήσει συνεπόμενος, καὶ ἡδονῇ κατακηλῶν κρονομένον του αὐτὰς οὕτως οἰκειῶται, i. e. "by following the flight of the bees and charming them with the delight of something being beaten, thus make them his own."

⁴ Plato is thought to allude here to Solon; who introduced a similar law at Athens, as we learn from Plutarch i. p. 91, D.

⁵—⁵ I have introduced the words "like water-courses," to preserve the play in παροχετεύειν, applied here to both the course of the water and conversation.

where he likes, except through dwellings, or certain sacred (places) or tombs, and doing no damage, except what arises from¹ leading aside the water. But if the natural dryness of the ground in certain places should be incapable of retaining the waters from Zeus,² and there is a deficiency in necessary drink, let a person dig in his own ground, until he comes to the clay.³ But if in this depth he does not meet with water, let him draw from his neighbours as much drink as is necessary for each of his domestics. But if there should be a scarcity⁴ amongst his neighbours also, let him, after receiving an order from the Land-Stewards, take to himself the regulation-allowance each day, and thus have a share in the water of his neighbour. But if there be water from Zeus, and one of those on the lower ground does an injury to a farmer on the upper, or to the party dwelling near him, by not allowing an outlet to the water; or, on the contrary, if the party above carelessly permits the waters to run down, and does an injury to a party below; and (the two parties) are for this unwilling to communicate⁵ with each other on these matters, let the party, who wishes it, bring in a City-Steward in the city, and in the country a Land-Steward, and let him regulate himself⁶ what each ought to do; and let him, who does not abide by the regulation, undergo a punishment for his envious and at the same time morose temper, and let him, the verdict being against him, pay to the injured party the double

³ To this passage Plutarch alludes in ii. p. 827, D., and from i. p. 91, it appears that Plato adopted merely a law of Solon.

⁴ So Ast, after Ficinus, understands δι' ἀκρυβείας—a meaning those words never did or could bear; and though Faehse has failed in successfully correcting them, he has happily suggested, what I have adopted, δεξιόμενος in lieu of ταξάμενος—

[10.] It is meet likewise for all to have a communion in some such way as this of the fruits of autumn. ²The goddess herself has a twofold gift of grace for us; ³ one a Dionysal instruction,³ not to be treasured up; the other, which is naturally suited for laying by. Let then this law be ordained respecting the fruits of autumn. Whoever tastes the rustic fruit, be it grapes or figs, before the season for gathering them, which falls in with the rising of Arcturus,⁴ either in his own or the grounds of others, pay fifty drachms sacred to Dionysus, if he has plucked them from his own land; but if from his neighbour's, a mina;⁵ but if from that of others, two-thirds of a mina. But let him who wishes to gather the grape now called "well-born,"⁶ or grapes called "well-born,"⁷ if he takes them from his own ground, pluck them how and when he likes; but if from another's, let him, if he has not

⁴ Here again is an error in the text, which, although it has baffled the ingenuity of Cornarius, Ast, and Stalbaum, it is not very difficult to correct. The Greek is παιδείαν Διονυσιάδα—where lies hid ὁποῦ ἡδεῖαν Διονυσίου λιβα—"the sweet flowing of the Dionysian juice," a quotation from some lyric poet; while in ὁπός there would be an allusion to Ὀπώρα, which, says the Etymol. M. in Ὀπός, is so called, ὅτι ὁπός αὐτῇν ὥρεϊ, ὃ ἔστι φυλάττει, or, as it should be read, ὅτι ὁπός αὐτῇ ὥρεϊ. With regard to λιβα, see at Æsch. Eum. 54, where I elicited λιβα from διὰ, adopted by every editor except Wellaver. Winckelmann refers here to something he has written on this passage in Act. Societat. Græc. ii. p. 17. But as I have never seen the work, I do not know what he has done for the correction or explanation of the passage.

⁶ That is, double; for the mina contained 100 drachms.

⁷ Although Eustathius on Il. E. p. 544 = 414, quotes from this passage γενναίαν and γενναία, yet Plato wrote, I suspect, the names of two places, where the grape and fig were grown to perfection.

persuaded (the owner), be fined ¹in that way ever¹ following out the law,² that a person is not to remove what he has not put down. But if a slave, not having persuaded the owner of the ground, gathers any fruit of this kind, let him be scourged with stripes equal in number to each grape on a bunch and fig on the tree. Let a foreign settler, who has bought the "well-born" autumnal fruit,³ eat them if he pleases; but if a stranger sojourning in the land, as he passes along the road, (either alone)⁴ or with one follower, desires to taste the autumnal fruit, let him taste the "well-born" fruit, receiving it as the gift of a host; but the law prohibits even a person of such a kind⁵ from sharing in the fruit called rustic. If any one ignorantly tastes these, either himself or a slave, let a person punish the slave with stripes, but send away the free person after admonishing and teaching him that he may taste other autumnal fruits (unfit)⁶ for laying by, but that those, belonging to raisins and wine and dry figs, are unfit for him to have. With respect to pears, and apples, and pomegranates, and all such fruits, let it not be held a disgraceful act to gather them secretly. But if a person under thirty years of age is detected (gathering them), let him be struck and repelled, but without wounds, but let there be no infliction of such like blows upon a free-man. And let it likewise be lawful for a stranger to be a partaker of these, as of the autumnal fruits.⁷ But if any older person tastes of them, eating them on the spot, and secretly taking away none, let him partake of all such as a stranger does; but if he is not obedient to the law, let him run the risk of being no competitor for virtue, should any one at that time give information of such matters to the then judges.

[11.] Water for gardens is pre-eminently the most nutritive

¹—¹ Ficinus, followed by Taylor, unable it seems to understand ἐκείνως δεῖ, has omitted those words; and so he has ἐπόμενος, for which Stephens suggested ἐπομένως, found in Timæus, p. 27, C.

² This too was a law of Solon, as we learn from Diogen. L. i. 57.

³ Ficinus renders τὴν γενναίαν, by "ad repositionem ineptis," and shortly afterwards τῆς γενναίας by "fructus non reponendos—"

⁴ Ficinus, followed by Taylor, has alone "si transeat solus."

⁵ Instead of τῶν τοιούτων, all the MSS. have τὸν τοιούτον, answering to "peregrinos" in Ficinus.

⁶ Ficinus has "ficus uvasque solum modo ad repositionem ineptas," who therefore found in his MS. ἀνεπιτηδείων after εἰς ἀπόθεσιν.

of all things, but it is easily rendered corrupt. For it is not easy to corrupt either the earth, or the sun, or the air, which together with water are the nourishers of what springs up from the soil, either by drugs, or turnings aside, or thefts; but all such things as these can take place in the case of the nature of water; and hence it requires the assistance of law. Let this then be (the law) respecting it. If any one willingly corrupts the water of another by drugs, or diggings, or thefts, whether such water be from a spring or collected (in a tank), let the party injured have a trial before the City-Stewards,¹ and write down the estimated amount of the injury.¹ ² And if any one be found guilty of having corrupted it by any drugs, let him, in addition to the fine, cleanse the spring or the tank of water in the way that the laws of the (holy) interpreters shall point out, how the cleansing ought to be done on each occasion, and by each person.²

With respect to the conveyance of all fruits in season, let it be lawful for any, who wishes, to carry home his own property through every place, wherever he shall do no damage to any one, or gain an advantage himself three times as much as the damage done to his neighbour. But of these questions let the magistrates take cognizance, and of all other injuries that one person wilfully commits by violence or secretly against another person unwillingly, either himself or his property, by means of the property of the former. And let the party (injured) lay all matters of this kind before the rulers, and receive compensation for the injury up to three minæ; but if the complaint of one person against another be of a higher amount, let him bring his suit before the common courts of justice, and let him have satisfaction against the party, who has done the injury. But if any magistrate shall be found to decide upon the damage with an unjust sentence, let him be considered as a debtor to the injured person for twice the loss sustained. And let any one, who wishes it, bring the unjust conduct of the magistrate before the common tribunals in each case³ of complaint. But as there are ten thousand trifling things of law, according to which punishments ought to be inflicted, respecting the distribution of trials by lot, and the citations, and the persons citing, whether the citation ought to be made before two, or how many, and whatever else is of such a kind, these are not to be left unregulated by law, nor yet are they worthy of an aged legislator. Let young men, therefore, lay down the laws relating to these,¹ (by looking) to the enactments of their predecessors, and modelling trifling matters after great,¹ and by becoming experienced in the necessary use of them, till every thing shall appear to be sufficiently laid down. ² And then rendering them immovable, let them live and use them as possessing a power in moderation.³

²—² In the place of all between the numerals Taylor has merely, "and if convicted he shall be punished adequately to his offence."

With respect to the other handicraft trades, it is requisite to act in this manner. In the first place, let no person of the country be one of those, who labour at handicraft trades, nor yet the domestic of a person of the country. For a citizen, who is to preserve and hold the arrangements of the state, common to all, is engaged in an art requiring much practice, and, at the same time, much learning, nor is he able³ to attend to the pursuit as a by-work. Now to labour accurately in two pursuits, or two arts, scarcely not a single nature of man is sufficient. Nor is the same person sufficient⁴ to exercise one art, and to superintend another person, exercising another. This therefore ought first of all to take place in a state. Let no coppersmith be at the same time a carpenter; nor let a carpenter attend more to others, who are coppersmiths, than to his own art, making as a pretext, that while he is attending to many servants, who are working for him, he very reasonably attends more to them, for the sake of greater gain accruing from thence to himself than from his own art; but let every artist in the state exercise one art alone, and from that obtain

²—² Ficinus has "deinde sufficienter, positis immobiliter, his utantur," as if his MS. read μετρίως in lieu of μέτριον, which can hardly stand here without τι—Baiter would read μέτρον, and refers to p. 836, A., 957, A., 959, A.

⁴ The Greek is αὐτὸς ἱκανῶς. But five MSS. read ἱκανός, while αὐτός is plainly required by the sense.

his living. This law let the City-Stewards with all exertion preserve; and let them punish with disgrace and infamy any person of the country, if he inclines to any art more than to the attention to virtue, until they bring him to his own proper course. But if any stranger applies himself to two arts, let them, by punishing him with bonds, and fines, and expulsions from the city, compel him to be one person instead of being many. With respect to the wages of workmen, and the destruction¹ of their works, and² should any other person injure them, or they³ any one else, let the City-Stewards pass a judgment as far as to fifty drachms; but beyond this, let the common tribunals decide according to law.

And let no person in the state pay any duty on exports and imports. But with respect to frankincense, and other foreign aromatics, for the gods, and purple, and other dyed colours, which this country does not produce, or with respect to any other art, requiring foreign articles to be imported, let no one introduce any of these without some necessity; nor, on the other hand, export any thing which it is necessary to remain in the country. On all these matters let the twelve guardians of the laws, five of the elder being excepted, take the cognizance and have the care. With respect to arms and all warlike instruments, if there should be a necessity for importing any foreign art, relating to plants,⁴ or metals, or chains,⁵ or any animals,⁶ on account of their use of such a kind,⁶ let the Hipparchs and the Generals have full powers over the import and export of such articles, ⁷the state

² This "and" seems strangely introduced here.

³ The Greek is ἐάν τις αὐτοὺς ἔτερος ἢ ἐκεῖνοί τιν' ἄλλον ἀδικῶσι. But in this antithetical formula, where αὐτοὺς is found in the first clause, it is always repeated in the second. There is some error here; which might be corrected without much difficulty.

⁴ The plants used for warlike purposes were, the ash made into spear handles, and other trees converted into shields and bows and arrows.

⁵ The Greek is ἡ μεταλλευτικοῦ κτήματος ἢ δεσμευτικοῦ. Ficinus has "senea instrumenta, funes—"

⁶ Ficinus, followed by Taylor, has "quæ ad bellum conferant."

⁷ The words between the numerals are omitted by Taylor. Ficinus fills out the sense in his version, "ut civitas invehendi evehendique simul, cum opus sit, facultate non privetur." What Plato wrote and meant to say, I confess myself unable to discover.

giving at the same and receiving;⁷ but the guardians of the laws shall lay down, respecting these matters, laws becoming and sufficient. And let there be no higgling for the sake of money-making, ¹either by this person or any one else,¹ either in the whole country or city, or in any part.

[12.] With respect to food and the distribution of the produce of the country, the correctness of the method near to that laid down by the law in Crete, would seem, if adopted, to be adopted with reason. For it is meet that all should distribute into twelve parts the whole produce of the land, in which way also it is to be consumed. Let every twelfth part, for example, of wheat and barley, of which let all the rest of fruits be the followers, that are to be divided, and all the animals in each,² that are to be sold, be divided into three parts, according to a certain proportion; one being for free-men, another for their domestics, and the third for handicraftsmen and strangers generally, and such as are residing with the foreign settlers, in want of necessary sustenance, or are constantly arriving during the exigencies of the state, or any individual. Of all the necessaries (of life), let this third part so distributed be alone vendible from necessity; but of the two others let nothing be necessarily sold. How then would these be distributed most correctly? In the first place, it is evident that we should distribute³ them partly equally, and partly unequally.

Clin. How say you?

Athen. It must needs be, that the land produces and brings up each of these things worse or better.

Clin. How not?

Athen. ⁴In such a way then as this, ⁴as there are three parts, let no part have more, when distributed, either (that)⁵ for masters

¹—¹ Here again I am in the dark, as to the person or thing meant by τοῦτον and ἄλλου μηδενός.

² Cousin understands after ἐκάστοις the words μέρεσι τῆς χώρας.

³ In lieu of νέμομεν, one MS. has νεμόμενα: which leads to νέμοιμεν ἄν.

or slaves, nor, on the other hand, that for strangers; but let the distribution give ¹the equality of similitude, ¹the same to all. And let each citizen, on receiving his two parts, have the power to distribute both to slaves and free-men, as much of his share, and of what kind, as he pleases. ²But the greater quantity of these ³it is meet to be distributed by measure and number, in this way, (by a person) taking the number of all the animals to which there ought to be food from the earth and distributing it. After this it is meet for habitations to be separately assigned them in an orderly regulated manner. Now the following regulation is suited to matters of this kind. There ought to be twelve hamlets, one in the middle of each twelfth part; and in each hamlet, to be selected first a market-place, and temples for the gods and the dæmons, who follow the gods; and whether these are some local (heroes) amongst the Magnetes, ³or the holy seat of other ancients, whose memory has been preserved, to these let persons pay the honours due to ancient men, and found every where temples to Vesta, and Zeus, and Athéné, and to him who may be the leader of the others, that belong to each twelfth part. And first (it is meet) for the buildings to be about these temples, where the ground is the highest, as receptacles the best protected possible for the garrison; but to prepare all the rest of the country, by distributing it into thirteen parts for the handicraftsmen; and to cause one portion of these to settle in the city, by distributing this portion amongst the twelve parts of the whole city; ⁴(but to have the other) ⁴persons distributed out of the city, and in a circle about it; and every hamlet to cause the race of handicraftsmen to settle together, that are useful to the agriculturists; and of all these let the Land-Stewards have the care, and of how many and of what kind each place may require; and of the spots in which the handicraftsmen may dwell, and be the least annoyance, and the greatest benefit to the agricul-

²—³ Cousin translates τὸ δὲ πλεον τούτων—"pour le surplus."

⁴—⁴ Ficinus alone has, what is required by the sense, "aliæ exteriorem undique teneant locum," omitting however καὶ ἐν κύκλῳ.

turists; but of those in the city, let the City-Stewards in like manner have the care.¹ [13.] But to the City-Stewards each of the matters relating to the market-place must be a care. For after their inspection of the sacred things, let their attention (be given) to the matters of the market-place,² lest any one does wrong in what relates to the needs of man;³ their second work would be to punish, as being the inspectors of temperance and insolence, the person requiring punishment; but such of the vendible articles, as the citizens are under regulations to sell, they must first look into, in behalf of the strangers, whether each article is according to the law. And let the law be this. On the new⁴ day of each⁴ month, let the superintendents⁵ bring out a portion of what is to be sold to the foreigners; namely, a first twelfth part of the corn; and let the foreigner buy corn, and such things as pertain to corn, on the first market for the whole month. But on the twelfth⁶ day of the month, let some make a selling, and others a buying of liquid articles, sufficient for the whole of the month. And on the twenty-third day (of the month), let there be a sale of such animals⁷ as are to be sold by each party, or bought by those in want of them, and the sale of such chattels and goods as (suit) the agriculturists, such as of skins, and all kind of clothing, either woven or felt-like, or other things of such a kind;⁷⁸ but it is necessary for foreigners to

^{2—3} Such is the literal version of the Greek. Ficinus has “ne quis vendendo emendove injuriam faciat,” adopted to the letter by Taylor.

⁴ Bekker has νόμος δὲ ἔστω, μηνός— But six MSS., νόμος δ' ἐκάστῳ μηνός. Plato wrote νόμος δὲ ἔστω ἐκάστου μηνός, as shown by “mensis cujusque” in Ficinus, who however omits νόμος δὲ ἔστω.

⁶ All the MSS. read δεκάτῃ, answering to “decimo” in Ficinus.

^{7—7} Ficinus has thus abridged all between the numerals, “quibus homines egent, supellectiliumque, ut corii vestiumque ac similia.”

⁸—⁸ Such is the literal version of the Greek, which I confess I cannot understand; nor, I think, could Ficinus, whose rendering is “nece acquire them by purchasing from others ; but the retail dealing in these articles either barley or wheat, distributed in the form of meal, or any other food in general, for citizens and their slaves, let no one sell or buy from any person of this kind.⁸ But in the markets for foreigners, let a foreigner (sell) to the handicraftsmen, and their slaves, ¹exchanging the sold articles for wine and food, which the majority call a retail trading ; and let the cooks expose for sale portions of animals cut into pieces to foreigners and handicraftsmen and their domestics.¹ Let too a foreigner buy daily the whole of the materials for burning in a mass, from the superintendents of farms, and sell it again to other foreigners for as much as he pleases, and when he pleases. But of all other goods and chattels, as much as there is a need of them to each person, let (the foreigners) sell (any part)² at the common market, after bringing them to a place appointed³ for each occasion,⁴ ⁵where they shall wait, having made a conjecture about fitting situations, until the guardians of the laws, and the Stewards of the market, with the City-Stewards, shall have marked out the limits of the sale-stands.⁵ In these autem est peregrinos omnia a possidentibus emere, ne cauponatio in tritico et hordeo circa farinam ac cætera alimenta ulla fiat ; nec civibus nec servis eorum cauponari omnino liceat."

² I have translated as if ὁτιούν, required to govern the genitive χρημάτων, had dropt out after πωλεῖν.

places let a person exchange money for goods, and goods for money, one party not giving up to another the article of barter (without an equivalent).¹ But if a person does give it up in confidence, whether he recovers (its value) or not, let him rest contented ; as there is no action relating to contracts of this kind. ²But the article sold and bought, by how much the more it is, or at a greater (price) than according to the law, which has stated through how much its being increased and decreased it is meet to do neither of these acts ;³ let the greater be written up before the guardians of the laws, and the contrary expunged. Let the same take place respecting the foreign settlers with regard to the registering of their property.

And let any one, who wishes, come to the emigration on certain conditions, ³as there is a location for any foreigner, who has the wish and the power to emigrate,³ if he belongs to any craft ; and if there is to him sojourning not more than twenty years from his enrolling himself, and paying no foreign settler's tax, ever so small, except that of living temperately, nor any other hawker's licence for the sake of buying and selling. But when the time (twenty years) shall have expired, let him take away his property and depart. ⁴But if during these years it should happen to him to become a person of note through some sufficient acts of kindness done to the state, and he trusts he can persuade the Council and Assembly by making a request that a delay may take place in his quitting the country absolutely, or that he may stay there for the whole of life, let him go and persuade the city ; (and) whatever he out the boundaries for each kind of wares. It would seem however, from a passage just afterwards, that the magistrates had a power to fix a price upon different articles. But the words are too corrupt to lead to any positive conclusion.

¹ I have inserted the words between the lunes to fill up what I conceive to be the sense.

²⁻³ Such is the literal version of the text. Ficinus has "si quid vero venditum emptumque pluris minorisve est, quam lex jusserit, qua rerum venalium mensuræ et pretia constituta sunt"—by the aid of which Ast would read πλέον ἂν ᾗ ἢ καὶ μείον instead of πλέον ἂν ᾗ καὶ πλεόνος—Cousin's version is "Si on vendait ou si on achetait une chose en plus grande quantité et plus cher qu' il n' est marquée par la loi"—thus applying πλέον to quantity, and πλεόνος to price.

⁴⁻⁴ Here again Taylor has adopted almost to the letter the abridged may persuade, let it be accomplished for him.⁴ But in the case of the sons of foreign settlers, who are handicraftsmen and fifteen years of age, let the period of their settlement commence after their fifteenth year; and after these let a person remain twenty years, and then depart whither he pleases; but if he wishes to remain let him remain after having persuaded (the government) on the same grounds. ¹But let the person, who is leaving, go and expunge for himself the registrations, which have been written previously about him before the rulers.¹

BOOK IX.

[1.] ²After these there would be law-suits, consequent upon all the preceding doings, according to the natural arrangement of laws. Now of the doings whatsoever, respecting which it is requisite for law-suits to take place, some have been mentioned, namely, those relating to agriculture, and what follow upon them; ³but some of the greatest moment have not been mentioned at all; and each having been mentioned stated singly ³what recompence it ought to receive, translation of Ficinus—"Quod si magnum aliquod beneficium intra viginti annos civitati contulerit velitque plus temporis aut etiam per vitam in civitate manere, fiat sibi, quod petierit ratumque habeatur, si modo consilio concionique persuaserit."

² Ficinus has, "Judicia vero, si post hæc superioribus actionibus convenientia reddantur, naturalis utique ferendarum legum ordo servabitur," as if his MS. read Δίκαι δὲ, αἱ τὰ—οὔσαι κατὰ φύσιν γίγνονται ἄν— But Ast says that οὔσαι γίγνονται ἄν is merely a circumlocution for γίγνονται ἄν.

³—³ Such is the literal version of the unintelligible Greek, τὰ δὲ μέγιστα οὔτε εἰρηταί πω, καθ' ἑν ἕκαστον τε λεγόμενον ῥηθὲν, out of which Cornarius, Stephens, and Ast have been unable to elicit any thing satisfactory; while Ficinus has been content to give an abridgment of the whole passage in his version, "de maximis vero judiciis et judicibus sigillatim nondum diximus." What the train of thought requires might perhaps and what judges to meet with, these are to be stated after those in order.

Clin. Right.

Athen. It were, however, after a manner disgraceful ¹ to lay down all the laws, that we are now about to do, ¹ in such a kind of state as we assert will be well regulated, and meet with every thing leading directly to the pursuit of virtue. For ² ever to think that in such a state a man can be born, who will participate in the depravity ³ of the others, the greatest, ³ so that it is necessary to lay down laws by anticipation, and to put out threats, should such a character arise, and for the sake of averting these, when they do arise, to lay down against them laws of punishment, as if they would arise, ⁴ (this,) as I said, were after a manner disgraceful. But since we do not, as the ancient legislators did, give laws ⁵ to heroes the sons of gods, as the story now goes, and they who were born from gods, gave laws (to themselves) ⁶ and others, born themselves from such beings, but we do at present legislate as men for the seed of men, there is no dread of doing wrong in fearing that some of our citizens should be, as it were horn-struck, ⁷ and be obtained, but not without alterations, which would appear too violent. In lieu of ῥηθὲν, which Ast would expunge, Winckelmann proposes διαρρήδην, Orelli, ῥητὴν ἤν—

² The Greek is ἐν δὲ—The sense requires ἐν γάρ—On the confusion of δὲ and γάρ, see Schæfer's Index to Porson's Euripides in Γάρ.

⁴ I have adopted ἰσομένους, suggested by Stephens, in lieu of ἰσομένους, which is without regimen.

⁵ In lieu of νομοθετούμενοι we must read νομοθετούμενοις, or, what is preferable, omit the word altogether.

⁶ I have inserted "themselves," absolutely requisite to balance ἄλλοις. For αὐτοὶ αὐτοῖς τ' might easily have been corrupted into αὐτοὶ τ'.

⁷ In the word κεράσβολος, there is an allusion to the notion of some ancient agriculturists, that seeds which, when sown, had struck against the horn of a bull or cow, produced fruit so hard as to be cooked with difficulty, and in fact to never become tender. The notion was ridiculed become naturally so hard, as not to be liquefied,¹ (and,) as those kinds of pulse are in the case of fire, so these persons should in the case of laws, although ever so strong, become not wasted.²

³In favour of whom I will state what is no favour,³ first a law relating to sacrilege, should any one dare to commit it. Now we would neither wish, nor is it to be very much feared, that any citizen amongst those, who have been properly brought up, will ever labour very greatly under this disease; but their domestics and strangers, and the slaves of strangers, would attempt many things of this kind. For the sake of whom especially, and at the same time being cautious of all the weakness of human nature, I shall mention the law relating to sacrilege,⁴ and all the other matters of that kind, as are to be cured, or ⁵not to be cured at all. The prelude, however, to these matters ought, according to what has been formerly agreed upon, to be as short as possible. Some one then would, conversing and at the same time admonishing, address him, whom an evil desire calls aside by day and excites by night, and leads him to plunder temples, in these words:—O wonderful man, no ill, either human or divine, stirs up that—which is now urging you to proceed to an act of sacrilege, but a certain madness, begotten in men from crimes of old date, and not yet cleansed, and which is carried round in the form of something to be expiated; and against which you ought, with all your might, to be on your guard. Learn, then, what this by Theophrastus, quoted by Ruhnken on Timæus, p. 155, who has shown that ἀρεάμων, which was originally said of pulse that, like some kind of peas, does not become soft by boiling, was afterwards applied by Aristophanes and Plato to a person; and, he might have added, by Æschylus likewise in Prom. 198, and 1098.

⁵ Ficinus has “aut vix aut nullo modo sanari possunt.” He therefore found in his MS. ἤ, not καὶ, or perhaps both ἤ καὶ— caution is. When any such idea comes upon you, betake yourself to expiatory rites ; betake yourself, as a suppliant, to the temples of the gods who avert evils ; (and) betake yourself to the society of men, who are called good, and partly hear, and partly endeavour yourself to say, that every man ought to honour what is beautiful and just. But fly, without turning back, from the society of the wicked. And if, while you are so doing, the disease becomes somewhat lighter, (it is well) ;¹ but if not, consider that death is more honourable than life, and free yourself from it.

[2.] Since, then, we have sung these preludes to those, who turn their thoughts to all such things as are unholy and destructive to the state, ²it is meet for the law to be silent in the case of him who obeys :³ but to him, who does not obey, to sing, after the prelude, loudly—He, who is detected in the act of sacrilege, if he is either a slave or a stranger, shall have the circumstance marked in his face and hands ;³ and after being scourged with as many stripes as the judges shall think proper, he shall be cast out naked beyond the boundaries of the country. For, perhaps, after suffering this punishment, he will, by being brought to his senses, become a better man. For punishment, taking place according to law, is not inflicted as an evil, but it nearly effects one of two things ; for it makes him who suffers the punishment, either better or less depraved. If however any citizen shall appear to have done any thing of this kind, in the shape of a crime, considered one of the heinous and not to be mentioned,⁴ relating to the gods, or parents, or the state, the judge shall consider such a person to

be incurable, from reflecting that though he had met with an education and a bringing up of so excellent a kind, he had not kept himself from the greatest wickedness. Now to such a person death is the least of evils. But he will by his example benefit the rest, when he is held in dishonour, and is made to disappear,¹ and (is cast out) beyond the boundaries of the country. But to his children and race, if they avoid their father's habits, let there be glory and words of honour, inasmuch as they have well and bravely fled from evil to good. It will not, however, be becoming for the property of such person to be confiscated to the state, in which the same and equal allotments ought to remain for ever. But when any one shall be voted to have committed crimes worthy (of a loss) of property, let him pay² from his possession the fines,³ if there be any overplus beyond his allotment properly furnished; and to this extent let him be fined, but not beyond. And let the guardians of the laws, looking into these matters accurately from the registers, ever give a clear statement to the judges, in order that no one may be idle,³ with regard to his allotment, through the want of means. But should any one be voted to be worthy of a greater fine, and none of his friends be willing to be his surety, and, by paying jointly the fine, to procure his liberty, punish him with bonds for a length of time, and in public, and with some kind of ill-treatment;⁴ and let no one for any offence be at any time without a punishment,⁵ not even if he is driven over the boundaries;⁶ but it is meet for the

²⁻³ Although ἐκτίσεις—ἐκτίνειν would be correct Greek, yet I very much doubt whether ζημίας ἐκτίσεις—ἐκτίνειν be equally so. I have therefore translated, as if the text were ζημίας ἐκ κτήσεως—similar to χρημάτων—ἐκτίσεις shortly afterwards.

³ As each allottee was required to cultivate his allotment, he would of necessity remain idle, if it were confiscated, and no provision made for its cultivation by another person; which could not take place in a state, where every one is supposed to be already occupied in some business.

⁵ This is a rare sense of ἄτιμος. Ast refers to Eustathius on Od. Δ. 32.

⁶ So Ast explains εἰς ὑπερορίαν φυγάδα—where he has adopted εἰς, as suggested by Stephens. But then the article would be required, as shown punishment to be either death, or bonds, or stripes, or certain¹ formless sittings or standings, or by-standings at temples,¹ at the extreme parts of the country, or, as we before stated, the payment of money; ² and for the trial to take place in this way. Let then² the guardians of the laws be the judges of death; and let the tribunal consist of the last year's magistrates, selected for their excellence. But as regards the bringing (before the court) an accusation and the citing (the witnesses), and such like matters, and how they ought to take place, this must be the care of the junior legislators, but ours to lay down the law for regulating the manner of giving votes. Now let the vote be given openly; but, prior to this, let the judge be seated before the face of the accuser and defendant,³ in order, as near as possible, according to old age;³ and let all the citizens too, who are at leisure, diligently attend as the hearers of such causes; and let the accuser speak first one speech, and afterwards the defendant; and after these speeches, let the senior judge commence by his own inquiry⁴ and proceed to a sufficient examination of what has been stated; and, after the elder judge, all the rest in order ought to go through whatever a person is ⁵ still desirous of being stated, or (regrets to have been) not stated⁵ by each party. But let him, by εἰς τὴν ὑπερορίαν ἐκπέμπειν in ix. p. 866, D., and xi. p. 936, C. Hence ὑπερόριον, proposed by Steph. and found in two MSS., is preferable.

¹—¹ Such is the literal version of the Greek—ἀμόρφους ἔδρας ἢ στάσεις ἢ παραστάσεις εἰς ἱερά—where I cannot well understand ἀμόρφους; nor can I believe that Plato wrote στάσεις ἢ παραστάσεις, especially as Dio Cassius, iv. p. 790, quoted by Casaubon, on Suetonius August. c. 24, has ἔδραι τε ἀτιμοὶ καὶ στάσεις ἐπονείδιστοι—By comparing however Timæus Lex. in Παράστασις· στάσις παρὰ τινά ἀτιμος—(or, as it should be read, παρ' ἱερά τινά)—it would seem that ἡ στάσις is a part of an explanation. Perhaps by ἀμορφοὶ or ἀτιμοὶ ἔδραι are to be understood sittings, where the party offending was placed in a corner or had a dress of dishonour put on him; while with the standing at the temple may be compared the custom in modern times of persons doing penance by standing in a church with a white sheet thrown over them.

²—² I have adopted, what Ast has suggested—τὴν δὲ δίκην ταύτη γίνεσθαι, in lieu of τὴν δίκην ταύτην γενέσθω, which is without sense or syntax. To complete however the connexion of the sentences he should have suggested δὴ γὰρ δὲ—

³—³ I confess I hardly understand ἐξῆς ἐγγύτατα κατὰ πρῆσβιν—

⁵—⁵ The Greek is ῥηθὲν ἢ μὴ ῥηθὲν ἐκπιθεῖν—I have translated as if who desires or regrets nothing, give up his right of inquiry to another. But of the matters mentioned, whatever may seem to be to the purpose, let persons affix a seal to the writings, and, after putting the marks of all the judges, place the document in the temple of Vesta; and again on the morrow, after coming together to the same place, let them inquire into and go through the suit, and again affix marks to what has been stated; and when they shall have done this thrice, after having sufficiently sifted the proofs and testimony, let each judge, carrying in his hand a sacred¹ pebble, undertake before Vesta,² to decide, as far as he can, justly and truly, and thus put an end to a suit of this kind.

[3.] After the offences relating to the gods, (let us speak)³ of those, that relate to the dissolution of a polity. Now he, who brings a person into power and makes the laws slaves, and puts the state under the control of factious societies, and effects all this by force, and excites sedition, acts contrary to the law. Such a person it is meet to consider as the greatest enemy of all to the whole state. And it is meet to hold him as the second in wickedness,⁴ who, although not taking any part in any of these acts, yet while he has a share in the greatest offices of the state, either lies hid from the knowledge of these matters,⁵ or not lying hid does through cowardice not act the part of an avenger on behalf of his country. But let every ἐπιποθῇ were written ἐτ ποθῇ, and ποθῇ taken in the 'double sense of desiring and regretting. But if this is not possible, we must omit ἢ μὴ ῥηθῆν, with two MSS., if ποθῇ means "be desirous;" but ῥηθῆν ἢ, if it means "regret."

¹ I do not know another place where mention is made of a holy pebble. By comparing φανερὰ ἢ ψῆφος just before, one would prefer φανερὰ to ιερά—

² As Ficinus has "jurejurando per Vestam," Stephens suggested πρὸς τῆς Ἑστίας, adopted by Ast, and found afterwards in five MSS. But ὕπισχνεῖσθαι has not elsewhere in the sense of "to swear."

³ Ficinus has alone "dicatur—"

⁴ Unless κάκη is to be referred to δειλία, which can hardly be the case, one would prefer κακία—

one, who is of the smallest utility, lay an information before the magistrates,¹ and bring to trial the person who is plotting for a violent and at the same time an illegal change in the form of government. And let the judges for these be those in the cases of sacrilege; and let the whole process be conducted for the former in a similar manner as for the latter; and let the vote,² which is the superior in number, bring with it death.² And in one word,³ let not the disgrace and punishment of the father follow upon any of the children, unless the father, grandfather, and great-grandfather of any one have in succession paid the penalty of death; and let the children keep their own property, except so much as belongs completely to the regulated allotment, and let the state send them away⁴ to their ancient paternal land and state.⁴ But as to those citizens, who shall happen to have more children than one, and these not less than ten years of age, let ten of them cast lots, whom the father or grandfather on the father's or mother's side shall mark out; and let the names of those who have obtained the lot be sent to Delphi; and whomsoever the god fixes upon, (it is meet to) appoint with a better fortune as the heir of the family of those who have left their home.

Clin. And properly so.

Athen. Let there be still a one-third⁵ law in common, respecting the judges⁶ [who ought to judge for them],⁶ and the mode of the suits,⁷ in the case of those, against whom a person shall lay a charge of treason, and bring them before a court of justice.⁷ In like manner, let there be in the case of their children this ¹ Ficinus has "judicibus," adopted tacitly by Taylor.

²⁻² This seems a rather strange law. Since even if the greater number of votes were for an acquittal, the party would still be put to death. But perhaps Plato meant to say, that if a bare majority of votes were given against the accused, he was to suffer death.

³ This expression seems here perfectly out of place.

⁴⁻⁴ The reader should bear in mind that the laws laid down by Plato were intended for a colony sent out from a mother country, and not for one existing already; where it would be in some cases impossible for them to be acted upon.

⁵ To avoid the incorrect τρίτος εἷς, Sydenham suggests ἐπὶ τρισὶν εἷς—I should prefer τρίτος οὗτος ἔστω ὁ νόμος—

⁶⁻⁶ The words between the brackets are omitted by Ficinus, and after him by Taylor.

⁷⁻⁷ Here again Ficinus has briefly "adversus eos, qui proditiōnis accusati sunt," followed tacitly by Taylor.

one law on all points¹ touching their remaining in, or departing from, their country, as regards the three, a traitor, and him who commits sacrilege, and him who by violence destroys the laws of the state. Against a thief too, whether he steals a thing great or small, let there be one law, and one punishment, after a trial² in all cases. For if any one is cast in a trial of this kind, and he has other property, beyond his allotment, sufficient to pay, he must in the first place pay double of what has been stolen; but if he has not, let him be put into bonds, until he either pays, or persuades the party, who has a verdict against him, (to forego his claim). But if any one is cast in a trial relating to a public theft, let him be freed from bonds, after he has either persuaded the state, or paid the double of the property stolen.

Clin. How say we, guest, that there is no difference in the case of a thief, who purloins a thing small or great, and from places sacred or not sacred; and in such other cases, as present a dissimilitude in the whole of thieving, which, as being various, the legislator ought to follow up by assigning punishments not similar at all?

Athen. You have, Clinias, in the best manner, nearly beaten me off, while I have been as it were carried along;³ and after stirring me up, you have reminded me, although I had previously thought of it myself, that the matters relating to the laying down of laws have never at any time been by any means properly worked out,⁴ as it has fallen out to speak of them at present.⁴

Clin. But how again say we this?

[4.] Athen. We did not make use of an incorrect image, when

¹ In lieu of περὶ ταῦτα, which is scarcely intelligible, I have translated as if the Greek were περὶ πάντα—

³ The Greek is ὥσπερ φερόμενον. But ὥσπερ requires the mention of something to serve as a comparison. Perhaps Plato wrote ὥσπερ θῆρα, φερόμενον—For to a wild beast would well apply the verb ἀνήγειρα.

we compared all those, who were now regulated by laws, to slaves under the care of slave-physicians. For it is meet to know a thing of this kind correctly, that if at any time one of those physicians, who handle the medical art from practice (alone) without theory, should come upon a free-born physician, discoursing with a free-born patient, and making use of theories bordering upon philosophy, and touching upon the disorder from its very commencement, and going back to the subject relating to (the whole) nature of bodies, he would quickly and greatly laugh, and speak no other language than is ready on such subjects to be addressed to the majority of the so-called physicians. For he would say—O stupid fellow, you are not curing the sick man, but you are almost giving him a lesson, as if he wanted to become a physician, and not to be in health.

Clin. And would he not speak properly in speaking so?

Athen. ¹ And would not the same person deservedly object against us,¹ that whoever discusses laws, as we do now, gives the citizens lessons, but not laws?

² Clin. And would he not seem to say this too correctly?²

Athen. Perhaps so.³ But at present a fortunate circumstance has occurred to us.

Clin. What is it?

Athen. That there is no necessity for us to lay down laws; but that, entering voluntarily upon an inquiry into all kinds of polity, we are endeavouring to perceive in what manner the best one and the most necessary may take place. And now, as it seems, it is permitted us, if we please, to consider what is the best, or, if we had rather, what is the most necessary on the question of laws. Let us choose, then, whichever it seems (is best).

Clin. We propose, O guest, a ridiculous choice, and we should become really similar to those legislators, who are compelled by some great necessity to give laws immediately, as being not permitted (to defer it) till the morrow. But it is lawful for us to speak with god's will, just as it is for masons, or those, who commence any other putting together of materials, to bring together for ourselves dispersedly, things out of which we may select what is suited to the combination which is to be, and to collect them at leisure. Let us then suppose ourselves to be for the present house-builders, not from necessity, but those, who at leisure put aside for their use some things, and put together others, so that we may have to say correctly, that some portions of the laws have been laid down, but others laid aside.

^{1—1} Such is the literal version of the Latin of Ficinus, "Nonne et nobis merito idem objiciet," who either did not find in his MS. the words τάχ' ἂν εἰ προσδιανοοῖτό γε, or else could not understand them a bit better than myself; although it is easy to see that they conceal something like Τάχα δ' ἂν ὦν ἐν ταῖς διανοοῖς' ἂν, i. e. And perhaps even one still a boy would thoroughly understand.

^{2—2} The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus, and after him tacitly by Taylor.

³ The word ἰσως has been hitherto assigned to Clinias. Evidently incorrectly.

Athen. For thus, Clinias, our survey of the laws will be more natural. But, by the gods, let us consider some such thing as this, relating to legislators.

Clin. What?

Athen. There are writings and written discourses in cities by many other persons, and writings likewise and discourses by the legislator.

Clin. How not?

Athen. Whether then shall we direct our attention to the compositions of the rest of poets, and of such as in prose ¹ and in verse, ² have put together their advice relating to life, to be remembered by their having written them down, ² and by no means apply ourselves to the writings of legislators? Or (to the latter) most of all?

Clin. Very much so.

Athen. But surely it is not necessary for the legislator alone of those who write to give counsel about things beautiful, and good, and just, while teaching what they are, and how they ought to be studied by those, who are about to be happy.

Clin. How not?

Athen. But is it more disgraceful for Homer, and Tyrtaeus, and the rest of poets, to have laid down in their writings what is incorrect, relating to life and its pursuits, and less so for Lycurgus, Solon, and such as, being legislators, have composed writings? Or is this correct, that of all writings in cities those relating to laws ought to appear, when unfolded,¹ the most beautiful and best; ²but that those of the rest, either following after them, or at discordance with them, are to be laughed down?³

¹⁻¹ The words καὶ μετὰ μέτρων are properly omitted in the two best MSS., as being superfluous after ποιητῶν: unless it be said that ποιητῶν καὶ are to be omitted, as being scarcely intelligible after τῶν ἄλλων—

³ Clin. Let us think in this way.

Athen. And³ that with regard to the writing down of laws, it ought to take place in states, that the writings seem to be of persons, who, in the garb of a father or mother, have feelings of love, and possess a mind, ⁴and not, like a tyrant⁴ and despot, commanding and threatening, ⁵and after writing (decrees) on walls, to depart.⁵ Let us consider then, even now, whether we should, after thinking upon laws, endeavour to speak in this manner, whether we are able or not. Let us (gird up ourselves⁶ for it), exhibiting at least an alacrity, and proceeding along this road, let us, if we must suffer aught, endure it. And may the attempt be fortunate; and (fortunate), if god pleases, it will be in this way.

Clin. You have spoken well. And let us do as you say.

^{2—3} In the place of these unmeaning words Ficinus has, what is at least intelligible, “cæterorum vero scripta probari, si legibus consentanea sunt; sin dissona, derideri.”

^{3—5} The Greek is, οὕτω διανοώμεθα περὶ νόμων δεῖν—all put into the mouth of the Athenian. I have translated as if it were originally, ΚΑ. οὕτω διανοώμεθα. ΑΘ. περὶ νόμων δὲ δεῖν—Ficinus, to avoid the want of connexion in the sentences, and to conceal, probably, the difficulty in οὕτω διανοώμεθα, has given the general sense of the passage, “Sic igitur leges civitatibus conscribantur.” Cornarius proposed to read, Οὕτω διανοώμεθα περὶ νόμων, μὲν δὲ δεῖν—but Ast, πῶς δεῖ, so that γραφῆς might be governed by πῶς, which he would defend by πῶς—τῆς συμφωνίας, in p. 860, C., and the other passages quoted by himself on ναυπηγησίμης ὕλης—πῶς ἔχει, in p. 705, C.

^{4—4} I have translated as if the Greek were καὶ μὴ, not ἢ—Cousin says that the clause to which ἢ is to be referred, is τὰ γεγραμμένα φαίνεσθαι ἐν σχήμασι πατρὸς: but the laws would surely not be said to be as mild as a parent, or as severe as a tyrant.

^{5—5} Such is the literal version of the Greek. Ficinus has “rationem vero nullam penitus assignantis,” with the omission of ἀπηλλάχθαι, neglected here by Taylor likewise.

⁶ Ficinus alone supplies, what the sense requires, “accingamur,” translated by Taylor, “let us attempt it.”

[5.] Athen. In the first place then, let us accurately consider, as we have attempted to do, respecting those who commit sacrilege, and about every kind of theft, and injuries of all kinds. And let us not take it ill, if we lay down some, during our legislating, and deliberate about others. For we are becoming to be legislators, but are not yet so, although perhaps we soon shall be. But if it seems good to you, to consider about what I have said, let us, ¹as I have said,¹ consider.

Clin. By all means.

Athen. With regard to all things that are beautiful and just, let us endeavour to look in some such way as this, how we may for the present agree with, and how differ from ourselves; ²who would say that we desire, if nothing else, to differ from the majority, and the majority too on the other hand with themselves.²

Clin. Of what kind of disagreement among ourselves are you speaking?

Athen. I will endeavour to state. On the question of justice generally, and of just men, and of things, and of actions, we all of us in a manner agree, that all these are beautiful;³ so that if any one should strenuously affirm that just men are, through their most just habit, all-beautiful, although they should happen to be ugly in body, scarcely a single person would, by speaking thus, be thought to speak improperly. ⁴Is not this true?

Clin. Perhaps so.

Athen. But let us see⁴ that, if all things that border upon ¹—¹ According to two MSS., ὡς εἶρηκα have been noted as spurious.

²—² Such is the literal version of the Greek; in lieu of which Taylor has, "for we acknowledge, that we desire, though we may not be able, to excel others." Ficinus, "qui in hoc maxime studere nos profitemur, ut a plurimis differamus, quo item alii a se ipsis dissentiunt—" by the aid of which one might read, ἐν ᾧ οἱ πολλοὶ γε, αὐτοὶ πρὸς αὐτοὺς, οὐ—"on a point, where the many differ, themselves from themselves, not at all."

³ Ficinus, uncertain whether καλὰ means "honourable" or "beautiful," has expressed as usual both ideas, "honesta pulchraque."

⁴—⁴ Such is Taylor's translation of οὐκοῦν ὁρθῶς. ἴσως: who seems to have adopted the idea of Stephens, who says that after οὐκοῦν ὁρθῶς is to be supplied ταῦτα καὶ σοὶ λέγεσθαι δοκεῖ. But as such an ellipse is not to be found elsewhere, Bekker assigns οὐκοῦν ὁρθῶς to Clinias, as if δόξειε λέγων were to be understood. But to such a question the Athenian could not answer ἴσως, "perhaps," after he had stated distinctly what justice are beautiful, ¹the sufferings of all of us are nearly equal to our doings.¹

Clin. What then?

Athen. Whatever action is just, so far as it partakes of what is just, it nearly partakes of the beautiful likewise.

Clin. How not?

Athen. Whatever suffering then partakes of what is just, it would so far, by being confessed to be beautiful, exhibit a reasoning not discordant.

Clin. How not?

Athen. But if we should agree that a suffering is just, but not beautiful, the just and the beautiful would be discordant through things that are just being said to be the least beautiful.

Clin. How have you said this?

Athen. It is not difficult to understand. For the laws which have been laid down a little before, would seem to proclaim what is perfectly the contrary to our present assertions.

Clin. To what assertions?

Athen. We surely laid it down, that he, who committed sacrilege, would justly die, and he too, who is hostile to well-established laws; and, as we were about to lay down many other laws of this kind, we stopped short, on perceiving that these sufferings were infinite in multitude and magnitude; and that they were of all sufferings the most just, and of all the least beautiful. Will not then things just and beautiful appear in this manner at one time to be the same, and at another to be the most opposite?

Clin. There is a danger of it.

Athen. By the multitude, then, things beautiful and just, his opinion was. To meet this difficulty, Ast would render ἰσως—"truly so." But such is not the meaning of ἰσως. Plato wrote, I suspect, ΚΑ. ἰσως. ΑΘ. οὐκ οὐν ὁρθῶς ἰδοιμεν ἂν—instead of ἰδωμεν δὲ—which are so discordant ¹ on these kind of points, ¹ are addressed as things separate.

Clin. It appears so, guest.

Athen. Let us then, Clinias, view again our notions, as to how the accordance ² exists on these very points.

Clin. Of what accordance, and with what, ² are you speaking?

Athen. I think I have clearly stated in the previous discourse; ³ but if not before, suppose me saying it now.

Clin. What? ³

Athen. That all wicked persons are in all things wicked involuntarily; ⁴ and that as this is the case, it is necessary for this inference to follow in order.

Clin. What (inference) do you mean?

Athen. That the unjust man is wicked; and that the wicked man is such involuntarily. Now there is no reason for a voluntary act to be ever done in an involuntary manner. He therefore, whoever acts unjustly, will appear to act so in an involuntary manner to him, who considers injustice to be an involuntary act. And this too must now be acknowledged by me. For I have agreed, that all men act unjustly involuntarily; and though some one, for the sake of contention or ambition, may say, that unjust men are involuntarily unjust, but yet many act unjustly voluntarily, the other is my assertion, and not this. In what way then should I agree with my own assertions, should ye, Clinias and Megillus, thus interrogate me—If these things are so, what would you, O guest, advise us respecting the legislation for the city of the Magnesians? To legislate for them, or not? ⁵ How not? I shall say. ⁵ Will you then sepa-

¹—¹ The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus. Taylor has "with each other."

⁴ On this doctrine see at v. § 3.

rate injuries into the involuntary and voluntary? And shall we assign greater punishments for voluntary offences and injuries, and less (for the contrary)?¹ Or equal for all, since injuries are not voluntary at all?

Clin. You speak properly, O guest. But how shall we make use of what has now been said?

Athen. You have inquired correctly. Let us in the first place use them for this.

Clin. For what?

[6.] Athen. Let us call to mind that we stated correctly, that there is a great confusion and dissonance amongst ourselves respecting things just. Laying hold then of this, let us ask ourselves again ²(what shall we say).³ Since we have neither found a way clearly out of the doubt relating to these matters, nor defined how those things differ from each other, which in all states, and by all legislators, that have ever existed, are laid down as forming two kinds of injuries, one voluntary, and the other involuntary, ⁴are they to be legally established⁵ in this way likewise?⁶ and shall the language, which has been expressed by us, as if it had been spoken by some god, be dismissed, after having said only thus much, and without assigning any reason, that it has spoken correctly; shall it in some manner lay down a counter-law? This may not be.⁷ But it is somehow necessary, before we lay down laws, to show these two things as existing, and (having) another⁶ difference between them, in order that when any one assigns a punishment for either; every one ⁷may follow what is said,⁷ and be able to judge, whether it is established in a becoming manner, or not.

Clin. You appear to us, O guest, to speak well. For it is necessary to do one of two things, either to say that all unjust

¹ I have translated as if the Greek were τῶν δ' ἐναντίων, ἰλάττους, not τῶν δὲ, ἰλάττους—to preserve the balance of the sentences.

^{2—3} I have translated as if the Greek were τί ἐροῦμεν, not ἀρ' οὖν, to supply the apodosis of the sentence.

^{3—5} The Greek is νομοθετεῖται. I have translated as if it were νομοθετηρία—Ficinus has “ita varie puniuntur.”

⁴ i. e. in a twofold manner.

⁵ I have translated as if the Greek were ἔσται, not ἔστιν—

⁶ I cannot understand ἄλλην, nor could Ficinus, who omits it in his version, “et quam differentiam habeant—” Did Plato write πολλήν?

^{7—7} Ficinus has “intelligat,” translated by Taylor, “may understand—” actions are not involuntary, or to show, ¹by first defining,¹ that this has been stated correctly.

Athen. Of these two things one I can by no means endure that it takes place,² (I mean) ³the denying that the person, who thinks so, has the truth on his side ;³ for this would be neither according to law⁴ nor holy. But in what manner these are two, if they do not differ by the involuntary and voluntary, but by something else perchance, I must endeavour by some means to show.

Clin. By all means, O guest : for it is not possible for us to understand this at least otherwise.

Athen. Be it so. Come then, (say,) does not, as it seems, much damage take place amongst citizens in their communications and intercourse with each other, and yet the voluntary and the involuntary abound in these transactions ?

Clin. How not ?

Athen. Let not however any one imagine, after laying down that all damage is an injury, that in this way the injuries exist in them of a double kind, partly voluntary, and partly involuntary. For the involuntary damage done by all men is neither in number, nor in magnitude, less than the voluntary. But consider ⁵whether I am saying any thing, when I say what I am about to say,⁵ or nothing at all. For I do not say, Clinias and Megillus, that if some one hurts another, ⁶not willingly, but unwillingly,⁶ he does an injury to a person unwilling (to be injured). And in this way I will lay down the law, by making legally this an involuntary injury ; nor will I consider a damage of this kind as an injury at all, whether it be of a greater or less magnitude. And we shall frequently

⁴ In lieu of νόμιμον five MSS. read ἐμὸν, similar to “officii mei est” in Ficinus. But νόμιμον is required by ὅσιον.

⁵—⁵ In lieu of this repetition of λέγω λέγων—λέγειν, Ficinus has “utrum deinceps veri aliquid afferam.”

say that through¹ assistance taking place not correctly, he, who is the cause of the assistance, does an injury,² at least if my opinion is the better.³ For, my friends, if any one gives one any thing, or, on the contrary, takes it away, it is not meet to call such an action thus simply just or unjust; but whether a person does to another in any thing a benefit or harm, while making use of (a correct)³ habit, and a just manner, to this ought the legislator to look; ⁴and [direct his attention]⁴ to (these) two things, injustice and detriment; and ⁵by making, what has been damaged, uninjured⁵ as much as is possible, by the law, and by restoring, what has been lost, and raising up again, what has fallen by means of any one, ⁶and making, what has been wounded, whole, and, what has been killed, expiated with money,⁶ let him ever endeavour to convert, in the case of the doers and sufferers, by means of his laws, each of the injuries from a state of variance to that of friendship.

Clin. This at least is well (said).

Athen. Unjust damages therefore and gains, if any one can by injuring a person cause ⁷to be a gain to himself,⁷ he ought to cure, such at least as are to be cured, as being diseases in

¹ To support the syntax, I have translated as if δι' had dropt out between δὲ and ὠφέλειαν—

^{2—3} Ald. alone has ἢ γ' ἐμὴ νικᾷ, with the usual ellipse of δόξα—as Stephens was the first to remark; although he has edited himself ἢ γε μὴ νικᾷ, deceived by “si hæc minime superat” in Ficinus.

³ Ficinus has “probis moribus,” as if his MS. read ἦθει ὁρθῶ, to balance δικαίῳ τρόπῳ.

^{4—4} The Greek is καὶ πρὸς δύο ταῦτα δὴ βλεπτίον πρὸς τε ἀδικίαν καὶ βλάβην. But βλεπτίον is superfluous after the preceding θεατίον: nor could πρὸς τε be thus repeated after πρὸς δύο, where ἀδικίαν and βλάβην are the two things alluded to; nor lastly, could τὰ be omitted before δύο.

^{5—5} The Greek is τὸ μὲν βλαβὲν ὑγίης—ποιητίον: where Ast was the first to see that the sense and syntax require ποιούντα, while since four MSS. read ἀβλαβεῖς in lieu of βλαβέν, it is evident that Plato wrote τὸ μὲν βλαβέν ἀβλαβεῖς, of which ὑγίης is the explanation.

^{6—6} The Greek is καὶ τὸ θανατωθὲν ἢ τρωθὲν ὑγίης, τὸ δὲ ἀποίνοις ἐξίλασθιν—where Ast would reject ἢ τρωθὲν ὑγίης as an interpolation; but Stalbaum insert ἰώμενον after τὸ θανατωθὲν, forgetting that for what is dead there is no cure. Cousin would understand ποιούντα—I have translated as if the Greek were—καὶ τὸ τρωθὲν ὑγίης ἰσάντα καὶ τὸ θανατωθὲν ἀποίνοις ἐξίλασθιν—and so Winckelmann, but without ἰσάντα.

^{7—7} In κερδαίνειν lies hid κέρδη εἶναι, and ἑαυτῶ in τούτων, as I have translated.

the soul ; but the question of the cure of injustice it is meet to say inclines in this way.

Clin. In what ?

Athen. That what injury soever a person may do, be it great or little, the law may instruct, and altogether compel him, either not to dare again at any time to do such an act voluntarily, or far less frequently, in consequence¹ of the punishment for the injury. This should any one accomplish, either by works or words, or by pleasure or pains, or by honours or dishonours, and by fines of money or gifts, or altogether by any means whatever, (so that)² a person may hate injustice, and love, or at least not hate, the nature of justice, this is the very business of laws the most beautiful. But, upon the persons, whom the legislator perceives to be incurable on these points, he shall impose a punishment and law,³ knowing that to all such as these it is better even for themselves not to live any longer, and that they will doubly benefit the rest, when freed from life, by being an example to others to do no wrong, and by causing the state to be devoid of bad men. In this way there is a necessity for the legislator to assign death, as the punisher of delinquencies of this kind,⁴ but by no means otherwise.

Clin. This appears to have been spoken by you with great moderation ; but we would hear still more gladly this spoken, namely, the difference between injustice and detriment,⁵ and how the question of what is voluntary and involuntary is in these cases variously represented.⁶

[7.] Athen. I must endeavour therefore to do and say as you request me. For it is evident that, respecting the soul, you⁶ say to, and hear from, each other⁶ thus much, that one

² After τις there has evidently dropt out ὥστε—

⁴ Ficinus has “insanabiles homines,” as if his MS. read τῶν ἀνιάτων in lieu of τῶν τοιούτων.

⁶—⁶ Ficinus has “sæpe dicitis et auditis,” as if his MS. read πολλάκις λέγετε instead of καὶ λέγετε.

property of nature resides in it, whether as an accident or part, namely, anger,¹ a thing naturally hard to contest with and to overcome, and which overturns many things by its irrational violence.

Clin. How not?

Athen. And we speak moreover of pleasure as not being the same as anger; and we say that it possesses, from a contrary influence, a power through persuasion, united to a violent deception, to do whatever the will pleases.

Clin. And very much so.

Athen. He too who says that ignorance is a third cause of crimes, will not state a falsehood. Now the legislator, who makes a twofold division, would act the better by considering one kind as simple, and the cause of light offences; but the other twofold, when any one is in a state of non-instruction, not only by being afflicted with ignorance, but by an opinion of wisdom, as if he knew perfectly what he does not know at all; and laying down things of this kind, when followed by power and strength, as the causes of crimes mighty and unmusical;² but when followed by imbecility, as are the crimes of children and old men, he will consider them (all) as crimes, and will ordain laws against those who commit them; (laws), however, the mildest of all, and near to the greatest pardon.

Clin. You speak what is reasonable.

Athen. Now nearly all of us say, that one of us is superior to pleasure and anger, and another inferior. And such is the case.

Clin. Entirely so.

Athen. But we have never heard even, that one of us is superior to ignorance, and another inferior.

Clin. Most true.

Athen. But we say that all these allure to their will a person, who is frequently drawn at the same time to things opposite.

Clin. Very often indeed.

¹ In lieu of ὡν ὁ θυμὸς, five MSS. read ὅν ὁ θυμὸς, which leads to ὄνομα ὁ θυμὸς, similar to "quam iracundiam dicimus," in Ficinus. Taylor omits the words entirely.

² Such is the literal version of ἀμούσων, by which was meant, says Ast, the whole of a liberal education; an idea which it is impossible to convey by any single word in English. Taylor has "rustic—" We might say by a paraphrase, "arising from a want of education."

Athen. Now I will define to you clearly the just and the unjust, of which I was speaking, with no variety of colouring. For I denominate injustice to be wholly the tyranny over the soul through anger, and fear, and pleasure, and pain, and envy, and desires, whether it does, or does not, harm any one. But the opinion of what is the best, by whatever way a state or any individuals may think it¹ will exist, ²should it (the opinion,) by having a power in the soul, arrange in order the whole man, even though it stumbles in some matter, we must say that, what is done in this way, is just entirely, and (that too) which is under a rule of this kind of each, and of men through the whole of life best; ² but that a damage of this kind is thought by the multitude to be an involuntary injustice. However, our discourse at present is not a harsh contest about names. But since there have been pointed out three kinds of delinquencies,³ let us, in the first place, still more diligently recall them to our memory. Of pain then, which we denominate anger and fear, there is one kind.

Clin. Entirely so.

Athen. But of pleasure and desires there is a second kind; another the third, of hopes, and ⁴a desire of true opinion about that which is the best.⁴ Now by this third being divided into two parts, five kinds will be produced, ⁵as we have just now stated,⁵ for which we must lay down five laws, differing from each other in two genera.

Clin. What are these?

Athen. One, when a deed is done constantly with violence

¹ In lieu of τούτων one MS. has from a correction τούτον, which leads to τούτο, i. e. τὸ ἀπαισιν, as suggested by Cousin.

^{2—3} Such is the literal version of the unintelligible Greek; upon which Ast has written what has failed, in my opinion at least, to throw any light. Ficinus, whom Taylor follows for the most part, has “si animo dominata omnem virum exornet, etiamsi quid minus recti illi successerit, iustitiam nomino; et quicquid inde gestum est, iustum appello; atque eos, qui huiusmodi principatui libenter parent.”

³ As Plato alludes to what he had stated just above relating to the causes of crimes, it is strange to find here ἀμαρτανόμεινων instead of ἀμαρτάνειν ποιούντων.

^{4—5} All between the numerals are considered by Ast to be an interpolation; for the three causes of crimes were said already to be pain, and pleasure, and an opinion of wisdom. Grou suggested ἄφεισις in lieu of ἔφεισις, which, although the Zurich editors seem disposed to adopt it, I cannot understand. Cousin would reject ἔφεισις as a faulty gloss.

and accordant¹ actions; and the other, when it takes place secretly in darkness and with a fraud; but sometimes the act is done with both of these, against which there will be laws the most severe, if they possess their proper character.

Clin. This is reasonable.

[8.] Athen. But let us after this proceed to the point, from which we have digressed, and finish the laying down of laws. Now the subjects laid down by us were respecting those, who rob the gods, and are traitors to their country, and who corrupt the laws for the purpose of dissolving the existing polity. Of these some one may perhaps commit an act, when mad, or affected with a disease, or a very great age, or childishness,² differing not at all from things of this kind.³ Of which acts should any become manifest to the judges selected on each occasion, either by the party himself informing, or a person making an excuse in behalf of the perpetrator, and he be decreed, when in this state, to have acted contrary to the law, let him pay simply for the damage, whatever he may have done; and let him be exempt from other punishments, unless by having killed any one his hands are not clean from murder; for in this case let him depart to another country, and dwell there in exile during a year; but if he returns before the time prescribed by the law, or puts his foot on the whole³ of his native land, let him be imprisoned by the guardians of the laws for two years in the public gaol, and then released from bonds.

Since then we have begun with murder, let us endeavour to lay down laws completely for every kind of it. And, in the first place, let us speak of that done with violence and involuntarily. If then any one in a contest, and at the public games, shall involuntarily kill a friend, either on the instant, or some time after from the blows inflicted; or, in like manner, during a war, or in warlike exercises, of which the rulers have enjoined the practice, with naked bodies, or with any weapons, in imitation of warlike doings, let him be purified¹ according to the law brought from Delphi² touching these matters, and let him be held to be pure.³ And in the case of physicians, should any person, when attended upon by them, die, without their willing it, let every one³ be held to be pure by the law. But if any one with his own hand unwillingly slays another, whether with his own naked body, or with an instrument or dart, or by administering drink or food, or by the hurling of fire, or a tempest,⁴ or the privation of breath, whether he does this with his own body, or through the means of other bodies, let him be considered altogether a slayer with his own hand, and suffer punishments such as these. If he kills the slave (of another),⁵ thinking that he had done for⁶ his own, let him either cause the master of the dead (slave) to be without loss or hurt, or be fined double the value of such slave; and let the judges make an inquiry into the value, and let the homicide make use of greater and more purifications than those, who kill a person in gymnastic exercises; and in such cases let the holy interpreters, whom the

² Compare Æsch. Cho. 1069, and Eum. 283.

³⁻³ To avoid the absurdity in καθαρὸς ἔστω, applied to the patient—for so it must be according to the rules of syntax—Ficinus, whom Taylor follows, has altered the construction in his version, “omnes autem medici, qui curantes non sponte occiderint, mundi sint.” Plato wrote, I suspect, ιατρῶν δὲ πέρι, πᾶς τις—not πάντων—and so I have translated. Respecting this clause in favour of a physician, Matthiæ quotes opportunely Antipho, p. 694, R.

god ordains, decide without an appeal.¹ But if any one kills his own slave, let him, after undergoing a purification, be released according to law from (the stain of) murder. But if any one kills involuntarily a free-born person, let him be purified with the same purifications as him, who has killed a slave. And let him not dishonour ²some of so-called² old stories of the ancients. For it is said, that a person, who had lived with the feelings of a free-man, having been violently put to death, was, when recently dead, angry with his murderer; and being filled ³with fear and terror³ likewise through his violent suffering, and beholding the person, who slew him, passing the time in his own seats, [familiar haunts,]⁴ terrified him, and, being disturbed himself, disturbed with all his might the murderer and his doings, by having Memory⁵ as an ally. On this account, it is requisite for the doer to withdraw himself from the sufferer through all the seasons of the year, and to cause a void in all his own places through the whole of his native land. But if the party deceased is a stranger, let (the homicide) be debarred the country of the stranger for the same period. And if any one willingly obeys this law, let him, who is the nearest relative of the deceased, be the examiner into all that has taken place and grant a pardon; ⁶and by keeping quiet, he would

³⁻⁴ Why the murdered man should be said to be filled with fear and terror, I must leave for those to explain, who can point out the story to which Plato alludes. According to the Greek dramatists, it was the murderer rather, who felt the touch of fear, as shown in the case of Clytemnestra and Orestes. Unless I am greatly mistaken, the author wrote φθόνου (to which φόνου in one MS. plainly leads) καὶ λήματος; where λήμα would be the counterpart of φρόνημα mentioned just above.

⁵ What Plato means by μνήμη, Euripides, in Orest. 396, expresses by σύνεσις, in English "conscience."

⁶— Such is the literal version of the Greek. Ficinus has "qui etiam pace ipsi reconciliatus et æquus omnino erit."

be altogether moderate towards him.⁶ But if a person does not obey, and, in the first place, being still unpurified, dares to go to the temples, and to sacrifice; and, further, is not willing to be an exile, and to complete the stated time; let the nearest relative of the deceased prosecute the murderer on a charge of blood, and let his punishment be doubled when found guilty. But if the nearest relative shall not prosecute¹ [for the act of suffering],¹ let any one, since the pollution has come round to the relative,² through the sufferer turning on himself the suffering,² prosecute the relative and compel him by law to be absent from his country for five years. But if a stranger involuntarily kills a stranger amongst those in the city, let whosoever is willing prosecute him on the same laws; but if a foreign settler (kills a stranger), let him be exiled for one year; but if he be altogether a stranger, in addition to the purification, let him, if he shall have killed a stranger, or a foreign settler, or a citizen, be banished for his whole life from the country which has the supreme power over these³ laws, and if he returns contrary to the law, let the guardians of the laws punish him with death; and if he has any property, let them give it to the nearest relative of the deceased. But if he returns involuntarily by sea, and has been cast out on the coast by a storm,⁴ let him fix a tent (on the shore), so that his feet may touch (the water),⁴ and watch for an opportunity of sailing; but, if he is brought on land

²—² Such is the literal version of the unintelligible original; where the Scholiast says that προσπρεπομένου means the same as ἀποπρεπομένου: but πρός and ἀπό never have the same meaning. The Scholiast's interpretation is, however, adopted by Ficinus; whose version is—"ipso videlicet interempto passionem in illum convertente," translated by Taylor—"or in other words the slain person turning his anger towards him."

³ In lieu of τῶνδε, Ficinus found in his MS. τοιῶνδε, as shown by his "hujusmodi."

⁴—⁴ So Taylor, and after him Ast, paraphrases the Greek—σκηνησάμενος ἐν θαλάττῃ, τέγγων τοὺς πόδας, πλοῦν ἐπιφυλαττέω—But as one MS. has συννησάμενος, Plato wrote, I suspect, something more fit to be read than what the literal version presents—"let him, fixing a tent in the sea and wetting his feet, watch for a sailing." Ficinus has "navigandi opportunitatem, pedibus mare tangens, expectet," omitting σκηνησάμενος.

forcibly by any one, ¹ let the magistrate, who of those in the city first meets him, ¹ release him ² and send him safe from harm to the country over the borders. ² But if any one with his own hand kills a free-man, and what is done is done through passion, it is meet, in the first place, to make a two-fold distinction in a thing of this kind. For a thing is done in a passion by those who, on a sudden, and without intending to kill, destroy by blows, or such other means, a person, ³ on the instant that an impulse arises, and when repentance is close upon the deed ; ³ and (a deed is done) in a passion by those too, who, having been befouled by words or deeds of dishonour, pursue with revenge and subsequently kill a person, intending to murder, and for the deed there is no repentance. We must therefore, as it seems, put down two kinds of murder, and both of them as arising nearly from passion, and they may be said most justly to be between the voluntary and the involuntary. ⁴ Each, however, is only a likeness. ⁴ For, he who stores up his anger, and does not immediately (and) ⁵ suddenly, but with malice prepense ⁶ after a time ⁷ revenge himself, is like to the voluntary ; but he, who, without storing up ⁸ his anger, does on the instant [immediately] ⁹ gratify his passion, without premeditation, is like to the involuntary. He is not, however, altogether involuntary, but the likeness of the involuntary. On this account, the murders committed in anger are difficult to define, whether one ought to lay down laws for them, as being voluntary, or some of them involuntary. The

²—² Ficinus, whom Taylor follows, is content with the general sense—"et intactus in exilium retrudendus."

³—³ Ficinus, followed by Taylor, thus abridges this passage—"ita ut confestim post impetum pœnitentia sequatur."

⁴—⁴ Ficinus alone supplies, what is wanting for the sense—"neutra enim voluntaria revera vel involuntaria est ; sed altera alterius est imago."

⁵ Ficinus has "nec repente"—for he found probably in his MS. καὶ between παράχρημα and ἐξαίφνης.

⁶ This legal phrase in English answers best to the Greek ἐξ ἐπιβουλῆς.

⁷ In lieu of ὑστερον χρόνῳ I should prefer ὑστέρῃ χρόνῳ. See my note on Æsch. Suppl. 220.

⁸ The common expression in English of "not bottling up one's anger," would answer the best to ἀραμύτως in Greek.

best and the truest method therefore is to put both down as likenesses ; and to divide them apart from each other, by their being done with malice prepense and without premeditation ; and to lay down by law severer punishments for those, who kill in anger, and with malice prepense ; but milder for those without premeditation and on the sudden. For that, which is like a greater evil, should be punished more severely ; but that, which is like a less one, less severely. Let it then be thus established by our laws.

Clin. By all means.

[9.] Athen. Let us then return again to the subject and say, that if any one with his own hand kills a free-man, but if the deed, when done, took place without premeditation, in a moment of anger, let him in other respects suffer, as it is proper for the party to suffer, who has killed a person, not in a passion ; but let him of necessity be an exile for two years, and thus punish his passion. But he, who in a passion, but with malice prepense, commits a murder, let him (suffer) in other respects as the former does ; but let him be an exile for three years, as the other is for two, and be punished for the greatness of his passion by a longer time. And let this be held¹ universally respecting these matters.¹ It is difficult however to give laws on such matters with accuracy. For sometimes of these two murders, the one, which is held by the law to be the more atrocious, is the milder ; and that, which is the milder, would be the more atrocious, ²according as the murder is committed in a more savage or a more gentle manner.³ But for the most part the deeds take place according to what has been mentioned already. Of all these matters, therefore, it is meet for the guardians of the laws to have the cognizance ; and, when the period of the exile shall have expired³ to each

²—³ So Taylor translates the Latin of Ficinus—"prout atrocius aut mitius gesta est." But the Greek is καὶ τὰ περὶ τὸν φόνον ἀγρωτέρως ἢ πράξειεν, ὃ δὲ ἡμερωτέρως. By uniting the two it is easy to read—καθάπερ ὃ μὲν τὸν φόνον—ὃ δὲ—i. e. "according as one—"

³ Taylor has thus expressed in English, what Ast says would be in Greek not ἐλθῃ, but ἐξελθῃ, as shown by x. p. 909, A., xi. p. 921, C.

offender, to send twelve judges to the borders of the country, (so that)¹ after having examined still more clearly the conduct of the exiles during that period, they may be the judges of the pity (to be shown) and of their reception; and let the exiles acquiesce in the decisions of such magistrates. And if, after having returned from exile, any one of them shall, overcome by passion, commit again the very same offence, let him be exiled and never return again; and if he returns, he shall suffer in the same way as a stranger for returning from exile. And let him, who kills his own slave, undergo a purification. But if, in a passion, he kills the slave of another, let him pay to the master double the value of the loss. But whoever of all the homicides does not obey the law, but, while he is uncleansed, defiles (by his presence) the place of public meeting, and of contests, and other sacred places, whoever is willing may bring to trial the relative of the deceased, who has neglected (his duty), and the murderer likewise, and compel him to pay a double fine, and ²to do some of the other doings;² ³and let the (accusing) party carry off the payment according to the law.³ If a slave kills his master in a passion, let the kindred of the deceased use the murderer in whatever manner they please,⁴ and be clean (of the acts), so long as they do not by any means ⁵preserve the life⁵ (of the slave). ⁶But if a slave kills (not his own master, but) some other free-man, in a passion,⁶ ⁷let the owners give up the slave⁷ to the relatives of ¹ I have translated as if ὥστε had dropt out.

^{2—2} Such is the literal version of the Greek; which Ast explains by saying, that "the other doings" refer to the acts requisite to be done for the purpose of a purification. But if such be the meaning, and I confess I have nothing better to offer, it is a pity that Plato did not take the trouble to express his ideas more clearly.

^{2—3} Such is the literal version of the Greek, which Taylor has thus translated, "And let the offending party consider the fine as legal."

^{5—5} This is a very unusual meaning of the verb ζῶγειν, literally "to take alive."

^{6—6} The Greek is ἐὰν δὲ ἄλλος τις δοῦλος ἐλεύθερον ἀποκτείνῃ θυμῷ—But Ficinus has more fully, "sin vero servus non dominum suum sed alium liberum per iram necaverit," from whence Faehse was the first to correct ἄλλος into ἄλλον—

^{7—7} This mixture of numbers, οἱ δεσπόται τὸν δοῦλον, seems rather strange; as if one slave had many masters.

the deceased, and let them of necessity put him to death in whatever manner they please. If a father or a mother in a passion kills their son or daughter by blows, or any other violent manner—events that happen but rarely—let them be purified after the same manner as other homicides, and be exiled for three years; and on their return from exile, let the husband be divorced from the wife, and the wife from the husband, and let them never afterwards beget children together, nor be a fellow-dweller with those, whom they have deprived of a child or brother, nor have a share with them in sacred rites. But he, who has acted impiously in these matters, and does not obey the laws, let him be brought to trial for impiety by any one who is willing. If a husband kills his wife in a passion, or a wife does the same thing in a similar manner to her husband, they shall undergo the same purifications, and complete an exile for three years; and let not the party, who has so acted, on his return, have a share with their children in sacred rites, nor ever eat at the same table with them. And let the father or the child, who disobeys the law, be brought to trial for impiety by any one who is willing. If a brother kills either a brother or a sister, or a sister (kills) a brother or a sister in a passion, let the matters, relating to purifications and exiles, be stated as necessary to take place in the same manner, ¹as have been stated in the case of parents and children; ²and (on their return from exile), ³let not any one ⁴be a fellow-dweller or a sharer in sacred rites with those, whom a person ⁴has deprived, brothers of brothers, and fathers of children. And if any one disobeys the law, he would rightly with justice ⁵be amenable to the before-mentioned law,

²—² So Taylor, from “post reditum,” in Ficinus; who probably found in his MS. καὶ τοῦτοις—κατιούσι δὴ, instead of καὶ τοῦτοις—τούτοις δὲ, where the same pronoun is repeated uselessly. On the meaning of κατιέναι, similar to κατέρχεσθαι, see Porson on Med. 1011.

⁵ That Plato wrote both ὀρθῶς and μετὰ δίκης, it is hard to believe; but which of the two he did write, it is equally hard to say. I suspect however that ὀρθῶς is an interpretation of μετὰ δίκης: for there would be a Platonic play on the words ὁπῶδικος μετὰ δίκης. Ficinus has merely “jure ut impius condemnabitur.”

relating to impiety on these points. But should any one in the case of his parents be so powerless over his passion, as in the madness of anger to dare to murder one of his parents, if the deceased shall, before he expired, have voluntarily absolved the perpetrator of the murder, let him be purified as they are, who commit murder involuntarily,¹ and performing the other things that they do, let him be considered as pure; but if (the deceased shall) not have absolved him, let the party who has done a deed of this kind be amenable to many laws. For he will be amenable to the extreme punishments for an assault, and, in like manner, for impiety and for the robbery of what is holy, because he has robbed his parent of his life; so that, if it were possible for the same man to die oftentimes,² it would be most just for a person, who had in a passion committed an act of parricide or matricide, to meet with many deaths. For in the case of him, whom no law will permit, even when defending himself and about to be made an end of by his parents, to destroy his father or mother, who have brought his nature to the light, and whom (the legislator) shall order³ to endure all things rather than do a deed of this kind, how would it be fitting for such a person to meet with punishment legally in any other way? Let death then be laid down as the punishment for him, who in a passion kills either his father or mother. But if a brother shall in his own defence, during a fight occurring in a sedition or in any other similar manner, kill a brother, while warding off the party, who first had recourse to his hands,⁴ let him be held clear in the same manner, as he who kills an enemy; and similarly, if a citizen (kills) a citizen, or a stranger a stranger; and if a citizen in defending himself kills a stranger, or a stranger a citizen, let him in the same way be held to be clear; and similarly if a slave (kills) a slave. But if a slave, in his own defence, kills a free-man, let him be amenable to the same laws as him, who kills his father. And what has been stated

² Compare Criton, § 6.

³ This future seems rather strange here. One would prefer νομοθερεῖται, similar to "præcipitur" in Ficinus.

⁴ On the phrase ἀμύνεσθαι τὸν ἀρχοντα, with or without χειρῶν, see Ast's learned note.

respecting the absolution from murder by a father, let the very same thing take place respecting every absolution in matters of this kind; that if any person of his own accord gives an absolution to any one for such an act, let the purifications take place for the perpetrator, as if the murder had been involuntary, and let one year be the term of absence from the country according to law. And thus let the matters relating to murders, done with violence and involuntarily and in a passion, be held to have been detailed in moderation. But as regards those relating to such as are voluntary and perpetrated with every kind of injustice, respecting these and what are done with malice prepense, through yielding to pleasure and desires and envy, it is to be spoken of subsequently.

Clin. You speak correctly.

[10.] Athen. ¹Let us then again speak to the utmost of our power in the first place upon these points, how many they are.¹ Now the greatest is desire, having a mastery over a soul rendered savage by regrets.² And this exists for the most part there, where³ there happens to be the greatest and most vehement wish for wealth on the part of the many, and⁴ a power that is producing an infinite love for the possession of property insatiable and boundless, by means of a natural disposition and a wretched want of education,⁵ of which the cause is that wealth is praised improperly by report amongst both the Greeks and Barbarians.⁵ For by placing as the first of good things that, which is the third,

² Taylor, misunderstanding the meaning of "libidinibus," Ficinus' version of πόθων, has translated "venereal incentives—"

³ Ast, by not perceiving that οὐ after ἐνταῦθα is an adverb, and not a pronoun, has missed entirely the meaning of the passage.

⁴ The Greek is in all the MSS. ἡ τῶν χρημάτων τῆς—I have translated as if Plato had written τῶν χρημάτων, ἥ τε τῆς—

they do (by this opinion)¹ injure both those after them and themselves. ²For that the truth respecting wealth be told in all states is of all things the most beautiful and the best;³ (namely,) that it exists for the sake of the body, but the body for the sake of the soul. ³Of the good things then existing, for the sake of which wealth naturally exists, it would be the third after the virtue of the body and soul.³ This reasoning then will be to us⁴ a teacher, that it is not meet for him, who would be happy, to seek to be wealthy (by any means),⁵ but [to be wealthy]⁶ in a just and temperate manner. For⁷ thus murders, which require to be purified by murders,⁸ would not take place in cities. But now, as we stated at the beginning of the discussion, this is one and the greatest thing, which causes the greatest punishments of voluntary murder. The second is the habit of an ambitious soul, producing envy, a fellow-dweller the most disagreeable to him who possesses it,⁹ and secondly,¹⁰ to the best of those in the state. But the third is a cowardly and unjust fear, which has caused many murders, when acts are being done or have been done by a person, which he does not wish to be conscious to himself of their taking place, or of having taken place. They therefore take off by death the informers of such acts, if they cannot do it by any other means. About all these matters then let this be

⁴ Ficinus has "nos tanquam magistra docebit," as if his MS. read ἡμῖν between οὖν and ἀν—

⁵ Ficinus inserts, what is required to balance the sentence, "quomodo-docunque"—unless it be said that he remembered the passage in Horace—"rem facias; rem, si possis, recte, si non, quocunque modo rem."

⁶ This repetition of πλουτεῖν is omitted correctly by Ficinus.

⁷ Ficinus, "sic enim," which leads to καὶ γὰρ instead of καὶ—

⁸ On the doctrine that murder is to be cleansed by murder, see Æsch. Cho. 304.

⁹ The Greek is τῷ κεκτημένῳ τὸν φθόνον. But τὸν φθόνον could not thus be repeated after φθόνους—I have therefore omitted those words.

held to be said as a prelude ; and in addition to this, the story, which many of those engaged seriously in the Mysteries have heard touching these subjects, and strongly believe, that of such persons there is in Hades a punishment ; and that it is necessary for them to come back hither to suffer punishment according to nature, namely, of suffering from another what a person had done himself, and with such a fate to finish his then life. For him therefore, who from this prelude is persuaded, and fears altogether such a punishment, there is no need to hymn a law on this point, but for him, who is not persuaded, let this law be expressed in writing.

[11.] Whosoever shall designedly and unjustly kill with his own hand any one soever of his tribes-men, let him, in the first place, be debarred from legal rights, nor let him pollute the temples, or the place of public meeting, or the ports, or any other general assembly, whether any person forbids the perpetrator or not. For the law forbids him ; and it is ever seen and will be seen forbidding him in behalf of the whole state. But the relative of the deceased as far as a cousin,¹ on the male or female side, who does not, when requisite, prosecute, or forbid him to be debarred (from those things),² shall first of all take upon himself the pollution, and the hatred of the gods, ³ as the imprecation by the law provokes the report ;³ and secondly, let him be amenable to any, who is willing to avenge the dead ; and let him, who is willing, avenge, after performing every thing respecting the observation of washings⁴ for such occasions, and of such other acts as the deity has enjoined as legal in cases of this kind ; and after

² Ficinus alone has "ab his—" From the passages of Antipho and Demosthenes, quoted by Ast, one might suppose that τῶν νομίμων had dropt out between προαγορεύων and εἰργεσθαι.

making the proclamation let him go and compel the perpetrator to suffer the vengeance of justice according to law. But that these things ought to take place through certain prayers and sacrifices to certain deities, who have a care of such matters, so that murders may not take place in cities, it is easy for a legislator to show. But who are the deities, and what would be the manner of introducing such suits most correctly as regards the divine power, let the guardians of the laws, together with the (holy) interpreters, and the prophets, and the god, lay down by law, and introduce these suits. But let the judges of these matters be the same as those, to whom has been given the power of deciding upon sacrilege. Let him too, who is convicted, pay the penalty of death, and ¹ let him not be buried in the country of the murdered person,¹ on account of his shameless conduct, in addition to the act of impiety. But if he goes away, being unwilling to stand a trial, let him suffer a perpetual exile. ² And if any one of these sets his foot upon the land of the murdered party,² let whatever relation or even citizen, who first meets him, kill him with impunity, or, placing him in bonds, hand him over to the magistrates, who decide upon the suit, to put him to death. ³ But let him, who urges (the suit), require bail at the same time from him, against whom he is urging it; ³ and ⁴ let the latter produce three persons, whom the magistrate appointed for such matters shall decide to be in sufficient credit,⁴ cutted the murderer, is supposed to undergo, to avoid the pollution of blood. But as of such washings nothing is to be found elsewhere, Plato wrote, I suspect, something else, which it would be not difficult to discover by bearing in mind a celebrated scene in the Choephoroi of Æschylus.

who shall engage to produce (the accused) at the trial; but if the latter either will not or cannot get bail, let the magistrate take and put him in prison, and produce him at the trial of the suit. If a person shall not with his own hand (perpetrate),¹ but suggest to another, a murder, and by his willing and plotting cause the murder to take place,¹ and dwell in a city, having been the instigator of, and not pure in his soul from, the murder,² let there be to him in the same manner, with the exception of the bail, a trial and verdict on these matters;² and, if convicted, let it be lawful for him to have the family³ burial-place; but let other things take place in the same manner to him, as to the party previously mentioned; and let the same things take place in the case of strangers towards strangers, and citizens and strangers towards each other, and of slaves towards slaves, with respect to a murder done by a person's own hand and instigation, with the exception of the bail; but this let the murderers with their own hands be required to procure, as has been stated;⁴ and let the party who brings forward the suit, require bail of them likewise.⁴ But if a slave voluntarily murders a free-man, whether with his own hand or through a plotting, and there is a verdict against him, let the public executioner lead him to the tomb of the deceased, or⁵ to a place, where he may see the tomb, and after scourging him with as many stripes as the plaintiff shall order, put the murderer, if he survives the whipping, to death. But if any one kills a slave, who has done no wrong, through the fear of his disclosing deeds disgraceful and wicked, or for any similar reason,⁶ let him, as if he underwent the punishment of murder for having killed a citizen, undergo similarly

³ So I have translated τῆς οἰκίας—

⁴—⁴ The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus, for perhaps he could not understand them; nor do I very clearly see why they are introduced here.

⁶—⁶ Ficinus, followed by Taylor, has merely "quasi civem necaverit, sic puniatur."

and with the same forms a punishment on account of the slave, who had thus perished.⁶

[12.] But if cases occur, for which it is a thing of dread and by no means agreeable to legislate, and impossible on the other hand¹ not to legislate, (relating to) the murder of relations by a person's own hand or plotting, and done willingly and wickedly in every way—which take place for the most part in states² badly administered and nurtured,³ and which will somehow take place in a country where no one would expect it—it is requisite to mention again, what has been stated a little before, should perchance some one, on hearing us, be enabled more willingly on this account to abstain from murders the most unholy in every way. For a fable, or a story, or whatever else it is meet to call it, has been clearly told by priests of old, that⁴ Justice, the avenger and inspector of kindred blood, makes use of the law, which we have just now mentioned; and has ordained that he, who has done any such act, shall necessarily suffer what he has done;⁵ (so that)⁴ if any one has ever murdered his father, he has at some time suffered⁵ the very same fate by the daring and violence of his own children;⁵ and if he has (murdered) his mother, he has in after times become necessarily⁶ a partaker in a feminine na-

^{2—3} Ficinus has merely “male gubernatis—” For his MS. read perhaps οἰκουμέναις in lieu of οἰκούσας, which is scarcely correct.

^{3—3} In the prose of Plato evidently lies hid a dramatic tetrastich—Τῶν ξυγγενῶν ἄρ' αἱμάτων ἐπίσκοπος Δίκη νόμῳ τιμωρὸς οὐδ' ἱχρῆτ' αἰεὶ τοιῷδ'. ‘Ἀρὰ δ' ἔταξε τῷ δράσαντί τι ταῦτ' αὐτ' ἀνάγκαις, ἅπερ ἔδρασ' ἄλλον, παθεῖν—where I have substituted ‘Ἀρὰ δ' ἄρα, for the verses were probably spoken by Œdipus, while cursing his sons for their unkind conduct to their father: and I have inserted ἄλλον, for δρᾶν frequently has two accusatives, one of the person and another of the thing. With regard to the sentiment Ast refers to Choeph. 409. He might have added Cho. 311, ‘Δράσαντα παθεῖν’ Τριγέρων μῦθος τάδε φωνεῖ: and Agam. 1541, μῖμνει δ' ἀμύνοντος ἐν χρόνῳ Διὸς παθὼν τὸν ἐρξαντα—for so we must read in lieu of Μῖμνει δὲ, μῖμνοντος—παθεῖν τὸν ἐρξαντα. For the sense is, “the sufferer waits for the doer, when in time Zeus is the avenger.”

^{5—5} I have translated as if the Greek were αὐτὸ ταὐτὸ ὑπὸ τῶν τέκνων τὸλμης καὶ βίᾳ, not αὐτὸν τοῦτο ὑπὸ τέκνων τολμῆσαι βίᾳ, where αὐτὸ ταὐτὸ is due to Ast, τῶν to one MS., and τόλμης to Stephens.

^{6—6} By partaking in a feminine nature is meant, I presume, the be-

ture,⁶ and having become so, has departed from life at the hands of his offspring. For of a common blood defiled there is no other cleansing, nor is the pollution wont to be washed out, before the life, that has done (wrong), shall pay like blood for like blood, and appease and put to sleep the anger of all the kindred. It is requisite then for a person to be restrained on these points, through the fear of such punishments from the gods. But if so wretched a calamity should lay hold of any one, as that he should dare designedly and willingly to separate the soul of his father or mother, or brethren or children, from the body, the law of the mortal lawgiver legislates respecting matters of this kind in this way, that there is to be a proclamation¹ respecting a debarring from all rights,¹ and the same bail, as mentioned above; and if any one is convicted of a murder of this kind,² [for having killed any one of those,]² let the ministers of the judges and the magistrates put him to death, and cast him out of the city naked to an appointed place, where three roads meet; and let all the magistrates, in behalf of the whole state,³ carry each a stone and hurl it at the head of the dead body,³ and thus make an expiation for the whole state; and afterwards carry the corpse to the boundaries of the country, and cast it out there unburied, according to law. But what ought he to suffer, who murders his nearest and so-called dearest friend? I mean, he who kills himself, and by violence deprives himself of his share of fate, being compelled neither by a verdict of the city ordering it, nor by a very painful (and)⁴ unavoidable misfortune falling upon him, nor by sharing in a thing of shame, without a resource, and not to be lived through, and who by his indolence and⁵ the cowardice

²—² The words within brackets, evidently an interpolation, are properly omitted by Ficinus, whom Taylor has tacitly followed.

³—³ On such kinds of stoning see Valckenaer in Adnotat. Crit. in N. T. ii. p. 287, ed. Lips., quoted by Ast, and Scaliger on Propertius iv. 5, 75. Jacobs on Epigr. Inc. 234. The practice has been still preserved in the East, as we learn from Laurent's "Recollections," p. 209, and Henricker's "Notes," p. 277.

⁴—⁴ Stephens was the first to insert καὶ, suggested by "et." in Ficinus, whom Ast has followed.

of unmanliness⁵ imposes upon himself an unjust punishment. To such a person a god knows what ought to take place on other points, and relating to purification and burial; about which it is necessary for the nearest relatives to inquire of the (holy) interpreters, and at the same time the laws relating to them, and to do according to the orders given by them; but let the tombs of those, who have perished thus, be in the first place by themselves, and with no one buried in them; next, let them be in the twelve boundaries of the divisions, which are uncultivated and without a name; and bury them¹ without honour, nor mark their tombs with any pillars or names. But if a beast of burden or any other animal shall kill any person, except such as may do so in some public contest, let the relations prosecute the causer of the death: and let the Land-Stewards, upon whom and how many the relative shall impose the task, decide upon the matter; and let them destroy the condemned animal, and cast it² beyond the borders. If any lifeless thing deprives a man of life, except lightning, or any other such-like bolt sent from a god, but of all the rest that kill a person, by either the person falling upon it, or it falling upon the person, let the nearest of kin appoint the nearest neighbour to be a judge for him, and let him make an expiation both for himself and the whole of his kindred; but drive the thing condemned beyond the borders of the country, as has been stated in the case of the living kind. If any one is found dead, and the murderer is not known, and is not to be discovered by parties searching not carelessly, let there be proclamations, as in other cases; and let the heir-at-law³ make a proclamation against the perpetrator of the murder, and state in the Market-place that the person, who has murdered so δειλίᾳ— I should prefer ἀνανδρίας δουλείᾳ, “the slavery to unmanliness.”

¹ Matthiæ in Gr. Gr. has suggested αὐτως for αὐτοῦς, in allusion to ἀκλείς αὐτως in Il. vii. 100.

² The word διορίσαι is strangely introduced here. One would have expected something like διαμερίσαι, “to cut up into pieces.” Unless it be said that διορίσαι is the same as ἐξορίζειν, a little below. Ficinus omits the word entirely. His version is, “extra regionis fines interficiant.”

and so, is not, as being guilty of murder, to set his foot upon any sacred place, or in the whole of the country¹ of the party suffering,¹ as he shall die, should he be found and known, and shall be cast out unburied, beyond² the country of the sufferer.² Let this one law then be laid down by us as decisive on the subject of murder. And thus (be it said) up to this point about matters of this kind.

But for killing whom,³ and on what conditions, a person would be properly pure, let this be laid down. If any one catches a thief, entering his house by night, for the purpose of stealing his property, and kills him, let him be pure. In like manner, let him be pure, who kills a cloak-stripper⁴ in his own defence. And if any one commits a rape upon a free-born woman or a boy, let him be put to death with impunity, either by the party treated with insult and violence, or by the father, or brothers, or sons of the party. And if a man comes upon his wedded wife, while being ravished, and kills the party using violence, let him be pure by the law. And if any one, while assisting his father, when doing nothing⁵ unlawful and unholy,⁵ or his mother, or children, or brothers, or joint-parent of his children, shall kill a person, let him be in every respect pure.

[13.] Let these then be the laws laid down relating to the nurture and education of a living soul, with which if it meets it may live; but not meeting, the reverse; and relating also to violent deaths, what punishments there ought to be for them. Mention too has been made of the nurture and education of bodies; and what is close upon those subjects, namely, actions done with violence by persons to each other, both voluntary and involuntary, we must define according to our power, what they are, and how many, and meeting with what punishment

² Ficinus has what seems preferable, "extra regionis fines."

³ I have with Ast adopted ὅν, found in one MS., in lieu of ὧν— Ficinus has "nunc dicamus, in quibus recte mundus sit," as if his MS. read νῦν δὲ—ἐφ' οἷς, not ὧν δὲ—ἐφ' οἷς τε—

⁴ Literally, "one who robs another of his clothes at the public baths."

¹ they would each of them possess what is suited to them.¹ For² these, it appears, would be properly laid down as laws after those. Now the person of the least mark amongst those, who have turned themselves to law, would rank wounds, and mutilations from wounds, as secondary to murders. Wounds then are to be divided in the same manner as murders have been divided. For some are involuntary, others done in a passion, some through fear; but such as take place from design are called³ voluntary. Now about all such something of this kind must be premised; that it is necessary to lay down laws for mankind, and for them to live according to law, or for them to differ not at all from animals the most savage in every respect. And the cause of this is, that the disposition of not a single man is naturally sufficient to know what is conducive to a polity amongst men; and, when it does know, to be always able to do and wish what is the best. For first it is difficult to know that not private but public interests must necessarily be the object of the true science of politics—for a common interest binds states, but a private one tears them asunder—and that it conduces to both public and private interests, when the public are well established rather than when the private are so. Secondly, that, although a person should obtain sufficiently from art the knowledge that such things are so naturally, yet should he after this possess power in the state, without being brought to book,⁴ and hold it in his own hands entirely, he would never be able to remain in this opinion, and continue to live, while nourishing the public interest in a state as the leading one, and the private as following the public; but his mortal nature will ever urge him on to the wish to possess more, and to his own individual well-doing. (For) through irrationally avoiding pain, and pursuing pleasure, it will set both of these before what is more just and excellent; and, by producing a darkness in itself, it will at length fill both itself and the whole state with every ill. Since should any man, born with a divine destiny, be

³ I have translated, as if the Greek were not γινόμενα, but λεγόμενα—

¹ naturally competent to comprehend¹ this,² he would require no laws for the government of himself. For there is no law or order superior to science; nor is it lawful for intellect to be the minister, and the slave of any thing, but the ruler of all, if it is thus³ true and really free by nature. But now (it is not so);⁴ for it does not exist any where and in any manner, except to a small extent. On this account then we must choose the second in rank, namely, order and law; ⁵ which the one for the most part sees and beholds, but the other is entirely unable.⁵ Thus much then has been stated for the sake of these matters; and let us now ordain what he ought to suffer (in person), or pay (in purse), who wounds or otherwise⁶ injures another. ⁷ For it is easy for every one upon every point to take up correctly of a party having wounded what thing, or what person, or in what manner, or whether are you speaking;⁷ for there are numberless things of this kind and very different from each other. It is therefore impossible to commit to courts of justice, to decide upon all these matters, or not one. For it is necessary to commit in the case of all to decide upon this one point, whether each of these acts have taken place

² Ficinus, whom Taylor follows, has—"publicum bonum."

³ So Taylor, from "ita," in Ficinus. The MSS. read ὄντως, which is superfluous after ἀληθινός— One MS. has neither ὄντως nor ὄντως. Plato probably wrote, ἴανπερ ἀληθινῶς ἐλεύθερός γε ἦ—for γε thus perpetually follows ἴανπερ.

⁴ After νῦν δὲ Ast says there is an aposiopesis, as in the Banquet, § 8. But there, as here, I suspect that οὐ has dropt out before οὐ—or not ; but on the other hand not at all to commit to them, (to decide) upon this point, what the party, who has done any of these injuries, ought to be fined (in purse), and suffer (in person) ; and yet (for the law-giver¹) himself to lay down laws upon all questions, small and great, is nearly impossible.

⁵—⁵ Such is the literal version of the Greek, which I confess I cannot understand; nor could, I think, Ficinus; for his version is "a quibus plurima quidem perspicuntur, omnia vero videri nequeunt."

Clin. What then is the inference consequent upon this ?

Athen. It is this ; that some matters should be committed to courts of justice, and others not, but be ²left to (the legislator) himself.

Clin. What then are the matters, which are to be laid down by law, and what those to be committed to courts of justice ?

[14.] Athen. After the preceding, it would be the most correct to say this ; that, in a state, where the courts of justice are depraved and dumb, and concealing³ their opinions pass sentence in private ; and, what is still more dreadful than this, when, not in silence, but full of noise, as in a theatre, they praise and blame with an uproar each of the orators in turn ; then is a grievous calamity wont indeed to occur to the whole state. It is not then a fortunate circumstance for a person to be laid hold of by some necessity to legislate for courts of justice of this kind ; nevertheless, when he is laid hold of by a necessity, ⁴he must commit to them to order fines only relating to matters of the slightest kind, but he must himself distinctly lay down those relating to the most numerous,⁴ ⁵if he would ever legislate correctly⁶ for such a kind of polity.⁵ But in a state, where courts of justice are established as correctly as possible, and those, who are about to judge, are brought up well and undergo a scrutiny with all accuracy, there it is right and it will be well to commit to such judges to decide upon most points relating to those who are found guilty, as to what they

⁵—⁵ The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus, and after him by Taylor.

⁶ In lieu of ποτε, the sense evidently leads to πᾶρ' εὖ, as I have translated.

are to suffer (in person), or to pay (in purse). Against us then there will be no cause of complaint for our not laying down laws relating to matters the greatest and most numerous, into which judges, who have been educated in the meanest manner, would be able to look, and to adapt to each offence a punishment suited to the suffering and act. But since we are of opinion, that those, for whom we are laying down laws, will be not the least clever of judges in such matters, we must commit to their decision the greatest number of cases. However, as we have often said and done during the previous laying down of the laws, that by giving an outline and types of punishments, we have presented to judges patterns for their never going beyond the line of justice; and, as this was then correctly done, so must we now do likewise the very same thing, while returning again to the laws. Let then the outline¹ (of the laws) relating to wounds be thus laid down. If any one, having both the intention and wish to kill a friend, except it be those whom the law ordains, shall wound, but is unable to kill him, towards the party with such intentions, so inflicting a wound, it is not meet to feel a pity nor to pay a regard to him, otherwise than by compelling him to undergo the punishment of murder, as if he had actually killed his friend;² and, by doing reverence to his Fortune, not bad in every respect, and his Dæmon likewise, who, pitying both him and the wounded party, became to both an averter of evil—to one, in the wound not being incurable,³ and to the other, in the accident and calamity being exposed to a curse³—it is meet⁴ to give thanks to this Dæmon; and, by not opposing him, to take away the punishment of death from the party inflicting the wound, but for a removal to take place to him during life to a neighbouring state, enjoying there

¹ I have translated as if the Greek were not γραφῇ but περιγραφῇ, to answer to the preceding περιγραφῇν—

² Such was the law at Athens, as we learn from Lysias, p. 159, R. quoted by Ast.

³ How the Dæmon could be called an averter of evil, by the accident of a person being exposed to a curse, I cannot understand. Did Plato write ἐπάραιον μόνον κατ' ἀτυχῇ ξυμφορὰν—"to be exposed only to a curse touching the event which failed"—instead of ἐπάραιον τύχην καὶ ξυμφορὰν. Ficinus endeavoured to evade the difficulty by translating—"fecitque, ne vulnus huic letiferum, illi fortuna calamitasque execranda infligeretur."

his property ; but if he has inflicted any loss upon the wounded person, let him pay for the loss ; and let the court of justice, that tried the cause, fix the sum ; ¹ and let those, who would have decided about the murder, had the party died from the blow of the wound, ² be the judges.¹

If a child designedly wounds his parent, or a slave his master, the punishment shall be death. And if a brother wounds in like manner a brother or sister, or a sister a sister or brother, ³ and there is a verdict of wounding by design, ³ let the punishment be death. But if a woman wounds her husband with the design of killing him, or (in like manner⁴) a husband his wife, let (each) undergo a perpetual exile ; and, if their sons or daughters are at that time but children, let guardians manage their property, and take care of the children, as being orphans ; but if they are adults, let it not be a compulsory act for the exiled parent to be supported by their offspring, but let there be a permission to take possession of the estate. But whosoever happens to be childless, when falling into calamities of this kind, let his kindred, as far as cousins, both on the male and female side, come together, and appoint for this family, being one of the five thousand and forty in the state, an heir, after consulting with the guardians of the laws (and) considering the matter ⁵ in this manner and reasoning, ⁵ that no house out of the five thousand and forty is the property of its inhabitant, or of all his kindred, but of the state, considered in a public and private view, and that it is requisite for the state to possess its own houses, as holy and as happy as is possible. When therefore any house has become at the same time unhappy and unholy, so that its possessor has left no children in it, and ⁶ being in youth and married

² To avoid the tautology in πληγῆς and τραύματος, we might read τοῦ τρώσαντος—

³—³ The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus, and after him by Taylor.

⁴ Ficinus alone has “similiter,” adopted by Taylor.

⁵—⁵ The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus, and after him by Taylor.

⁶—⁶ Here again Taylor has tacitly omitted the words between the numerals, because they were wanting in Ficinus.

has died childless,⁶ through his having been convicted of voluntary murder, or some other crime against the gods or his fellow-citizens—¹ the punishment for which has been distinctly laid down by the law to be death—or if a person is in perpetual exile, being without male² children,¹ let it be necessary in the first place to purify this house and make use of expiatory sacrifices according to law; and next, let the kindred coming together, as we have said just now, examine together with the guardians of the laws, what family there is in the state in the greatest repute for virtue, and fortunate at the same time, and in which the children are rather numerous; from which let them put one upon the father of the deceased and his progenitors, as their adopted son,³ and let them call him, for the sake of⁴ a good omen,⁴ by the name (of the father,)³ and pray that he⁵ may become for them a parent⁵ and hearth-preserver and minister of rites holy and sacred, with better fortune than his predecessor;⁶ (and)⁷ after praying in this manner, let them appoint him the heir according to law, and suffer the sinner to lie nameless, and childless, and shareless, whenever such a calamity shall have seized upon him.

[15.]⁸ There is not, as it seems, in all existing things a boundary close in contact with a boundary; but in things to which there is a boundary, that in the middle being previously thrown

² In lieu of τῶν ἀνδρῶν ἄπαις, we must read, as I have translated, τῶν ἀρρένων ἄπαις, as shown by the passages quoted by Ast.

⁴—⁴ The Greek is at present φήμης— I have translated as if it were formerly εὐφημίας—similar to “boni ominis causa” in the note of Ast.

⁶ Taylor, by translating “his predecessor,” has led me to suggest τοῦ πάρος instead of τοῦ πατρός, which is here unintelligible.

⁷ I have translated as if τε had dropt out between ρούρω and τῷ—

to either of the boundaries, would become between both.⁸ Moreover, we have said that what takes place in a passion is something between what are voluntary and involuntary. If then a person is found guilty of wounds ¹existing, taken place ¹in a passion, in the first place let him pay double the amount of the damage, if the wound is curable; but fourfold in the case of those incurable. But if it be curable indeed, and yet brings upon the wounded party a feeling of considerable shame and disgrace,² let the party pay fourfold.³ But when ⁴a person in wounding another, injures not only the sufferer, but the state likewise, by rendering him unable to assist his country against its enemies, he must,⁵ in addition to other fines, pay for the damage done to the state. ⁶For besides his own period of service abroad, let him go through that of the disabled party, and execute the orders relating to war (at home) in the place of the other; ⁶or not doing so, let him be brought to trial by any one whatever, according to law, for neglect of military duty. And let the judges, who have given their votes against him, fix the equivalent for the damage, whether it is to be twofold, or threefold, or fourfold. If one relative by blood wounds another in the same manner, let the parents⁷ terminus termino conjunctus. Nam ubi confinium aliquod commune est, ibi hoc inter rerum terminos utrisque conventum medium fit—"where πρότερον is omitted, in which one part of the difficulty lies.

¹—¹ I cannot believe that Plato wrote τραυμάτων ἐνεστώτων ὀργῇ γενομένων—I suspect he wrote ἀνωϊστως ἐν ὀργῇ—"not knowingly, in a passion."

² Ficinus omits καὶ ἐπονείδιστον.

³ Sydenham was the first to suggest τριπλασίαν for τετραπλασίαν, and so too Orelli, comparing shortly afterwards εἴτε διπλῆν, εἴτε τριπλῆν, εἴτε καὶ τετραπλασίαν.

⁴ I have translated as if the Greek were, what is suggested by Stalbaum, ὅταν, not ὅσα, which is without regimen; unless it be said that τραύματα is understood, and that τρώσας governs two accusatives.

⁵ Although τοῦτον δὲ might perhaps be defended, yet I have no doubt that Plato wrote τοῦτον δέ, as I have translated. Ficinus, whom Taylor follows to the letter, has "similiter puniatur, ac præterea damnum civitati restituat."

⁶—⁶ Such is the literal version of the Greek; which Taylor has thus abridged: "Besides too his own military duties, he shall perform those of the wounded person."

and kindred, as far as the cousins on the male and female side, come together, and decide to deliver the offender to his parents to fix the fine according to nature. But if the fixing of the fine be a matter of doubt, let the kindred on the male side fix the fine definitely. And if they are unable (to decide), let them at length commit it to the guardians of the laws. And of such kind of wounds as are inflicted by children on their parents the judges must be of necessity above sixty years old, and whose children are not adopted but truly their own. And if a person is found guilty, let them fix the punishment, whether such a person must die or suffer something else greater, or not much less; but let none of the relatives of the doer act as judge, not even if he be of the age which the law has ordained. But if a slave wounds any free-man in anger, let his owner give up the slave to the wounded person, to use him as he pleases; but if (the owner) does not give him up, he himself shall remedy the wrong. And if any one brings an accusation touching what has happened, as being a plan arising from an arrangement between the slave and the wounded party, let him contest the matter; and if he does not get a verdict, let him pay the damage threefold; but if he does, let him hold the party planning as amenable together with the slave under the statute of slavery. But let him, who involuntarily wounds another, pay a simple fine; for no legislator is competent to be the ruler over accident; and let the judges be those, who were mentioned in the case of children (wounding) their parents, and let them fix a fine for the damage.

[16.] All the aforesaid sufferings come under the class of violent; and violent too is every kind of assault and disfigurement. It is necessary therefore for every man and every woman in matters of this kind alway to bear in mind that, what is older is honoured in no small degree beyond what is younger, both amongst gods and such persons as are about to be in a state of safety and happiness. To see therefore an assault made upon an elderly person by a younger is in a state a thing shameful and hateful to the deity; and it seems reasonable for every young man, when struck by an old one, to refrain with a light heart

his anger, ¹and to lay up for himself such a kind of honour for his old age.¹ Thus then let it be. Let every one reverence both in deed and word a person older than himself; and let him, deeming a person, who is his superior by twenty years of age, whether male or female, as a father or mother, act reverently towards them, and let him keep his hands from every period of life, that would be able to beget or bring forth himself, for the sake of the gods who preside over births. In like manner let him keep his hands^{2 3} from a stranger, whether a resident of old, or a new comer. For neither as the aggressor nor in self-defence let him dare to punish by blows such a person.⁴ But should he conceive that a stranger ought, through acting wantonly and rudely, to be punished, let him lay hold of the party and bring him before the office of the City-Stewards; but let him abstain from beating him,⁵ in order that he may be far from daring to strike a fellow-citizen.⁵ And let the City-Stewards, reverencing ever⁶ the god of hospitality, receive (the stranger) and sift the matter; and let them, should the stranger appear to have struck unjustly the inhabitant of the country, cause the stranger to cease from his foreign and bold behaviour, by inflicting as many blows as he may himself have struck. But if he has acted not unjustly, let them after threatening and reproaching the party, who

⁴ In lieu of νομοθεεῖν in Ald. Stephens happily conjectured νοουθεεῖν, found, it would seem, in all the MSS. but one.

⁵—⁵ Such is the literal version of the Greek. Ficinus, whom Taylor follows tacitly, has, what is more intelligible, “ut eo magis a cædendis civibus suis abstineat, quando etiam a peregrinis se continet.”

had brought him, dismiss them both. If one person strikes another of the same age with himself, or ¹ who is a little older, but without children, or if an old man strikes an old man, or one youth another, let a person defend himself according to nature, ²[without a weapon,]³ with naked hands. But if any one more than forty years old dares to fight with another, either as the aggressor, or in self-defence, let him be called rude, and ill-mannered, and slave-like, and meeting with this disgraceful punishment, he will have what is becoming to him. And if any one is obedient to these admonitions, he will be led easily by the rein; but let him, who is disobedient, and heeds not a prelude,⁴ receive with readiness the following law. If any one strikes another, who is older than himself by twenty years or more, in the first place, let him, who happens to be present, if he is neither of an equal age, nor younger than the combatants, prevent them; or ⁴(if he does not prevent them,) ⁴let him be considered a bad man according to law. But if he is of the same age with, or younger than, the person struck, let him defend the injured party, as if he were his brother or father, or a person still more remote;⁵ and further still, let him, who has dared to strike his senior, undergo the punishment for an assault and disfigurement, as stated; and if he is found guilty, let him be put into prison for not less than a year; ⁶and if the judges fix the fine for a longer period,⁶ let the time so fixed be considered as positive. If a stranger or a settler strikes his senior by twenty years or more, let the same law have the same power, with respect to the assistance of those who are present. And let him, who is defeated in a suit of this kind, if he is a stranger, and not a settler,⁷ ⁸undergo this very punishment, by being in bonds

³ Stephens was the first to see that the preceding $\pi\alpha\rho\alpha\mu\upsilon\theta\iota\omicron\varsigma$ seems to lead to $\pi\alpha\rho\alpha\mu\upsilon\theta\iota\omicron\nu$ here in lieu of $\pi\rho\omicron\sigma\iota\mu\iota\omicron\nu$.

⁴—⁴ Ficinus alone has, what is adopted by Taylor, "si non prohibuit—"

⁶—⁶ Ficinus, whom Taylor follows tacitly, has "immo etiam majore, si modo iudicibus id videbitur."

for two years.⁸ But if he is a settler, and disobedient to the laws, let him be in bonds for three years, unless the court of justice shall fix upon him a punishment for a longer period. And let whoever happens to be present on any of these occasions, and does not give assistance according to law, be fined, the person of the largest estate, a mina, of the second class, fifty drachms, of the third, thirty, and of the fourth, twenty; and let the court of justice for such matters consist of the Generals and Taxiarchs, and ¹Phylarchs and Hipparchs.¹

[17.] With respect to the laws, some, as it seems, are in behalf of worthy men, for the sake of their instruction, as to what manner they may associate with each other on friendly terms; others for the sake of those, who fly from instruction through their being of an unmanageable nature ²and not to be softened,³ so that they proceed to every kind of vice. These are the persons, who would have caused³ the discourses to be spoken, that are about to be; for whom in truth the legislator would of necessity lay down his laws, while wishing that there may never be a need of using them. Whoever then dares to touch his father ⁴or mother or their progenitors still,⁴ ⁵and to violently maltreat them,⁵ neither fearing the anger of the gods above nor the so-called vengeance of those below the earth, but, as one who, thinking he knows what he does not know at all, despises the men of old, and what has been asserted by all, and acts contrary to the law, for such a person there is ταύτην αὐτὴν τὴν δίκην: where I cannot see the force of αὐτὴν, nor could, I think, Ficinus, whose version, adopted by Taylor, is merely “biennium vinciat.” Ast says however that ταύτην αὐτὴν is put for αὐτὴν ταύτην, from which nothing, as far as I can see, is gained.

^{1—1} As the Taxiarch, answering to the English Colonel, was under the General, and is therefore placed after him, so ought the Phylarch to come after the Hipparch, as being an inferior officer, according to Aristotle, quoted by Harpocration in Φύλαρχος; unless it be said that there is here a Chiasmus, a figure of speech frequently found in Plato.

^{2—2} The words between the numerals are omitted by Taylor, who might have remarked the similar passage in § i. p. 853, D.

³ I confess I hardly understand πεποιηκότες ἂν εἶεν. One would have expected the indicative πεποιήκασι. Ficinus has “hi sequentium verborum causa sunt.”

^{4—4} The Greek is ἡ μητρὶς ἡ τούτων ἐτι προγόνων, where Ficinus omits ἡ μητρὶς, and Taylor ἐτι. But as ἐτι could not be united to προγόνων, Plato probably wrote ἐτι προγενεστέρων—

^{5—5} The words between the numerals are omitted by Taylor.

a need of some extreme turning aside. Now death is not the extreme; but the pains inflicted¹ on such persons in Hades are still more amongst the extreme than this;² and though they tell³ the greatest truths, they effect nothing in the way of turning aside in the case of such souls as these. For otherwise there would not have been persons to strike their mothers,⁴ nor the unholy daring of blows inflicted upon other parents.⁵ It is requisite then, that the punishments here for crimes of this kind, should be as much as possible in no respect inferior to those in Hades. Let then what follows be stated in this way. Whoever shall dare to strike his father or mother, or their fathers or mothers, unless he is seized with madness, let, in the first place, any one, who is present, as mentioned before, give assistance; but if it be a settler or stranger,⁶ who assists, let him be called to the principal seat at the (public) games; but, not assisting, let him suffer a perpetual exile from the country. But let him,⁷ who is not a settler,⁷ if he assists, receive praise; but if he does not assist, blame. And if a slave assists, let him be made free; but if

² As the last thing mentioned was death, it is evident that Plato wrote not τούτων, but τούτων, as I have translated.

³ Here λέγοντες is to be united to πόντοι by a prosopopœia, of which I could produce full thirty examples, if requisite; of which the most apposite is Æschyl. Pers. 823, Θῖνες δὲ νεκρῶν στόμασιν εὖ βροτῶν γένει Ἀφωνα σημανοῦσι καὶ τριτοσπόρφ, Ὡς οὐχ ὑπὲρ θεῶν θνητῶν ὄντα δει φρονεῖν, i. e.

“Well with the mouths of dead men shall the shores

To the third race of mortals voiceless say,

‘No man must deem himself above a god:’”

where στόμασιν, in lieu of δμμασιν, vainly defended by Paley, is confirmed by Diodor. Sic. i. 2, p. 5. αἱ πράξεις—διαβοῶμεναι τῇ τῆς ἱστορίας στόματι, and Epigr. Inc. 387, Πᾶν ἔπος ἀφθίγκτω τῷδε λέγω στόματι, supposed to be spoken by a pen.

⁵⁻⁶ Ficinus, followed to the letter by Taylor, has “nulli, qui parentes scelerate pulsarent, unquam reperirentur.”

⁶ Taylor omits “or stranger,” although found in Ficinus.

he does not assist, let him receive a hundred stripes with a whip. And if this occurs in the market-place, let him (be whipt) by the Market-Stewards; but if out of the market-place in the city, let any one of the City-Stewards, who is resident, inflict the punishment; but if in the rural parts of the country, let the chiefs of the Land-Stewards do so. If any denizen happens to be present ¹(when parents are struck by their child),¹ whether such denizen be a boy, or a man, or a woman, let him assist, and call the striker an impious wretch; and let him, who does not assist, be implicated in the curse sworn in the name of Zeus ²Homognius, and Patroius,² according to law.³ And if any one is convicted on the charge of assaulting and disfiguring his parents, let him, in the first place, suffer a perpetual exile from the city to some other country; and next, let him keep himself from all sacred rites; but if he will not so keep himself, let the Land-Stewards punish him with blows, and entirely as they please. And if he returns from exile, let him be punished with death. And if any free-man ⁴shall eat or drink with such a person, or have any other communication of such a kind⁴ with him, or only touch him voluntarily, should he happen to meet him any where, let the party neither enter a temple, nor a place of public meeting, nor, in short, the city, until he is purified; conceiving that he has had a communication with a calamity of an impious kind. But if, disobedient to the law, he shall ⁵contrary to the law⁵ defile the sacred places, and the city, let the magistrate, who, cognizant of this, does not institute a suit

² On these titles of Zeus, Ast refers to v. § 2, and Rep. iv. § 5.

³ Taylor omits the formula κατὰ νόμον, although found in Ficinus.

⁴ On this rite of excommunication, see my note on Æsch. Eum. 437, where I should have referred to Cæsar, in B. G. vi. 13, "Iis (quos sacrificiis interdicant Druides) omnes decedunt; auditum eorum sermonemque defugiunt, ne quid ex contagione incommodi accipiant; neque iis petentibus jus redditur, neque honor ullus communicatur;" and I should have corrected the remarkable passage in Eurip. Iph. T. 947, by reading 'Ἠλθον δ' ἐκεῖσ', οὐ πρῶτα μὲν μ' οὐδ' εἰς ξένος ἔκων γ' ἰδέεσθ', ὥς θεοῖς στυγούμενον. "Ὅς δ' ἔσχεν αἰδῶ ξένια μονοτράπεζά μοι Παρεῖχ' ἀκοινώνητά τ' ἐν ταύτῳ στέγει, εἰς γῆν δ' ἐκέκτητ' ὅμμι'—ἀπόφθεγκτόν τ' ἔπος, εἰς τ' ἄγγος ἰδίων γαῦμ' ὄσον γ', οὐ βάκχιον μέτρομα πληρώσας τις, ἔχε', ἐν ἡδονῇ Δαιτὸς γάνος τ' ἦν πώματος, πάντων δίχα.

against such a person,¹ be held amenable² to the greatest accusation for this very matter.³ If a slave strikes a free-man, whether a stranger or citizen, let any one present give assistance, or pay the fine above-mentioned, according to the value of his estate; ⁴ and let those who are present succour the party struck, and having bound the striker, deliver him to the injured party; ⁴ and he, on receiving him, shall ⁵ put him into the stocks,⁵ and give him as many stripes with a whip as he pleases, without doing an injury to the slave's owner, to whom let him deliver up the slave, to be his possession according to law. And let the law be this. Whatever slave strikes a free-man, without the order of the magistrates, let his owner, on receiving him bound from the party struck, not release him from bonds, until the slave shall have persuaded the party struck that he deserves to be released and to live. And let the same laws be for women, with respect to each other, on all matters of this kind; and for women with respect to men, and men to women.

BOOK X.

[1.] AFTER assaults,⁶ let a law of some such kind as this be stated relating to acts of violence, one for all; that no one

³ In lieu of ἐν τούτῳ αὐτῷ, Bekker would read ἐν τούτῳ αὐτῷ, and in that case ἐν εὐθύναις might remain; for the sense would be, "let this thing be held as one of the greatest charges against him, when the accounts of his office are examined."

⁴ Such is the English for the Latin of Ficinus, "qui ergo præsentes erunt, pulsato succurrant, vinciantque pulsantem, et ei vinctum tradant, cui fecit injuriam." The Greek is, συνδῆσαντες δὲ οἱ προστυγχάνοντες μετὰ τοῦ πληγέντος παραδόντων τῷ ἀδικουμένῳ; where μετὰ τοῦ πληγέντος is perfectly unintelligible; for it would thus seem that the striker and the struck were to be bound together—an idea that never could have occurred to Plato. Perhaps however it will be said that μετὰ τοῦ πληγέντος may mean, "after the blow has been struck—" But that would be in correct Greek, μετὰ τὸ πληγέν—

⁵ Taylor omits the words between the numerals, although duly found in Ficinus.

⁶ Ficinus, uncertain how to render αἰκίας by a single word, has made use of three, "cæde, vulneribusque et verberibus."

shall ¹ carry or take away ¹ any thing belonging to another, or use his neighbour's property, if he has not induced the possessor (to permit it). For from a thing of this kind ² all the above-mentioned evils have depended, and do and will (depend).² But of the remaining evils, the greatest are the lasciviousness and insolence of young men; to the greatest extent, when they are directed against sacred things; and they are particularly great in the case of public and holy matters,³ or in those of the common portions of tribes-men, or any other (persons)³ who have a communion in things of that kind. The second in order and heinousness, are those (directed against) the sacred concerns of individuals and sepulchres. The third, when, apart from the acts previously detailed, a person behaves insolently towards parents. The fourth kind of insolence is, when any one, despising the magistrates, carries off, or ⁴ drives away, or makes use of any thing belonging to them, without having persuaded them (to suffer it). ⁵ The fifth consists in unjustly calling to account the political conduct of any citizen.⁵ ⁶ For each of these there must be assigned a law in common.⁶ For in the case of sacrilege, it has been stated summarily what a person ought to suffer, if it takes place with violence and secrecy. But with regard to what a person does by word or deed insolently towards the gods, let me now detail, after laying down

²—² The Greek is πάντα ἡρτημένα τὰ τε εἰρημένα κατὰ γέγονε καὶ ἔστι καὶ ἔσται. Ficinus has "hinc enim mala omnia, quæ narravimus, dependerunt pendentque jam et in posterum dependebunt." From which Ast was led to read τὰ γε εἰρημένα— and Stalbaum to consider τε as an interpolation. But then γέγονε would have to be united to ἡρτημένα in a manner not to be found elsewhere in lieu of ἦν. Hence Plato wrote, I suspect, πάντ' ἦν ἡρτημένα τὰ τε εἰρημένα κατὰ καὶ ἃ γέγονε—

⁵—⁵ Such is Taylor's translation. The Greek is, πέμπτον δὲ τὸ πολιτικὸν ἀν εἴη ἐκάστου τῶν πολιτῶν ὑβρισθὲν δίκην ἐπικαλούμενον, where I cannot make out the syntax or sense; nor could Ast, I think, for he is quite satisfied with the loose version of Ficinus, "quintum cum civis alicujus civilis dignitas læditur vel offenditur."

⁶—⁶ Such is the literal version of the Greek. Ficinus has "quod genus omnino ultionem poscit."

an exhortation,¹ what he ought to suffer. Let it then be this. No one, who believes that there are gods, conformably to laws, has ever at any time voluntarily done an impious act, or spoken a word contrary to the laws; but he,² who does or says an impious deed or word against the gods,² suffers one of these three things; either he does not think, what I have stated;³ or, secondly, that, although they exist, they take no care of mankind;⁴ or, thirdly, that they are easily appeased by sacrifices,⁵ and drawn aside by prayers.⁶

Clin. What then shall we do, and what shall we say to them?

Athen. Let us, my good man, first hear, what I prophesy they will jocosely say in contempt of us.

Clin. What?

Athen. Perhaps they will say with a banter—O guests from Athens, and Lacedæmon, and Cnossus, you speak the truth. For some of us think ⁷the gods are no gods⁷ at all; others,⁸ that they take no care of us; and others, that they are drawn aside by prayers,⁸ as you have described them. We deem it then proper, as you have deemed it with respect to the laws, that, before you threaten us severely, you should endeavour to persuade and teach us that there are gods, by stating sufficient arguments, and that they are beings too good to be drawn aside, contrary to what is just, by any gifts. For now;

^{2—2} The words between the numerals, wanting in the Greek, are found only in the version of Ficinus, "faciunt autem aut dicunt impium aliquid in deos."

³ Namely, "that there are gods;" which very words Taylor has adopted from Ficinus, "deos esse negant."

⁵ On this doctrine, see iv. § 8.

⁶ Ficinus, followed by Taylor, omits παραγομένους—

^{7—7} I have adopted the reading θεοὺς οὐ θεοὺς, preserved by the Scholiast, in lieu of θεοὺς οὐδαμῶς. See Dobree on Aristoph. Eccl. 115, and myself on Crito, § 13, n. 5.

^{8—8} The words between the numerals are wanting in all the MSS. but the one used by Cornarius, and another by Ficinus, as shown by his version, "alii, nihil nostra curare; alii, muneribus facile placari—" who has however omitted οἷους ὑμεῖς λέγετε, which certainly seem to be superfluous.

after hearing this, and other things of such a kind, from those said to be the best of poets, and orators, and prophets, and priests, and ten thousand times ten thousand others, the majority of us do not turn to the acting unjustly, but, after acting so, we endeavour to get a salve. But on the part of legislators, who profess themselves to be not savage, but mild, we think it reasonable for them to make use of persuasion in our case, by stating, with regard to the gods, if not in a manner much superior to the rest, yet superior at least as regards the truth, that they do exist. And then perhaps we may be persuaded by you. Endeavour then, if we say what is fair, to speak on the points, to which we invite you.

Clin. Does it not seem then easy, O guest, to say with truth, that there are gods?

Athen. How?

Clin. In the first place, the Earth and Sun, and all the Stars, and the arrangements so beautiful of the Seasons, divided into months and years, (prove this);¹ and moreover, that all men, both Greeks and Barbarians, believe that there are gods.

Athen. I feel a fear, O blessed man—for I will never say that I feel shame, lest depraved persons hold you in contempt. For you are not acquainted with the cause of their difference² (in opinion); but you imagine that their souls are impelled to an impious life, by a want of mastery alone over pleasures and desires.

Clin. But what other cause can there be, O guest, besides this?

Athen. ³That, which you would know nearly not at all, through living out of their way, and which would lie hid from you.³

Clin. Of what are you speaking at present?

Athen. A certain ignorance of a very grievous nature is appearing to be the greatest prudence.

¹ The words between the lunes, absolutely requisite for the sense, are found only in the version of Ficinus, "id ostendunt."

² Cornarius seems to have found in his MS., or rather to have wished to read, διαφορᾶς; which Stephens, and after him Stalbaum, considered to be correct. Cousin is content with διαφορᾶς—I should prefer τούτων περί—διαφορᾶς, "of the difference on these points."

³ Such is the literal version of the Greek. Ficinus has merely "Quod vos ipsius expertes penitus fugit."

Clin. How say you?

[2.] Athen. There are certain stories put into writing amongst us, which, as I understand, are, through the virtue of your polity, not amongst you, some in a kind of verse, and others out of it, which speak of the gods. The most ancient (assert), that the first nature was that of Uranus¹ and the other (gods); and proceeding they detail, not far from the beginning, the birth of the gods, and how after being born they had intercourse with each other. Upon those, who hear the accounts, whether they are well or not upon any other ground, it is not easy to cast a censure, as they are of the olden time; but as regards the attention and honour to be paid to parents, I would never praise them, nor say that they are beneficial, nor that they have been correctly² told at all. Let then, what relates to the writings of the ancients, be dismissed and bidden farewell, and let them be spoken of, as may be pleasing to the gods. But let the poetry³ of the young and wise⁴ be blamed as the cause of evil; for the language of such persons effects this. For when you and I, detailing the proofs, that there are gods, bring forward those very things, the Sun and Moon, and Stars, and the Earth, as being gods and of a god-like nature, they, who have been persuaded by these wise men, would say that they are⁵ earth and stones,⁵ and incapable of paying any regard to human affairs; and that such ideas are cleverly wrapped round in a paste of words⁶ to render them plausible.

¹ I have thus translated Οὐρανοῦ: for it alludes to a person, not a thing, as shown by ἄλλων (θεῶν).

² Instead of ὀρθῶς five MSS. read ὀντως. But as Ficinus has "vera esse," he probably found in his MS. ὀρθὰ ὄντα—

³ I have adopted Ast's ἐπη for ὅπη, which Cousin retains without attempting to explain it.

⁵ Ast refers opportunely to Apolog. § 14, where, according to the doctrine of Anaxagoras, the Sun was said to be a shining stone and the Moon a mass of earth. Had the philosopher lived in our days, he would perhaps have compared the Sun to a large diamond, or a mass of pure carbon reduced to a solid state, and by the aid of the Earl of Rosse's telescope confirmed his guess that the Moon is a mass of earth in its most solid state of granite.

Clin. You have spoken, guest, a speech, grave indeed, even if only one had (said so);¹ but now, since there happen to be very many (who say so),² it will be still more grave.

Athen. What then shall we say, and what ought we to do? Shall we apologize, as if some person were accusing us before impious men, who fly³ from the subjects relating to legislation, and³ assert that we are acting in a shocking manner by legislating as if there were gods? Or shall we bid farewell to these, and return again to the laws, in order that this our preface to the laws may not become rather prolix? For the discourse will, if stretched out, become by no means short, if we sufficiently prove only moderately by reasons to men, eager to act impiously, some of the points, on which they say we ought to speak; ⁴and if we lead them to feel a fear upon others; and if, after having caused them to be disgusted on others, we lay down laws after this on matters that are becoming.⁴

Clin. But, O guest, we have often, for so short a time at least, said this very thing, that for the present it is not meet to prefer brevity to prolixity. For nobody, according to the saying,⁵ is pursuing us in haste. ⁶And it would be ridiculous,⁶ and at the same time paltry, for us to be seen preferring the shorter to the best. And it is a thing of no little moment, for our reasons possess somehow a power to prove that Jacobs in Athenæum, p. 297. Other passages are quoted by Dobree on Aristoph. l. c. According to Donaldson in the New Cratylus, p. 370, ed. 1, there lies hid here a comic verse, Λόγοισι δ' εὖ πως ταῦτα περιπεπεμμένα, similar to ῥηματίοις περιπεφθεῖς in Aristoph. Σφηκ. 668.

^{1, 2} The words between the lunes have been introduced from the version of Ficinus—"etiamsi solummodo unus dixisset, nunc vero—quo plures sunt, qui dicunt."

^{2—3} I have translated as if τὰ had dropt out before, and καὶ after, περὶ τῆς νομοθεσίας. Orelli however has suggested, what Stalbaum approves of, περιττὰς νομοθεσίας: and while Winckelmann would read ψέγουσι in lieu of φεύγουσι, Ficinus, unable perhaps to understand φεύγουσι περὶ τῆς νομοθεσίας, has omitted these words; and so after him has Taylor.

^{4—6} Such is the literal version of the Greek, which Ficinus, whom Taylor has followed in part, has thus abridged—"atque etiam terrore illos a scelere amovere, demum vero, quemadmodum convenit, leges ferre."

^{6—6} The Greek is γελοῖον δὲ—It was γελοῖον δ' ἦν ἂν in the MS. of Ficinus, as shown by his version—"quare ridiculum—esset." On the corruption of δ' ἦν ἂν into δὲ see Porson Miscellan. Crit. p. 182.

there are gods, that they are good, and that they honour justice pre-eminently more than men. For this will be nearly the most beautiful and excellent preface to all our laws. Let us then, without feeling any disgust, or being urged on, exhibit, as far as we can, sufficiently whatever power we possess in the way of persuasion, and lay aside no part of such kind of reasonings.

Athen. ¹The speech just now spoken by you appears to me to invite a prayer,¹ since you put yourself on the stretch with alacrity, nor is it fitting to delay any longer to discourse.

[3.] But come, (tell us) how can any one speak without a feeling of anger on the question² that there are gods? For there is a necessity for us to bear ill with and to hate those, who have been and are³ now the cause of the discussion, ⁴in not being persuaded⁴ by the tales, which they have heard even ⁵from young children,⁵ and when they were fed with milk from their nurses and mothers, and which were spoken, as it were, in epodes,⁶ both in sport and in earnest, and together with sacrifices hearing them in prayers, and seeing the sights that follow them,⁷ which a young person sees and hears with the greatest delight, when they take place; while their parents are making a sacrifice with the greatest earnestness, and occupied in it in behalf of themselves and them;⁸ and addressing in prayers

² Taylor adds, no doubt to complete the idea, "as if it were a thing of a doubtful nature."

³ Ficinus, and Taylor after him, omit καὶ γίγνονται.

⁴—⁴ I have, with Ast and Stalbaum, adopted Stephens's correction—γίγνονται νῦν, οὐ πειθόμενοι—in lieu of γίγνονται νῦν οὖν πειθόμενοι—which is perfectly unintelligible. Cousin however observes that "la construction suspendue (est) extrêmement claire—Il était difficile de gâter davantage une plus belle phrase—"

⁵—⁵ It is correct Greek to say ἐκ νέων or ἐκ παιδων, but not ἐκ νέων παιδων. Hence Winckelmann proposed to insert ἀρξάμενοι after παιδων—I would rather read ἐκ νηπίων in lieu of ἐκ νέων παιδων—

⁶ I confess I cannot understand what is meant by ὅλον ἐν ἐπιρδαῖς.

⁷ Ast translates, after Ficinus, ἐπομένας by "consentaneas—"

⁸ In lieu of ἐκείνων I should prefer τέκνων—On the custom of persons praying for themselves and children only, I have written something on II. Alcibiad. § 18, n. 10, τὰ καλὰ ἐπὶ τοῖς ἀγαθοῖς τοὺς θεοὺς δίδοναι κελεύοντες μόνους σφίσιν αὐτοῖς.

and supplications the gods, as really existing, both at the rising of the Sun and Moon, and at their setting; and when they hear and see the rollings on the ground and acts of adoration of Greeks and Barbarians of all kinds,¹ under the influence of all kinds of adversity and prosperity, not as if the gods were not existing, but as if existing in reality, and giving not even a handle for the suspicion that the gods do not exist—they who despise all these facts, and from not a single sufficient reason, as all would say, who possess even a little intellect, compel us to speak as we do at present, how can any one in mild language admonish, and at the same time teach them, in the first place, that the gods do exist? Let us however dare the attempt. For it is not meet that some of us² should be mad through a violent hankering after pleasure, and others through being angry with such characters as these. Let then our address to persons thus depraved in their intellect be of this kind and passionless, and let us speak mildly after extinguishing our anger, as if conversing with one of such persons—³ My child, you are young. But time, as it advances, will cause you to change in many points the opinions you now hold, and to give them to the opposite side.³ Wait then until that period, so as to become a judge of matters of the greatest moment. Now that is of the greatest moment, which you at present deem to be of no consequence, namely, to have correct ideas on the subject of the gods, and to live well or not. If then I first point out⁴ to you a thing of this kind, as being one of great moment, I shall not appear to tell a falsehood. Not you alone nor your friends are the first, who have held this opinion respecting the gods; but there have been always a greater or less number labouring under this very disease. I will therefore tell you this, as I have come in contact with many of them, that not one of them, after adopting this opinion

² In lieu of ἡμῶν, which Stephens wished to reject, Winckelmann would read ἡττωμένους—Sydenham suggested ἡδονῶν for ἡδονῆς ἡμῶν—Cousin translates ἡμῶν by “parmi nous autres hommes—”

⁴ Ficinus has “sacrificavero,” from which it is difficult to discover what he found in his MS. in lieu of μνήων—from their youth respecting the gods, that they do not exist, has continued to old age remaining in it. Two circumstances have however remained as regards the gods, not indeed to many, but to some; one is, that the gods exist indeed, but take no care of human affairs; and the other after this, that they do indeed take care, but are easily appeased by sacrifices and prayers. If then you will be persuaded by me, you will, turning over¹ with all your might this doctrine, ²which has ever been clear² to you, wait and consider whether it be thus or otherwise, by inquiring of other persons, and the legislator in particular. But during that period do not dare to act impiously towards the gods. For he, who lays down laws for you, must endeavour, both now and hereafter, to teach you on these points in what state they are.

Clin. What has been said thus far, is, O guest, most beautiful.

Athen. Entirely so, Megillus and Clinias; but we have unconsciously fallen upon a wonderful assertion.

Clin. Of what kind are you speaking?

Athen. That, which is thought by many to be the wisest of all assertions.

Clin. Speak yet clearer.

[4.] Athen. Some persons surely say, that all things, which are and have been and will be, exist, some from nature, others from art, and others from chance.

Clin. And do they not (say) well?

Athen. It is reasonable, indeed, for wise men to speak correctly. Let us then follow ³those from that point,³ and consider what they happen to be thinking of.

Clin. By all means.

Athen. It seems, say they, that nature and chance effect the greatest and most beautiful things, but art the lesser ; which, receiving from nature the generation of great and primary works, moulds and fabricates all the smaller works, which all of us call artificial.

¹ I have translated as if the Greek were περιελίττων, not περὶ αὐτῶν, which I cannot understand.

²⁻² Here again, by the slight change of ἀν into αἰ, I have made the meaning of Plato intelligible, of which Ficinus and Cornarius had only a vague idea, as may be seen from their respective versions, quoted by Ast.

Clin. How say you ?

Athen. I will speak still clearer in this way. They say that fire and water and earth and air exist from nature and chance, and not one of them from art ; and that the bodies, next after these, of the Earth, and the Sun, and the Moon, and the Stars,¹ are generated through them, being entirely without a soul ; and that, ²each being borne along by the chance, which is a portion of the power of each,³ to the spot where they fall together, ³fit together in some congenial manner,³ the hot with the cold, the dry with the moist, and the soft with the hard ; and that all things, which by the mixture of contraries, according to chance, have been commingled through necessity, have in this way and under such circumstances really⁴ generated the whole of heaven and all that are in heaven, and animals and plants together,⁵ all the seasons having been produced from them ;⁵ and not, say they, through intellect, nor any god, or art, but, as we have stated, by nature and chance ; and that art, mortal itself, being subsequently produced from these, themselves mortal, generated afterwards some kind of instruction, not partaking very much of truth, but certain images allied to themselves,⁶ such as painting produces, and music, and whatever arts are fellow-workers : and that if any⁷

^{2—3} This is the only translation I can give of τύχῃ φερόμενα τῇ τῆς δυνάμεως ἕκαστα ἐκάστων—

^{3—3} The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus.

⁴ From οὕτως in Euseb. P. E. i. 7, Viger elicited δυνως, which I have adopted ; for ταύτῃ κατὰ ταῦτα οὕτω is not found elsewhere thus united.

^{5—5} Why Plato should have thus introduced genitives absolute after the preceding accusatives, it is hard to say.

⁶ In lieu of ἐαυτῶν Ast suggests αὐτῶν, i. e. τεχνῶν. But Taylor translates ἐαυτῶν by "each other," a meaning assigned elsewhere to the same pronoun.

of the arts produce any thing of a serious nature, they are such as communicate their own power with that of nature, such as the art of medicine, and of agriculture, and of gymnastics ; and, moreover, the statesman's art communicates in some small part with nature, but very much with art ; and thus the whole of legislation is not from nature, but art ; of which¹ the positions are not true.

Clin. How say you ?

Athen. The gods, O blessed man, these persons say, in the first place, exist from art, not nature, but from certain laws ; and that these are different amongst different people, according as each have agreed to have laws laid down for each.² And, moreover, that things beautiful by nature are of one kind, those by law of another ; and that³ things just do not exist by nature at all,³ but that persons continue to dispute amongst themselves about them, and are perpetually changing them ; and that, what they change and when, possess then a fixed authority, emanating from art and laws, but not from any certain nature. All these, my friends, are amongst young men⁴ the doctrines of the wise, both private persons⁵ and poets,⁶ who assert that to be the most just, by which a person obtains a victory through violence. From whence both impiety comes upon young men—since gods are not such as the law enjoins us we ought to think there are—⁷and seditions too (arise) on this account, while persons are drawing towards the

² I have adopted ἐκάστοις, preserved in one MS. in lieu of ἐαυτοῖς, similar to ἕκαστα ἐκάστων—

^{3—3} On this doctrine Ast refers to Gorg. p. 482, E. § 85; Theætet. p. 172, B. § 75; Protag. p. 337, D. § 69; and Aristot. Polit. i. 3.

⁴ As ἀνθρώποις is seldom thus united to νέοις, Plato wrote, I suspect, both here and shortly afterwards, ἄνοις, "senseless," for such young men are, and ἄνων for ἀνθρώπων a little below. See my Poppo's Prolegom. p. 106.

⁶ Plato alludes to Pindar, as shown by iii. § 10.

^{7—7} Such is the literal version of the Greek, out of which I can make nothing, nor could, I think, Ficinus ; whose translation is—"hinc etiam seditiones oriuntur, per quas ad eam homines vitam, quasi secundum naturam rectam, trahuntur, qua ita vivant, ut ceteros vincant, nec secundum life, which is correct according to nature, which is in truth that a person lives, the master over others, and not the slave of others according to law.⁷

Clin. What an account have you, O guest, gone through, and what a mischief (detailed) to young men, both publicly in cities, and in their private homes!

Athen. You speak truly, Clinias. What then think you a legislator ought to do, ¹when states have been of old in this condition.¹ Ought he ²merely to stand up in the city² and threaten all, that unless they assert, and ³are thoroughly satisfied in their own minds,³ that there are gods, such as the law says there are, ⁴(they shall suffer punishment).⁴ And with respect to things beautiful and just, and every thing of the greatest moment, and whatever tends to virtue and vice, that it is meet for them to think and act in the way the legislator leads by his writings; and that, whoever does not exhibit himself obedient to the laws, one of them ought to die, another to be punished with stripes and bonds, and another with disfranchisement, and others with poverty and exile; and that while he is laying down laws for men, ⁵he is to have no persuasion over them, (so that) by fitting them to reasonings, he may, as far as he can, render them mild.⁵

Clin. By no means, O guest. But should any persuasion, though small, happen to exist relating to matters of this kind, it behoves a legislator, who is of the least worth, to be never leges aliis servant"—From which however it is easy to see that his MS. read ἐλκομένων, what the sense seems to require, instead of ἐλκόντων—

¹—¹ In lieu of the words between the numerals Taylor has merely "in this case," got from "cum ita se res habent—" in Ficinus.

²—² The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus, and partly by Taylor likewise.

⁴—⁴ The words between the lunes, absolutely requisite for the sense, are found only in the Latin of Ficinus—"eos omnino pœnas daturus."

faint-hearted, but¹ to utter, as the saying is, every cry,¹ and to become an helper to the old legal saw,² that there are gods, and such other things as you have discussed; and moreover, to aid both nature itself and art, (by showing) that they two exist by³ nature, or not less than nature,³ since they are the progeny of intellect, according to correct reasoning, which you seem to me to have stated, and as I now believe.

Athen. O thou most eager-minded Clinias, what, are not the matters thus spoken before the multitude difficult to follow up by arguments, and do they not possess a prolixity spoken with a clamorous voice?

Clin. But what, O guest, have we on the subject of drunkenness and music waited, while we were speaking at such a length, and shall we not wait (while speaking) on the subject of the gods, and such like matters? Moreover there will be⁴ the greatest assistance to the legislation, which is united to intelligence, because the ordinances relating to the laws being put into writing, will, ⁵as being about to afford a disproof,⁵ for all time remain⁶ perfectly quiet. So that we ought not to be alarmed, even if those things are at the commencement harsh to hear, which it will be in the power of a person, who is slow to learn, by frequently recurring to them, to look into; nor even, if they are prolix, yet useful, do they on this account possess no consideration; nor does it seem to me to be a holy thing for every person not to assist these assertions to the utmost of his power.

Megil. Clinias appears to me, O guest, to speak most excellently.

Athen. Yes, very much so; and we must do as he says. For if assertions of this kind were not scattered, so to say,

² The Greek is τῷ παλαιῷ νόμῳ ἐπικούρον γίνεσθαι λόγῳ: where Winckelmann would expunge νόμῳ, but Orelli alter it into νομίμῳ, whom I have followed.

³—³ This I confess I hardly understand. The sense seems to require φύσει ἢ φύσεως οὐχ ἥττονί τῳ—"by nature or by something not less than nature."

⁴ Ficinus has "est futurum," for his MS. doubtless read ἔσται, not ἔστι—

⁵—⁵ Ficinus has "redargutioni subjecta—" as if his MS. read something the reverse of δῶσοντα—

⁶ One MS. has ἡμεῖς, to which if we add ἀν, we shall have what Ficinus found in his MS., answering to "quiescant."

amongst all men, there would be no need of arguments to prove that there are gods. But now this is necessary. To whom then does it pertain, more than to the legislator, to give assistance to the greatest laws, when corrupted by wicked men?

Clin. To no one.¹

[5.] Athen. But do you, Clinias, tell me again—for it behoves you to take part in the conversation—does not he, who mentions these things, namely, fire and water and earth and air, appear almost to consider them as the first of all things, and to call them nature, and (to say) that soul is (a production) subsequent to them? Does it seem that he not only appears (to think so), but in reality signifies to us so much by his assertions?

Clin. Entirely so.

Athen. Have we not then, by Zeus, discovered, as it were, some source of the stupid opinion of those men, who have ever touched upon inquiries relating to nature? Look into and examine the whole subject. For it is a matter of no small moment, if those, who meddle (themselves) with impious assertions, and are the leaders to others, are seen to employ arguments not correctly, but erroneously. Such to myself at present² appears to be the case.

Clin. You speak well; but endeavour to show why so.

Athen. It seems then I must employ rather unusual arguments.

Clin. You must not, guest, hesitate. For I understand that you conceive you will travel out of legislation, if we handle reasonings of this kind. But if it is not possible to agree in any other way than this with what has been according to law just now stated, as being correct,³ on the subject of the gods,³ let us, O wonderful man, speak even in this way.

Athen. I will detail then some such reasoning as this, which, as it seems, is nearly not usual. The discourses, which have worked upon the soul of the impious, have shown that, what is the first cause of the generation and corruption of all things, was not produced the first, but subsequently, and that the subsequent was prior : from whence they have erred respecting the real existence of the gods.

¹ Instead of οὐκ ἔστιν the syntax requires evidently οὐ τίνα, to answer to the preceding τίνα.

² The sense requires τὰ νῦν, as I have translated, not τοίνυν.

³ In lieu of θεοίς, which is perfectly unintelligible, Ast suggested λόγοις. But Ficinus found in his MS. θεῶν περί, as shown by his version, "de diis secundum legem"—which Sydenham says is correct. For otherwise there would have followed, not ὡς ὁρθῶς ἔχουσιν, but ὡς ὀρθῶς εἶσιν. Orelli would read θεσμοίς, and refers to Epist. viii. p. 355, Bekk.

Clin. I do not yet understand.

Athen. Almost all men, my friend, appear to have been nearly ignorant what the soul happens to be, and what power it possesses, with respect to other things belonging to it, and its generation besides—how that it is amongst the first of substances and before all, and that more than any thing else it rules over the change and altered arrangement of bodies. And if this be the case, is it not necessary for things allied to soul to have been produced prior to those pertaining to body, through soul itself being more ancient than body?

Clin. It is necessary.

Athen. Now opinion, and care, and intellect, and art, and law, would be prior to things hard and soft, and heavy and light. And moreover the great and first works and doings of art would be amongst the first things ; but those produced by nature, and nature herself, which they do not correctly call by that name, would be posterior to, and ruled by art and intellect.

Clin. ¹How not correctly?

Athen. Because¹ they are willing to say that nature is the generation relating to the first; ²and they place bodies amongst the first.² But if soul shall appear to be first, and not fire or air, ³soul would be said with almost the greatest correctness to have been produced amongst the first; and these will be pre-eminently by nature in this state, should any one show that soul is more ancient than body;³ but otherwise not.

²—² Ficinus alone has, what the train of thought requires, “primaque ponunt corpora—” in Greek, according to Cornarius, τὰ δὲ σώματα τιθέασιν τὰ πρῶτα—words evidently lost through τὸ ὁμοιοτέλετον. Cousin, however, considers those words to be perfectly useless.

³—³ I have followed for the most part Ficinus, whose version is, “anima ipsa corpore antiquior rectissime affirmabitur; et hæc ipsa ita natura constare, si animam corporibus antiquiorem esse constiterit,” who seems to have found in his MS. ψυχὴ δὲ, not ψυχὴ δὲ—and εἶναι καὶ φύσει, not εἶναι διαφερόντως ὄντι φύσει—while to preserve the train of thought, it is requisite to read ἔσται for ἐστὶ—Ast, however, adopts διαφερόντως φύσει, from Eusebius P. E. xii. p. 622, D., which, I confess, I do not understand. Cousin says—“On eclaireit la phrase entiere un peu en lisant καὶ ὁ τι οὐ ὅτι δὲ, i. e. et que c'est là le véritable ordre naturel des choses.”

Clin. You speak most true.

Athen. Shall we then, after this, proceed to this very point?

Clin. Undoubtedly.

Athen. But let us by all means guard against a deceitful reason, lest perchance, being of a youthful look, it persuades us old men improperly, and after escaping, makes us a laughing-stock; and lest we appear, ¹after throwing ourselves upon greater things, to miss even the little.¹ Consider then, if it were requisite for us three to pass a river, running with a strong current, and I, happening to be the youngest of us, and acquainted with many rivers, should say,—It is proper for myself to make an experiment the first, and, leaving you in safety, to ascertain whether it is fordable by you, older than myself, or how it is; and, on its appearing to be in that state, I were then to call upon you, and by my experience cause you to pass it together with myself; but if not fordable by you, for the danger to fall upon myself—I should appear to speak with moderation. So now, the future reasoning is of rather a violent kind, and perhaps nearly impassable, at least by your strength.² Lest then it should cause in you a dizziness and giddiness, by being carried round, and put questions to you unaccustomed to give answers, and afterwards beget in you an unseemly and unbecoming conduct,³ it appears to me that I ought, in the present case, to do thus to myself, (namely) to interrogate myself, first, while you are hearing in safety, and after this to give the answer myself, and thus to go through the whole of the reasoning, until, as regards the soul, it is finished, and shows that soul exists prior to body.

²—³ Such is the literal version of the Greek. Taylor however thought it sufficient to translate nearly as closely the Latin of Ficinus, “ne vertiginem tenebrasque vobis faciat, ad eas vos quæstiones deducens, quibus consueti non estis, atque hoc pacto dedecore et tristitia afficiat—” where παραφερόμενος was probably omitted, as being unintelligible; for Plato wrote no doubt περιφερόμενος: since giddiness is produced rather by a circular than a lateral motion. And so I have translated.

Clin. You seem to us, guest, to speak most excellently; and do then as you are saying.

[6.] Athen. Come then, if at any time we ought to call upon gods,¹ let this be done so now; (and) let them be called on with all earnestness to the demonstration of their existence. And laying hold, as by some secure rope,² let us mount up to the present reasoning. Now it appears to me that, when I am examined upon these points, I shall answer most securely after this fashion,³ to questions of this kind. When a person says—O guest, do all things stand still,⁴ and is nothing moved; or does quite the contrary⁵ to this take place? Or, are some things moved, but others remain (fixed)? To this I shall reply—Some things are moved, but others remain (fixed). Do not then the things, which stand still, stand in a certain place; and are not the things, which are moved, moved (in a certain place)? How not? And some things would surely do so in one spot, but others in more (than one). Are you speaking, we shall say, of the things, which, obtaining the power of such as stand in the middle, are moved in one (spot), just as the circumference of tops,⁶ which are said to stand still, revolves? I do. And we understand that, in this circumference, the motion, which carries round⁷ the largest and the smallest circle,⁷ distributes itself proportionally in small and large circles, and is proportionally less and more. Hence it becomes

² Ast refers to Phædo, p. 85, D. where reasoning is compared to a raft.

³ In lieu of the unintelligible κῆρα δέ, I have with Ast adopted κατὰ τὰδε, furnished by Eusebius, and similar to hujusmodi in Ficinus.

⁴ This was the doctrine of Parmenides.

⁵ This was the doctrine of Heracleitus.

the fountain of all wonderful things, ¹proceeding (with) slowness¹ and swiftness, that coincide with large and small circles,² in a manner that one would expect to be an impossible occurrence. You speak most true. But by things that are moved in many (places), you appear to me to mean such as are carried along by a movement, and pass from one place to another. And ³sometimes it is when³ they obtain the going of some one centre, and sometimes more,⁴ by being rolled around,⁵ ⁶and meeting on each occasion with each, they are cut through by

² Here κύκλοις is taken in its usual sense. For there is a general inference drawn from a particular fact.

⁴ I cannot understand to what πλείονα is to be referred. From its being opposed to ἐνός κέντρον, one would expect πλείονων. But as ἐνός κέντρον depend themselves upon βάσιν, (or μετάβασιν, if my correction is correct,) the sense would require βάσεις (or μεταβάσεις) πλείονων. With regard to the two kinds of motion, one of a body revolving on its centre in a fixed place, and another of a body revolving similarly, but with a change of place, Ast refers to Parmenid. p. 138, D. § 24, and Theætet. p. 181, D. § 95.

those that stand still ;⁶ ¹ but being in the middle and between things of this kind, they are mingled with each other, meeting from an opposite direction, and carried along to one point.¹ I mean that these things are, as you say. And, moreover, the things that are mingled together,² are increased ; but when separated,³ waste away, when the existing condition of each remains ; but when it does not remain, both are destroyed. But the generation of all things takes place, when what event occurs ? It is evident that, when the commencement, after receiving an increase, arrives at the state of a second transition, and proceeding from this to that which is near, as far as three, ⁴ it possesses sense in things sentient.⁴ Every thing therefore is generated by this change and transition, and it exists in reality when it remains ; but when it is changed into another condition, it becomes entirely destroyed. Have we not then detailed, O friends, the whole of motion in its species and numbers, except two ?

Clin. Of what kind are those ?

Athen. They are nearly those, my good man, for the sake of which has been the whole of our present inquiry.

Clin. Speak more clearly.

Athen. It was surely for the sake of soul.

Clin. Entirely so.

Athen. Let then one motion be that, which is able to move other things, but is ever unable to move itself ;⁵ and let the

²—² Ficinus, aware that συγκρινόμενα could not be translated into Latin by a single word, has properly made use of two, “conjuncta densataque,” and rendered similarly διακρινόμενα by “disjuncta rarefactaque.”

other be that, which is ever able to move both itself¹ and other things, by a commingling and a separation, and by increase and the contrary,² and by generation and corruption; and let this motion be different from all the other motions.

Clin. Be it so.

Athen. Shall we not then place that motion as the ninth, which always moves another, and is moved by another; but the motion, which moves both itself and others, (and) which is adapted to all doings and sufferings, and which is truly denominated the change and motion of all things, shall we not call this almost³ the tenth?⁴

Clin. Entirely so.

Athen. But which of the ten motions shall we most correctly select as the most powerful of all, and pre-eminently effective?

Clin. It is necessary to say, that the motion, which is able to move itself,⁵ is superior ten thousand-fold, and that all the rest come after this.

Athen. You speak well. Must we not then alter one or even two of our present assertions, as having been made not correctly?

Clin. Of what are you speaking?

Athen. That, which was stated respecting the tenth, was not correctly stated.

Clin. In what way?

Athen. According to reason, it is the first in generation and strength; but we hold, as second to this, that which comes ¹ This is the motion of soul. T. On these two kinds of motion Plato founds his leading argument in the Phædo for the immortality of the soul.

² Why Plato should thus have written καὶ τῷ ἐναντίῳ, instead of μειώσεις, to balance the preceding αὐξαις, it is difficult to understand. Something similar however is found in v. 5, as I have remarked in p. 163, n. 4.

⁴ The genus of motion is here distributed into ten species: 1. revolution about a fixed centre; 2. transition from place to place; 3. condensation; 4. rarefaction; 5. increase; 6. decrease; 7. generation; 8. destruction; 9. change produced in another by another; and 10. change produced by a thing itself, both in itself and in another. This last is the tenth motion, of which he now speaks, and is the motion of soul. T.

⁵ Ficinus has "et se et alia movere," as if his MS. read τὴν αὐτὴν αὐτὴν καὶ ἕτερα κινεῖν—similar to τὴν τε αὐτὴν κινούσαν καὶ ἕτερα just before.

after it, (the tenth,) although it has been just now absurdly called the ninth.

Clin. How say you ?

[7.] Athen. Thus. When one thing moves another, and something else always moves the former, will there ever be amongst such things any thing which first moves ?

*Clin.*¹ How can that, which is moved by another, ever be the first of things that cause an alteration ?

*Athen.*¹ It is certainly impossible. But when a thing, by moving itself, alters another thing, and this latter some other thing, and thousand things upon ten thousand become moved thus, will there be any other commencement of all the motion than the change of that, which moves itself ?

Clin. You speak most beautifully ; and on these points we must agree.

Athen. Let us speak² still further in this way, and give an answer to ourselves. If all things that are produced should somehow stand still together, as the majority of such persons³ dare to assert (they do), which of the above-mentioned motions must necessarily exist the first ?

Clin. That surely which moves itself. For things⁴ will never change by a fall under another, when there has not existed previously a change by a fall in themselves.⁴

Athen. We will say then that the commencement of all motions, and which first exists in things standing still and moved, is that, which moves itself ; (and) that this is necessarily the most ancient and the most powerful change of all : but that the second is that, which is altered by another thing, and moves other things.

Clin. You speak most true.

Athen. Since then we are at that point of our reasoning, let us likewise give an answer to this.

² Ficinus, whom Taylor follows, has "nos ipsos interrogemus."

³ By "such persons" are meant "the impious," whose arguments the Athenian is supposed to be bringing forward and refuting.

⁴—⁴ I have translated as if the Greek were οὐ μὴ ποτὶ τιν' ἐμπροσθεν μεταίσῃ—not ποτὶ ἐμπροσθεν—for otherwise μεταίσῃ would want its subject.

Clin. To what ?

Athen. If perchance we should see this (first)¹ motion taking place in a body formed of earth, or water, or fire-like, whether separate or mixed, what circumstance should we say was inherent in a thing of this kind ?

Clin. Do you ask me, whether, when a thing moves itself, we should say it is alive ?

Athen. Yes.

Clin. That it is alive. How not ?

Athen. But what, when we see soul inherent in any thing, must we admit ²that it lives through any thing else than this ?

Clin. Through nothing else.³

Athen. Hold then, by Zeus. Would you not be willing to understand three things with respect to each thing ?

Clin. How say you ?

Athen. One, the existence ; and one, the definition³ of the existence ; and one, its name ; and that there are likewise two questions respecting every thing that exists ?

Clin. How two ?

Athen. Sometimes each of us, when the name itself⁴ is proposed, inquires the definition ; and sometimes, when the definition itself⁴ is proposed, we inquire on the other hand the name. Are you then willing for us to speak again of a thing of this kind at present ?

Clin. Of what kind ?

Athen. There is surely a twofold distinction in other things, and in numeration. Thus, for instance, in numeration, "even" is a name ; but the definition is, a number divided into two equal parts.

Clin. Certainly.

¹ Ficinus has alone, what the train of thought requires, "primum motum," as if his MS. read ταύτην τὴν α̃ instead of ταύτην merely.

²⁻³ I have followed Ficinus, who doubtless found in his MS., ἄλλω ἢ τούτῳ αὐτὸ ζῆν, and οὐκ ἄλλω, in lieu of ἄλλο ἢ ταῦτόν τούτῳ ζῆν—οὐκ ἄλλο : which Ast could not understand, as is evident from his attempt to explain and correct the common reading.

⁴⁻⁴ I cannot see what αὐτὸ and αὐτόν have to do here. The sense seems to require rather, τὸ ὄνομα προτεινόμενόν πού του—"the name perchance of a thing being proposed—" and similarly in the next sentence, τὸν λόγον αὐ τοῦ προτεινόμενον instead of αὐτόν—

Athen. I mean some such thing as this. Do we not speak of the same thing in each way, when, on being asked the name, we give the definition, or, being asked the definition, (we give) the name? ¹and when we call by the name of "even" a thing really the same, but by a definition divide a number as into two (equal) ¹ parts?

Clin. Entirely so.

Athen. But what is the definition of that thing, to which there is the name of soul? Have we any other than what has been just now mentioned, I mean, the motion which is able to move itself?

Clin. Do you mean, that the thing, which moves itself, is the definition of that existence, which we all call by the name of soul?

Athen. Yes, I do. But if this be the case, do we not still regret that it has not been shown sufficiently, that soul is the same with the first generation and motion of things which are, and have been, and will be, and, on the other hand, ²of all the contraries to these; ² since it has appeared to be the cause of all change and motion in all things?

Clin. No. For soul has been sufficiently shown to be the most ancient of all things, and the commencement of motion.

Athen. Will not then the motion, which exists in another through another, but which never causes a thing to be moved in itself, be the second in order? ³and ought it not to be placed after the former motion, by whatever interval of numbers any one may choose to reckon, ³ since it is the change by a truly soulless body?

Clin. Right.

²—² What Plato meant by the contraries to things that are, have been, and will be, I confess I cannot conceive.

³—³ Such is Taylor's translation of the Latin of Ficinus, "et quoto quis velit numerorum intervallo, superiori motui postponendus," as if he had found in his MS. καὶ ὅπου ἀριθμῶ βούλοιτ' ἂν τις ἀριθμῆν αὐτήν, πολλοστή τοσοῦτῳ, instead of ὅπου ἂν ἀριθμῶν—πολλοστήν τοσοῦτων, where I cannot discover either syntax or sense. With regard to πολλοστή, Ast says it means "one out of many, i. e. the least," referring to Phileb. p. 44, E., while "postponendus" would lead to ἐκτρία in lieu of τε καὶ—

Athen. Rightly then, and decisively, and most truly, and most completely, should we have said that soul was generated prior to body, and that body is posterior and secondary, as being according to nature ruled over by the ruling soul.

Clin. With the greatest truth indeed.

[8.] Athen. We surely remember, however, that we agreed on a previous occasion that, if soul should appear to be more ancient than body, the things pertaining to soul would also be more ancient than those pertaining to body?

Clin. Entirely so.

Athen. Now conduct, and manners, and wishes, and reasonings, and true opinions, and attention, and memory, would have been generated prior to the length, and breadth, and depth, and strength of bodies, if soul be (prior) to body.

Clin. It is necessary.

Athen. Is it not then necessary after this to acknowledge, that soul is the cause of things good and evil, and of honourable and base, and of just and unjust, and of all contraries, if we lay it down as the cause of all things?

Clin. How not?

Athen. Is it not also necessary to assert, that soul, which administers ¹[and dwells in] ¹all things that are moved in every way, administers likewise the heavens?

Clin. How not?

Athen. One soul, or many? Many; (for) I will answer for you. Let us not then lay down less than two, one the beneficent, and the other able to effect things of a contrary kind.²

Clin. You speak very correctly.

Athen. Be it so. Soul then leads every thing in heaven, and on earth, and in the sea, by its movements; the names of which are, to will, to consider, to take care of, to consult, to form opinions true and false, to be in a state of joy, sorrow, confidence, fear, hate, love, together with all such primary movements as are allied to these, and which, receiving those of bodies that are secondary efficient, lead all things to increase and decay, and to rarefaction and condensation, and to things consequent upon these, such as heat, cold, gravity, lightness, the hard and the soft, the white and the black, the sour and sweet, (and the bitter,)¹ and all that Soul makes use of, when, being a goddess herself,² she ever takes as an ally Mind, a god,³ and disciplines all things correctly and happily; but when with Not-Mind,³ it works out every thing the contrary. Shall we lay down that such is the case? or do we still doubt whether the case is different?

² On this doctrine of two powers, good and evil, Ast refers to Xenophon Cyrop. vi. 1, 41.

Clin. By no means.

Athen. Whether then shall we say, that the genus of soul has a power over heaven and earth, and the whole circuit,⁴ (as being)⁵ intellectual and full of virtue, or as⁶ possessing neither of these qualities? Are you willing then for us to answer these questions thus?

Clin. How?

Athen. If, let us say, O wonderful man, the whole path of heaven, and at the same time the progressive movement of all it contains, possess a nature similar to the motion and circulation and reasonings of Mind, and proceed in a manner allied to them, it is evident that we must say that the most excellent soul takes care of the whole world, and leads it along a path of that very kind.

Clin. Right.

¹ The words between the lunes are omitted by Bekker, with the two modern MSS., which have been evidently tampered with. Ficinus found them in his better one, as shown by his version, "austerum, dulce, amarum."

² I have followed the text of Bekker, προσλαβοῦσα ἀπὸ θεὸν θεὸς οὔσα, and translated προσλαβοῦσα, "taking as an ally," remembering the expression in Æsch. Prom. 225, προσλαβόντα μητέρα, as explained by Barker in Classical Recreations, p. 303, who to the passages quoted from Demosthenes might have added Thucyd. i. 82, and Xenophon K. A. i. 7, 3. In considering Mind as a god, Plato had perhaps in mind the doctrine, to which Euripides alludes in Tro. 890, Ζεὺς εἶρ' Ἀνάγκη φύσιος εἶρε Νοῦς κρατῶν: where Musgrave refers to Cicero de N. D. i. 11, "Cur quidquam ignoraret animus, si deus esset?"

³ To preserve the antithesis in Νοῦς and Ἀνοεία I have translated "Mind," and "Not-Mind."

⁵ I have translated as if the Greek were ἄτε φρόνιμον ὦν, and ἡ ἄτε, not τὸ φρόνιμον, and ἡ τὸ—

Athen. But if it proceeds in a mad and disordered manner, that the evil (soul leads it).

Clin. And this too is correct.

Athen. What nature then does the motion of Mind possess? To this question indeed it is difficult, friends, to answer prudently. It is therefore just that I should for the present anticipate¹ you in the answer.

Clin. You say well.

Athen. Let us then not look, as it were, opposite to the sun,² and, bringing upon ourselves night in mid-day, answer the question,³ as if we could ever sufficiently see and know Mind with mortal eyes:³ but one may see it more securely by looking to the image of the object of the question.

Clin. How say you?

Athen. From among those ten motions let us take (one)⁴ as an image, to which Mind is similar, which bearing in remembrance, I will in common with you give a reply.

Clin. You would speak most beautifully.

Athen. We remember, at present,⁵ so much at least of what was said formerly, that some of all things we laid down were moved, and others remained (at rest).

Clin. We do.

Cthen. But of things, which are moved, some were moved in one place, but others borne along in many.

³—³ In the words of the original lies hid, I suspect, a poetical fragment, οὐ νοῦν ποτε θνητοῖς Ὀμμασιν ὀψόμενοι γνωσόμενοι θ' ἱκανῶς.

⁴ I have translated as if μίαν had dropt out after λάβωμεν. Of this fact had Ficinus been aware, he would have given a closer version than the following, "Videamus, cui potissimum decem illarum agitationum similis sit intellectus, ut, tanquam imagine, hac utamur."

⁵ I have translated as if the Greek were not τοῖνον but τὰ νῦν, to balance τῶν τότε—

Clin. They are so.

Athen. Of these motions, it is necessary for that, which is borne¹ along in one place, to be moved round a certain middle point, in imitation of ² circles fashioned by a wheel,² and that it is in every respect as much as possible allied and similar to the circular movement of Mind.

Clin. How say you?

Athen. In saying that both Mind and the movement borne along in one place, are moved according to the same, and in a similar manner, and in the same, and round the same, and towards the same, according³ to one reason, and one order, similar to the movements of a sphere⁴ made round by a turner, we should not appear to be at all indifferent workmen for beautiful similes in a speech.

Clin. You speak most correctly.

Athen. The motion, then, which is not borne along in a similar manner, nor according to the same, nor in the same, nor round the same, nor towards the same, ⁵ neither in arrangement, nor in order, nor in one certain reason,⁵ will be allied to all Not-Mind.

Clin. It will so most truly.

Athen. It will then be now no longer difficult to assert distinctly, that since it is soul, which leads all things in a circular ¹ As φέρεισθαι is generally employed by Plato to denote a progressive motion, φερομένην could scarcely be introduced here; nor was it, I conceive, in the MS. of Ficinus, whose version is "qui semper in uno fit." But since Eusebius acknowledges it, and it is repeated twice afterwards, it would be perhaps uncritical to reject it in this place.

^{2—3} Such is Taylor's English for the Latin of Ficinus, "circuli torno confecti similis." For neither of them knew that Plato was alluding to a top, as I have shown on § 6, p. 419, n.⁶. Hence the real meaning is, "being an imitation of tops made round by a turner." For according to Hesychius, the τόρνος was an instrument used to make things round. With respect to the text, it is strange that Bekker should not have adopted οὖσαν from Eusebius, in lieu of οὐσῶν, which is perfectly unintelligible, and properly rejected by Ast.

³ Ast would read καθ' ἑνα in lieu of καὶ ἑνα, which is without regimen. Ficinus too has "una ratione et uno ordine."

⁴ By this "sphere," was meant "a top."

^{5—5} Others may, but I will not, believe that Plato wrote here, ἐν κόσμῳ—ἐν τάξει—ἐν τινι λόγῳ, after he had written in the corresponding clause of the preceding speech, καθ' ἑνα λόγον καὶ τάξιν μίαν, although it is true that κόσμῳ seems to have been introduced here to pave the way for the subsequent κοσμοῦσαν. In lieu however of τινι we must evidently read ἐνι, as I have translated.

manner, we must of necessity assert, that the best soul, or the contrary, leads round, and takes care of, and arranges the circular movement of heaven.

Clin. From what has been now stated, it is not, O guest, holy to say otherwise than that either one soul, possessing every virtue, or more souls, lead those things round.

Athen. You have listened, Clinias, to the reasons in the best manner; but listen still further to this.

Clin. To what?

[9.] Athen. If a soul leads round the Sun, and Moon, and the other Stars, does it not do so to each singly.

Clin. How not?

Athen. Let us then direct our arguments to one (luminary), that they may appear to suit all the stars.

Clin. Which one?

Athen. Every one sees the body of the Sun, but not one its soul; nor (the soul) even of the body of any other animal, either living or dead; ¹ but there is a great hope that this genus (of things), which is naturally altogether not perceptible by all the senses of the body, would be thoroughly perceptible by the Mind alone. Let us then take something of this kind in our thoughts respecting it.¹

Clin. What?

Athen. If soul leads the Sun, we shall perhaps not miss the mark by asserting that it does so in nearly one of these three methods.

¹—¹ I have translated as if the Greek were—ἀλλ' ἑλπίς ἐστι πολλή, τὸ γένος ἡμῖν τοῦτο, ὃ ἀναίσθητον τὸ παράπαν πάσαις ταῖς τοῦ σώματος αἰσθήσεσι περιπέφυκε, διανόητον ἂν εἶναι νῶ μόνῳ καὶ δὴ καὶ διανοήματι λάβωμεν αὐτοῦ περὶ τὸ τοιόνδε—not ἀλλ' ἑλπίς πολλή τὸ παράπαν τὸ—τοῦτο ἀναίσθητον πάσαις—περιπεφυκέναι, νοητὸν δ' εἶναι νῶ μόνῳ δὴ καὶ διανοήματι—where, as Ast was the first to remark, there is neither syntax nor sense. With regard to the transposition of τὸ παράπαν, it is required by the usual practice of Plato, who unites perpetually πᾶς with some of its adverbial derivatives, and so too he does καὶ δὴ καὶ: and while περιπεφυκεν ΔΙΑ might have been easily corrupted into περιπεφυκεν ΑΙ, where the compound διανόητον is better suited than the simple νοητὸν to the following διανοήματι, both the syntax and sense require rather ἂν εἶναι after ἑλπίς than εἶναι. Lastly, as regards διανόητον—νῶ μόνῳ, Ficinus found that very reading in his MS. as shown by his version—“idque genus cum nullo corporis sensu percipiatur, sola mente comprehenditur,” although less dependence than usual is to be placed here upon his translation, as he has omitted ἑλπίς πολλή—τὸ παράπαν and περιπεφυκέναι—Baiter too would unite νῶ μόνῳ with νοητὸν—

Clin. What methods?

Athen. That either, residing within this apparent circular body, it entirely carries along a thing of that kind, just as the soul within us carries us around every where; or that, by supplying somehow from without a body of fire or air, as the doctrine is of some persons, it violently impels body with body; or thirdly, that being itself destitute of body, yet possessing certain other powers pre-eminently wonderful, it leads the way.

¹ Clin. Yes, this is necessary, that a soul, by doing some one of these things, should lead through² all.

*Athen.*¹ ³ And this too is surely better,³ for every man to consider this very soul as a god,⁴ which, keeping together the Sun, as a well-reined car, brings a dancing light to all the universe, whether derived from without, or in whatever manner, or by whatever road. Or how shall we say?

Clin. Yes, (for every man) surely, who has not arrived at the extremity of silliness.

Athen. But with respect to all the stars, and the moon, and years, and months, and all the seasons, shall we give any other

³—³ I have translated as if the Greek were καὶ τοῦτό γ' ἦν ἄμεινον τὸ ταύτην, not αὐτοῦ δὴ ἄμεινον: to which Stephens was the first to object; for since ἄμεινον and χρεών could not both be found in the same sentence, one of them is superfluous. He did not however remark that αὐτὸς and its cases never begin a sentence, unless followed by μέν, δὲ, γάρ, or an enclitic.

account than this, that, since a soul, or souls, good in every virtue, are seen to be the causes of all these things, we will call them gods, whether they exist in bodies, as being animals, and put in order the whole of heaven, by whatever road or in whatever manner (they do so)? nor is there the person,¹ who, assenting to this, would endure (to say) that all things are not full of gods.²

Clin. ³ There is not, O guest, a person so insane.³

Athen. After assigning then limits to him, who at the former period conceived that gods do not exist, let us, Clinias and Megillus, free ourselves (from this person).

Clin. What (limits)?

Athen. Either that he is to teach us we do not speak rightly, in laying down that soul is the first generation of all things, and such other points as follow upon this; or, if he is unable to assert any thing better than we do, that he is to be persuaded by us, and live for the remainder of his life in the notion that gods do exist. Let us then see whether we have spoken sufficiently to those, who do not conceive that gods exist, or insufficiently.

Clin. Insufficiently, O guest, the least of all.

[10.] Athen. For these then let this be the end of our discourse. And let us thus ⁵ soothe him, who conceives that gods exist indeed, but take no care of human affairs. Let us then say, O thou best (of men),⁶ since you think there are gods, perhaps a certain divine relationship leads you to honour what is cognate, and to think it does exist; but the ⁷ (good) fortune ⁷ of

² This was the theory of Thales. See Aristot. Περὶ Ψυχῆς, i. 8, Diogenes Laert. i. 27, and Stobæus Ecl. Physic. Ast.

³⁻⁵ From the words of the original may be elicited an Iambic verse—Οὐκ ἔστιν οὕτως παραφρονῶν οὐδ' εἰς, ξένη.

⁶ Ficinus omits entirely ἐν τῷ πρόσθεν χρόνῳ. Taylor has “at present.”

⁷ Ficinus has “sic,” answering to ὥδε in Theodoretus. The word is wanting in all the MSS. of Plato.

⁷⁻⁷ Ficinus, whom Taylor follows, has “successus,” as if his MS. read εὐτυχίαι, not τύχαι.

evil and unjust men, both in private and public life, who, although not truly happy, yet are deemed to be very much so in common opinion, and are improperly hymned by the Muses, and in all kinds of compositions to boot, leads you not very sensibly¹ to impiety. Or perhaps, on seeing that impious old men, after arriving at their end, have left behind them grandchildren in the greatest honours, you are disturbed² for the present² in all these matters;³ or learning by hearsay, or perhaps being altogether an eye-witness,⁴ you have met with many and dreadful impieties, that have occurred to some, who through such very acts have arrived⁵ from small means at despotic power and the greatest (state).⁶ On account of all such events, you would then evidently be unwilling to blame the gods as the causes of such things, through your relationship with them; but at the same time being led by a want of reason, and unable to feel an ill-will towards the gods, you have arrived at your present state, so as to think that they do indeed exist, but that they despise and neglect the affairs of men. In order then that your present opinion may not⁷

¹ I have translated as if the Greek were μάλ' οὐκ ἐμμελῶς, not ἀλλ' οὐκ ἐμμελῶς—Ficinus has "temere," without ἀλλ'—

²⁻² In lieu of τὰ νῦν, Plato evidently wrote τι νοῦν—remembering the expression in Sophocles Ced. T. 473, Δεινὰ με νοῦν δεινὰ ταρασσει σοφὸς οἰωνοθέτας—for so we must read in lieu of Δεινὰ μὲν οὖν—which every editor of the dramatist has hitherto failed to correct; while from ὅταν, which Eusebius has after ὅταν, Stephens elicited ὦ' τὰν, with the approbation of Ruhnken on Timæus, p. 281. But as Ficinus has "valde turbaris," perhaps he found in his MS. ἄγαν instead of ὅταν; and in that case I should prefer ἄγαν τι νοῦν—For this ἄγαν τι is similar to πάνν τι in Phileb. p. 63, B., and in Athenæus xiii. p. 555, A., and the other passages quoted by D'Orville on Chariton V. 4, p. 477, ed. Lips.

³⁻³ The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus, and after him by Taylor.

⁴⁻⁴ Ficinus has "audistis fortassis aut etiam ipse vidisti." For he found in his MS. ἴσως δὲ δι' ἀκοῆς αἰσθόμενος ἢ καὶ αὐτόπτης προστυχῶν, not ἰδὼν ἢ δι' ἀκοῆς αἰσθόμενος ἢ καὶ παντάπασιν αὐτὸς αὐτόπτης προστυχῶν, where ἰδὼν αὐτὸς is evidently an explanation of αὐτόπτης—Cousin however says that the common reading "est irréprochable et même élégante."

⁵ For the sake of the syntax, it is evident that we must read τισι—ἀφικομένοις, not ἀφικομένως.

⁶⁻⁶ Ficinus, followed by Taylor, has what is more elegant, "ex re parva in magnam et ex infimo gradu ad tyrannidem."

draw you in the direction of impiety to greater suffering, but that¹ we may be able, as it were, to send it away,² while advancing (like a disease), by reasonings, let us endeavour to unite the reasoning next in order, with that, which we went through from the beginning, against the party, who held that gods did not exist at all, and to make use of it for the present. And do you, Megillus and Clinias, in succession, answer for the young man, as you did before; and if in our reasonings any thing difficult occurs, I will, as I did just now, take hold of you and cause you to pass the river.

Clin. You speak correctly. And do you act in this manner, and we will, to the best of our power, do as you say.

*Megil.*³ But, perhaps, it would not be difficult to prove this at least, that the gods are no less attentive to small things than to such as are pre-eminent in greatness. For I surely⁴ heard and was present⁴ during what was just now said, that they are good and possess every virtue, and have a care peculiarly their own of all things.

Clin. And I too heard it very distinctly.

Athen. Let us then after this search out in common thus, by speaking of what virtue of theirs do we acknowledge that they are good. Come then, to be temperate, we say, and to possess a mind, (belongs) to virtue, but their contraries to vice.

Clin. We say so.

where interchanged, as I have shown in Poppo's Prolegom. p. 234, and to the passages there quoted I could add not a few more.

¹ I have translated as if the Greek were ἀλλ' ἵνα, not ἀλλ' ἕδν, to which Ast was the first to object.

⁴ Plato has here, as elsewhere, adopted an ὕστερον πρότερον. Ficinus therefore, designedly perhaps, abridged the whole passage in his version, "præsertim cum paulo ante dictum fuerit, eos omni virtute refertos providentiam omnium sibi propriam vindicare."

Athen. And that fortitude (belongs) to virtue, and cowardice to vice.

Clin. Entirely so.

Athen. And shall we say that some of these are base, and others honourable?

Clin. Of necessity.

Athen. And shall we say that of such things those, that are vile, if (vile) they are,¹ belong to us; but that to gods there is no share in aught that is great or small amongst things of this kind?

Clin. And this too every one would acknowledge.

Athen. What then, shall we place carelessness, and idleness, and luxuriousness, as belonging to the virtue of soul? Or how do you say?

Clin. How can we?

Athen. But belonging to the contrary?

Clin. Yes.

Athen. The contraries therefore to these belong to that which is contrary.

Clin. To that which is contrary.

Athen. What then, would a person luxurious, and careless, and idle, whom the poet² says is most like the bees without a sting, be³ wholly of such a kind amongst us?³

Clin. ⁴Having spoken most correctly.⁴

Athen. It must not then be said, that a god has a habit of ¹ On the ellipse in εἴπερ Ast refers to ii. § 10.

³⁻³ The Greek is ὁ τοιοῦτος πᾶσιν ἡμῖν. But four MSS. acknowledge πᾶς, adopted by Stalbaum; who confesses however the passage to be corrupt, nor is it clear how it ought to be corrected. Ficinus has—"nonne odio nobis habetur"—as if his MS. read γίγνοι' ἂν στύγητος in lieu of γίγνοι' ἂν ὁ τοιοῦτος—Hence, if we read πᾶς ἐν ἡμῖν likewise, we shall probably have what Plato wrote, unless we adopt Winckelmann's—ὁ τοιοῦτος πᾶσι νεμεσητός, got from the words in Hesiod, Τῷ γε θεοὶ νεμεσῶσι.

⁴⁻⁴ To make something like sense out of these words, Ficinus, who is followed by Taylor, translated—"Rectissime profecto poeta ille cecinit." But the question is not whether Hesiod said what was correct or not, but what any one else would say. Hence I suspect the true reading to be 'Ορθότατα ταῦτά γε ὁ εἰπὼν εἶποι ἂν; i. e. "He who says so, would say so most correctly." For ταῦτα might easily have dropt out after 'Ορθότατα, and εἶποι ἂν after εἰπὼν. With regard to the formula, perpetual in Plato, see Ast on iii. p. 682, and myself on Criton, § 8, n. 10. And to the passages there quoted I could now add full twenty more.

such a kind that he himself hates it; nor must we overlook it, when a person attempts to say so much.

Clin. By no means. For how could it (be said) ?

Athen. But of him, to whom it belongs pre-eminently to do, and to take care of, any thing, does the mind take care of great things, but neglect small? (And)¹ shall we not do wrong entirely in the case of a person by praising such an assertion? But let us view the matter in this way. Does not he, who acts so,² whether a god or a man, so act according to two kinds (of acting)?

Clin. What two?

Athen. We will tell (you).³ Either because he thinks it of no consequence to the whole, when the small are neglected; or, if it is of consequence, he does through indolence and luxuriousness (knowingly) disregard them.⁴ Or does negligence take place in any other way? For surely, when it is impossible to take care of all things, there will not then be a neglect of things small, or great, in the case of the party not taking care of what⁵ either a god may be wanting in power or some trifling person unable to take care.⁵

Clin. How not?⁶

[11.] Athen. Now then let those two, who, although they both confess that there are gods, yet one (says) they are easy to be turned aside, and the other that they neglect matters of small moment, give an answer to us three. Do ye both assert, first that the gods know, and see, and hear all things, and that no-

¹ I have with Taylor inserted "and," as if καὶ had dropt out before κατὰ—

² i. e. neglects the small.

³ Ficinus omits λέγομεν: which Stephens and all subsequent editors assign to Clinias on the authority of Eusebius. But in that case Plato would have written λέγεις, or λέγοιμεν ἄν;

⁴ In ὁ δὲ, to which Stephens justly objects, lies hid εἰδῶς—or, since Ficinus has "pigritia mollitieque detentus"—ἀλούς—a word elsewhere corrupted, as I have shown on Æsch. Prom. 918.

⁵ The Greek is—δυνάμει θεὸς ἢ φαῦλός τις, ὧν ἑλληνικῆς καὶ μὴ δυνατὸς ἐπιμελεῖσθαι γίγνηται. The version of Ficinus—"sive homo quidam sit impotens, sive deus aliquis non posse fingatur"—who either found in his MS. or else wished to read—ἢ ἄνθρωπος τις—δυνάμει φαῦλος ἢ θεός τις μὴ δυνατὸς ἐπιμελεῖσθαι λέγεται. I have translated as if Plato wrote ἢ δυνάμει θεὸς ὧν ἑλληνικῆς, ἢ καὶ—φαῦλός τις μὴ δυνατὸς— thing of what there is a perception or knowledge can lie hid from them? Dò ye say that such is the case? Or how?

Clin. That it is such.

Athen. What then, that they are able to do all things over which there is a power to mortals and immortals?

Clin. How will they not agree that such too is the case?

Athen. We five then have agreed that the gods are good and the best.

Clin. Entirely.

Athen. Is it not, then, impossible to confess that they do at all any thing whatever through indolence and luxuriousness, since they are such as we confess they are? For with us inactivity is the offspring of cowardice, but indolence of inactivity and luxuriousness.

Clin. You speak most truly.

Athen. Now of gods not one is negligent through inactivity and indolence; for in cowardice surely they have no share.

Clin. You speak most correctly.

Athen. It remains then that, if they neglect things of little moment and size of those in the universe, they would do so either through their knowing that there is no need of taking care of things of this kind; ¹or—what remains but to think the contrary?¹

Clin. Nothing.

Athen. Whether then, O thou ²most excellent and best of men,² shall we put you down, as saying that (the gods) are ignorant, and through their ignorance neglect, when they ought to take care; or that, knowing what is proper, they do just as the weakest of mankind are said ³to do, when they know

²—³ I confess myself quite incompetent to understand, much less to explain, the difference between ἀριστε and βέλτιστε. Ficinus has merely "O vir eximie."

there are other things better to be done¹ than what they are really doing, they do not do them through some failure, arising from pleasure or pain.

Clin. But how could there be ignorance?²

Athen. Do not human affairs partake of a nature endued with soul? and at the same time is not man of all animals the most pious towards the gods?³

Clin. It appears so.

Athen. Now we assert that all mortal animals are the property of gods, to whom belongs⁴ the whole of heaven.

Clin. How not?

Athen. Let then any one say that these things are to the gods either small or great, (it matters not);⁵ for on neither ground would it be fitting for our owners, who are the most careful and the best, to neglect us. For let us, in addition to these points, consider still further this.

Clin. What?

Athen. Respecting sensation and power, are they not naturally contrary to each other, with reference to easiness and difficulty?

Clin. How say you?

Athen. To see and hear small things is more difficult than large. But on the other hand, to carry, and to rule over, and to take care of, small and few things, is for every one more easy than in the case of their contraries.

Clin. Yes, more easy.

¹ I have taken ποιεῖν in a passive sense after βελτίω, remembering a similar expression, Ῥῆων φυλάσσειν for φυλάσσεισθαι, in Med. 320. Ficinus, it would seem, not aware of this, and remembering the passage in Ovid, has given this version, "An sicut improbos homines dicimus meliora quidem videre, sed voluptate aut dolore fractos deteriora sequi, sic deos, quamvis sciant providendum esse, similiter non providere."

² Instead of ἀν, one of the best MSS. read ἀνία, which evidently leads to ἀν ἄγνοια εἶη—and so I have translated. For otherwise ἀν would have nothing to which it could be referred.

³ Compare a similar sentiment in Menexen. § 7.

⁵ So Ast supplies the ellipse before γὰρ—of which Ficinus not being aware, thus renders, "Jam ergo, seu parva hæc sive magna quis dixerit diis esse, nullo modo, cum providentissimi atque optimi sint, negligenda sibi sua possessio est—" which Taylor has for the most part adopted.

Athen. But when the whole of a thing is enjoined upon a physician, both willing and able to cure, will the whole itself¹ ever be in a good state, while he is taking care of great matters, but neglecting parts that are small?

Clin. By no means.

Athen. Nor will things many and large, apart from the few and small, ²(be in a good state)² in the case of pilots, or army-leaders, or housekeepers, nor, ³on the other hand, of some³ statesmen, or any other person of such a kind. For masons say, that great stones do not lie well without small ones.⁴

Clin. ⁵For how (is it possible)?

Athen. We will not then think it right⁵ for a god at least to be even more vile than mortal artificers; who, the better they are, by so much the more do they from one art bring out accurately and perfectly the works small and great, pertaining to their own trade; but that a god, who is most wise, and both willing and able to take care of things, does of things which, being small, it is easy to take care of, take no care at all, like a person inactive or timid, or listless through labour, but only of things that are large.⁶

Clin. Let us by no means, O guest, receive this notion, respecting the gods; for we should form a conception neither holy nor true.

Athen. We seem then, to myself, to have conversed in a very moderate manner with him who loves to find fault with the carelessness on the part of the gods.

⁴ Donaldson in The New Cratylus, p. 551, ed. 1, compares very aptly Soph. Aj. 158, Καίτοι μικροὶ μεγάλων χωρὶς Σφαλερὸν πύργου ῥῦμα πέλονται. Μετὰ γὰρ μεγάλων βαυὼς ἀριστ' ἄν, Καὶ μέγας ὀρθοῖθ' ὑπὸ μικροτέρων. He did not however perceive that in the words of Plato there probably lies hid a proverbial hexameter—Οὐ γὰρ ἀνεμὶ μικρῶν μεγάλους κείσθ' ἐστὶ λίθους εὖ.

⁵—⁵ The Greek is Πῶς γὰρ ἄν; Μὴ τοίνυν—ἀξιῶμεν— But there is nothing to which ἄν can be referred; and moreover μή—ἀξιῶμεν is rather doubtful Greek. To meet the latter difficulty, we might read ἀξιῶμεν with Theodoretus in Therap. Serm. vi. p. 570, B., or—Οὐ μὴ τοίνυν ἀξιῶμεν—which last word is found in one of the best MSS.

⁶ The aposiopesis is to be supplied from the next speech of Clinias.

Clin. Certainly.

Athen. By forcing him through our reasoning to confess that he does not speak correctly. He seems however to myself to be still in want of enchantments by certain words.¹

Clin. Of what kind, my good man?

[12.] Athen. Let us persuade the young man by our reasonings, that by him, who takes care of the universe, with a view to the safety and excellence of the whole, every thing has been arranged, each part of which, as far as possible, suffers and acts what is suited to it; and that over each of these parts rulers have been appointed with reference to even the smallest portion of action and passion,² having worked out an end to the ultimate distribution;³ of which parts, even thy portion, O miserable man, is one, and although it is very small, it is continually stretching its view to the whole. But this very thing has lain hid from you, that all generation is for the sake of the whole, in order that the existence of the universe may be happy in its life, and not for the sake of you; but that you exist for the sake of the universe. For every physician, and every skilful handicraftsman, works out all things for the sake of the whole, stretching (his view)³ to that which is the best, taken in common; and he fashions a part for the sake of the whole, and not the whole for the sake of a part.⁴ But you take it ill, through not knowing that what is best with respect to yourself, happens both to the universe and yourself, according to the power of a common generation. But since a soul, connected⁵ at one time with one body and at another with

^{2—2} Such is the literal translation of the Greek, which Stalbaum conceives to be corrupt; and so too does Ast; for he proposes to read τελείως in lieu of τέλος: but I confess I cannot see what is gained by the change. Ficinus has what is intelligible indeed, but not to be got from the Greek at present—"per singulas et extremas universi particulas distributione, ad ultimum usque peracta, curam habent"—as if his MS. read καὶ μερισμὸν τοῦ ὅλου τελίως τίς τὸ ἔσχατον ἀπειργασμένοι, i. e. "and working out a distribution of the universe perfectly to its extreme point."

⁴ Of this passage in Plato Horace had perhaps a recollection, when he wrote his remark—"Infelix operis summæ, quia ponere totum Nescit."

⁵ In lieu of συντεταγμένη one would prefer συμπεπηγμένη— another, undergoes all kinds of changes through itself, or through some other soul, nothing else remains for the player at pebbles¹ than to place the habit, which has become better, into a better place, but the worse into a worse, according to the proper condition of each, in order that they may obtain their fitting allotment.

Clin. In what way do you mean?

Athen. I appear to myself to be speaking in that way, by which an inactivity on the part of the gods in taking care of all things would seem to have a reason. For if any one, always looking to the whole, were to mould all things by changing their forms—for instance, water² with a soul³ from fire, and either³ many things from one or one from many—participating in a first, or second, or even a third generation, the things relating to an altered arrangement would be infinite in number. But now there is a wonderful easiness to the party taking a care of the universe.

Clin. How again, say you?

Athen. Thus. After our king had seen all his actions, possessing a soul,⁴ and much of virtue existing in them, and much of vice, and both soul and body being a thing⁵ indestructible, ¹ The game called περρεία I have supposed to be something similar to the modern backgammon. But Ficinus has here “harum rerum ordinatori, tanquam talos jacenti,” from which it is easy to elicit, what the sense requires, ἔργον, ὅλον περρεύει, αὐτῇ (i. e. ψυχῇ) λείπεται— With regard to the metaphor, in addition to the authors quoted here by Ast, may be added those, of which I have given a list on Æsch. Suppl. 14, to be still increased by as many more.

but not eternal,⁵ like the gods, existing according to law,¹ for there never would have been a generation of living beings, if either of these (soul or body) had been destroyed,—and that the thing which, as being² a good in the soul, has been thought to be always naturally disposed to be of service, but that the thing which, as being an evil in it, (has been thought) to do mischief,—all this, when (the king) beheld, he planned, where each of the parts should be situated, and cause virtue to gain the victory in the universe,³ and vice to suffer a defeat, in the easiest⁴ and best manner. He planned therefore generally⁵ this, how a thing, being generated of what kind, what seat it ever ought to share in,⁶ and in what place⁷ reside; but he left to the will of each of us the causes of generation of⁸ this or that.⁸ ⁹For wherever a person has a desire, and of what kind he may be as to his soul, there nearly on each occasion, and such becomes each of us, for the most part.⁹

² I have adopted, what Stephens suggested, ὥς ὃν for ὅσον, which I cannot understand. Cousin says that ὥς ὃν means the same as ὅσον.

³ In lieu of τῷ one MS. has αὐτῷ; which seems to lead to some other reading.

⁴ On the doubled superlative μάλιστα ῥῆστα, see Monk on Hippol. 487

⁵ Ficinus has "ad universum," as if his MS. read πρὸς τὸ πᾶν, translated by Taylor, "with reference to the universe," and by Ast, "universi rationibus convenientem—" And hence we can avoid the impropriety in τὸ ποῖόν τι—by reading πρὸς τὸ πᾶν τοῦτο, ποῖόν τι—

⁶ Ficinus has "sortiri," as if his MS. read μεταλαγχάνειν—

⁷ I hardly understand here the difference between ἵδραν and τόπους: for where the seat is, there also will be the place. Ficinus has "sedem habitationemque—"

⁹ Such is the literal version of the Greek, out of which I must leave for others to make what sense they can. I am quite in the dark. In lieu of ὁποῖός τις ὦν Theodoretus has, what Ast adopts, ὁποῖος ἂν ᾖ, similar to "qualisque animus sit" in Ficinus; while from "ferme semper habitat" in the same version, Cornarius elicited σχεδὸν ἐκάστοτε οἰκίζεται. Lastly ἀπας ἡμῶν is omitted there, as being considered perhaps perfectly useless.

Clin. It is likely.

Athen. Every thing then, that has a share of soul, is changed, and possesses in itself the cause of the change; but, when changed, it is borne along according to the order and law of fate. And ¹of the manners such as being changed are less and less (wicked),¹ proceed along the superficies of the region;² but those that are more (changed) and are more unjust, fall into a depth, and into the so-called places below, which persons, designating by the name of Hades, and what are close upon these appellations, greatly fear, and dream of, when living ³and freed from their bodies; but the soul when it partakes more of vice than of virtue through its will and intercourse becoming strong, when mixing with divine virtue, it becomes pre-eminently such, and it is changed to a pre-eminent place entirely holy, after being carried to some other better place; but when the contrary, it transfers its life to the contrary.³

O thou ² boy and youth,² who thinkest that thou art neglected by the gods; for that the person, who has become more wicked, departs to the more wicked souls; but he, who has become better, to the better, both in life, and in all³ deaths, to suffer and do what is fitting for the like⁴ to do to the like.

consuetudine vehementius permutata, divinæ virtuti adhæsit, talisque præcipue facta est, in locum similiter longe meliorem sanctumque transfertur; quæ vero contrario modo affecta est, in contrarium translata vitam peragit suam." But as Eusebius offers διαλυθέντες δὲ σωμάτων, properly opposed to ζῶντες— I suspect that Plato wrote to this effect, διαλυθέντες δὲ τῶν σωμάτων μείζω δεδίασιν, ἢ ψυχὴ κακίας ἢ ἀρετῆς πλείον ὅταν μεταλάβῃ διὰ τῆς αὐτῆς βούλησιν καὶ ὁμιλίαν γενομένην ἰσχυράν καὶ αἰσχροὺς ὅταν δ' αὖ μένῃ ἀρετῇ θείᾳ προσμίζασα, γίγνεται διαφερόντως αἰσχυρὰ, διαφερόντως καὶ, εἰς τόπον ἁγίων ὅλον μετακομισθεῖσα, εἰς ἀμείνω μετέβαλιν' ὅταν δὲ τάναντία ποιῇ, κατὰ τάναντία μεθιδρύσαστο εἰς τινα τόπον ἀνιερὸν τὸν αὐτῆς βίον: i. e. "But after being freed from their bodies they have a greater fear, when the soul shall have participated in more of vice than virtue, through its will and converse (in life) having become violent and base. But when on the other hand it shall remain, having an intercourse with divine virtue, it becomes such (i. e. divine) pre-eminently; and pre-eminently, after being conveyed to a place entirely holy, it is changed for the better; but when it acts in a contrary manner, it has, under contrary circumstances, placed its existence in some unholy spot." To produce however this light out of darkness, it was requisite to alter the position of some words, and to change δε δὴ into δεδίασιν, and οποταν into πλεον οταν, and οποταν μιν into οταν μιν, and γίγνεται into γίγνεται, and διαφερόντα into διαφερόντως, and ἐπὶ τάναντία into ποιῇ κατὰ τάναντία; and τοπον ἕτερον into τοπον ανιερων; and lastly, on the authority of Eusebius, μεθιδρύσασα into μεθιδρύσαστο, which Stephens was the first to point out and approve. With regard to μείζω δεδίασι, this is evidently required as a climax to the preceding σφόδρα φοβούνται—and so too both ἰσχυράν and αἰσχροὺς are required by βούλησιν and ὁμιλίαν: and διαφερόντως καὶ by the preceding διαφερόντως: and lastly, τόπον ανιερων to balance τόπον ἁγιων: by the aid of which it is easy to see that in § 13, where all the MSS. read ἀγιώτερον—τόπον, contrary to the sense, except that of Ficinus, which seems to have had ἀπώτερον, answering to his "remotiorem," as remarked by Stephens, Plato probably wrote ἀνιερώτερον— Neither of these corrections would however meet with the approbation of Winckelmann, if he still adheres to his proposed reading, τόπον ἄλλον in lieu of τόπον ἁγιων ὅλον—

³ This "all" seems rather strange here, as if the question were about many kinds of death.

⁴ From προσφέρουσι in Ald. Cornarius elicited προσφέρῃσι, by the aid of "a similibus ad similes" in Ficinus. And so all the MSS. subsequently

But neither must you or any one else¹ pray, after becoming fortunate,² to be superior to this judgment of the gods. For this judgment, pre-eminent above all, did those, who ordained, ordain, and it is meet to regard it carefully in every way. For you will never be neglected by it,³ not though you were so small, as to sink into the depths of the earth, nor so lofty, as to fly up to heaven;³ but you will suffer from them the fitting punishment, whether you abide here, or depart to Hades, or are carried to a place still more wild⁴ than those. And my language will be the same to you, as it was respecting those persons, whom you have seen becoming great after being small, and whom, after committing unholy acts,⁵ [or doing something of that kind,]⁵ you thought had become happy after being miserable. And then you conceived that you beheld in their doings, as in a mirror, the disregard of all things on the part of the gods, nor did you know in what way they pay up the full amount of their contribution to every one;⁶ and to know that, think you, O most courageous of all men, is a thing of no consequence?⁷ which he who is ignorant of, will neither see a type of life, nor be able to contribute a discourse about it on the subject of happiness or an unhappy fortune. If then Clinias here, and the whole of this old assembly,⁸ are able to persuade you that you do not know what you are saying about the gods, a god himself will kindly give you his aid; but if collated. Eusebius has however προσφύσι. But even there some MS. probably reads προσφέρεισι—

² I have adopted εὐτυχής, found in the three best MSS., in lieu of ἀτυχής, through the usual change of εὐ and α, as I have shown on Eurip. Tro. 606. Ficinus too found εὐτυχής, as shown by his version, "adeo felicem." Eusebius however acknowledges ἀτυχής.

³ On this sentiment, Ast refers to Dorville on Chariton, p. 665, and Wytenbach in Biblioth. Crit. iii. iv. p. 37.

⁴ Ficinus has "remotiorem inaccessibilemque," as if he had found in his MS. ἀπώτερον καὶ ἄβατον— But see just before in § 12.

⁵ The words between the brackets are omitted by Ficinus, and after him by Taylor. They are certainly superfluous.

⁶ I have translated as if the Greek were παντί τῷ, not τῷ παντί—for the allusion to the universe would be here out of place.

⁷ I have adopted πρὸς οὐδέν, found in Eusebius, in lieu of πῶς οὐ δεῖν— Winckelmann suggests πῶς οὐ πολλοῦ δεῖν δοκεῖς;

⁸ Instead of γερουσία, Plato probably wrote γερῶτα, for such was the Spartan word.

you are still in want of a further reason, hear us, if you possess any mind whatever, while we are speaking to the third party. For that there are gods, and that they take care of men, I would say has been not altogether badly shown by us. But that the gods can be turned aside by receiving gifts from those who act unjustly, must not be conceded to any one; but on the other hand, disproved by every means in our power.

Clin. You speak most beautifully; and let us do as you say.

Athen. Come, then, by the gods themselves, (say) if forsooth¹ they are turned aside in what manner are they so moved; and who and what kind of beings are they? Now it is surely necessary for those to be rulers, who regulate continually the whole of heaven.

Clin. It is so.

Athen. But to what rulers are they like? or what rulers are like to them ²amongst such as it is in our power to meet with, while likening the less to the greater?² Would such be either the rein-holders, while two-yoked cars are contending (in the course), or the pilots of ships? Perhaps however they may be likened to certain leaders of armies. Or it would be possible to liken them to physicians, who have a prudent care respecting the war of diseases³ about bodies; or to husbandmen, who, in fear for the generation of plants, wait for the usual period of bad seasons; or to the superintendents of herds. For, since we have agreed amongst ourselves that heaven is full of many good things, and that there are some of the opposite kind, but the majority is of those that are not,⁴ we assert that a war of this kind is immortal, and requires a wonderful watching. The gods however, and at the same time dæmons, fight on our side; for⁵ we are the property both of ¹ In lieu of αὖ, which has no meaning here, Plato wrote, what I have translated, δὴ, taken in its usual ironical sense.

² Such is the literal version of the Greek. Ficinus, whom Taylor follows to the letter, has "ut possibile nobis sit minores majoribus comparare," as if he had found in his MS. ὡς δυνατόν ἢ ἡμῖν ἀπεικάζειν μείζουσιν ἐλάττωνας, in lieu of ἀπεικάζουσι τυγχάνειν.

³ Although the expression νόσων πόλεμον might perhaps stand, yet I should have preferred νόσων πολὺν ἔσμον—similar to νόσων ἔσμος in Æsch. Suppl. 677, and "morborum cohors," in Horace. Winckelmann suggests νόσους διὰ πόνων, referring to πόνους Νούσων τὲ, in Hesiod Epy. 91.

⁴ Ast would supply ἀγαθῶν after μή—

gods and dæmons. But injustice and insolence together with imprudence corrupt us; whereas justice and temperance, united to prudence, which dwell in the soul-endued powers of the gods, preserve us. Now that some little portion of such properties resides in us, one may clearly see even in this way. Certain souls residing on the earth, and possessing an unjust disposition,¹ it is plain, have a savage feeling towards the souls of their guardians, whether dogs, or shepherds, or in every respect the highest of all rulers. (And)² falling upon these, they persuade them³ by flattering words, and some prayer-like enchantments³—as say the reports of the wicked—that it is lawful for them to possess a superfluity of power amongst men, and not to suffer anything. Now this superfluity, what is now denominated a sin, we surely say is called, in the case of fleshly bodies, a disease; in that of the seasons of the year,⁴ a pestilence; and in that of cities and polities, by giving again to this very word a change, injustice.

Clin. Entirely so.

Athen. Such a reasoning as this it is, therefore, necessary for him to state, who asserts that the gods always pardon men⁵ unjust and acting unjustly,⁵ should any one offer a part of his unjust gains, just as wolves⁶ give a small portion of their ¹ I have adopted λήμα, suggested by Ast, in lieu of λήμμα, which Dorville on Chariton, p. 87, vainly identifies with λήμα. See Valckenaer on Ammonius, p. 87.

²⁻³ The Greek is προσπίπτουσαι πείθουσι—But no person, who wishes to persuade another, would think of making a violent attack upon him. Nor can προσπίπτουσαι be rendered "falling down to" in an attitude of prayer, as applied to souls. There is then, evidently, some error in προσπίπτουσαι. But since προσπίπτουσαι suits sufficiently well with θηριώδεις, one would say that the error is in πείθουσι, were it not that πείθουσι suits equally well with θωπείαις λόγων. Hence to avoid either dilemma, perhaps Plato wrote δῆλον ὅτι, εἰ θηριώδεις εἰσὶ—δεσπότων, ὅμως πλάθουσι προστρέπουσαι—i. e. it is plain that, even if they are savage—they still approach them and beg of them by flattering words—that it may be lawful—

⁵⁻⁵ Ficinus unable, no doubt, as I am, to see the difference between ἀδίκους and ἀδικούσιν, has merely "injustis," adopted by Taylor.

⁶⁻⁶ By this passage may perhaps be understood the λυκοφιλία alluded to in Epist. iii. p. 318, E.

plunder to dogs,⁶ who, being softened down by gifts, allow them to seize upon the sheep. Is not this the assertion of those who say that the gods are easily turned aside?

Clin. It is this.

[14.] Athen. To which then of the aforesaid guardians would any man ¹by likening the gods ¹not become a laughing-stock? Is it to pilots, who turned aside

²By wine-libations and the scent of fat,² destroy both the ships and the sailors?

Clin. By no means.

Athen. Nor yet to charioteers, who, when drawn up in order for contest, are induced by a bribe to give up the victory to the other two-yoked cars.

Clin. For in speaking such a speech you would speak of a dreadful likeness.

Athen. Nor yet to army-leaders, nor to physicians, nor to husbandmen, nor to shepherds, nor to certain dogs softened down by wolves.

Clin. Speak good words. For how could³ (a person, by so likening them, not be a laughing-stock)?

Athen. But are not all the gods the greatest of all guardians, and over the greatest affairs?

Clin. Very much so.

Athen. Shall we then say that those, who watch over the most beautiful things, and over ⁴themselves pre-eminently,⁴ with a guard as respects virtue, are worse than dogs, and men of a moderate kind, who would never betray justice for the sake of bribes⁵ given in an unholy manner from unjust men?

Clin. By no means—such an assertion is not to be borne; and of those, ⁶who are engaged in every kind of impiety,⁶ he

²—² Plato had in mind l. A. 500.

³ After δὲν is to be supplied ἀπεικάζων καταγέλαστος οὐ γίγνεται, from a preceding speech of the Athenian.

⁵ Instead of δώρων, “gifts,” one would have expected rather δωρεῶν, “bribes,” as I have translated.

⁶—⁶ The words between the numerals here, or between those at ‘—’, who lays hold of this opinion runs the risk surely of being most justly adjudged to be ⁷ of all impious persons ⁷ the worst and most impious.

Athen. Let us say, then, that the three subjects proposed, namely, that the gods exist and have a care of (all things),¹ and that they are not to be drawn aside (by entreaties) contrary to what is just, have been demonstrated sufficiently.

Clin. How not? and we give our votes together in favour of these reasonings.

Athen. The arguments have however been somehow stated with greater vehemence through the love of contention in bad men. But, friend Clinias, this love of contention has been indulged in on this account, that wicked persons may not imagine that, by being the masters in words, they have a licence to do what they please, (according to)^{2 3} what and of what magnitude and of what kind³ they conceive of the gods. There has then arisen a readiness on this account, to speak in rather a novel⁴ manner. But if we have done even a little of moment towards persuading somehow the (three)⁵ men to hate themselves and to love manners quite the reverse, the prelude to the laws relating to impiety will have been spoken by us to a good purpose.

Clin. There is a hope at least; but should (the event be) not so, this kind of discourse will bring no blame upon the lawgiver.

[15.] Athen. After the prelude, then, such a discourse as is the interpreter of the laws, would follow⁶ correctly, pro-are evidently an interpolation. They are omitted in the former place by Ficinus, whom Taylor does, and Ast would, follow. They ought rather to be omitted in the latter. For we find in § 15, περὶ δόξιν διὰ τῶν ὄντων. But in both passages Plato wrote, I suspect, ἰόντων. For εἶναι περὶ τι is scarcely correct Greek.

¹ Ficinus, followed by Taylor, alone has "omnium."

² The syntax and sense show that καθ' has dropt out before δ— Hence Taylor has "conformably to—"

³⁻³ Ficinus has merely "et qualiacunque adversus deos," as if his MS. read καὶ ὅλα πρὸς θεοῦς— in lieu of δὲ καὶ ὅσα καὶ ὅλα περὶ θεοῦς— Cousin would omit δὲ καὶ and read διανοεῖσθαι.

⁴ On account of σφοδρότερον just before, perhaps νεωτέρως means here "rather like a young man."

⁶ So Taylor after Ficinus, who found no doubt ἔκαστο in his MS., an-claiming to all impious persons, that they must stand apart from their depraved manners, and (betake themselves) to such as are pious. But against those, who are not persuaded, let this be the law relating to impiety. If any one is impious in word or deed, let any one who happens to be present repel him by giving information to the magistrates; and let the magistrate, who first hears of it, bring, according to law, the party before the court of justice appointed for such matters. But if any magistrate, on hearing of it, does not act so, let him be accused of impiety by any one, who is willing to be the avenger on behalf of the laws. And if any one is convicted, let the court of justice fix a fine against each person¹ for each act of impiety. And let a prison in the case of all be assigned, since² there are three prisons in the city; one in common for the generality of crimes committed about the Market-place, for the sake of safety to the majority of persons; another by the spot, where meetings take place at night, and which has the name of the House of Correction; and another in the middle of the country, where the locality is most solitary and wild,³ and⁴ having as an appellation of punishment some ill name.⁴

⁵ There being respecting impiety three causes which we have swering to his "sequitur." Stalbaum however defends γίγνοιτο, and refers to his small edition of the Euthyph. p. 5, C.

¹ I have adopted Winckelmann's ἐνὶ ἐκάστῳ in lieu of ἐν ἐκάστῳ.

² To avoid τὸ ἀσύνδετον, Stephens suggested, what Ast has adopted, γὰρ δὲ: but Plato wrote rather ἄτε, as I have translated.

³ Ficinus renders ἀγχιώτατος incorrectly by "silvestris."

gone through; and since from each of such-like causes two are produced, there will be six kinds of crimes against the gods; which, ¹as being worthy of a distinction,¹ require neither an equal nor a similar punishment. For to him, who may think that gods do not exist at all, there may be a naturally just habit (of mind); and such become the haters of the wicked; and through their bearing ill with injustice, they do not give themselves up to committing actions of that kind, and they avoid the unjust, and love the just. ²But upon whom, in addition to their opinion that all things are destitute of the gods, there falls a want of self-control in pleasures and pains, and to whom there is present a strong memory and a quickness in learning, the notion that gods do not exist, would be one circumstance common to both; but in the mischief done to the rest of mankind, one effects less of evil, the other more;³ for the one would in word be full of a freedom of speech on the subject of the gods, and about sacrifices and oaths, and, laughing at the others, he would perhaps render the rest like himself, should he not meet with punishment. But the other, who thinks as the former does, is called by the vulgar clever,³ but is full of fraud and stratagem;⁴ from whom many diviners are produced, and such as are excited⁵ with respect to every kind of witchcraft; and sometimes, too, from them are produced tyrants, and mob-orators, and army-leaders; and those, who plot against⁶ private mysteries,⁷ and with the plans of men called sophists. Of these indeed there are many species. But two of them are worthy of legislation; one of which the ironic⁸

²—² Such is the literal version of the Greek, which I confess I do not understand; nor could, I think, Ficinus; who has in the last clause, what Taylor has adopted to the letter, "in hoc autem differunt, quod, ceteris hominibus ille minus, hic plus, nocet."

⁴ Literally "ambush," in Greek ἐνέδρας, which is strangely applied here to the mind of a man.

⁵ Winckelmann reads καὶ τὰ περὶ τὴν—κεκτημένοι, referring to ii. p. 635, D.

⁶ Such is the exact meaning of ἐπιβεβουλευκότες. But the sense seems to require "plot against others with their own private mysteries—"

⁸ I confess I cannot understand what Plato means by ειρωνικόν here.

errs in a way to deserve not one or two deaths, (but more);¹ but the other requires admonition and bonds. In like manner the notion that the gods are careless, produces two errors; and that they are easily turned aside, another two. Of these persons, so placed apart, such as have become so through folly, without a vicious frowardness and manners, let the judge² appointed by law,³ put into the House of Correction, for not less than five years; and during that time, let no one of the citizens converse with them, except those, who participating in the assembly by night,⁴ associate for the purpose of admonition and the safety of the soul. And when the period of their imprisonment expires, if any one amongst them appears to be modestly behaved, let him dwell together with the modest; but if not, and he is again convicted on such a suit, let him pay the penalty of death. But such as, in addition to their believing that gods do not exist, or that they are careless, or easily turned aside, become brute-like, and despising mankind, allure the souls of many while living, and pretend they can allure too the souls of the dead, and promise they can⁵ persuade the gods, as bewitching them with sacrifices, and prayers, and incantations,⁶ and who endeavour by these means to destroy utterly individuals and whole families and cities, for the sake of their property; amongst these whoever shall be deemed to be convicted, let the court of justice determine that he is to be imprisoned⁷ according to law in the prison of the midland district; and let no free-man be ever allowed to visit him; but let the food, appointed for him by the guardians of the laws, be brought to him by servants; and, when he dies, let him be cast out, beyond the boundaries of the country, unburied; and if any free-men shall⁸ together bury him,⁹ let the party undergo the punishment for impiety

²⁻³ The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus, and after him by Taylor.

³ On the νυκτερινος ξύλλογος, see at xii. § 14.

⁴⁻⁴ A similar idea is expressed in Rep. ii. § 7, quoted by Ast.

⁵ In lieu of δεδίσθαι, which could not be applied to a future event, common sense requires δεδήσεσθαι: on which Attic future passive see myself at Æsch. Eum. 302. Ficinus, omitting τιμάτω τὸ δικάστηριον, has merely "vinciatur."

through any person who is willing to obtain by lot a trial.¹ If he leaves behind him children, sufficient² for the state, let the guardians of orphans take care of these likewise, as being orphans not less than the others, from the day, on which their father was convicted.

But it is meet for a common law to be established in all these cases, such as shall cause the masses to behave less improperly towards the gods, both in word and deed, and may render them moreover less devoid of intellect, through not permitting them to attend to sacred matters in a manner contrary to law. Now let this law be laid down simply for all together. Let no one practise sacred rites in a private dwelling.³ But when it enters into the mind of any one to sacrifice, let him go to the public buildings, and there sacrifice; and let him place his offerings in the hands of the priests and priestesses, to whom the holy ritual is a care; and let him pray, both himself and whoever else may wish to join with him in prayer. And let this take place on this account. It is not easy to build temples and place statues of the gods; but to do such things correctly, is the work of some mighty intellect. But it is a custom with all women especially, and all⁴ men in sickness, or in danger, or in want, and, on the contrary, when they receive an abundance of any thing, ever to consecrate that which is at hand, and to vow sacrifices, and to promise statues to the gods, and to dæmons, and to the sons of the gods; when they are awakened by frightful⁵ apparitions, and in dreams bring up the recollection of many visions likewise; against all of which things they endeavour to make for each of themselves⁶ remedies, by filling all the streets⁷ and all the villages with altars and chapels, and fixing them in purified places, and⁸ wherever a person has met with such events.⁸ On account of all which

² I do not remember to have met elsewhere with ικανούς, used in a similar manner.

³ Ast quotes a similar enactment in the laws of the Twelve Tables at Rome. "Separatim nemo habessit deos."

⁴ In lieu of πάντη Taylor, by his "all," seems to have wished to read πᾶσι, subsequently found in a good MS.

⁵ I have translated as if the Greek were διαφόβοις, not διὰ φόβους.

⁶ I have adopted ἐκάστοισι, found in three MSS., in lieu of ἐκάσταισι—

⁷ Instead of οικίας Plato wrote, I suspect, ἀγυίδας, as I have translated. See Buttmann on Demosthen. Mid. § 15, n. 2.

⁸—⁸ Such I conceive to be the meaning of the words καὶ ὅπη τις ἐτυχε things it is meet to act according to the law now mentioned, and on account moreover of the impious ; in order that they may not, after acting fraudulently by such doings, put up altars in their private dwellings ; and, thinking to render the gods propitious by sacrifices and prayers in secret, increase injustice unlimitedly, and give rise to accusations on the part of the gods against them and those, who permitted them (to do so), although the latter were themselves ¹the best of all ; ¹ and thus the whole city meet ²justly, after a certain manner, with mischief through the impious. The god, however, shall not blame the lawgiver. For let the law be laid down that no one is to have holy places in private houses ; and the party, who is discovered as having other places and performing orgies, except such as are public, let the person, who is cognizant of it, denounce to the guardians of the laws ; and let them, ³if a man or a woman has it, not having committed any great or impious crime, ³order the parties to carry their private sacred affairs to the public places ; and not persuading, ⁴let them punish with a fine, until they are carried. But, if any one shall be conspicuously committing, ⁵not the impious deed of unholy boys, but of men, ⁵whether by sacrificing ⁶to the gods in private or in public temples, let him be condemned to death, as one who has sacrificed, not being pure ; and let the guardians of the laws, ⁷after deciding, whether there is (any impiety) or not, τῶν τοιούτων : which Ast renders "ubique ejusmodi homines ea collocant—" Ficinus, apparently unable to understand them, has omitted them entirely, and so after him has Taylor.

³—³ The words between the numerals Ficinus doubtless found transposed, as he has translated them ; or else he exercised a sound discretion in so transposing them.

⁴ One would have expected here πεισθίντας in lieu of κείθοντες, which Ast strangely says is put for πειθομένους.

⁶ So Taylor, from "sacrificando" in Ficinus, who probably found in his MS. ἱερυσάμενος instead of ἰδρυσάμενος.

on the part of the children, bring it before a court of justice,⁷ and thus put in their case a finish to the trial for impiety.

BOOK XI.

[1.] AFTER these, the compacts with each other would require from us a suitable regulation. Now a thing of this kind at least is surely simple. ¹Let no one touch,¹ as far as possible, my property, nor disturb the least thing (of mine), without previously persuading me; and may I, possessing a well-disposed mind, act in the same manner with respect to the property of others. Let us then, in the first place, speak about such a treasure,² as a person ³not descended from my parents,³ has placed as a thing to be kept both for himself and those belonging to him, and which may I never pray to the gods to find, nor, on finding, to disturb; ⁴nor on the other hand to communicate with those called diviners, who in some sort advise me to take up the deposit put into the ground.⁴ For I should never be so much benefited by the possession of property, should I take it up, as I should increase in the virtue of the soul and in justice by not taking it to myself, ⁵(and tice. To avoid therefore this difficulty, Ast renders εἰσαγαγόντες by "judicium reddentes," a meaning that εἰσάγειν never has, nor could have.

¹—¹ Although μὴ ἔπτοιτο expresses here a wish, yet the wish itself is of the nature of a command. So in English, "let a person not do a thing," is said both of a wish and command.

² The Greek is τῶν τοιούτων, which, says Ast, depend upon πρῶτον, and that the sense is πρῶτον τῶν τοιούτων, "primo inter has res." But πρῶτον is always used by itself adverbially. Ficinus has "thesaurum eum," which leads to τὸν τοιοῦτον—

³—³ So Taylor, after the Latin of Ficinus, "qui meorum parentum non erat," as if his MS. had read, μὴ τῶν ἐμῶν ὡν πατέρων, instead of ὃν πατέρων in five MSS., adopted by Stalbaum. Ast retains the Aldine, ὃν πατρίων, and supplies ἀγαθῶν with Stephens after πατρίων.

⁵—⁵ In lieu of this verbiage, where the phrase ἀμείνων ἐν ἀμείνων is by acquiring one possession instead of another, a better in a better, (and) preferring justice in the soul to wealth, to hold it as a property in preference.⁵ For on many occasions it is well said—"Do not disturb what ought not to be disturbed—" and it may be said on this too, as being one of them. It is likewise meet to be persuaded by the stories¹ told relating to these matters, that things of this kind do not contribute to the procreation of children. Now he, who is careless of children, and disregards the enactment of the lawgiver, and takes up that, which neither he nor his grandfather had deposited, such a one destroys the most beautiful and simple law, which has been laid down by a man,² ignoble by no means, which says, "Thou shalt not take away that, which thou hast not deposited." What then he ought to suffer at the hands of the gods, who, disregarding these two lawgivers, takes up a trifling thing, which he did not deposit himself, but is sometimes a mighty treasure, the god³ knows; ⁴(but let us declare what he ought to suffer from men.)⁴ Let him, who first sees (the offender) give information, if such an event happens in the city, to the City-Stewards; if in the marketplace of the city,⁵ to the Market-Stewards; and, if in any other part of the country, point him out to the Rural-Stewards and to their chiefs; and when the parties have been pointed out, let the city send to Delphi; and whatever the god gives as an oracle respecting the money and the person who without syntax and sense, Ficinus has more tersely, "pro possessione igitur pecuniæ melior mihi possessio animi justitiæ erit, si virtutem divitiis proposuero."

¹ It is difficult to understand what stories Plato is here alluding to, unless it be something like what the Etymologist mentions relating to Helen, that she was after her birth thrown by Tyndareus into a marshy spot, and there taken up by Leda. So too Œdipus was exposed by the order of Laius, and afterwards taken up by a shepherd; and a similar story is to be found in the case of the children of Melanippé, and doubtless in many other dramas likewise.

² This was Solon, as we learn from Diogen. Laert. i. 57.

has removed it, let the city perform, and be the minister to the oracle; and if the informer is a free-man, let him have a reputation for virtue; but, not informing, for wickedness; but if he is a slave, let him for informing be made, and justly so, free by the city, paying the value to his owner; but not revealing it, let him be punished with death. This enactment there would in due order follow this same¹ law relating to matters great and small, ²(so as) to follow.² If a man leaves any property of his own willingly or unwillingly, let him, who may happen to meet with it, suffer it to remain, conceiving that the dæmon, who presides over roads, watches over things of this kind, that are dedicated to the deity³ by the law. When any one shall be ⁴disobedient to the enactment, and, contrary to it,⁴ take up and carry home any thing of little worth, let him, if a slave, receive many stripes from any one not less than thirty years of age, who may happen to meet him. But, if he is a free-man, let him in addition to his being considered ungentleman-like⁵ and out of the pale of the law, pay as a fine to the party, who left it, ten-fold the value of what he took up. When any one accuses another of detaining his property, whether it be much or little, and the party (who detains it) acknowledges that he has it, but (denies) that it is the other's property, if there be a written statement relating to the property laid before the magistrates according to law, let the plaintiff call the detaining party before the magistrate,⁶ and let the latter place the property in court;⁶ and the matter being rendered clear, if the property mentioned in the written statement shall appear to belong to either of the

¹ Instead of ταὐτὸ τοῦτο, some MSS. read ταύτην τούτω: which seems to lead to τοιοῦτό τι—"some such as this."

³ The deity was Diana, the Moon, or Hecatē, three names for one goddess, whose power was respectively on earth, in heaven, and in hell.

⁴⁻⁴ It is evident that ἀπειθῶν is a gl. of παρὰ ταῦτα—

⁵ This is perhaps the best translation of ἀνελεύθερος—

contending parties, let him have it and depart. But if it belongs to some of those, who are not present, whichever party shall in favour of the absent owner produce trust-worthy bail, that he will deliver it up to him, ¹ let the party (so producing the bail) take the property away, according to the right of taking away in the absent party.¹ But if the property in dispute be not stated in writing before the magistrates, let it lie under the charge of the three oldest magistrates until the trial; and if the property under security be ²a thing requiring food,² let the party defeated in the suit respecting it, pay the magistrates for its keep; and let the magistrates decide the question within three days.

[2.] ³Let any one who wishes, provided he is in his senses, take his own slave and treat him as he pleases, in whatever way it is holy, and let him on behalf of a relation or friend, for their security, lead the slave (to punishment) who has revolted.³ But if any one takes away another person, as if the latter were a slave led away, on the ground ⁴of giving him freedom, let the party so leading let (the other) go; and let the person taking away, on producing three trust-worthy bail, take away on these conditions,⁴ but otherwise not. And if a person takes away contrary to these conditions, let him be amenable to the laws relating to acts of violence; and on being cast, pay to the party, who has taken away,⁵ double of the damage which

³—³ All the words between the numerals are tacitly omitted by Taylor, although duly found in the version of Ficinus.

has been stated in the pleadings. And let a person lead (to punishment) his freed-man, if he does not attend to those, who have made him free, (at all) or not sufficiently. Now the attention is in the freed-man going thrice in the month to the hearth of the party, who had made him free, and engaging to do whatever is requisite of acts just and in his power; and as regards marriage, to do whatever seems good to his lord. And let it not be lawful for him to possess more wealth than the person who made him free; and let the overplus belong to his lord. And let a freed-man remain not longer than twenty years, but like ¹the rest of strangers¹ depart, taking his whole property with him, unless he can persuade the magistrates and the party who made him free. And if the property of a freed person, or of any other stranger, is more than that of the census, the third in magnitude, let him within² thirty days from that on which this occurs³ take his property and depart; nor let there be granted to him by the magistrates a request for a further stay. And if any one disobeys them, let him be brought before a court of justice, and after being convicted, let him be punished with death, and his wealth become public property. And let the suits in these cases be ⁴amongst the suits relating to parishes,⁴ unless the parties are previously freed ⁵from the accusations against each other⁵ in the presence of neighbours or chosen judges. And if any one lays his hand upon an animal or any thing else whatever, as being his own property, let him who has possession of it bring (the claimant) to the party who sold or gave it, being trust-worthy, and having the right to do so, or who handed it over in any fecto," i. e. cujus servum quis in libertatem asseruit"—and this too although he had shown from Demosthenes, p. 1327, 22, R., and Æschines, p. 85, 6, R., that ἀφαιρείσθαι εἰς ἐλευθερίαν meant actively—"e reliquorum servorum numero eximere et in libertatem vendicare."

¹ This is said because slaves were generally brought from foreign countries.

² The ellipse of ἐντός before ἡμερῶν is supplied in § 1.

manner with authority,¹ in the case of a citizen, or a settler in the city, (within) thirty days, but in the case of a transfer by a stranger, within five months, the middle of which² is the month in which³ the summer sun turns to the winter.³ And whatever articles one person exchanges with another by sale or purchase, let them thus make the exchange, by one party giving and the other receiving on the instant the value in the place appointed for each kind of articles in the market-place, and no where else; and let no one engage in the purchase or sale of an article on credit.⁴ But if any one person barter with another any thing whatever for any thing whatever in any other manner or in any other place, by trusting the party, who is making the exchange, let a person act in this way towards him, as no action will lie⁵ according to law, respecting articles, that have not been purchased according to what is here detailed. ⁶With respect to joint contributions, let any who is willing ask a contribution as a friend amongst friends; but if any difference arises respecting the payment of the contribution,⁷ let the parties act thus,⁸ as there will be no action against any one on such matters.⁶

³—³ On this method of marking the summer solstice, when the sun turns from the tropic of Cancer to that of Capricorn, see at iii. § 5.

⁴ This is the phrase in English, answering to ἐν ἀναβολῇ. Plato's object was that all transactions should be for ready money alone. For he knew that the credit system was the forerunner of usury; and usury, of extravagant profits; and these, of large fortunes; and these again, of luxurious habits; and these, lastly, of a corruption in morals and the destruction of the state.

⁵ I have translated as if the Greek were not οὐδὲν, but ἐσμένον, repeated shortly afterwards.

⁶—⁶ All between the brackets are evidently out of their place: unless it be said that Plato introduced the subject of friendly contributions, with the view of showing that under no circumstances, either of barter or voluntary subscriptions, was any credit to be given; or if given, any remedy by law for the creditor.

⁷ The Ἐρανοί at Athens were like the Benefit Societies or Clubs in England, to which persons contributed by monthly, as in England by weekly, payments; and the money thus raised was, according to certain regulations, given to the contributors when in want. At Athens the contributors could be sued for arrears. But this Plato would not permit in his code of laws.

⁸ i. e. as friends. But οὐρα conceals, I suspect, some error.

Whoever sells an article and receives for it a price of not less than fifty drachms, let him remain of necessity ten days in the city; and let the buyer know the residence of the seller, for the sake of the complaints which usually take place on such matters, and the return of the articles according to law. Now let the return or not, according to law, be in this way. If a person sells a slave labouring under a consumption, or the stone, or a strangury, or the disease called sacred,¹ or any other malady not apparent to the many, of long standing and incurable, whether of the body or mind, if the sale be to a physician or a master of gymnastics, there is to be no return; nor yet, when the seller tells beforehand the (whole) truth to any one; but if a handicraftsman sells to a person not in trade an article of such a kind, let the buyer return the article, except in the case of (a slave affected) with the sacred disease, within six months; but in the case of the disease, let it be lawful to make the return within a year; and let the matter be decided before some physicians, whom the parties may bring forward and select in common, and let the party defeated pay double the value for which the party sold it. But if a party not in trade sells to another not in trade, let the return and decision take place in the manner mentioned above; and let the party defeated pay simply the value. If any one knowingly sells to another knowingly a slave, who has killed any person, let him have no return in the case of a purchase of this kind; but to a person not knowing, let there be a return then, when any buyer becomes aware of it; and let the decision rest with the five youngest guardians of the laws; and if it is decided that the seller was cognizant of the fact, let a person purify the residence of the buyer according to the law of the sacred interpreters, and let the seller pay the purchaser triple the sum.

[3.] Let him who exchanges either money for money, or any thing whatever for things of life or not of life, give and receive every thing unadulterated, following out the law. Let us however receive² a prelude, as in the case of other laws, so likewise with respect to the whole of this wrong. It is meet for every man to consider adulteration, and lying, and fraud, as forming one genus; to which it is usual for the multitude to apply the saying, although speaking improperly, that when such a conduct is adopted opportunely, on each occasion, it often turns out well. But as they leave the occasion, and the where, and the when, in an unregulated and undefined state, they do by this assertion much injury to themselves and to others. But it is not fitting for the legislator to leave this undefined; but he ought always to state clearly the greater and lesser limits. Let them be determined now. Let no one who is not about to be the most odious to the gods, perpetrate, either by word or deed, a falsehood, or fraud, or adulteration in any thing, when calling (to witness) the race of the gods. Now such is (in the first place)¹ he, who while swearing false oaths, thinks nothing of the gods; and secondly he, who speaks falsely before those who are better than himself. Now the better are superior to the bad, both the elder, to speak in general terms, than the younger, and parents [better]² than their offspring, and men than women and children, and governors than the governed; ³ all of whom it is becoming for all to reverence in every other government,³ and especially in political offices, ⁴ for the sake of which⁴ the present conversation has come upon us. For every one of those in the market-place, who by adulterating any thing perpetrates a falsehood and a fraud, and calling upon the gods takes an oath,⁵ according to the regulations and precautions of the Market-Stewards, is a person who has no regard for men nor reverence for the gods. ⁶ It is indeed a beautiful institution not to defile the names of the gods, while a person is taking it

² In lieu of δειξώμεθα, Winckelmann would read ἀποδείξώμεθα, "let us exhibit."

³ Ficinus has "quos revereri par est, cum in omni principatu—"

⁵ Ficinus and all the subsequent translators, says Ast, have taken ἐπὶ νόμοι incorrectly in the sense of swearing falsely.

easily, as the majority of us do on each occasion as regards the greater part of a pure and holy conduct in what relates to the gods.⁶ If then a person is not persuaded¹ (by these reasonings),¹ let this be the law. Let the seller of any thing in the market-place never mention two prices of what he is selling; but after mentioning a simple one, if he does not meet with it, let him take the article back again, and justly so, nor value it for that day at a greater or less sum. Let puffing² and oaths be absent in the case of every thing sold. And if a person is disobedient to these enactments, let any citizen, not less than thirty years of age, who happens to be present, punish the party swearing, and strike him with impunity; and if he neglects to do so, and is himself disobedient (to the law), let him be amenable to blame for his betrayal of the laws. And let him,³ who falls in with those who know³ the seller of an adulterated article, and unable⁴ to obey the present reasonings, if he is able himself to detect the party, expose (the fraud) before the magistrates, and if he is a slave or a settler, let him carry off⁵ the adulterated article. But let the citizen, who does not expose (the fraud), be proclaimed a bad man, as one who defrauds the gods: but if he exposes it, let him offer up (the adulterated article) to the gods, who preside over the market-place.⁶ And let him, who has been discovered selling any thing of this kind, in addition to his being deprived of the adulterated article, be scourged with as many lashes from a whip as there are drachms in the sum at which he valued the article, by the hands of the crier, proclaiming in the market-place the reason of his being

³—³ Such is the literal version of ὁ προστυγχάνων τῶν γιγνώσκοντων. But the sense requires rather ὁ γινώσκων, and hence Ficinus has "qui advertit—" about to be whipped. And let the Market-Stewards and the guardians of the laws, after hearing from those who are skilled in each of the adulterations and evil practices of the sellers, write out ¹ what the seller ought and ought not to do; ¹ and let them, after writing down the laws that are to afford clear information to those engaged in business about the market-place, ² put them upon a pillar before ³ the court belonging to the Market-Stewards. ³ But the particulars relating to the City-Stewards have been sufficiently detailed above. Should it however appear that any thing more is wanting, let them communicate with the guardians of the laws, and writing down what seems to be wanting, let them place on a pillar at the court belonging to the City-Stewards, the first and second regulations, as laid down by their authority.

[4.] To the business of adulteration ⁴ there follows on its heel ⁵ those of the huckster's trade. But about the whole of this let us first give advice ⁶ according to reason, (and) ⁶ afterwards a law respecting it. For the whole of huckstering in a city does not exist for the sake of doing an injury, at least naturally, but the reverse. For how is not every one a benefactor, who causes the existence of property of any kind soever, that is out of measure and unequally (diffused), to become so equably in measure? ⁷ This it is meet for us to acknowledge, and to work out the power of money; and it is necessary

²—² In lieu of ἀγορανόμον, which is unintelligible, Stephens suggested, what Ast has adopted and Stalbaum approves of, ἀγορανομίον, obtained from "foro" in Ficinus, similar to ἀντυνομίον just afterwards.

⁴ I have adopted Winckelmann's κιβδηλίας, in lieu of κιβδήλους, to balance the subsequent καπηλείας.

⁵ Such is the idiomatic English version of κατὰ πόδα.

⁶—⁶ I have translated as if the Greek were not καὶ λόγον, but κατὰ λόγον καὶ, where κατὰ is due to one of the best MSS.

to say that the merchant is ordained for this; and the person who is hired, and the tavern-keeper, and other trades, that are some, more genteel, and some, less, have all this power, to show assistance to all in need, and to cause an equality in property.⁷ But let us see why this seems to be neither honourable nor becoming, and why it happens to lead to calumny, in order that, although we may not cure the whole by a law, yet we may at least a part.

¹ Clin. This, as it seems, is no trifling matter, and requires no little virtue.

Athen. How say you, friend Clinias?¹ ² A race of men small and naturally few,³ and brought up with a superior education, are, when they fall into want and a desire for certain things, able to bear up with moderation; and when they have it in their power to acquire great wealth, behave soberly, and prefer that, which borders on moderation, to excess. But the mass of mankind conduct themselves in a manner perfectly the reverse of this; for they desire without measure; and when they have it in their power to obtain a moderate gain, they prefer to have a gain that never satisfies. Hence all the races of men engaged in trades ³ retail and wholesale,³ and as tavern-keepers, have been calumniated and subject to disgraceful reproaches. For should any one—which never may it happen, nor ever will—compel—⁴ what it is ridiculous indeed to say, yet said it shall be⁴—the best of men in every way to keep a tavern for a certain time, or to be a huckster, or to do any thing of this kind, or even ⁵ women (the most holy)⁵ through some necessity of fate, to take part in an employment

³⁻³ On the difference between καπηλός, "a retail dealer," and ἔμπορος, "a wholesale merchant," see at Sophist, § 19, n. 23.

⁵⁻⁵ Ficinus alone has "mulieres sanctissimas," as if he had found in his MS. something to balance the preceding τοὺς πανταχῇ ἀρίστους ἀνδρας—

of such a kind, we should know that each of these is ¹ honest and laudable,¹ and that ² if they occurred uncorrupted according to reason,² all such acts would be honoured, as belonging to the character of a mother and a nurse. But now, since some one has for the sake of a retail trade established dwellings in solitary places, and, having in every direction a length of road, receives in much-desired resting-places those unable to proceed, or affords a warm and quiet spot to those driven³ by the violence of severe weather, and a cool one in hot; and afterwards having them received as friends, does not give them⁴ symbols of friendship ⁵ subsequent to their reception,⁵ but, ⁶ as if they were enemies taken in war and in their power, lets them go for a ransom very great, and unjust, and not to be cleansed⁶—these actions and such as these, having been disgracefully ⁷ committed by all persons of this kind, have correctly⁷ furnished a ground of calumny against the assistance given to distress. Against these the lawgiver ought therefore to prepare⁸ a remedy. For the saying⁹ of old is correct, that against two opposite things it is hard to fight, as in the case of diseases

^{1—1} So Taylor translates the Latin of Ficinus, “honesta et approbanda.” But such is not the meaning of φίλον και ἀγαπητόν, “dear and to be loved,” words which I can scarcely understand here, even if they are applied to a person, and not, as the train of thought seems to require, to a thing.

^{2—2} Here again I am at a loss, and so was Ficinus; who translates, “nisi corrupte fierent,” omitting entirely κατὰ λόγον, while Taylor has “according to uncorrupt reason.”

³ I have translated as if the Greek were φιλικά—ξύμβολα, not φιλικὰ ξένια—

⁴ I have adopted with Ast ἐλαυνομένοις, as suggested by Stephens, in lieu of ἐλαυνόμενους—

^{5—5} The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus, and after him by Taylor; who through the whole of this passage has looked only to the Latin version.

^{6—6} Such is the literal translation of the Greek. Ficinus has “sed ut inimicos atque captivos crudeliter se redimere cogunt rebusque omnibus spoliant.” For he did not understand, nor can I, the meaning here of μακροτάτων and ἀκαθάρτων λύτρων.

^{7—7} In lieu of ὀρθῶς, Ficinus found in his MS. αἰσχροῦς, as shown by his version, “turpiter.” Plato wrote, I suspect, both words; and so I have translated.

⁸ Literally, “to cut.” On this expression, see Blomf. on Agam. 16.

and many other things. But at present the contest is against these two things, poverty and wealth; the latter of which corrupts the soul of man through luxury, while the former turns itself through pain to shamelessness of every kind.¹ What protection, then, will there be against this disease in a state endued with intellect? In the first place, let it make use, to the utmost of its power, of the fewest in number of the race of hucksters; next, we enjoin² such trades upon some³ of those persons, from whose corruption there would be not a great mischief to the state; and thirdly, to discover a plan in the case of those, who take a part in these occupations, how their morals may not happen to become freely partakers in impudence and in feelings unfitted for free-men. Let then, after what has now been stated, a law of this kind take place, with a good fortune relating to these matters. Of the Magnesians, whom a god is again raising up and settling into a colony, let no one amongst such as have a share in the land, and possess hearths amounting⁴ to five thousand and forty,⁵ either willingly or unwillingly become a retail or wholesale dealer, nor hold any situation whatever under individuals, who are not upon an equality with himself, except under a father or mother, and those⁶ who are still higher up in birth than these,⁴ and all who are older than himself, and (live)⁵ like free-men in a free manner. It is not however easy to legislate for what is gentleman-like or ungentlemanly. Let however a distinction be made by those, who have obtained the prize of excellence, by their hatred and reception of these doings (respectively). Let then any one, who is willing, indict, on the charge of disgracing his family, the person, who takes a part in any trickery

¹ As αὐτήν cannot thus follow ἀναισχυντίαν, I have translated as if the Greek were παντοίην.

^{2—3} I have translated as if the Greek were ταῦτά τισιν, not τοῦτοισι, which is without regimen. Ficinus has "his hominibus cauponandi artes."

^{3—3} Taylor has, by an error perhaps of the press, "forty-five thousand."

^{4—4} I have translated as if the Greek were ἐν τοῦτων εἰς τὸ ἄνω γένος ἰοῦσι, not γένεσι; or since one MS. has γένεσιν, γένος ἰοῦσιν. For in this formula the singular γένος is either adopted or omitted entirely, as in ix. p. 878, A., πατρὶ καὶ τοῖς ἄνω τοῦ γένους. Menex. §. 5, τῶν ἀνωθεν ἐν προγόνων, and the other passages quoted by myself on Philoct. 180. Ast too would read here εἰς τὸ ἄνω γένους—of an ungentlemanly huckstering; and if he shall appear to have defiled his paternal hearth by any unworthy employment, let him, after being in bonds for a year, abstain from such employment; and if he does so again, for two years; and on each conviction let him not cease doubling the previous period. A second law ordains, moreover, that a person must be a settler or a stranger, who is to follow a retail trade. And a third one (ordains this) the third,¹ in order that the best character, or one the least improper, may be a fellow-dweller in the city, that it is requisite² for the guardians of the law to consider that they are the guardians not only of those, whom it is easy to guard against, when (acting) contrary to the law, and becoming wicked—such, I mean, as are well born and have been well brought up—but that they ought to guard still more against persons, who are not of such a kind, and who follow pursuits, that possess a powerful incentive³ to their becoming bad. ⁴Such then are the circumstances⁴ relating to retail trade, which is extensive, and embraces many occupations. Respecting then such of these, as may be left, through their being thought to be, from a great necessity, requisite in a state, it behoves the guardians of the laws to come again together with those skilled in retail trades, as we before enjoined in the case of adulteration, an occupation allied to this; and, after coming together, to see what receipts and outlay produce a moderate profit to the retail dealer; ⁵and after writing down the outlay and receipts, to lay down the result,⁵ and, to watch over it, in some matters the Market-Stewards, in others the City-Stewards, and in others the Rural-Stewards. And thus will retail trading be of service in some points on nearly every occasion,⁶ and be of the least disservice to those, who make use of it in states.

¹ Ficinus incorrectly omits τὸ δὲ τρίτον, but correctly adds “cavendum monet,” requisite to complete the sense.

² I have translated as if the Greek were χρῆναι νοῆσαι, as required by the syntax, not χρῆ—

³ I have omitted προτρέπειν, which Ast vainly, I conceive, attempts to defend.

⁴—⁴ In ταύτη δὲ, which has puzzled Ast not a little, evidently lies hid—ταῦτ’ ἦν δὲ—similar to “cum vero cauponatio—sit,” in Ficinus.

⁵—⁵ All between the numerals is thus translated by Ficinus, “et tam impendium quam emolumentum conscribant,” and by Taylor, “and establish its expenses and emolument.”

⁶ I have translated as if the Greek were ἐκάστοτε, not ἐκάστους—

[5.]¹ Whatever compact a person acknowledges to have made, if he does not act according to the acknowledgment, except in cases where laws or a decree prevent him, or where he has made the acknowledgment through being compelled by some unjust necessity, or if he is prevented unwillingly by an unexpected accident, let an action lie against him² in the legal suits relating to the tribes,² for an acknowledgment not completed in other respects, unless the parties are able to come to a reconciliation previously, in the presence of arbitrators or neighbours.¹ The race of artificers is sacred to Hephæstus and Athéné,³ who jointly fit up our life by their arts;³ while, on the other hand, they, who preserve the works of artificers by other arts of a defensive kind, are (sacred) to Ares and Athéné. And justly too is this race sacred to those gods; for all these are through life attending to the country and people; some by presiding over the contests of war; others by bringing to an effect the production by hire of instruments and works; to whom it would not be a becoming act to tell a falsehood about these matters, while reverencing the gods, their progenitors.⁴ If then any operative shall, through improper conduct, not complete his work by the stated time, and, paying no reverence to the god, who is the giver of life, conceive, seeing nothing with his mind's eye, that a god, as being of his own kindred, will pardon him, such a one will, in the first place, suffer punishment from the god himself; and secondly,⁵ let a law be laid down conformably to this;⁵ and let him be bound to pay the value of the work, of which he has defrauded by a falsehood the party, who gave it out; and let him complete it again from the commencement within the stated time gratuitously. And as the law has advised the seller not to make an attempt (on the purchaser) by

²—² Here, as above in § 4, Ficinus translates ἐν ταῖς φυλετικαῖς δίκαις by "tribuum iudices cognoscant," as if his MS. read ἐν τοῖς φυλετικοῖς δίκασταῖς. And so he does in § 5, where the Greek is ἐν τοῖς κατὰ φυλὰς δικάσθησι—

³—³ A similar expression in Menexen. § 7, where however the names of the deities are not given. Compare too Protagor. § 33, and the Statesman, p. 274, C., and Pseudo-Plato in Critias, p. 109, C.

⁵—⁵ The words between the numerals seem strangely introduced. Ficinus has "hoc lege reus factus," what is far preferable.

valuing (an article)¹ at more than its worth, but in all simplicity at its worth—for the operative knows the value—so does it advise in the case of a person undertaking a job, and gives the same order. In cities, therefore, of free-men, it is not meet for the operative himself to make an attempt upon unskilled individuals by his own skill in an art, which is a thing naturally clear and devoid of falsehood; but (it is meet) for an action to lie on this ground in behalf of the person injured against the party doing the wrong. If then any one, after giving out work to an operative, does not pay him his wages, according to the agreement legally drawn up, but by dishonouring Zeus, the guardian of the city, and Athéné,² (both) sharing in the polity,³ and, by being in love with a little gain, shall loosen⁴ great societies, let there be a law to assist, conjointly with the gods, the binding together of the state. For let him, who, after he⁴ has bargained for work and got hold of it,⁴ does not pay the wages at the time agreed upon, be sued for double the amount.⁵ And if a year has elapsed, while all the other monies are without interest, which a person confers as a loan, let him put down the interest at the rate⁶ of an obolus,⁵ for a drachm monthly, and let the cause be tried in the courts of justice⁷ belonging to the tribes. As, however, (we have made mention)⁸ incidentally of those, who in war are the workers of safety, and of army-leaders, and such as are artists in ¹ I have translated as if $\tau\iota$ had dropt out before $\tau\mu\acute{\alpha}\nu$.

^{2—3} As I do not believe that Zeus and Athéné, both of whom are called elsewhere πολιούχοι , are ever spoken of as $\text{κοινωνοὶ πολιτείας}$, I suspect there is some error here, arising from the improper position of some words, and the faulty writing of others. To avoid the difficulty, Ficinus has "Minervamque hujus rei participem—"

³ Ficinus alone has "pro virili parte dissolverit."

^{4—4} Such seems to be the meaning of $\text{προαμειψάμενος ἔργον}$. I suspect however that Plato wrote something like $\text{προειπὼν ἔργον καὶ ἀψάμενος}$ — But as the very same phrase is repeated shortly afterwards, it is perhaps to be considered as a technical one, applicable to various trades. Cousin's note is—"Celui, qui apres avoir commandé un ouvrage à un artisan, $\text{προαμειψάμενος ἔργον}$, ne le paie pas le prix convenu, paiera le double."

^{5—5} All the words between the numerals are omitted by Taylor, although duly found in Ficinus.

⁶ As the obolus was the sixth part of a drachm, the rate was above 16½ per cent. monthly.

⁷ From this passage it is evident that, although the expression in § 4 and 5 is $\text{ταῖς φυλῆταικαῖς δίκαις}$, Plato wrote in all the three places $\text{τοῖς φυλῆτικοῖς δικαστηρίοις}$.

⁸ Ficinus alone has, what the sense requires, "mentionem fecimus"— these matters, ¹it is (only) just to say that we have been reminded of operatives altogether, as in the case of these being again, like those, as it were other operatives.¹ If then any one even of these undertakes a public work, either voluntarily or from a command,² and executes it beautifully, (and)³ the law justly pays him in honours, which are the wages of men skilled in war,⁴ such a law one will never be tired of praising;⁴ ⁵but he will blame it, if it does not pay, after it has bargained for and got hold of any work of those [works]⁶ that are beautiful in war.⁵ Let then this law mingled with praise be laid down by us respecting these matters, in the form of advice, and not of compulsion, to the mass of the citizens, namely, to pay secondary honours to brave men, who are the saviours of the whole state, whether by their valour, or by stratagems in war; for let the greatest guerdon be given to those the first, who have been able⁷ to honour pre-eminently the writings of good legislators.

[6.] The greatest of compacts, that men have with each other, except such as relate to orphans, and the guardians of orphans, have been laid down by us in due order, in nearly (the best manner).⁸ It is necessary however, after what has

² Ficinus has "jussus," which leads to προσταχθεῖς: but if προσταχθέν be retained, we must read ἐκούσιον instead of ἐκόν.

³ I have adopted καί, suggested by Stephens, and inserted by Ast.

⁶ The word ἐργων could not be thus repeated after ἐργον.

been now detailed, to arrange these matters at least in some manner. Now of all these is the desire ¹of those about to die¹ respecting their will, and the circumstances of those who have made no will. I have said it is necessary, Clinias, from looking at the harsh and difficult temper of such persons; nor is it possible to leave the point unarranged. For each party would, ²previous to his being about to make his will,² introduce many clauses at variance with each other, and contrary to the laws, and the manners of the living, and their progenitors, if one gave a power for a will to be effective, simply in the manner, that a person may have made it in whatever state he might be towards the end of life. For most of us, when we think we are about to die, are in a certain manner silly in mind, and broken down in spirit.³

Clin. How say you this, O guest?

Athen. A man, Clinias, when about to die, is morose, and full of language very terrible to legislators, and difficult (to treat with).

Clin. In what way?

Athen. Seeking to be the master of all things, he is wont to speak with anger.

Clin. What?

Athen. It is a shocking thing, O ye gods, says he, if I am not permitted to give my property to whomsoever I please, ⁴and not ⁴to one person more, and to another less, amongst such as have evidently behaved ill or well towards me, after they have been tested sufficiently, (some)⁵ during my disorders, and others during my old age, and in other circumstances of various kinds.

Clin. Does he⁶ then, O guest, not appear to you to speak correctly?

²—² Ficinus, followed by Taylor, omits all between the numerals.

³ Ast renders διατεθρυμμένως "animo fractos," and refers to Xenophon's Agesilaus ii. 14, ἀσπίδας διατεθρυμμένας. He should have read here διατεθραυσμένως, and there διατεθραυσμένας.

⁴—⁴ Ficinus, followed by Taylor, omits καὶ μὴ. But Stephens says that the ellipse is to be thus supplied, καὶ μὴ δοῦναι, ᾧ δοῦναι μὴ ἐθέλω.

⁵ Here οἱ μὲν is to be supplied from the subsequent οἱ δὲ—

⁶ Taylor has, what the train of thought requires, the singular here, not the plural, as if he wished to read, δοκεῖ σοί γε, instead of δοκοῦσι σοι—

Athen. The lawgivers of old appear to me, Clinias, to have been cowards, and to have legislated, while they were looking to ¹and thinking upon ¹a trifling portion ²of human affairs.

Clin. How say you?

Athen. Terrified at this language (of the dying man),³ they laid down this ⁴law, that it should be lawful for any one⁵ to dispose of his property without exception entirely as he pleased. But I and you will answer those in your state about to die, in a more careful manner.

Clin. How?

Athen. O friends, we will say, ⁶who exist really but for a day,⁶ it is a difficult thing for you to know your own affairs, and yourselves to boot, as the writing of the Pythian (priestess)⁷ says at present. I, therefore, as being a legislator, lay down that neither yourselves are your own property, nor this substance of yours, but that they belong to the whole of your family, both past and to come; and further still, that both the whole of your family and substance belong to the state; and this being the case, should any one by flattery insinuate himself⁸ into your favour, either during a disorder or when you are tost about by old age, and persuade you to dispose of your property by will in not the best manner, I shall not willingly agree to it; but looking to all that is the best both for the whole state,

³ Ficinus adds “morituri hominis,” and so after him Taylor, “of the dying man.”

⁴ The Greek in all the MSS. but two is τόνδε, in lieu of which Bekker, whom Stalbaum follows, has edited τόν—contrary, I conceive, to the genius of the language. They should have read τούτον—With regard to the law itself, Ast refers to Plutarch, in Solon, p. 90, A., but there, as remarked by Cousin, Solon permitted a father to dispose of his property, only when he had not a son.

⁵ Ficinus has “licet cuique,” as if his MS. read ἐξεῖναι τῷ τᾷ—

⁶—⁶ Ficinus, not aware that Plato had in mind the expressions in Pindar, Æschylus, and Aristophanes, where man is described as “the being of a day,” has “brevi procul dubio morituri,” and so Taylor after him.

⁷ Of the celebrated saying, “Know thyself,” to which Plato has alluded in not less than five places, the earliest notice is in Æsch. Prom. 317, Γίγνωσκε σαυρόν; and the passage the least noticed is in Ovid, A. A. ii. 499, “Est ibi (at Delphi) diversum fama celebrata per orbem Littera, cognosci quæ sibi quemque jubet.”

and your family, I will lay down laws ¹ by justly putting to a less account that which belongs to each individual.¹ May you, therefore, be mild and well-disposed towards us, and proceed in the path, ² in which you are now, according to man's nature, journeying; ³ while of the rest of your concerns it will be for us to be the guardians, by taking, to the utmost of our power, a care (of every thing),³ and not of merely some, but not of others. Let this then, Clinias, be ⁴ the consolation for the dead, and for the living this the prelude (of the law); ⁴ but this the law itself.

[7.] Let him, who makes a will, disposing of his property, if he is a father of children, appoint first whichever of his sons he thinks proper to be his heir, but of his other children whichever he gives to another person to adopt, let this too be written down. And if any of his sons survive him, after having been adopted, but not with any heir-property, and of whom there is an expectation that he will be sent to a colony according to law, let the father be permitted to give him from his other property what he pleases, except the paternal allotment, and all the chattels belonging to it. And if there are more children, let their father distribute in shares the remainder of the allotment in whatever manner he pleases. But whichever of the sons possesses a house, let him not leave to such a one any money. To a daughter, in like manner, to whom a man has been affianced, ⁵ [that he may be about to be her husband,]⁵ let him not give a share; but to her, who is not betrothed, let him give a share. And if any allotment in the country shall be found to be in the hands of any of the sons or daughters, after the will has been made, let it be left ⁶ for the heir of the party

²—² Such is the literal version of the Greek. Ficinus has "quo nature humanæ vos necessitas vocat," thus rendered by Taylor, "as human nature requires you should."

⁴—⁴ To avoid the figure of speech called Chiasmus in the original, I have placed the words in their natural order; while Ficinus has altered the construction by his version, "hæc præmio solamina."

⁵—⁵ The words between the numerals are evidently an explanation, and are omitted by Ficinus, who has "filie, quæ viro sit desponsata."

⁶ In lieu of καταλείπω Ast suggests correctly καταλείπῃσθω, similar to "relinquatur" in Ficinus.

who has made the will. And if the testator has no sons, but daughters, let him write down what man he would wish as the husband for any of his daughters, and as the son-in-law for himself. And if the son of any one, whether natural or adopted, happens to die before he could be enrolled amongst men, let the testator mention this circumstance in the will, and signify whom he wishes to be his son in his stead with better fortune. And if any one without children makes a will, let him select the tenth part of his property, beyond the allotment, and give it to whom he pleases; but all the rest let him give without blame to his adopted son, and make for himself, according to law, a son kindly disposed. And in the case of a person whose children require guardians, if, after having made his will, he dies, and has mentioned as guardian for his children parties of the number and kind he wishes, and who are willing and agree to act as guardians, let the selection of the guardians be according to what has been written down in full force. But if a person dies intestate, if there is ¹any thing deficient in the selection¹ of the guardians, let the next of kin, two on the father's side, and two on the mother's, and one from among the friends of the deceased, have power to act as guardians; and these let the guardians of the law appoint (as guardians) to any orphan, who is in want of them. And of the whole care of orphans, let fifteen of the guardians of the laws, who are the oldest, have the charge ²ever according to seniority; and having divided themselves into threes, let three (act) in one year, and in another year three others, until the five periods are accomplished in a circle;² and let no one fail in this duty to the best of his power. But should any one die without having made a will at all, and leave children that require a guardian, let the indigent state of the children share in the same laws. And should any one, meeting with an unexpected misfortune, leave behind him daughters, let him pardon the legislator if, looking to two things out of three, namely, proximity of race, and the preservation of the allotment, he makes provision for the giving the daughters in marriage; but the third point, to which the father would have attended, namely, ¹ by looking to habits and manners, ¹ (to select) ² from all the citizens a fitting son for himself and a husband for his daughter, he omits, through the consideration of it being an impossibility. Let then this law be laid down relating to matters of this kind. If any one, dying intestate, leaves behind him daughters, ³ let the brother on the father's or mother's side, if he is without an allotment, take the daughter and the allotment of the deceased. But if there is not a brother, let a brother's son (do so) in like manner, if the cousins are of a sufficient age. And if there is not one of these left, let the son of (the father's) sister (act) in the same way, and let the fourth after these be the father's brother; the fifth, the son of this (brother); and the sixth, the son of the father's sister; ³ and in like manner let the race be continued perpetually by consanguinity, if a person leaves behind daughters, proceeding through brothers and cousins, first the males, and afterwards the females, in one ⁴ family. And let the judge on reflection determine the fitness or unfitness of the time of marriage, by looking at the males naked, and at the females naked, as far as the navel. And if there is a want of kindred to families, as far as the sons of brothers, and as far too as the children of grandfathers, whomsoever of the other citizens, being willing, the girl shall of her own free-will select, with the consent of her guardians, let that person become the heir of the deceased, and the husband of his daughter. Further still, there might be ⁵ a great want of many things, and a still greater of persons of this kind, ⁵ at some time in this very state. Should then a female, ⁶ being in want of nuptials, ⁶ see any one going from hence to a colony, and it

²—² Ficinus, partly followed by Taylor, has thus abridged all between the numerals, “ut terni pro dignitate singulis annis curent, et, exacto quinquennio, similiter quindecim alios.”

³—³ With this law Ast compares a similar one at Athens, as shown by Isæus, T. vii. p. 270, R., and Demosthenes, p. 1067, R.

⁴ Ficinus has, what is preferable, "in eodem genere—"

is in her mind for that person to be the heir of her father's property, provided he is a relation, let him enter upon the allotment according to the arrangement of the laws. ¹But if he is out of the family, those in the city being out of relationship,¹ let him have the power, through the selection of the guardians and of the daughter of the deceased, to marry her, and returning home, to take the allotment of the intestate. And if any one, who has no male or female children at all, dies intestate, let other matters hold good respecting such a person, according to the aforesaid law; but let a female and a male go, as joint-sharers, from his family to the dwelling, on each occasion deserted; and to them let the allotment belong as owners; and let a sister (enter) first; a brother's daughter, second; a sister's offspring, third; a sister of the father, fourth; a daughter of the father's brother, fifth; and a daughter of the father's sister, sixth. Let these females live together with those (males) according to affinity and lawfulness, as we have previously laid down by law. Nor let the weighty nature of laws of this kind lie hid from us, that sometimes it harshly ordains the relation of a deceased person to marry a relation. ²(For he who introduces a law of this kind,) ²does not appear to consider that ³ten thousand impediments arise, so as to render a person unwilling to comply with mandates of this kind; and that there are those, who would suffer any thing whatever, when diseases and maimings in body or mind come upon some of those ordained by law to marry, or be married. The legislator then will perhaps seem, not correctly so, to some, to pay no regard to these matters. Let this then be stated, as if it were a prelude in common, both for the lawgiver, and the party to whom laws are given; which requests ⁴those under laws to grant a pardon to the legislator, because, while he is taking care of public concerns, he cannot at the same time regulate the circumstances that occur to each in-

³ In lieu of ἀ μὲν Ficinus seems to have found in his MS. ὥς μὲν—For his version is "quam multos—" dividual likewise; and, on the other hand, ¹(the legislator to grant) ¹a pardon to those under laws; since they are sometimes unable, and reasonably so, to perform the commandments of the legislator, which, ignorant ²(of private circumstances),² he has ordained.

⁴ Ast unites δεόμενον with προοίμιον by a rather violent prosopopœia.

Clin. By doing what then, O guest, will a person be the most in measure in such a case?

Athen. It is necessary, Clinias, to choose arbitrators between laws of this kind, and for those governed by them.

Clin. How say you?

Athen. Sometimes ³the son of a rich father ³would not be willing to marry the daughter of his uncle, ⁴through being given to luxury and keeping his thoughts upon a greater connexion; ⁵and sometimes too, while the legislator is enjoining the greatest calamity, he would be compelled by necessity to disobey the law, which forces ⁶him to accept an alliance with a mad woman, or other terrible calamities of body or soul, and by possessing them, to live a life not to be endured. ⁵Let then this law, which has been just now spoken of, ⁷be laid down by us. If any persons find fault with the laws laid down relating to wills and any thing else whatever, and marriages to boot, (by saying) ⁸that if the legislator himself were ⁹present and living, ⁹he would never compel a person to act thus, nor would those compelled to marry, or to be married, do either; or should any of the family or any guardian assert, that (as) the lawgiver

¹—¹ I have inserted the words between the numerals, as being requisite for the balance of the sentence.

²—² Ficinus, followed tacitly by Taylor, has alone, what the train of thought requires, “singularum calamitatum—”

⁴ I have omitted ἀδελφιδούς, as a gloss for θείου.

⁶ I have followed Stephens, who reads ἀναγκάζονται in lieu of ἀναγκάζοντος, which is without regimen.

⁸ Ast supplies λέγοντες, which he got from “asserant” in Ficinus.

⁹—⁹ I confess I cannot understand why Plato thus put the cart before the horse. Ficinus omits παρόντα καὶ— had left the fifteen of the guardians of the laws to appear¹ as arbitrators and parents to male and female orphans, to these² let those go, who are contesting about any of such like matters, and by them be adjudged, and bring to an end their decrees as being decisive. But should it seem to any one that too great a power has been given to the guardians of the law, let him carry the matter to the tribunal of selected jurymen, and decide the question about contested points; and upon him, who is defeated by the legislator, let blame and reproach lie, a fine in the eyes of him, who possesses a mind, more heavy than a mass of money.³

[8.] And now there would be, as it were, a second birth to orphans. After the first the nurture and education for each have been spoken of. But after the second, rendered desolate by the want of fathers, it is meet to devise by what means the misfortune of their orphanhood may excite the least possible pity for their misfortune in the case of those who have become orphans.⁴ First then, we assert that we assign by law to them the guardians of the laws to be not worse parents, in the place of those who begat them; and we ordain moreover, that for each year they take a care of them, as if they were their own.⁵ And such is the prelude we have given with care⁶ to them and the guardians, relating to the bringing up of orphans. For we appear to have detailed at some fitting time in the previous discourse, how that the souls of the dead possess a certain power,⁶ by which they attend to human affairs.

¹ I have translated as if the Greek were φανῆναι, not φάναι, which, says Ast, often means "to think." But even if such were the case, of which I am very doubtful, we should here gain nothing by such a meaning.

² In lieu of οὗς I have adopted τούτους, as suggested by Stephens; who got the idea from "ad hos ipsos" in Ficinus. For otherwise the apodosis of all the preceding sentences would be wanting.

³ In the Greek there evidently lies hid a dramatic distich—Ψόγος βαρύτερα χρημάτων πολλῶν ἂρ' ἦν Ἡ ζημία τῶ νοῦν ἔχοντι σῶφρονα.

⁴ That Plato should have been guilty of this wretched verbiage seems hardly credible. Ficinus has—"Post secundam vero, operam dare debemus, ut privati parentibus, quam minime miserabili calamitate premantur"—thus translated by Taylor, "But after the second it is necessary to devise some means by which orphans may be oppressed with calamity as little as possible."

⁵ I have translated as if the Greek were—ἐμμελῇ ταῦτα τοῦτοις—not ἐν μελίῃ τοῦτοις—Opportunately then do three MSS. offer ἐμμελῇ—

⁶ I have omitted τελευτήσασαι with Ficinus.

On this point indeed the reasons are true, but long, through the going round about. It is necessary likewise to believe in the other traditions relating to matters of this kind, which are so numerous and very old; and to believe too in those who legislate, unless they seem to be altogether insane, that such is the case. If then such is naturally the case, let persons fear in the first place the gods above, who have a perception of the desolate state of orphans; next, the souls of the dead, to whom in the course of nature it belongs to have a care of their own offspring, and to be kind to those who do them honour, but hostile towards those who treat them with dishonour; and further still, the souls of those who are living, but in old age, and in the greatest honours;¹ for to whom there is a state under good laws and prosperous, their² children's children live a pleasant life, through paying them a proper attention. ³ For all those acutely hear and acutely see every thing³ relating to these matters, and are kind to those who act justly to these persons, but excessively angry, on the other hand,⁴ with those, who behave insolently towards orphans and the destitute; since they deem (such a state) to be a deposit the greatest and the most sacred. To all of which points it is meet for the guardian and magistrate, who possesses the smallest degree of intellect, to direct his attention, and by bestowing his care upon the bringing up and education of orphans, to pay, as it were, a contribution for the benefit of himself and children, and to confer wholly a kindness to the whole of his power. He then, who is persuaded by this story⁶ before the law, and does not behave insolently towards an orphan, will never know distinctly the anger of the legislator about matters of this kind. But let him, who is unpersuaded and does an act of injustice to one

^{1, 2} I have translated as if the Greek were δρῶν γὰρ, not δρῶν περ, and τοῦτο, not τοῦτο—On the Attic δρῶν see myself in Æsch. Eum. 282.

⁴ I have adopted αὐ τοῖς—the reading of Ast, in lieu of αὐτοῖς—which is unintelligible.

⁵ Ast quotes opportunely Demosthen. c. Aphob. p. 840, 7, R.

deprived of father and mother, suffer a punishment entirely the double of what he would have done from acting evilly to a party whose parents are both alive.

With regard to the remaining portion of legislation applicable to guardians, in the case of orphans, and to magistrates touching their supervision of guardians, if they had not¹ themselves a pattern for bringing up free children, in bringing up their own, and taking care of their own property, and laws relating to these very matters stated² in moderation, there would have been some reason to lay down certain laws for guardians, as differing very much individually from others, and causing to vary by individual pursuits the life of orphans from that of those who are not so. But now, with respect to every thing of this kind, the care of orphans does not with us differ much from paternal care; but it is unwilling to be equalized in honour, and dishonour, and in attentiveness. Hence as regards this very point the law has, by consoling and threatening, attended to the legislation relating to orphans; and further still, a threat of this kind would be very seasonable. Let him, who is the guardian of a female or a male, and him, who is appointed by the guardians of the law to watch over the guardian, love, not less than his own children, the party who has a share in the misfortune of an orphan; nor let him pay less attention to the property of the party brought up than to his own, but better than according to the forethought³ shown to his own. Let then every one act as a guardian while having this one law relating to orphans. But if any one acts otherwise (and) contrary to this law in affairs of this kind, let the magistrate fine the guardian.⁴ And let the guardian bring the magistrate, (who has acted contrary to the law,) before the tribunal of select (jurymen),

² Instead of διγρημένος, Ast would read, what Stalbaum has edited from two MSS., διειρημένους—

³ The sense requires προμήθειαν, not προθυμίαν.

and punish him (if convicted) with a fine, that shall have seemed good to the tribunal, two-fold.⁴ And if the guardian shall appear to the kindred of the orphans, or to any other of the citizens, to act negligently or viciously, let such party bring him before the same tribunal; and ¹in whatever sum he shall be cast, let him pay the quadruple,¹ and let one half belong to the child, and the other to the party who brought the charge forward. When an orphan arrives at puberty, if he thinks that he has been badly treated by his guardian, let him be allowed to obtain by lot a trial relating to guardianship up to ²five years from the close of the guardianship;² and if any guardian is found guilty, let the court of justice fix what he is to suffer (in person), or pay (in purse); and if any magistrate shall appear to have injured an orphan through negligence, let the court of justice fix what he is to pay the child; and if through injustice, in addition to the fine, let him be removed from the office of a guardian of the law; and let the common power of the state appoint another in his place for the country and the city.

[9.] Greater differences take place between fathers and sons and between sons and fathers, than is proper; in which fathers will think that the legislator ought to permit them to renounce, if one wishes it, a son by the public crier, (and to say) he is no longer his own according to law; and sons, on the other hand, that they ought to be allowed to indict their fathers on the charge of silliness, when they are disgracefully in that state through disease or old age. Now these things are wont to take place, when the morals of men are perfectly corrupt. For on the half only of these evils taking place, as in the case of a wicked parent and child, or the contrary, calamities, which are the progeny of such a mighty hatred, have no existence. Indeed, in any other polity, a son disowned by his father would not necessarily become cityless; but in a state, where these are the laws, it is a matter of necessity for the fatherless to settle himself in some other place; since it is not possible for a single one to be added to the five thousand and forty households. On this account it is necessary that the son, who shall suffer this justly at the hands of one person, his father, should be renounced by his whole race. It is meet then, in relation to matters of this kind, to act according to some such law as this. For him, upon whom a feeling by no means fortunate has come, whether justly or not, in his desire to release the party, whom he has begotten and brought up, from a relationship to himself, let it not be lawful to do so upon slight grounds, nor on the instant; but let him first bring together his own relations up to cousins, and in like manner those of his son on the mother's side; and let him accuse his son before them, and show that he deserves on all accounts to be expelled from the family; and let him allow his son to give reasons of equal weight (to prove) that he does not deserve to suffer any thing of that kind; and if the father can persuade them, and get to vote on his side more than half of all the relations,¹ except the father,² mother, and the son himself,³ and of the rest such as are complete women and men,³ in this way and under these regulations let it be lawful for the father to renounce his son; but otherwise not; and if any of the citizens is willing to adopt as his son the party so renounced, let no law prevent him from so adopting him. For the habits of youth naturally undergo many changes continually in life. But if during ten years no one wishes to adopt the renounced party as a son, let the curators of the superabundant population⁴ (that is fit) for a colony,⁴ look to these likewise, in order that they may have a share in the same colony in a proper manner.⁵ But if disease, or old age, or

² After πατρός the Greek has διαψηφιζόμενον, which neither Ast nor Baiter could understand; for the former would read διαψηφιζόμενους, and the latter διαψηφιζομένων: nor could Ficinus, who has omitted it. I could have understood κρίβδα ψηφιζομένων placed after ξυγγενῶν, or after τῶν τε ἄλλων—harshness of manners, or all these together, more than any thing else, cause a person to be pre-eminently beyond the majority out of his mind, and this is concealed from every one, except those who live with him, and, as being the master of his property, he brings his family to ruin, but his son hesitates and fears to bring a charge of silliness, let a law be first laid down in this case, that the son is to go to the oldest guardians of the law, and inform them of his father's calamity; and let them, when they have seen him sufficiently, take counsel together, whether the suit is to be entered upon or not; and if they together advise (a suit), let them be both witnesses and parties in the cause. And if the father is condemned, let him for the remainder of his time be without the power of disposing by will of even the smallest portion of his property, but dwell at home for the rest of his life, like a child.

³⁻³ The words between the numerals are omitted by Taylor. Ficinus has "tam viri quam mulieres conferant, nisi ætas impedimento sit," which evidently leads to ὅσοι περ ἂν ᾧσι—μὴ τέλειαι, what the sense requires: where τέλειαι is to be taken in the sense of "perfect" in limbs and full grown.

⁵ I confess I scarcely understand here ἐμμελῶς, which Ficinus translates "congrue," and Ast would unite to ἐπιμελίσθαι.

[10.] If a husband and wife cannot, through the misfortune of their tempers, agree with each other, it will be requisite for ten men, from amongst the guardians of the laws, as mediators, and similarly ten women, who are the curators of marriages, to have the care of matters of this kind; and if they are able to reconcile the parties, let their decision be valid. But if their minds swell rather violently, like waves, let them seek, to the best of their power, such persons as will reside¹ with either party; and as it is likely that such persons are not tempered by gentle manners, it is meet² to endeavour to fit to them social habits and manners of greater weight and mildness, and that such as, being without children, or having but a few, disagree, ³should, even for the sake of children, make for themselves a joint-dwelling.³ ⁴But it is meet for such as, when there is a sufficient number of children, to make for themselves a separation and an union, for the sake of a joint old age, and a care for each other.⁴ If a woman dies,

² In lieu of δὴ one MS. has δε, which leads distinctly to δεῖ—

^{3—3} Such is the literal version of the Greek. Ficinus, whom Taylor follows in part, has "procreandorum liberorum causa conjugium rursus querere compellendi." Hence instead of τὴν, Winckelmann suggested καὶ τὴν—Orelli, ἀλλήν—

and leaves behind her male and female children, let the law laid down advise, but not compel, (the husband)¹ to bring up the children, and not bring upon them a stepmother; but if there are no children, let him of necessity marry, until he has begotten children, sufficient both for his household and the state. But if the husband dies, and leaves behind him a sufficient number of children, let the mother of the children remain (a widow),² and bring them up. But if she seems to be younger than is fitting for a person to live in a state of health without a husband, let her kindred, communicating with the women who take care of marriages, do what seems good to themselves and the women touching matters of this kind; and if they are in want of children, even for the sake of children;³ and let an exact sufficiency of children be considered, according to law, a male and a female. When it is agreed that an offspring is the progeny of the adopters,⁴ but there is a need of a decision, as to which of the parents the child ought to follow,⁵ if a female slave shall have had connexion with a slave, or with a free-born person, or with a freed-man, let the offspring be the property of the master of the female slave; and if a free-born woman shall have had intercourse with a slave, let the offspring belong to the master of the slave. If a slave becomes pregnant by her master, or a mistress by her slave, and this becomes apparent, let the women⁶ send the offspring of the woman, together with the father, into another country; but let the guardians of the law (send away) the offspring of the man together with its mother.

[11.] ⁷To have a neglect of parents neither a god nor a man, si filios non paucos habent atque dissentiunt, senectutis mutuo curandæ gratia, divortio facto, aliud conjugium ineant. What Plato meant to say, I must leave for others to explain.

² Here again Ficinus supplies, what is wanting for the sense, "vidua—"

³ Ficinus adds here—"ducant nubantve:" but Ast understands τοῦτο ποιοῦντων, which he explains by "mulierem viro nubere jubento." I am quite in the dark.

⁴ From the version of Ficinus, "qui sibi eos vendicant," Stephens, who is followed by Ast, was led to προσποιοῦμένων—"of those who lay claim to it"—Taylor translates "the begetters"—But that would be in Greek πεποιηκῶτων. Winckelmann would read either ἀποποιοῦμένων or ὁποιοῦμένων—

⁵ Ficinus, followed by Taylor, inserts "sic agatur"—

⁶ i. e. those, who have the care of marriages.

⁷ Winckelmann, in the Preface to the Phædrus in the smaller Zurich who has any mind, would ever advise any one. ¹ And it is necessary to consider that a prelude of this kind would be relating to the ministering to the gods,¹ having been properly regulated touching the honours and dishonours shown to parents. Now laws have been of old laid down relating to the gods amongst all men in a two-fold manner. For seeing clearly some of the gods,² we honour them; but of others we place statues as resemblances; which³ while we are honouring, although not endued with life, we do not vainly⁴ imagine that the gods, who are endued with life, feel a great goodwill on this account, and gratitude towards us. Let not then any one, whose father or mother, or the fathers or mothers of these, lie in his house, like a deposit, worn down with old age, ever conceive that while he has such a possession⁵ at his hearth and in his house, there will be ever a statue more powerful,⁶ if only the possessor ministers to it in a proper manner.⁷

Clin. What is the propriety which you say exists?

Athen. I will tell you. For things of this kind, friends, it is fit to hear.

Clin. Only mention it.

Athen. We say that Œdipus, having been dishonoured by his children, imprecated upon them what every one celebrates in hymns,⁸ ⁹ as having come to pass and being heard⁹ by the edition, has supplied here what he conceives to be omissions, by the aid of a fragment of Pempelus the Pythagorean, in Stobæus Tit. 77, p. 460.

² By these are meant the Sun and Moon.

³ Instead of οὗς, which is unintelligible, I have translated as if the Greek were ἄς, similar to "eas" in Ficinus.

⁴ I have translated as if the Greek were οὐ κενῶς, not ἰκύνους—

⁶ Ast incorrectly explains κύριον by "his own"—See a little below.

⁷ I have omitted ὁρθῶς, plainly an explanation of κατὰ τρόπον, although it seems to be defended by the subsequent ὁρθότητα.

⁸ On these imprecations of Œdipus see Valckenaer on Eurip. Phœn. 67.

⁹—Here again Plato has chosen to put the cart before the horse. For the prayers must have been heard by the gods before they were brought to pass.

gods. Amyntor too is said to have cursed in anger his son Phœnix,¹ and Theseus too Hippolytus,² and innumerable other fathers innumerable other sons. From which it has become manifest that the gods hearken to parents (when praying) against their children. For a parent is to his children, as no one else is to other persons,³ when imprecating a curse, most justly pernicious.³ Nor let any one imagine, that for a deity to be hearkening to the prayers of a father and mother, when dishonoured pre-eminently by their children, is according to nature; for when a parent is held in honour, and has become very joyous, and on this account is earnest in prayer and is calling upon the gods for good things to his children, shall we not imagine that they equally hear and grant us (their requests)? For otherwise they would not be just distributors of what is good—an act, which we say becomes the gods the least of all.

Clin. Certainly.

Athen. Let us think then, as we observed a little before, that we could not possess a statue more honoured by the gods, than that of our father and grandfather, worn down by old age, and of mothers and grandmothers, possessing the same want of power;⁴ which when any one honours, the god is glad; for otherwise he would not hear them.⁵ For the statues of our progenitors (still living) are wonderfully superior to those without life. For those, which are animated, do, when ministered to by us, pray for us on each occasion; but the very contrary when they are held by us in dishonour. But (the inanimate do) neither of these. So that he, who behaves properly to his father and grandfather, and all persons of this kind, would possess the most powerful of all statues, as regards his portion (of life) beloved by the gods.

Clin. You speak most beautifully.

¹ This was probably told in the Phœnix of Euripides, who followed Homer in Il. i. 417.

² See Eurip. Hipp. 891.

⁵ As there is nothing to which Ἀντῶν can be well referred, one would prefer Αἰτῶν, "prayers."

Athen. Every one therefore, who has any mind, fears and honours the prayers of his parents, as knowing that they have come to pass to many persons and at many times. Since then this is the ordinance of nature to good men, their aged progenitors will be a god-send, when living to the extremity of life, and young persons, when they depart,¹ be a source of great regret; but to the bad, on the contrary,² very terrible. Let then every one, persuaded by these reasonings, honour his parents with all lawful honours. But if the voice of preludes like these lays hold of any deaf person,³ for such would this law be properly laid down. If any one in this state takes a less care of his parents than is fitting, and does not pay them in all matters more attention than he does his sons, and all his offspring and himself, and is (not)⁴ fulfilling their wishes, let the party suffering in this way lay an information, either himself or by sending some one to three of the oldest guardians of the law, and likewise to three of the women, who have the care of marriages; and let these attend to the matter, and punish the offenders, if young men, with stripes and bonds, if they happen to be up to thirty years of age; and let women be punished with the same punishment, up to ten years more. But if they are beyond these years, and do not stand aloof from the same neglect of parents, but maltreat them in some way,⁵ let (persons) bring them before a court of justice, to one and each of the citizens,⁶ who may be the oldest of all; and if a person is cast, let the tribunal fix what he is to pay (in purse) or suffer (in person), and consider nothing of what a person can suffer (in person) or pay (in purse) as a thing not to be told. And

³ I have translated as if the Greek were not κωφή, but κωφόν, similar to "surdus" in Ficinus; unless it be said that Plato wrote κωφή κωφόν, for κωφός means both "deaf" and "dumb."

⁴ I have translated as if the Greek were ἀποπληρῶν μὴ ᾗ, not ἀπληρῶν ᾗ—

if any one, who has been maltreated, is unable to tell the tale, let him, who has heard from free persons, lay an information before the rulers, or let him be considered a bad man, and brought to trial by any one who is willing, for a mischief done. And if a slave gives information, let him be made free; and if he is the slave, either of the maltreating or maltreated parties, let him be made free by the magistrate; but if he is the slave of any other citizen, let the public (treasury) put down his value for his master; and let it be a care to the magistrates, that no one, in revenging himself, does an injury to a person of this kind for giving the information.

[12.] With respect to the cases, where one person does a mischief to another by means of poisons, such as are deadly have been already spoken of; but as regards other mischiefs, if any does an injury willingly and with malice prepense, by drink, or meat, or ointments, of these nothing has been stated as yet. For two kinds of poisonings ¹according to the race of man ²stop the statement. ³ For (the poisoning), of which we were just now clearly speaking, is doing an injury to bodies by bodies according to nature; but the other is that, which, by sorceries and incantations and the so-called bindings, ³ persuades those, who dare to injure them, ⁴ that they are able to do something of this kind; and others, that they are injured more than any thing by those, who are able to act the sorcerer. Now these matters, and all relating to things of this kind, it is neither easy to know how they exist in nature, nor, if any one did know, to persuade others. But upon the minds of men, who look with suspicion on each other in things of this kind,

²—² Here again I am at a loss. For though Ast translates ἐπίσχουσι τὴν διάρρησιν “inhibent expositionem,” yet I cannot see how such a result could arise from the poisonings merely of two kinds. Ficinus omits the words entirely.

it is not worth while to endeavour to make an attack,¹ if perchance they see representations moulded in wax, either on the house-door, or where three cross-roads meet, or on the tombs of their parents, and to exhort those, who have no clear notions about them, to hold all things of that kind cheap. Dividing then the law relating to poisonings into two parts,² according as a person may attempt to use poisons in one way or the other,³ let us first beg, and exhort, and advise persons, that they ought not to attempt to do a thing of this kind, nor to terrify the masses of mankind, frightened like children; nor, on the other hand, to compel the legislator and judge to cure mankind of such fears;³ since, in the first place, he who attempts to make use of poison, if he does not know what he is doing, both as regards the body, if he happens not to be skilled in medical science, and as regards on the other hand sorceries, unless he happens to be a diviner, or an interpreter of miracles.³ Let this law then be stated in words⁴ respecting poisons. He, who employs poison, not for deadly injury⁵ to a person himself, or to the folks belonging to that man,⁵ but⁶ for an injury of another kind, or deadly⁶ to cattle and hives of bees, if he happens to be a physician, and is condemned for poisoning

¹ I have translated, both for the syntax and sense, as if the Greek were ἐπιθῆναι, not πείθειν.

^{2—3} The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus, and by Taylor after him.

³ There is evidently a lacuna here.

^{5—6} The words between the numerals I hardly understand; nor could, I think, Ficinus. At least he has omitted them, and so after him has Taylor. The difficulty lies in ἐκείνου, placed after αὐτοῦ, whether the two pronouns be applied to the same person or not. Cornarius applies it to the same. Moreover ἀνθρώπων is strangely used here for ἀνδραπόδων, or ἄλλων, opposed to αὐτοῦ: from whence one would be led to read ἐν οἴκῳ for ἐκείνου.

^{6—6} Stephens was the first to object to εἰτ' ἄλλῃ βλάβῃ εἰτ' οὖν θανάσιμῳ, thus introduced after ἐπὶ βλάβῃ μὴ θανάσιμῳ. He would therefore expunge εἰτ' ἄλλῃ βλάβῃ, as an interpolation. But εἰτ' οὖν could not stand here or any where without εἴτε in a corresponding clause. I suspect that Plato wrote ἐπὶ ἄλλῃ βλάβῃ, explained by ἡγουν θανάσιμῳ: for when ἡγουν was corrupted into εἰτ' οὖν, the ἐπὶ would of course be altered into εἴτε. Ficinus seems, as remarked by Ast, to have found in his MS. εἰ γ' ἄλλῃ βλάβῃ ἢ θανάσιμῳ. For his version is "sive etiam ut aliter quam morte bestiis noceat."

let him be punished with death; but if he is unskilled (in medicine), let the tribunal fix what he must suffer (in person) or pay (in purse). But if any one by bindings-down, or allurements, or certain incantations, or any of such like poisonings whatever, appears to be like a person doing an injury, if he is a diviner, or an interpreter of miracles, let him be put to death. But if any one is accused of poisoning, without being a diviner, let the same thing take place to him likewise. For respecting him, let the tribunal fix what it seems good to them he ought to suffer (in person) or pay (in purse). Whatever injury one person does to another by fraud or force, if it be a great one, let him pay a greater fine; but a smaller one, if it be small; and in all cases let a party pay as much as he may on each occasion have done an injury, until he shall have remedied the mischief done. ¹In each case of wrong-doing, let each person pay the penalty that follows it, for the sake of bringing him to his senses; ¹ and let one, who in thoughtlessness has done wrong, and by making use of a persuasion foreign to his nature, through his youth or some such thing, (pay) a lighter (fine), but another one a heavier, through his own thoughtlessness, or his non-mastery over pleasure and pain, from the fears of cowardice,² or certain desires, or envyings, or angers, that have become difficult to cure; and let him suffer a punishment, not for having done wrong—³for what has been born, ne'er will be unborn³—but for the sake of this, that in after-time both the culprit and those, who see him under the sentence of the law, may either hate injustice entirely, or that a great portion of a calamity of this kind may cease. For the sake of all which, it is meet for the laws to look to all these matters, nor, like a bad archer, to take aim, for the sake of the magni-

² Stephens and Ast, objecting to ἐν φόβοις δειλίας, wished to read, the former ἐν φόβοις ἢ δειλίας, the latter ἢ δειλία— But as one MS. has λια

*δεινω*s, perhaps Plato wrote ἐν φόβοις δουλούμενος—“enslaved by fear.” Winckelmann suggests ἐν φόβοις δειλοῖς, referring to p. 870, C.

³—³ With this sentiment, Ὁ γὰρ τὸ γεγὸς ἐστὶν ἀγέννητον ποτε—which is a dramatic fragment, Ast compares Soph. Trach. 743, τὸ γὰρ Φανθὲν τίς ἀν δύναιτ' ἀν ἀγέννητον ποιῆν—and Horace, “neque Diffinget infectumque reddet, Quod fugiens semel hora vexit,” and the other passages quoted by Gataker in Misc. Adv. Posth. p. 756.

tude of the punishment in each case, and the proper desert viewed as a whole.¹ The same ought the judge to do, and to be the minister to the legislator, whenever a law puts upon him to fix what the party tried ought to suffer (in person) or pay (in purse); and, like a painter, he ought to sketch out the acts, in conformity with the description of them; which must be done at present by us, Megillus and Clinias, in the most beautiful and best manner; and we must state what fines, as they are called, are to take place for all acts done by fraud and violence, in order that the gods, and the sons of gods, may permit us to lay down laws.

[13.] If any one is insane, let him not be seen openly in the city, but let the relations of each person watch over them at home, in the best manner they know of; or let them pay a fine, he with property of the largest valuation a hundred drachms, if he is negligent in the case of a person, whether a slave or a free-man; he of the next valuation, four out of five parts of a mina; he of the third, three parts of a mina; and he of the fourth, four parts. Many indeed are mad in various ways. Some, of whom we have just spoken, through disease; others, through the vicious nature and nurture to boot of passion; for being excited by a trifling enmity, they send forth a loud voice and speak blasphemously against each other. But nothing of this kind ought to take place at any time, or by any means, in a state under good laws.² Let then there be this one (law) relating to all on the subject of evil-speaking. Let no one speak evil of another. But when one person has³ in some discourses³ a dispute with another, let him give to and receive instruction, from the person disputing, and those who are present, and abstain entirely from evil-speaking. ⁴For from uttering prayers and curses against each other, and bringing through disgraceful names the language of women upon each other,⁴ in the first place from words,

² I have adopted εὐνόμῳ for εὐνόμων, as suggested by Stephens, who refers to xii. p. 950, D., to which he was led by finding "bonis legibus instituta" in Ficinus, followed tacitly by Taylor.

³—³ In lieu of ἐν τισι λόγοις Winckelmann suggests ἐν πράξει λόγοις, referring to p. 888, A., but Baiter ἐν τισι συλλόγοις—

which are a light thing, hatred and grievous enmities are produced in deed. For by gratifying anger, a thing most unlovely, the speaker gorges passion with an evil feast, and just as much as he was once rendered mild by education, to such an extent does he again make his soul savage, and, living in moroseness, becomes like a wild beast, and receives from passion a bitter delight. And under these feelings all are frequently wont to go out of the way to utter something ridiculous about their opponents; to which there is no one who accustoms himself, but who fails in a seriousness of manner, partially or entirely, or destroys of highmindedness many a part. On this account therefore, let no one ever speak any word of this kind in a temple, or ¹at public sacrifices,¹ or at public games, or in the market-place, or a court of justice, or at any common meeting. But let the magistrate, who is the president at such places, punish without damage to himself the individual (so speaking); ²or never let him enter the lists for the prizes of good conduct, as being one who pays no attention to the laws, nor performs what is enjoined by the legislator.² And if any one in other places begins abuse or uses it in self-defence, and does not keep himself from language of this kind, let any more elderly person, who meets him, in defence of the law restrain with blows those, who ³act kindly towards anger, another ill;³ or let them be held amenable to the fine ordained. We say too at present, that he, who ⁴is entangled with abuse,⁴ is not able to make use of it without seeking to say what raises a laugh; numerals—"cum enim sibi invicem verbis turpibus maledicunt, mulieres habentur—"

²—² Ficinus is here unusually prolix—"quod si non fecerit, quasi legum proditor præceptorumque legislatoris spretor, nunquam ad publici cujusquam muneris certamen, quasi de virtute certaturus, ascendat."

³—³ The Greek is τοὺς θυμῷ, ἐτέρῳ κακῷ, φιλοφρονουμένους: where φιλοφρονουμένους is strangely used for χαριζομένους, and ἐτέρῳ κακῷ applied to λοιδορίῳ. Ficinus has "ira, alieno malo, concitati," dissatisfied, it would seem, with φιλοφρονουμένους. Winckelmann proposes θυμῷ, ὥσπερ θηρίῳ κακῷ—I should prefer θυμῷ, ἀγρίῳ κακῷ καὶ ἀφίλῳ, θηριουμένους—Cousin with Grou refers κακῷ ὄντι to πληγαῖς—

and this is what we abuse ourselves, when it takes place through anger. But what then? ¹ Shall we admit the propensity of comic writers to say what raises a laugh against persons, if without any feeling of anger they attempt in their comedies to say any thing of this kind against the citizens? Or shall we make a twofold division into the playful and not? and that it may be lawful for any one in fun to say what is laughable, if without anger, about any one; but that it be not lawful for any one, as we said before, when on the stretch² and with any angry feeling? This then must by no means be put off; but let us lay down by a law for whom it may be lawful, or not. Let it then be not lawful for any composer of comedies, or of any iambics or melodies of the Muses, either by words or caricatures, to make any citizen a butt in comedy, either in anger or without anger. And if any one disobeys (this law), let the umpires at the contests expel him utterly from the country on the very same day, or be fined three minæ, sacred to the god to whom the contest belongs. But let it be lawful for the others, to whom it has been stated above that there is a permission, to do so to each other without anger and in sport; but let it not be allowed in seriousness and in anger. And let the inquiry into this matter be committed to him, who has the care of the whole education of the young. And whatever he shall select, let it be lawful for the composer to bring it before the public; but whatever he rejects, let not the author show it to any one, nor let him be found to have taught it to any other person, either a slave or free-man; or let him be considered as a vicious character, and disobedient to the laws.

[14.] But he is a person deserving of pity, not when he is hungry or suffers a thing of this kind, but when temperate, or possessing some (other) virtue,³ or a part of it, he has in pugnæ;" and hence λαιδορίαῖς συμπλεκόμενος would signify "fighting with abuse," as Thersites doubtless did, until he was stopt by Ulysses—¹ idea that would have been borne out to the letter, had Plato written—ζητεῖν, Θερσίτης δὲν—

³ Ficinus alone has "virtute alia," as if his MS. read τιν' ἄλλαν ἀρετήν addition a certain calamity.¹ Hence it would be a thing of wonder, should a person, who is such, be so entirely neglected, as to arrive at extreme poverty, whether a slave or a free-man, in a polity and a city which is regulated even moderately. On this account it would be safe for the legislator to lay down for such persons a law of this kind. Let there be no beggar in the state. But if any one attempts to do a thing of this kind, by collecting food by prayers² which cannot be satisfied,² let the Market-Stewards expel him from the market-place, and the City-Stewards from the city, and the Rural-Stewards send him from the rest of the country, over the land on the borders, in order that the land may become altogether pure from an animal of such a kind.

If a male or a female slave injures the property of persons ever so little, the injured party himself not being a joint-cause, through inexperience or any other event of an intemperate kind, let the owner of the party, who has done the mischief, either remedy the mischief in not a deficient manner, or hand over the injuring party himself. But if the owner (of the slave) brings an accusation by saying that the charge has been made by the common trick of the parties injuring and injured, with the view of depriving him of his slave, let him bring against the person, who pretends to have been injured, an action for fraudulent practices; and if the party is convicted, let him receive double the value of the slave, at which the tribunal may have fixed it; but if he is himself defeated, let him remedy the mischief and give up the slave. And if a beast of burden, or a horse, or a dog, or any other animal, injures the property of neighbours, let³ (the owner of the animal)³ in like manner pay for the mischief done.

If a person is unwilling to be a witness, let the party, who wants him, cite him;⁴ and after being cited,⁵ let him meet the

²—³ Such is Taylor's translation of "inexplebilibus" in Ficinus; a meaning that ἀνεύρεται can scarcely bear.

³—³ Ficinus, whom Taylor tacitly follows, has alone, what the sense requires, "animalis dominus—"

⁴ This would be said in England "to serve him with a subpoena."

party at the trial ; and if he knows the facts, and is willing to give evidence, let him give it.⁵ But if he says that he knows nothing, let him swear by the three deities, Zeus, Apollo, and Themis, that he knows nothing, and be dismissed from the trial ; and let him, who, when cited to give evidence, does not attend,¹ be held amenable for the mischief according to law. If any one cause a juryman to stand up as a witness, let him not, while giving evidence, give his vote upon the case. Let a free woman be allowed to bear witness, and appear as counsel, if she is more than forty years of age, and to obtain by lot a trial, if she is unmarried ; but if her husband is living, let her be allowed to be a witness only. Let a male and female slave, and a boy,² be allowed to be a witness in the case of murder, and to act as counsel, if they can produce trust-worthy bail that they will remain up to the trial, should they be accused of bearing false witness. Let either of the litigants bring a charge against the whole or part of the evidence, if he asserts that some have borne false witness before the trial is decided ; and let the magistrates preserve in writing the accusations put under the seal of both, and bring them forward for the purpose of deciding upon the false testimony. If any one shall be twice convicted of having borne false witness, let the law no longer compel him to bear witness again ; but if thrice, let him not be allowed ever to bear witness again. And if he dares, after having been caught thrice, to bear witness, let any one who is willing, inform against him before a magistrate ; and let the magistrate deliver him to a tribunal, and if he is convicted, let him be punished with death. Of whomsoever, that have seemed to have borne false witness in a cause, and by so doing to have gained the suit for the plaintiff, the evidence shall be detected, if more than half of such testimony is condemned, let the verdict obtained by such evidence be set aside, and let there be a question of doubt, and a trial, whether the cause had been decided or not by such evidence ; and according as the decision may be on either side, let the final result of the previous trials be determined by this decision.

While however there are many things of beauty in the life of man, to the majority of them there stick, as it were naturally, evil fates, which stain and defile them. And yet, as there is justice amongst men, how is not that beautiful, which renders all human affairs mild? And this being beautiful, how would it not be beautiful in us to take the side of a party in a cause? But ¹ on these notions being of such a kind a certain maliciousness brings a calumny,¹ by putting forward art under an honourable name, which says forsooth that the first thing is a certain stratagem in causes, and that it is able to gain a victory ² by litigating, and taking a part in causes,² whether what may have been done respecting each suit is just or not; and that of this art, and of the speeches resulting from it, there is a gift, if a person will give money in return. This therefore, whether it is an art, or an artless skill ³ and practice, it is particularly necessary that it should not exist in our state; but, as the legislator ⁴ requests (the people) to be persuaded by him, and not to say what is contrary to justice,⁴ ⁵ be sent about its business to some other country.⁵ ⁶ To those then, who are persuaded, silence (is sufficient); ⁶ but for the unpersuaded let this be the voice of the law. If any one is thought to be endeavouring to turn the power of justice, which is in the souls of the judges, to a contrary direction, and out of season ⁷ to

¹ The technical word in Greek was ἀπαντᾶν, "to meet," as shown by Demosthenes in various places, quoted by Ast.

² This boy would appear strange, did we not know that youths up to eighteen years of age were called "boys" at Athens.

¹—¹ The Greek is ταῦτα οὖν τοιαῦτα ὄντα διαβολή τις κακή— But as all calumny is bad, and as there is nothing to govern ταῦτα—τοιαῦτα, Cornarius proposed to read κακοί, adopted by Stephens. Since however one MS. offers διαβάλλη, and another διαβάλλη, I have, with the Zurich editors, accepted διαβάλλει, and altered κακή into κακία, where Orelli would read κάκη, and Winckelmann, δικανική—

²—² Such, I presume, is the meaning of τῷ τε δικάσασθαι καὶ ξυνδικεῖν: which Ficinus either did not understand, or else he found something very different in his MS. For his version is “quo agenda et dicenda, sive honesta, sive turpis sit causa, superare facile quis possit, victoresque facere, quibus ipsa rationibus suis favet.” The art however to which Plato alludes here is evidently that of the Sophist, who boasted that he “could make the worse appear the better reason.”

⁵—⁵ Ficinus differs again from the Greek, “et alio profecta, vires suas ostendat.”

⁶—⁶ The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus.

⁷—⁷ Instead of πολυδικεῖν, which is not, I believe, to be found else-toss back and fro⁷ a matter of this kind,¹ or to side with it, let any one who is willing, indict him for the perversion of a suit, or siding with a wrong one; and let the trial come on in the court for select jurymen; and if he is convicted, let the court decide whether he seems to have done a deed of this kind through a love of money or contention; and if through a love of contention, let the court decide for what length of time such a person is not to obtain by lot a suit, or to side in a suit with any one; but if through avarice, let him, if he is a stranger, depart from the city, and never return to it again, or be punished with death; but let a citizen be put to death for his love of money, which has been honoured by him in every way; but if a person is convicted of having done so twice through a love of contention, let him be put to death.

BOOK XII.

[1.] ² If an ambassador or a herald by telling falsehoods performs improperly an embassy from one state to another, or when sent does not report the embassy on which he is sent, as it is in reality; or again, on the other hand, is clearly bringing back not correctly from enemies or friends what he has heard as an ambassador or herald,² let indictments be drawn up against these persons, for having, contrary to law, acted with impiety towards the messages and mandates of Hermes and Zeus; ³ and let there be a fine as to what he is to suffer (in person) or pay (in purse).³

where, I have translated as if the Greek were παλινδικεῖν, where there is a play on δικεῖν, "to throw," and δίκη, "a suit," as in Aristoph. Ach. 376, Τῶν τ' αὖ γερόντων οἶδα τὰς ψυχὰς, ὅτι Οὐδὲν βλέποντο' ἑς ἄλλο πλὴν ψῆφον δικεῖν; for so I corrected in Præf. Troad. p. xxviii., and should have compared Archestratus, quoted by Athenæus vii. p. 305, E., Εἰώθασι δονεῖν ψήφους αἰθωνι λοχισμῷ.

³⁻³ Ficinus has more fully "et iudices pro magnitudine rei, quid pati dareve ipsum oportet, si damnatus fuerit, statuunt."

The stealing of money is an ungentlemanlike act, but seizing by violence is a shameless one. But of the sons of Zeus not one¹ has ever carried on either of those pursuits by fraud or force with impunity. Let no one therefore, acting improperly, be deceived and persuaded at all² by poets or certain mythologists, and think that, if he makes use of fraud or force, he does nothing disgraceful, but only what the gods themselves are doing. For this is neither true nor becoming. But whoever³ does a thing of this kind contrary to law, is neither a god, nor a son of the gods. But this it is fitting for the legislator rather than all poets to know. He therefore, who is persuaded by our discourse, is happy, and may he be happy through the whole of time; but let him, who is unpersuaded, be restrained⁴ subsequently by some such law as this. If any one steals what is public property, whether great or small, he has need of the same punishment; for he who steals a trifle, steals with the same desire, but with less power. But he, who removes any thing of greater value, and does not put it down again, is wholly unjust. The law however deems it just to punish the one with a less punishment than the other, not on account of the greatness of the theft, but through one of them being perhaps curable, but the other incurable. If any one convicts before a tribunal a slave or a stranger of stealing any public property, let sentence be passed on him as to what he ought to suffer (in person),⁵ or what fine he ought to pay,⁵ as if he were, from what is likely, curable; but if a citizen, who has been brought up, as he will have been brought up, is caught committing a theft upon, or doing violence to, his country, whether taken in the fact or not, it is meet to punish him with death, as being nearly incurable.

² I have translated as if the Greek were μηδαμῶς ὑπό τε, not μηδ' ἄλλως ὑπό—where I cannot understand ἄλλως, nor could Ficinus; who has "a fabulosis aliis hominibus," as if he wished to read, or found in his MS., μηδ' ὑπ' ἄλλων τινων μυθολόγων—

⁴ In lieu of μαχέσθω, Stephens would read κατεχέσθω, from "arcebitur" in Ficinus. But Ast, more correctly, ἐνεχέσθω—

⁵ The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus; for the letters ἡ τινα ζημίαν ἀποτίνειν, made up one line of the Codex Archetypus.

[2.] For the sake of foreign expeditions much consultation and many laws are properly instituted. The greatest of all things, however, is for no one, either male or female, to be at any time without a ruler, nor the soul of any one, either seriously engaged or in sport, to be ever accustomed to do any thing alone itself by itself; but that in all time of war and in all of peace, to look perpetually to a ruler, and, following him, to live and be governed by him in the smallest things; as for instance, to stand, when he commands, and to march and to engage in gymnastics, and to wash himself, and to take food, and to get up at night, to mount guard and to convey orders; and in the midst even of dangers, neither to pursue nor to give way to any one, without the orders of the rulers; and in one word, to teach the soul by habit to do nothing apart from the rest, nor to think of, or know it at all; but that the life of all men should, as much as possible, be in all things collected (into one), and in common. For nothing is, or will ever be, superior to, and better, and more full of art than this, for the purposes of safety and victory in war. And in peace, too, men must from their childhood be practised in ruling over others, and being ruled by others; but anarchy must be expelled from the whole life of all men, and ¹of wild beasts under man.¹ All dancing moreover (it is meet) to celebrate with a view to the best modes of warfare, and to practise a complete facility in using the body and arms for the sake of the same objects, and an endurance in food and drink, and of cold weather and the contrary, and a hard bed, and, what is the greatest of all, the not destroying the powers of the head and feet through the covering of strange clothing, and by relaxing² the generation and growth of our natural caps and shoes.³ For these extremities, when preserved, possess the greatest power of the whole body; but the contrary, when in a contrary state; and one (the feet) is the most subservient to the whole body; but the other (the head) has the greatest power, through possessing naturally all its dominant senses. And this praise of a war-like life, it is meet, it seems to me, for young men to hear: but the laws are these. Let the party serve in a campaign, who is on the list, or has been ordered through a certain quota

³ By a natural cap is meant the hair, and by a natural shoe, the hardened flesh.

But if any one through cowardice deserts his post, without a dismissal from the army-leaders, let an indictment for desertion lie before the war-officers, when they return from camp; and let those, who have served, try each of the parties, the heavy-armed foot and the cavalry severally, and all the other arms of the service each of the parties in a similar manner; and let the heavy-armed bring (the defaulters) before the heavy-armed, and the cavalry before the cavalry, and each of the other arms in like manner to those of their comrades. If any one is convicted, let it be not in his power to be a candidate for the whole prize of good conduct; ¹ or to indict another party for not serving in a campaign, ¹ or to be an accuser on these matters; and besides this, let a court of justice decide what he is to suffer (in person) or pay (in purse). After this, when the trials for desertions have been decided, let the commanders of each arm of the service form an assembly; and let the party, who wishes it, have amongst his own clans a trial relating to the prizes for good conduct; but let him not produce any testimony touching a former war, nor the confirmation of his assertions by witnesses, but only of the campaign, which had taken place at that time; and ² let the crown of victory to each be that of a bough; ² and let this person, after writing out an inscription, hang it up in the temple of whatever war-god he likes, as a witness through the whole of life, of the decision relating to the prize of good conduct; and so of the second and third prizes likewise. But if any one goes out during a campaign, but returns home before his time, without the commanding officers having sent him away, let there be indictments against such persons for leaving the ranks before the same parties as those in the case of non-service; and against the parties convicted, let punishments be imposed, such as have been laid down before. Now it is requisite for every man, when bringing every kind of law-suit against a person, to have a fear of bringing a false punishment, ³ either willingly or unwillingly, to the best of his power. For Justice is said to be a modest ¹ virgin, and ² is said to be so really.³ Now Falsehood is naturally an object of blame to Modesty and Justice. Respecting other matters then it is requisite to take care not to err against Justice; but pre-eminently so, in the case of throwing away arms in war; lest perchance a person by making a mistake about the throwing away of arms from a necessity, places such acts on the score of a reproach, and brings lawsuits unjustly against a person not deserving them. Indeed it is by no means easy to define one or the other of these points. It is necessary however for the law to endeavour to define somehow in part. Employing then a fable, let us say, that had Patroclus been carried to his tent without arms, and was still alive, as has befallen numberless persons, ³ and those former arms, which, as the poet says,³ (Il. Σ. 84,) were given as a wedding present to Peleus by the gods on his marriage with Thetis, had Hector possessed, would it have been lawful for such bad men, as were at that time, to reproach the son of Menœtius, for throwing away his arms? Still further, ⁴ (could such persons be reproached,) ⁴ who, by being thrown down from precipices, have lost their arms, or (have fallen) into the sea ⁵ during storms, or ⁶ in level places, when a τιμωρίαν, proposed to read κατηγορίαν μήτε μαρτυρίαν— So too Ficinus has “supplicium multamve,” unless it be said that he has here, as elsewhere, translated one Greek word by two Latin.

²—² Such is the literal version of the Greek. Ficinus has "corona ex frondibus arboris perpetuo virentis conserta," as if his MS. omitted τὸν νικητήριον, and had αἰεζῶου after θάλλου. Taylor's translation is "let a crown of olive too be the reward of the military champion." From which I have been led to conceive that ελαίνου has dropt out after θάλλου—

² ² As ὄντως εἰρηται never are, because they could not be, so joined, Plato wrote, no doubt, πάντως εὖ εἰρηται, “wholly well said—”

³ ³ Ficinus has “et arma, quæ a diis, ut poeta dicit, in dotem Thetidi data fuerant, ab Hectore rapta fuissent,” as if his MS. omitted πρότερα ἔκεινα, and read εἰλεν for εἶχεν.

⁴ ⁴ I have adopted, what Ficinus alone has preserved, absolutely necessary for the sense, “eruntne vituperandi—”

great flow of water has suddenly received⁶ them—and¹ numberless things of this kind one might chaunt, when consoling (persons), and beautifying an act bad (in itself), and easy to be abused? It is necessary, however, to the utmost of our power, to divide the greater and the most grievous evil from the contrary. Now in abuse, the very abundance of such appellations possess nearly a certain division. For a person would not be justly called in all cases a thrower away of a shield, but the loser of them. For he, who is deprived (of his arms) by a reasonable display of force, and he, who throws them willingly away, would not be equally a thrower away of a shield; but there is a difference wholly and entirely. Let then this be held as spoken by a law. If any one, being overtaken by the enemy, and having arms, does not turn round and defend himself, but voluntarily drops them, or throws them away, catching at a base life, united to ²a soulless cowardice,² rather than at an honourable death, united to manliness, against such a loss of arms thrown away, let there be justice done; but let the judge neglect to consider the loss mentioned above. For it is requisite always to punish the coward, in order that he may become better; but not the unfortunate. For in this there is no advantage. ³But what punishment will be suited to him, who gives up such a power of defensive weapons to a contrary purpose?³ ⁴For it is not possible to do, in the case of a man, the contrary to what they say a god did, by changing lated as if it were originally ἐν τόποις ἀπείδοις δεξαμένης—for ἀπεδον, found in Thucyd. vii. 78, χωρίον ἀπεδον, is explained in Greek Lexicons by ισόπεδα, ὁμαλά: while it is chiefly in level grounds that a sudden rush of waters, when it overtakes an army, is sure to carry off soldiers, unless they throw away their arms.

¹ In lieu of ἤ, Stephens saw that the sense requires καί, as I have translated.

³⁻³ Such is the literal version of the Greek. Ficinus has “sed quænam abjectionis armorum damnato et a virili fortitudine degeneranti pœna congrua erit?” One would prefer τὸν ἐναντίον, “the enemy—”

⁴⁻⁴ Ficinus, whom Taylor follows almost to the letter, swerves here from the Greek, which I have closely translated, in his version, “præ-

Cæneus of Thessaly from a woman into the nature of a man.¹

¹ For to the man, who throws away his shield, the sex would, after a manner, be the most becoming of all, which is the contrary to that sex, which, by the being changed from a man into a woman, would become a punishment to such a person.¹ But now, what² is the nearest to these, in order that a person, for the sake of a love of life, may through the remainder of life run no risk, but live as long as possible, as being a coward and coupled to reproaches, for such let this be the law. The man, who is convicted of having disgracefully thrown away his weapons of war, let neither the general of an army, nor any other military officer, ever employ as a soldier, nor put him into the ranks at all; otherwise let the party, who is the auditor of his accounts and doings, set him to rights thus.³ If the person who has put the coward into the ranks, belongs to the highest property-census, (let him pay) a thousand drachms;⁴ if to the second, five minæ; if to the third, three; and if to the fourth, one mina. And let him, who has been convicted (of throwing away his arms), pay, in addition to his being excluded from manly dangers, through his own individual nature, a thousand drachms, if he belongs to the highest census; and five minæ, if to the second; three, if to the third; and one mina, in like manner as the preceding, if to the fourth.⁵

[3.] With respect to the auditing⁶ of accounts, what would be for us the fitting discourse, when some of the magistrates are chosen by the chance of a lot for a year, and others for many years

sertim cum impossibile sit homini in contrarium commutari, ut Cæneum Thessalum ferunt divina quadam vi in naturam viri ex foemina commutatum." The god alluded to is Neptune, as we learn from the Scholiast and Hyginus, Fab. xiv., quoted by Ast; who should have adopted Stephens' ϕ in lieu of his own ω , for ω ς—

² I have adopted Ast's δ , τ for $\delta\tau$ — And so too Sydenham.

³ Photius in Eὐθύνας quotes—τούτους καταθέμεν αὐτοῖς—where lies hid οὐτως, as I have translated.

⁴ i. e. 10 minæ.

⁵ After τεράριον the text has μέρους, which is evidently an interpolation.

⁶ I have adopted εὐθύνων, which Ficinus found in his MS. for εὐθύνων, as shown by his version—"repetendis—rationibus—" and from a selection? For of such accounts who will be a sufficient Auditor? ¹ For should any one of the persons in office say or do any thing not straightforward, when bent down by the weight of his duties, or by the want of power, with respect to the dignity of his office, it (would be) by no means easy to find a ruler, superior to (other) rulers in virtue; ¹ still we must endeavour to discover some god-like Auditors. For the case is this. There are many occasions for dissolving a polity, as of a ship, ² or any animal; ² ³ of which while we say there are blocks, and underjoinings, and fibres, and ropes, ³ we call the nature one, yet dispersed in many parts by many names. But this is an occasion by no means the smallest, for the preservation of a polity and its dissolution and falling away. For if those, who audit the accounts of the magistrates, are better than the magistrates, and this takes place with justice not to be blamed, ⁴ and in a blameless manner, the whole country and state thus flourishes and is happy. But if that, which relates to the audit of the magistrates, takes place in a different manner, then the justice,

²—² This introduction of an animal seems very strange here, as if an animal were, like a form of government or a vessel, made by man. Unless I am greatly mistaken, Plato wrote νεὼς εὐζώστου τινος, not νεὼς ἡ ζώου τινος, for he goes on to mention the parts of a well-joined vessel.

³—³ The Greek is at present οὗς ἐντόνους τε καὶ ὑποζώματα καὶ νεύρων ἐπιτόνους. I have translated as if it were originally—ἡς λέγοντες ὄνους τε καὶ ὑποζώματα καὶ νεῦρα εἶναι ἐπιτόνους τε—for by ὄνους is meant what we call the “blocks” through which the ropes run, or a windlass, as it would seem from Eustathius on Il. A. p. 862 = 807, and the Schol. on Thucyd. vii. 25, ὄνος ἐστὶ μηχανὴ ἐπ’ ἄκρων τῶν ἀκατίων πηγνυμένη, ἀφ’ ἧς περιβάλλοντες βρόχους τοὺς σταυροὺς ραδίως ἐκ τοῦ βυθοῦ ἀνέσπων. With regard to ἐντόνους, that word is never found in the sense of a rope; only τόνους and ἐπιτόνους—both of which however would not be used here: and with respect to νεύρων ἐπιτόνους, Cornarius was the first to read νεῦρα καὶ ἐπιτόνους, for he doubtless remembered the passage in the Timeus, p. 84, E., τοὺς τε ἐπιτόνους καὶ τὰ ξυνεχῆ νεῦρα—By νεῦρα are probably meant ropes made of the tendons of animals twisted like the so-called cat-gut.

⁴ Winckelmann would expunge ἀμέμπτω: Orelli read ἀμιάντω, referring to p. 777, E. Ficinus, followed by Taylor, has “ut nemo jure conquiri possit.” What Plato wrote, others, I hope, will discover.

which binds together all political affairs into one, being dissolved, the whole government is torn apart, one portion from another, and ¹no longer inclining to the same point,¹ they cause the city from being one to become many, and, filling it with sedition, destroy it quickly. On this account then it is requisite for the Auditors to be objects of admiration for their virtue. Let us then devise by some method that their production shall be of this kind. Let the whole city come together each year, after the turn of the sun from the summer to the winter, to a sacred grove, common to the Sun and Apollo,^{2 2} with the view of exhibiting to the god³ three men, which each person shall judge to be the best of all except himself, and not less than fifty years of age; and of those voted in preference by the greatest number of persons, let them make a selection up to the half, if they are an even number; but if they are odd, let them take away the one, who had the fewest votes, and leave the half, and make a decision by the number of votes; but if to some the votes are equal, ⁴and they make the half number more,⁴ let them take away the surplus, after rejecting on account of the youth; but selecting the others, let them give their votes again, until three with unequal votes are obtained.⁵ But if for all or for two the votes are equal, then, committing the affair to good fate and fortune, let them select the victor by a lot, and let them crown him, and the second, and the third, with a bough;⁶ and after giving the prizes for excellence, let (a crier) proclaim to all, that ⁷the city of the Magnesians having again obtained

² This is the only place I remember, where the Sun and Apollo are considered different deities.

³—³ Ficinus, followed by Taylor, has simply "electuri"—

⁴—⁴ These words, I confess, I cannot understand. Ficinus has "dimidiumque numerum auxerint"—which is equally unintelligible. Taylor translates—"and the half of these is more than three"— safety from a god, shows before the Sun three of her best men, and offers them up, according to the old law, as a common first-fruit to Apollo and the Sun, for as long a time as they follow their judgment.¹ Let these in the first year mark out twelve Auditors¹ (and do so)¹ until each has reached his seventy-fifth year; and afterwards, let three be always added every year. Let these, dividing the magisterial offices into twelve parts, freely² examine them, by making use of all kinds of touchstones; and let them reside, as long as they are Auditors, in the grove sacred to the Sun and Apollo, in which they were elected. And let each, judging of some matters privately, and of others in common with each other, exhibit the rulers before the state; and putting, what they have written respecting each office in the market-place, let it be stated what the parties are to suffer (in person) or pay (in purse) according to the decision of the Auditors. And whichever of the magistrates shall not admit that he has been judged of with justice, let him bring the Auditors to the select jury-men; and if he escapes from the Auditors' decision, let him, if he will, bring a charge against the Auditors themselves; and if he is convicted, let him, if the punishment fixed by the Auditors against any one is death, simply die, as necessity requires; but of the other fines, of which it is possible to pay the double, let him pay the double.

⁵ In lieu of λειφθῶσιν Stephens proposed to read ληφθῶσιν, similar to "obtaineant" in Ficinus, and so the best MS., followed by Ast and Stalbaum. The Zurich editors prefer λειφθῶσιν. But in the whole of this passage I must acknowledge myself to be quite in the dark.

⁶ Here, as before in § 2, Ficinus renders θάλλω by "ex semper virentis arboris frondis contexta"—

It is now meet to hear what the honours³ of these Auditors are to be, and after what manner. Let the first seats in all public meetings be given to those, who, while they live, are deemed by the whole state worthy of the prizes for good conduct; and further, in the case of sacrifices, and holy embassies νόμον Τρεῖς τοὺς ἀρίστους ἄνδρας, ἀκροθίνιον Κοινόν τ' Ἀπόλλωνος καλόν θ' ὃν Ἥλιον, Ὅσον περ ἀκολουθῶσι τῇ δίκῃ χρόνον, where, however, correct Greek would require a dative after ἀκροθίνιον, as shown by ἀκροθίνια Λοξία in Pheniss. 210. As regards the last clause, all the words after "Sun" are tacitly omitted by Taylor. Ficinus has—"quatenus iudicium secuturi sunt—" But the business of the Auditors was to follow not the judgment of any one, but justice alone. Hence I suspect that Plato wrote not κρίσει, but δίκῃ. The two words are confounded in MSS. elsewhere.

amongst the Greeks in common, and of holy rites, in which there is a communion on other grounds,¹ let them send from amongst these the chiefs of each holy embassy; and let these alone of those in the state be adorned with a crown of laurel; and let all of them be priests of Apollo and the Sun; and let one be the high priest for the year, who is adjudged to have been the first amongst the priests² in that year;² and write up his name every year, in order that it may become the measure of the period of time, as long as the city is inhabited. And when they die, let the laying out of the corpse, and the carrying it out, and their graves, be different from those of the other citizens; and let (every one)³ wear his whole robe white, and let no one be without weeping and lamentation; and let there be also (one) choir of fifteen girls, and another of as many boys, and let each stand round the bier, and sing in turn praises on the priests, as it were a set hymn, and celebrate their happy state in an ode the whole day long; and on the morning (following), let a hundred young men, amongst those engaged in gymnastic exercises, and whom the relations of the deceased shall have selected,⁴ carry the bier to the sepulchre. And first, let the unmarried young men precede (the bier), each having put on a warrior's dress, the horsemen with their horses, and the heavy-armed foot-soldiers with their shields, and the rest after a similar manner; and let the boys around the bier go before and sing the national hymn, and let the girls follow behind, and such of the women as happen to be freed from child-bearing; and after them let the priests and

² Ficinus has, what the sense requires, "in superiori anno." But how ἐκείνῳ came here in lieu of περσίνῳ I am unable to explain.

³ So Taylor, as if he wished to read πάντα for πᾶσαν—Plato wrote, I suspect, πάντας πᾶσαν—For πᾶς is thus repeated perpetually.

priestesses follow, as to a pure tomb, although they are repelled from other tombs, if at least the Pythian priestess gives her vote so and on this side; and let the place of deposit for them be built under the earth, a long vault composed ¹of stones very valuable, and without old age to the best of their power,¹ and having couches, made of stones, lying by each other; where having placed the man, who has become blessed,² and raising a mound in a circle, they shall plant a grove of trees around, except at one limb, in order that the burial-place may have an enlargement,³ such that there may be no deficiency in a mound for those to be placed there in all time;³ and they shall make yearly contests in music and gymnastics and horsemanship. Such are the honours to be paid to those,⁴ who have escaped (the reversal) of their auditorship.⁴ But if any one of these, confiding too much in his having been tried, should exhibit ⁵(a depraved)⁵ human nature, by becoming depraved after his trial, let the law ordain that any one, who is willing, may indict him; and let the trial take place at a tribunal, in some such manner as this. First let the guardians of the laws belong to this tribunal. Next ⁶of these very persons

²—² On this custom of calling a deceased person by the name of blessed, see Blomfield on Æsch. Pers. 639.

⁴—⁴ Such is, as Ficinus saw correctly, what the sense requires. This is evident from his version, adopted almost to the letter by Taylor, "hæc præmia illis reddantur, quorum de relatis rationibus judicia damnata non sunt." But such is not the meaning of τοῖς τὰς εὐθύνας διαφυγούσιν—What Plato wrote, I must leave for better scholars to discover.

⁵—⁵ I have translated as if κακὴν had dropt out before κακός—

the living;⁶ and moreover let the tribunal be composed of the select jurymen. And let him, who lays the indictment, put on the record against the party, whom he is indicting, the charge, averring that this or that person is unworthy of the prize for good conduct and of his office. And if the defendant is cast, let him be deprived of his office, and sepulchre, and the other honours granted to him; but if the accuser does not obtain a fifth part of the votes, let him pay, if his property is of the highest valuation, twelve minæ; eight, if of the second; if of the third, six; and if of the fourth, two.

[4.] Respecting the so-called decision of Rhadamanthus, in judicial matters, it is indeed worthy of admiration. For he saw that the men of that time distinctly believed that there were gods, and reasonably so; because at that time the majority were the descendants of gods, of whom he was himself one, at least as the story goes. He appears, therefore, to have thought that he ought to commit (nothing)¹ to any man as a judge, but to gods; from whence causes were decided by him simply and quickly. For by tendering an oath to the disputants upon each matter in dispute, he was freed from them with rapidity and safety. But since at present, as we have stated, some portion of mankind think that the gods do not exist at all; and others conceive that they take no care of us; while the opinion of the greatest and worst part is, that, by receiving trifling sacrifices and abundance² of flattery, they will conjointly deprive persons of considerable property, and free them from harm on many occasions,³ the art of Rhadamanthus in lawsuits would no longer be suited to men of the present time. For since the opinions of men respecting the gods have undergone a change, it is necessary for laws to be changed likewise. In the allotment of causes therefore, it is meet for those who, possessing a mind, lay down laws, to take away the oaths of either of the opposing parties, and for the party, who has obtained by lot a trial against any one, to write down the accusations, but to swear no oath; and for the defendant in like manner to write down his denial, and to hand it over to the rulers without an oath. ¹For it is surely a terrible thing to know well that, while many lawsuits are occurring in the state, almost one half of the parties have perjured themselves,¹ by having been easily mixed up with each other at joint-feasts² and through other intercourse and private joint-producing of each one.³ Let it therefore be laid down as a law that he, who is about to act the jurymen, shall take an oath as a jurymen; and that he, who appoints for the commonweal the magistrates by oaths, or by the bringing of votes,³ must bring them from sacred places and do something of this kind;³ and on the other hand, that the judge of choirs and all kinds of music, and the presidents over, and the umpires at, the gymnastic and equestrian contests, and in all matters which, according to the opinion of men, do not bring a gain to the party forswearing himself, (shall take an oath;) ⁴but in those, that seem to be plainly a great profit to the party, who makes a denial or takes an oath, let all, who bring a charge against each other, be judged by lawsuits without any oaths.⁴ And generally in a lawsuit let

¹ I have translated, as if οὐδέν had dropt out between οὐδένι and διανοούμενος.

² I have retained πολλὰς, which Bekker, followed by Stalbaum, has inconsiderately omitted with two indifferent MSS.

^{1—1} Such is the literal version of the Greek. Ficinus has rather strangely, what Taylor has adopted, "Nam si jurandi licentia cuique dabitur, ubi plura quotidie ad iudices deferuntur, omnes pœne perjuri erunt."

^{2—2} Such is the literal version of the Greek, συνουσίαις τε καὶ ἰδιωτικαῖς συγγενήσεσιν ἐκάστων: where Ast explains συγγενήσεσιν by συνουσίαις, thus introducing a needless tautology. Moreover γένησις always means elsewhere "a producing," or "production." Opportunely then does the best MS. offer συντρονήσεσιν, from which it is easy to elicit συμπρονήσεσιν, "joint-labourings;" but as the idea of an act, done jointly by more persons than one, requires the mention of such persons taken jointly, not individually, it is evident that for ἐκάστων the train of thought leads here to δικαστῶν: while the antithesis required by ἰδιωτικαῖς plainly shows that δημοσίαις has dropt out after συνουσίαις; and thus the sense will be "by other intercourse, and joint-labourings of jurymen of a public and private kind," where, by the figure Chiasmus, ἰδιωτικαῖς belongs to συνουσίαις, and δημοσίαις to συμπρονήσεσιν.

^{3—3} The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus, and after him by Taylor. With regard to the expression τὰς ἀρχὰς ἀφ' ἱερῶν φέρεσθαι, Ast explains it by saying that the pebbles used in voting were taken to a temple, as stated in vi. p. 753; C. § 2, and afterwards brought from thence with the odour of sanctity about them.

^{4—4} Ficinus, followed almost to the letter by Taylor, has thus abridged all between the numerals, "in quibus autem utilitatem ex perjurio aliquis assequitur, ea sine jurejurando judicentur."

not the presidents permit a person while speaking to take an oath, for the sake of making his assertion credible, or to imprecate curses on himself and race, or to employ unseemly entreaties or the piteous tones of a woman, but let the party proceed ever with good words in teaching¹ and learning¹ what is just; and if not, let the magistrate, as if the party were speaking out of the record, bring him back to the arguments that may happen to be relating to the business in hand.² But let it be in the power of a stranger (when litigating) with a stranger, as at present, to receive from, if they are willing, and to tender to, each other oaths.² For they will not grow old,³ nor by hatching young ones⁶ in the state,⁴ will they furnish the power to others for the most part of such a brood to become the masters of the country.⁴

In the same manner let there be a decision respecting the allotment⁵ of lawsuits against each other in all cases, where a free-man is not obedient to the state in matters, deserving neither stripes, nor bonds, nor death. But as regards the non-attendance⁶ at dancings, or processions, or other public acts of a showy kind, or sharing in public duties, such as take place for the sake of a sacrifice in peace, or a contribution in war, in all these let the first necessity be a remedy⁷ for the damage done; but from such, as are disobedient, let a security be demanded by those, on whom the state and the law together enjoin to demand it;⁸ and of such, as are inattentive

^{1—1} The words between the numerals, evidently out of place here, are omitted in the best MS. Ficinus has elegantly, but not closely, "sed quod justum putant mansuete doceant, et docentem audiant."

^{2—3} Here again Ficinus, followed by Taylor, has abridged the original in his version, "peregrinis autem inter se litigantibus, quemadmodum nunc, si velint, jurare liceat."

^{2—3} The metaphorical word ἐννεορρεῦντες is omitted by Ficinus and Taylor; who should have remembered ἐπιθυμίας—ἐννεορρεῦμέναις in Rep. ix. p. 573, E. § 3, quoted by Ast.

^{4—4} Ficinus, followed to the letter by Taylor, has strangely represented this passage in his version, "non est formidandum, ne alios corrumpant."

⁵ Such, I presume, is the meaning of λήξεως. But the reading is here uncertain. For two MSS. offer λέξεως: while Ficinus, followed by Taylor, has "Eodem autem modo inter liberos homines executio iudicii fiat."

⁶ Ficinus has, what the sense requires, "siquis ad choreas—non venit"—as if his MS. read τῶν οὐ ποιήσεων, not τινῶν—

⁷ I have adopted ἴασιν for ἰαρήν, as suggested by Ast.

^{8—8} Here again Ficinus, followed by Taylor, has strangely rendered—"exactoque tempore—"

(to the matter),⁸ let there be a sale of the security, and let money (got from the sale) belong to the state. But if they are in need of a greater fine, let each of the magistrates, after imposing a fitting fine on the disobedient, bring the parties before a court of justice, until they are willing to do what they are ordered.

[5.] It is necessary moreover to consult about what it is meet to do for a state, which does not make money, except by what¹ arises from the land, and does not import any thing,^{2 3} touching the going abroad of its own people out of the country, and the reception of foreigners from other parts.³ On these points the legislator ought to give advice by first persuading to the utmost of his power. The intermixture indeed of states with states naturally causes a mixture of all kinds of manners, through strangers making with strangers innovations⁴ with each other;⁴ which thing would bring an injury the greatest of all to those, who have a good polity through good laws. But, to the greater number of states, as being by no means under good laws, it makes no difference for the citizens⁵ to be contaminated by receiving foreigners, and for the citizens⁶ to revel in other states, when a person is desirous of going abroad in any way or at any time, whether he is young, or rather advanced in years. But, on the other hand, for these never to receive others, and never themselves to travel elsewhere, is not at all suitable; and it would appear to be a behaviour rustic and rude to the rest of mankind, who would make use of harsh names, such as the so-called stranger-expellings,⁷ and manners self-willed and morose, as they would seem to be. Now to

² I have supplied τι, which seems to have dropt out after ἐμπορεύηται, unless it be said that ἐμπορεύεσθαι means “to be a foreign merchant—”

²⁻³ Ficinus, followed partly by Taylor, has—“neque peregrinationibus vacat, neque peregrinos aliunde suscipiat—”

⁴⁻⁴ As ἀλλήλοις is evidently superfluous, Ficinus has “plurima innovare—” either because his MS. read μάλα πολλάς, or he wished to read so from conjecture. I should prefer ἀλλῃ ἄλλους, i. e. “some in one way, and others in another.” See my Poppe’s Prolegom. p. 135.

^{5, 6} Winckelmann has correctly suggested ἀστοῖς for αὐτοῖς, and he should have read likewise ἀστούς for αὐτούς—in *. What Ficinus found in his MS. it is impossible to ascertain; for he has abridged the passage in his version, adopted by Taylor—“si tam senes quam juvenes pro arbitrio et alio peregrinatur et aliunde peregrinos suscipiant.” appear to be good, or not good, to others, it is meet never to consider a thing of small importance. For the multitude¹ do not, as far as they happen to fail in the substance of virtue, fail so far in their judgment of others, who are vicious and useless,¹ but there is even in the bad a something divine and felicitous in hitting the mark, so that very many even of the very bad distinguish very well, both by their words and thoughts, the better sort of men and the worse. And hence the exhortation to many states is correct, to set some value on the good opinion of the multitude. For it is a thing the most correct and of the greatest consequence for a man truly good to hunt in this way after a life of fair repute; for without it, he will by no means become the perfect man. And truly becoming would it be for the city, settled in Crete, to render itself in the opinion of the rest of mankind the most beautiful and best. And there is every hope in all likelihood, should it conduct itself according to reason, that in a little time² the Sun and the other gods will see it amongst the states and countries, that are well-governed. In this way then it is meet to act, with regard to travelling into other countries and places, and the reception of foreigners. In the first place, let it not be lawful for a person less than forty years of age to go abroad at any time, or in any manner; and further still, for no person on a private account, but on a public one, let it be lawful for heralds or ambassadors, or certain holy inspectors (to go abroad). But to be absent from the country during a war or a campaign, does not deserve to be called a going abroad, nor to be a part of such political doings. It is likewise requisite to send persons to the Pythian Apollo, and the Olympian Jupiter, and likewise to Nemea and the Isthmus,³ to take a share in the sacrifices and contests (sacred) to those gods; and to send the most numerous, and such as are the most beautiful and the best in their power, who may cause the state to appear of fair repute in holy and peaceful meetings, by exhibiting its apparatus for renown as the counter-part of what is requisite for war. And when they return home, they will teach the young, that the legal institutions of the rest of mankind relating to political affairs, are second to their own. ¹ But on other grounds it is (not) meet to send out holy inspectors; but some such as these, after obtaining permission of the guardians of the laws,¹ should any of the citizens be desirous to look at the affairs of the rest of mankind, let no law restrain. For a state, while unacquainted with good and wicked men, cannot by being unsociable be sufficiently mild and perfect. ² Nor again, can it preserve its laws without taking them into consideration, but not only by morals.² For amongst the multitude there are always some, not many, godlike men, every way worthy of being associated with, and who are produced in no respect the more in well-governed states than in those that are not so; in whose footsteps it is ever meet for him, who dwells in well-regulated states, to proceed, when on going out by sea or by land, he is seeking the party, who may be uncorrupted, so as to make some of the legal institutions, that have been laid down correctly, more firm, and to correct others, where there is any deficiency. For without such an inspection and search, a state will never continue perfect; ³ not even if they inspect it badly.³

² Bekker has adopted μετ' ὀλίγων from four MSS., similar to "cum paucis aliis civitatibus" in Ficinus.

³ It seems strange, that after Plato had mentioned the names of the gods, who presided over the Pythian and Olympian games, he should have omitted that of Neptune, who presided over the two others. Hence one would suspect that τῷ Ποσειδῶνι had dropt out after τῷ Διὶ καὶ—

³—³ The words between the numerals I cannot understand. Three MSS. offer ταύτην for αὐτήν: from which nothing is gained. I could have understood οὐδ' ἂν κακίστην τινα θεωρῶσιν, “not even if they inspect a very bad one,” in lieu of κακῶς ταύτην—

Clin. How, therefore, can both of these take place?

Athen. Thus. [6.] First let an inspector of this kind be not more than fifty years of age; and further, let him be of good repute for other matters and for war, if he is about to lay before other cities a specimen of the guardians of the laws. But when he is more than sixty years of age, let him no longer be an inspector. And having made an inspection for as many years of the ten as he likes, let him return home and go to the assembly of those who inspect the laws. And let this (assembly) be composed of old persons and young; and let it be held of necessity every day, from day-break until the sun rises; and let it be composed first of those priests, who have received the prizes for good conduct; next, ten of the guardians of the laws, ¹who happen to be the seniors; ¹ and further still, the guardian of the whole education, both the new one, and those who have been released from the office. And let each of these go not alone, but with a young man from thirty to forty years of age, having taken as an ally the person agreeable to himself; and let there be a conference amongst them, and a conversation upon the laws of their own state, and on such matters as they shall have heard of, superior at all in any other quarter; and about objects of learning to boot, such as may seem to be of use in this inquiry, and which, to those, who have learnt, will be more clear to be understood; ² but to those, who have not learnt, the points relating to laws would seem to be rather dark. ³ And whatever the elders may select from these, let the younger learn with all attention; and if any one of those, who have been invited, seems to be an unworthy person, let the whole meeting blame the party who invited him. But let the whole ⁴ state watch over those of the young men, who are in good repute, ⁵ looking at them, and observing them pre-eminently; and let them hold in honour those, who

³ After φαίνεσθαι I have omitted καὶ ἀσαφῆ, evidently an explanation of σκοτωδέστερα.

are in the right way,⁵ but in dishonour more than the rest, if they turn out worse than the majority. To this meeting let him, who has inspected the legal institutions amongst the rest of mankind, go immediately on his arrival; and if he has discovered any persons possessing any rumour about the laying down of any laws, or of education or bringing up, let him mention it, or if he has himself thought upon any matters, let him communicate it to the whole assembly. But if he appears to have returned in no respect either worse or better, let him be praised at least for his very great readiness to go; but if (he returns) much better, let him while living be greatly honoured, and when dead, let all the power of the parties in the assembly honour him with befitting honours. But if he appears to have returned corrupted, although he pretends to be wise, let him associate with no one, either young or old. And if he is obedient to the magistrates, let him live in private; but if not, let him be put to death,¹ at least if he be convicted in a court of justice of being a busy-body on the subject of education and the laws.¹ But if none of the rulers bring him before a court of justice, when he deserves it, let a reproach be laid up against the rulers at the time of their undergoing a trial for the rewards for good conduct. Let him then, who goes abroad, go abroad in this manner, and being such a person. But after him it is meet to receive kindly the person, who comes from abroad. Now there are four kinds of foreigners of whom we ought to make mention. The first is he, who comes ever in the summer, and continues for the most part in his visits like birds of passage; and of these the majority flying, as it were, cleverly² over the sea in the spring of the year,³ wend their way to other cities, for the sake of making money as merchants; which persons it is meet for the magistrates, appointed for such purposes, to receive in the market-places, and ports, and public buildings outside the city, at the city;⁴ taking care that

² I have translated, as if the Greek were ἐντίχυνως, not ἀτίχυνως. For most assuredly neither birds of passage, nor persons in the pursuit of gain, fly from place to place "artlessly."

³ Although πετόμενοι—πίτονται might perhaps stand, yet I have translated as if the Greek were ἐπιτείνονται—

⁴ Such is the literal version of the Greek, πρὸς τῇ πόλει: which Fi-

none of such foreigners make any innovation ; and distributing correctly to them the claims of justice, and having an intercourse with them for what is necessary, but as little as possible. The second kind is he, who is in reality an inspector with his eyes, and receives¹ with his ears such sights, as are presented by the Muses. For every such person it is meet that lodgings should be fitted up near the temples by the kindness of people towards strangers ; and it is meet for the priests and the sweepers of the temples to take care² that, after they have staid a moderate time, and have seen and heard (all), for the sake of which they came, they take their departure, uninjured by doing or suffering any thing ; and let the priests be their judges, should any one of them do an injury to any one, or any one else³ do an injury to any one of them, to within fifty drachms. But if there be a greater charge laid against them, it is requisite that the trial in such cases be before the Market-Stewards. The third kind of foreigner it is meet to receive in a public manner, when he arrives from another country on some public business. Him let the Generals, and the Hipparchs, and the Taxiarchs alone receive ; and let the care of such person rest with that one of the Prytanes, with whom alone any person, received as a stranger, takes up his abode. The fourth, should he come at any time, is a rarity ; but if he should come, the counterpart of the Inspectors from us,⁴ let him, first, be not less than fifty years of age ; besides this, let him think it right to see something beautiful, and superior in its beauty to the things in other cities,⁵ or to show something of the same kind to another city.⁶ Let then every such person come unbidden to the doors of the wealthy and wise, as being himself another of such a kind.⁶ And let him go to the house of the party, who is the guardian of the whole of education, trust-cinus renders, "in ipsis suburbiis." But such could scarcely be the meaning here. Plato wrote, I suspect, πρὸς τῇ ἐμπολῇ, "for the purpose of traffic."

² I have omitted, with Ficinus, ἐπιμελεῖσθαι καὶ, an evident explanation of τημελεῖν.

³ The sense evidently requires ἄλλος for ἄλλον, as I have translated.

⁴ Ficinus alone inserts here "hic ita recipietur," adopted by Taylor.

⁵ Winckelmann would read καὶ δεῖξαι τι κατὰ ταῦτά ἄλλο τῇ πόλει.

ing that ¹the reception of a stranger by one of those, who have gained a victory for virtue, will be sufficient for a stranger¹ of such a kind; and after being with some of these, and teaching in part, and learning in part,² let him go away honoured, as a friend should be by friends, with gifts and becoming honours. According to these laws it is meet to receive all strangers, both male and female, from another country, and to send out our own people, doing honour to Zeus, who presides over hospitality, nor to make an expulsion of foreigners by eatings and sacrifices, as ³the nurslings of the Nile³ do at present, nor yet by savage proclamations.

[7.] Let a person, who makes himself a guarantee, make it in an explicit manner, by acknowledging the whole transaction in writing, before not less than three witnesses, where the guarantee is for a sum under a thousand drachms; but, if above a thousand, before not less than five. ⁴Let the broker of a person, who sells any thing not justly, or is not trustworthy, be a guarantee;⁴ and let the broker, like the seller, be amenable to a lawsuit.

If a person wishes to search for his property in the possession of another party, let him, having previously sworn by the gods who preside over laws, that he expects to find (the property), search for it, either naked, or wearing a small cloak

¹—¹ The Greek is ξένος τῷ τοιούτῳ ξενῶνι τήν—where Ast, unable to understand τήν, would omit it. But the difficulty rests rather in ξένος—ξενῶνι. I have therefore translated as if Plato had written ξένισιν—ξένῳ, where ξένῳ is furnished by two MSS. Baiter suggests ξένος—ξένῳ ἡ—and so does Grou.

³—³ Despite the assertion, καθάπερ ποιοῦσι νῦν, it is hard to believe that in the time of Plato the people in Egypt fed upon foreigners and sacrificed them; while from the poetical expression, θρέμματα Νείλον, one would suspect that Plato obtained the knowledge of the fact from some drama, the argument of which was similar to the Helena and Iphigenia in Tauris of Euripides. Ast however explains the passage by saying, that “to expel foreigners from banquets and sacrifices is to prohibit them the use of such things.” But the dative βρώμασι could not be thus taken in the sense of the genitive ἀπὸ βρωμάτων.

and ungirded;¹ and let the other permit him to search the house, and the portions sealed up or unsealed. But if any one does not allow the search to the party desiring it, let the party, who is prevented, bring an action, after setting a value upon the property sought;² and, if the person is convicted, let him pay for twice the loss of the property valued. If the master of the house happens to be abroad, let those that inhabit it permit the search of such portions as are unsealed, and let the searcher place his own seal by those already sealed, and appoint any person he pleases as a guard for five days. But if the master is absent for a longer time, let the other party take the City-Stewards along with him, and search it thus, by breaking the seals, and, together with the relations and City-Stewards, seal them again in the same manner (as before).

Of property in dispute ³it is meet to define the time,³ during which, if a person has held it, it will not be lawful to dispute it any longer. Of farms and dwellings indeed there will be in this way no dispute. But of other property, whatever a person may have had in his possession, if he appears to have used it in the city, and market-place, and at sacred rites, ⁴(openly for a whole year),⁴ ⁵and no one has made a claim upon it, and he says he has been seeking (an owner)⁶ during that time, but that the party has concealed himself and never

² From "amissæ rei" in Ficinus, Ast was led to τὸ ἡρπυγόμενον, for τὸν ἡρπυγόμενον, subsequently confirmed by two MSS.

⁵⁻⁵ Such is the literal version of the Greek. Ficinus has "atque hunc non occuluisse constat, nec quisquam interea, quamvis quærens, eam exegerit."

appeared—if a person has thus held possession of any thing for a year,⁵ ¹ and he continues to be the seeker,¹ let it be lawful for no person² to lay claim to property of this kind, after a year has gone by. But if a person uses it neither in the city nor in the market-place, but in the fields openly, and no one offers himself during five years (as the owner), let it not be lawful for any one, after the five years have elapsed, to lay claim to it for the remainder of time. But if any one uses it at home in the city, let the period (of laying claim) be for three years; but if he uses it not openly in the country, for ten years; but if in another land, whenever (the owner) shall find it any where, let there be no definite period in all time for laying claim to it.

If any one by violence prevents another from being present at a trial, whether the party himself, or his witnesses, or his slave, or that of another person, let the cause be unfinished and undecisive; but if (the party prevented) is a free-man, in addition to the cause being unfinished, let (the party preventing)³ be in bonds for a year, and let him be amenable to a trial for making him a slave at the suit of any one, who wishes. And if any one by violence prevents an antagonist in a gymnastic or musical or any other contest from being present, let any one, who is willing, inform the prize-distributors; and let them send to the contest a free-man, who is willing to contend; but if they are unable (to do so), let them, should he, who has prevented a party from contending, be the victor, assign the reward of victory to the party prevented, and write him down as the victor in whatever temples he pleases; but to the party preventing let it not be lawful for any offering or inscription of such a contest to exist; and let him be amenable to a trial for doing an injury, whether he is defeated in the contest, or is the victor.

If any one receives stolen property knowingly, let him undergo the same punishment as the thief. Let death, too, be the punishment of him, who harbours an exile.⁴ For⁵ let every ¹—¹ Such, I presume, is the meaning of ὁ δὲ ζητῶν διαγένηται, for so we must read in lieu of διαγένηνται—which I cannot understand; nor could, I think, Ficinus, for he has omitted the whole sentence.

² I have adopted Ast's μηδενὶ for μηδέν—

³ Ficinus alone has what the sense requires—"qui depulit—"

⁴ Ficinus alone adds here—"seu quemvis hujuscemodi fugientem—"

⁵ Ficinus alone has "quippe—"

one consider the same person a friend and enemy, as the state does. If any one makes privately a peace¹ with, or a war against, certain persons, without the public (sharing in it), let death be the punishment for such a one. But if any part of the state makes a peace with, or a war against, any persons for its own benefit for itself, let the Generals bring the authors of this affair before a court of justice; and let death be the punishment of the party convicted. For they, who serve their country in any way, ought to do so without gifts. And let there be no pretext or argument held out,² that for good deeds we ought to receive gifts, but not for bad. For it is not easy either to know,³ or knowing⁴ to restrain oneself⁴ patiently, when this knowledge is obtained. It is, therefore, the safest plan to obey the law—"Do not serve for gifts"—and let him who does not obey, simply die, when found guilty at a trial.

With regard to the contribution of money to the public, it is meet for⁵ the state of each person⁵ to be valued, for many reasons; and for the parishioners to put down in writing before the Rural-Stewards the yearly produce, in order that, as there are two contributions, the public may, after deliberating⁶ every year, make use of whichever it pleases, whether it be a part of the whole valuation, or of the income arising each year, exclusive of the sums paid for the joint-feasts.

It is meet likewise for a man of moderate means to make moderate offerings to the gods. Now the Earth is the holy hearth of the whole⁷ domicile of all the gods. Let no one ¹ Of this an instance is feigned to take place in Aristoph. Ach. 291. See too Thucyd. v. 60, ἐνὶ ἀνδρὶ τῶν ἐν τέλει σπίνδεται.

² Instead of ἐπαινούμενον, which I cannot understand, I have translated as if the Greek were ἐπιτείνόμενον—

³ Taylor adds, and so does Ast—"when actions are good or bad."

⁴ So Ficinus understood καρτερεῖν, as shown by his version—"continere"—to which Ast adds—"from accepting gifts."

⁷ The Greek is πᾶσι, which, as it is omitted by Cicero Legg. ii. 18, 45, and Ficinus, Casaubon would reject on Apuleius Apolog. p. 30, ed. Lugd. 1614, but Wagner on Cicero alter to πᾶσα: which would be correct only if οἰκήσις be read with Ficinus in lieu of οἰκήσιως, that requires πάσις, as I have translated.

then consecrate (the same thing)¹ a second time to the gods. But gold and silver in [other]² states, both privately and in temples, is an invidious possession.³ And ivory, as belonging⁴ to a body, that has departed from life, is not a pure⁵ offering to the gods. And iron and brass are the instruments of war.⁶ Let, then, any one offer up whatever he pleases, of wood,⁷ and of one kind of wood,⁸ and, in a similar manner, of stone at the public temples; and let the woven portion be not more than one month's work for one woman; and the colours becoming to a god, both in other things and those woven, should be white; and offer nothing dyed, except for warlike ornaments. But the most godlike gifts are birds and pictures, such as a painter could finish in a single day. And let all the other offerings be imitations after this fashion.

Since then the portions of the whole state have been detailed, as to what number and of what kind they ought to be, and the laws have been mentioned relating to compacts of the greatest moment, it would be requisite that, as to what remains, the lawsuits⁹ relating to all matters should be mentioned.⁹ In the first place, there should be in the courts of justice selected judges, whom the defendant and plaintiff may choose in common, having the more becoming name of arbitrators, than ¹ Cicero has "iterum idem;" who therefore found in his MS. ἐπὶ καθιερούτω ταῦτά—unless he quoted from memory. Theodoret in Theophrast. Serm. iii. p. 519, B., offers ἐπὶ εἰκόνα—similar to "simulacra" in Ficinus. And in truth εἰκόνα, or rather εἰκώ, might easily have dropt out between ἐπὶ and καθιερούτω. What Plato wrote is quite uncertain.

² Both Cicero and Ficinus omit ἄλλαις, acknowledged by Clemens Alex. Strom. V. ii. p. 692, Pott., which I confess I cannot understand; and I should therefore prefer πολλαῖς—

³ Cicero's version is "res," as if his MS. read χρῆμα. Compare Eurip. Phœn. 205, Φιλόσογον τι χρῆμα θῆλυ γένος ἔφν.

⁴ So Taylor, and after him Ast; who would, however, read ἄτε λελοιπότος in lieu of ἀπολελοιπότος—He should have suggested that ἄτ' had dropt out before ἀπ'—

⁵ In lieu of εὐχέρεις, Clemens, Theodoret, and Euseb. P. E. iii. 8, p. 99, D., offer εὐαγές, similar to "satis castum" in Cicero. Ficinus has "in-cptum—" Perhaps Plato wrote οὐκ εὐαγοῦς χειρὸς—

⁶ Cicero adds "non fani—"

⁷ Ast explains ξύλου, where the genitive is without regimen, by "quod attinet ad—" But ἐκ has evidently dropt out between ὄργανα and ξύλου—similar to "ex ligno" in Ficinus, and ἐκ λίθου in Theodoret.

⁸ Cicero adds "cavato—"

of judges. Secondly, let those of the same village and parish divided according to a twelfth part (be the judges), before whom let those go to contest about greater damages, who shall not have had the cause decided before the first judges; and let the defendant, if he is defeated a second time, pay the fifth part of the damages ¹ in the indictment.¹ But if any one brings an accusation against the judges, and wishes to contest the matter a third time, let him carry the cause before the select judges; and if he is again defeated, let him pay the whole of the damages, and the half of it besides. But if the plaintiff, after being defeated before the first (judges), will not be quiet, but goes to the second, let him, if he is the victor, receive the fifth part; but if defeated, pay the same portion. And if the parties go to the third tribunal, not satisfied with the former trials, let the defendant, if defeated, pay ²as has been stated, the whole of the damages, and the half to boot,² but let the plaintiff pay the half only of the damages. With respect to the allotments of the tribunals,³ and their fillings up,⁴ and the appointments of persons⁵ to minister to the magistrates, and the times at which each of these ought to take place, and the matters relating to votes, and puttings off, and all that of such a kind necessarily takes place in lawsuits, and the obtaining by lot former and latter (trials)⁶ and the necessities of answers,⁷ and of coming (into

cinus, whose version is—"quin tam debiti partem persolvet."

²—² Ast, with the approbation of Stalbaum, would read τὸ πεμπτημόριον, ὥσπερ εἶρηται, καὶ τὴν ἡμιολίαν. But Cousin correctly observes that ὥσπερ εἶρηται is to be referred to τὴν ἡμιολίαν, and not to τὸ πεμπτημόριον.

³ If Plato had here an eye to the customs of his own country, he would have written δικαστῶν, "jurymen," as is evident from the Scholiast's explanation of Aristoph. Plut. 277.

⁴ From the note of Ast it appears that Matthias in Miscell. Philolog.
T. i. p. 3, p. 253, has discussed this passage. But as I have never seen the work, I am unable to state whether he has done so satisfactorily or not. Judging however from the extract made by Ast, it would seem that he has not thrown much light on the obscurity in πληρώσεις: by which word I suspect Plato meant to show, that, when all the special jurymen in any cause, called ἐκλεκτοὶ δικασταί, did not appear in court, their place was supplied by some of the common jurymen, who happened to be present, as is done to this day in England.

⁵ Ast says that ὑπηρεσιῶν is here put for ὑπηρετῶν.

⁶ Budeus, quoted by Ast, supplies here δικῶν— for the order, in which the suits were to be taken, was determined by lot.

⁷ Harpocration explains ἀπόκρισις by ἀπολογία. But I suspect it court)¹ and all together that are the nearest of kin² to these, we have spoken of even before;^{3 4} but what is right is beautiful twice and thrice.⁴ All such legal matters then, as are of a trifling kind, it is requisite for a young legislator to fill up after an older one has passed them by. The tribunals relating to private suits, would, when existing in this way, have a sufficient measure. But those, that are public and common, and which it is meet for the magistrates to make use of, (so as) to administer affairs suited to each office,⁵ are in many states the not unseemly legislation nor few of reasonable persons;⁶ from whence it is requisite for the guardians of the laws to furnish what is suited to the polity now being in a state of birth, by reasoning together, and correcting themselves (and) testing by experience, until each of the points shall appear to be laid down sufficiently; and then by putting a finish, to place a seal on what is to be thus irremovable, and to use them for the whole of life. But what relates to means what is called "an answer" given to an "interrogatory," put by one party to another, as in the Court of Chancery in England.

² In Greek ἀδελφά, which is used metaphorically in a similar manner elsewhere. See at Epistol. 6, p. 499, n. ⁴.

the silence and the good-omened language¹ of the judges and the contrary, and what in other states cause² (the mind) of the many to change improperly (about) things³ just, good, and honourable, these have been mentioned in part; but a part will be still mentioned towards the end. To all of which it is requisite for him, who is about to be an impartial judge according to justice, to look, and possessing⁴ them in writing to learn respecting all.⁵ For of all objects of learning the matters laid down relating to laws have the greatest power to make the learner better; ⁴which event, if the laws are laid down correctly, would take place (well);⁴ or vainly would the law, (considered) by us divine and wonderful, possess a name having an affinity with intellect.⁵ And moreover⁶ of the rest of discourses whatever are detailed in poems, as the praise or blame of some persons, or whatever in prose, whether in writings, or in all the rest of daily meetings, and are disputed about through a love of contention, and through concessions sometimes very foolish⁶—of all these the writings of the legislator

³⁻³ The Greek is at present γράμματα αὐτῶν περὶ μανθάνειν: which Ast unable to understand, has adopted πᾶρα for περὶ, as suggested by Stephens. But πᾶρα is never thus put after its case, as περὶ constantly is. I have translated as if it were originally γεγραμμέν' αὐτὰ πάντων περὶ μανθάνειν. Ficinus has, what he considered to be the general sense, “atque operam dare, ut has legum constitutiones ante omnia dicat et mente firmiter teneat.”

⁵ In a similar strain it has been said by some English lawyer, who perhaps had heard of this passage in Plato, that “Law is the perfection of Reason.” With regard to this notion of the Athenian philosopher, Taylor remarks that νόμος is properly νοῦ διανομή—an idea obtained, I suspect, from Proclus or some other Neo-Platonist.

⁶⁻⁶ Such is the literal version of the Greek, where I can scarcely discover what Plato is aiming at. How much more intelligible is the Latin of Ficinus—“Nam cum multi sermones de laude vituperationeque nonnullorum, partim carminibus, partim soluta oratione, tum scripti circumferantur, tum quotidie in coronis, seu contendendo sive falso assentiendo, habeantur.” With regard to ἀλλαις πάσαις συνουσίαις, which could not be thus opposed to γράμμασιν, the author wrote, I suspect, λαλίας πᾶ-

would be the clearest touchstone; which it behoves a good jurymen to possess in himself, the remedies, as it were, against the poison of other discourses; and by putting himself and the state in a straight course, ¹ to furnish to the good an abiding and an increase in justice; ¹ but to the bad a change, to the best of his power, from ignorance and intemperance, and timidity, and in one word, from all injustice; to such at least of the bad as have opinions that can be cured; but to such as have (their opinions) really ² woven by fate, ² the jurymen and leaders of the jurymen would be deserving of praise from the whole state, by assigning, what would be frequently said justly, death as the cure for minds so disposed. After the lawsuits, that occur yearly, have been decided upon, and come to an end, it is necessary for carrying out the proceedings after the verdict, ³ that these laws should hold good. Let the magistrate, who tried the cause, hand over to the victor all the monies of the defeated party, except what is required for necessities, immediately after each verdict has been proclaimed by the cryer and in the hearing of the jury. And when a month, next upon those, when lawsuits are tried, shall have arrived, unless a party has willingly sent the victor willingly away, ⁴ let the magistrate, who tried the cause, follow the victor, and deliver to him the property of the party in his debt. But if he has not the wherewithal, and there is a deficiency not less than a drachm, let him have no lawsuit against any other person, until he has paid to the full the whole of what is due to the victor; but to σης συνουσίαις, which would be in one Greek word λίσχαις. Reasonably then did Ficinus omit ταῖς ἄλλαις πάσαις as being unintelligible.

^{1—1} In lieu of the words in the text, here translated literally, Ficinus has most strangely, “bonos confirmabit atque extollet—” which Taylor has followed in his “confirming and praising—”

^{2—2} Ast explains ἐπικελευσμένοι by “fato quasi destinatae, ut immutari non possint.” Ficinus however, justly despairing of being able to make any sense out of the Greek, as it stands at present, has followed the train of thought, and translated “nam si sanari non possunt,” adopted by Taylor. Unless I am greatly mistaken, Plato wrote ἀποκελευσμένοι, in the sense of the Latin, “conclamatae—” which would be a proper antithesis to λάσιμοι.

³ Such is the meaning here of πράξεσιν, which would be rather, in correct Greek, ἐκπράξεσιν.

⁴ Ast correctly explains ἀπαλλάττηται by “creditori satisfiat debito solvendo;” and aptly refers to Demosth. p. 914, 4, R.; 1189, 13; and 249, 28. The phrase in English would be, “satisfy the plaintiff.”

others let there be lawsuits decisively.¹ And if any one when condemned ²(unjustly) takes (any thing)³ from the condemning magistrate, let the parties unjustly despoiled bring him before the tribunal of the guardians of the laws; and if he is cast in this suit, let him be punished with death, as one who is destroying the whole state and the laws.

[9.] To a man ⁴after this,⁵ who has been born and brought up, and has begotten children and brought them up, and has been mixed up with contracts in a moderate manner, and has made restitution, if he has done any one an injury, and ⁶on the other hand received ⁷(when injured)⁸ what is just in law,⁹ ⁷(and) in turn⁷ has grown old, his end would take place according to nature.

With respect then to the dead, whether a person be male or female, let the interpreters (of the gods) have full powers to ⁸detail the laws of the gods under the earth, and of those here⁹ relating to things divine¹⁰ (and) what it is proper to be done. But let the receptacles be in such spots as are not cultivated at all; nor let the monument be either great or small; but such spots, as being useless, possess¹¹ a nature fitted for

²⁻³ Ficinus has "læserit aut quicquam eorum injuste abstulerit," thus supplying τι, which Ast correctly says ἀφροῖται requires.

³⁻⁵ Ficinus, unable, like myself, to understand τὸ μετὰ τοῦτο, has omitted those words, and inserted in their place, apparently out of his own head—"sub his legibus"—adopted tacitly by Taylor.

⁴⁻⁴ The Greek is ἐκλαβόντι. But in the phrase λαμβάνειν δίκας, the preposition ἐκ is never, I believe, added. I have therefore translated as if the Greek were αὐ λαβόντι—

⁵ I have inserted, what the very balance of the sentence requires, which would be in Greek καὶ ἡδικομένην—

⁶ Instead of λαβόντι σὺν, I suspect Plato wrote, as I have translated, λαβόντι τὸ ἴσον ἐν—

⁷⁻⁷ The Greek is at present ἐν μοίρᾳ. But as μοῖρα would be more correctly applied to τελευτή than γηράσαντι, I have translated as if the Greek were ἐν μέρει—

⁸ I have adopted the splendid emendation of Valckenaer on Herodot. vii. 106, κυρίους φράζειν τὰς θήκας δὲ, in lieu of κυρίους φράζοντας θήκας δὲ—Ficinus, followed by Taylor, has "secundum responsa interpretum fiant."

⁹ In lieu of τῶν τῇδε Ficinus found in his MS. τῶν ἀνω, as shown by his version—"sive superos," adopted by Taylor.

¹¹ The Greek is—δὲ δὲ ἡ χώρα δεχομένη κρύπτειν, which Stephens would that alone, and which easily receive and conceal the bodies of the dead in the least painful manner to the living, these (it is meet) to fill up. ¹ For whatever the earth, being a mother, naturally wishes to bear as food for man, of this ¹ let no one alive or dead deprive any of us still living. And heap up no mound higher than what would be the completed work of five men in five days. And make not the upright tomb-stones greater than what may contain the praises of the deceased in not more than four heroic verses. And let the laying out of the corpse within (the house), be ² for not a shorter or longer ² time than to show ³ that the person is in a death-like trance, or really dead. But the carrying out to the tomb would, as human affairs are, be for a moderate period on the third day nearly. It is meet likewise to be persuaded by the legislator on other points, namely, when he says that soul is altogether superior to body; and that there is nothing, but the soul, which causes each of us to be ⁴ in this life the very thing we are; ⁴ and that the body, like an image, follows each of us; and that, when we are dead, the bodies of the deceased are beautifully said to be image-like forms; and that each of us, being in reality immortal, ⁵ but called correct by reading either ἡ δὲ τῆς χώρας, or ἡ δὲ ἐν τῇ χώρᾳ: but Ast, ἡ δὲ δὴ χώρα, of which Stalbaum approves. Ficinus has—"ad cætera inutilis," which has led me to ἡ δὲ δύσχωρα—δεχόμενα εὖ κρύπτειν—From Cicero de Legg. ii. 27, 76, who seems to have quoted the passage from memory, nothing is to be obtained.

¹—¹ Ficinus, unable, no doubt, to make out the syntax in the Greek, has given merely an abridgment of the general sense, adopted to the letter by Taylor—"nec enim a vivis neque a mortuis terræ matris fœcunditas impedienda est." To meet all the difficulty, I have translated as if πρὸς ταῦτα were a corruption of τις ταῦτα, to be placed after μήτε ζῶν—for thus ζῶν τις ταῦτα would balance τις ἀποθανών, and ταῦτα—τὸν ζῶντα be, as usual, the two accusatives after στερείτω.

²—² The Greek is in five MSS. πρῶτον, in lieu of πρότερον in one. But as Ficinus has "non breviori vel longiori tempore," I suspect he found in his MS. μὴ μακρότερον μὲν ἢ μικρότερον—At least all the MSS. read μὲν μακρότερον for μὴ μακρότερον.

³ Although τοῦ δηλοῦντος might perhaps stand, yet correct Greek would require the infinitive τοῦ δηλοῦν—

by the name of soul, depart to other¹ gods, to render an account, as the law of our country asserts, full of confidence to the good, but very fearful to the bad; and that to this (last) one there is no great assistance when dead. For it behoved all the relatives to aid the living man, so that he might have lived, when living, most just and holy, and when dead, have been punished for his wicked sins, during the life after this. Since then such is the case, there is no need to ruin a family by acting in a luxurious manner,² through thinking that the mass of flesh, which is buried, belongs to him; ³but not that his son, who lies dead,³ or brother, or whomsoever he regrets the most, and conceives he is burying, has departed, after bringing to an end⁴ and fulfilling his fate; and that he ought ⁵to do the best with present events,⁵ by expending a moderate sum upon, as it were, ⁶the lifeless altar of those in the earth.⁶ Now the legislature would divine what this moderate (expense) would be in not the most unseemly manner. Let this then be the law. By him in the highest census of property let there be expended not more than five minæ on the whole funeral; by him of the second class, three minæ; and two, by him of the third; and let one mina be the measure of expense to him of the fourth.⁷ And it is necessary for the guardians of the laws ⁸to do many other things,⁸ and to take care of many things, and especially of this, that they may ¹ The word ἄλλους is added because the soul, as being immortal, is considered itself a god.

² As Wyttenbach on the Phædo, p. 325, correctly saw that the sense is here "sepultura sumptuosa," it is strange he did not see likewise that Plato wrote διατρύφῳ, as I have translated, not διαφερόντως.

⁵⁻⁵ The proverb τὸ παρὸν εὖ ποιεῖν is found again in Gorg. p. 499, C. Sometimes in lieu of ποιεῖν we meet with τιθῆναι, or even θραπέειν, as in Soph. Philoct. 149.

⁶⁻⁶ The Greek is εἰς ἄψυχον χθονίων βωμόν. Ficinus has—"ad manium aram, anima carentem—" But as every altar is ἄψυχος, one would have expected here ἀψύχων τῶν χθονίων βωμόν.

⁷ Ficinus, followed by Taylor to the letter, inserts here—"atque its singulorum moderata erit impensa—" live attending to boys and men, and ¹persons of every age.¹ And moreover, at the end (of the life) of all, let one of the guardians of the laws, whom the relations of the deceased shall ²take as a superintendent,² act as president,³ ⁴to whom let whatever takes place in a proper and moderate manner be an honour; but what in not a proper manner, a disgrace.⁴ And let the laying out, and (carrying out),⁵ and all the rest relating to such matters, take place according to this law. But things of this kind it is meet to give up to the legislator, who lays down a political law.⁶ It would be a thing unseemly to order, or not, persons to weep for the dead; but it is necessary⁷ to forbid them to lament loudly, and to send the voice like that of a messenger⁸ out of the house, and to bring forth⁹ the corpse into the open part of the roads,¹⁰ and to talk¹¹ while going along the paths, and to go¹² out of the city before day. Let such laws then be thus laid down on these points; and let him, who is obedient, be exempt from punishment; but let him, who disobeys one of the guardians of the laws, be punished by a punishment that appears fit to all in common. What other burials, or non-burials, in the case of persons guilty of parricide and sacrilege, and all acts of such a kind,

⁸⁻⁸ The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus, and after him by Taylor.

²—² Ficinus has—"conjuncti elegerint, funus totum observet."

³ The Greek is ἐπιστάται. But two MSS. ἐπιστάτη—which leads to ἐπιστατοίη δν—

⁴—⁴ Ficinus, followed by Taylor, has—"providetque, ut bene moderateque omnia, non contra gerantur; et illud sibi honori, hoc dedecori sit."

⁵ I have adopted "elationes," found in Ficinus, but neglected by Taylor.

⁶ Ast was the first to approve of πολιτικὸν νόμον, found in the MS. of Ficinus, in lieu of πολιτικῷ νόμῳ, as shown by his version, "civilis autem legislatori concedatur ista."

⁷ The best MS. has εἰ ἀπογορεύειν: where evidently lies hid δεῖ ἀπαγορεύειν—as I have translated.

⁸ In ἐξαγγέλλειν is an allusion to the tragic stage; where an Ἐξάγγελος was frequently introduced to tell of any terrible event, that had happened in a house.

⁹ Ficinus has "efferre:" from which, or from Stobæus cxxi. p. 613, Stephens suggested προάγειν in lieu of προσάγειν.

¹⁰ Ficinus, followed by Taylor, has "vias—frequentiores—"

¹¹ Ficinus renders φθίγγεσθαι "ejulare," a meaning that verb never has.

take place of the dead, these have been spoken of in our previous discourse and laid down by law ; so that our legislation would now have nearly arrived at the end. But the end is not in having on each occasion done of nearly all matters something, nor in possessing and in settling, ¹ but in having discovered a preservation for what has been produced, and in thinking that all, which ought to have been done, has been then done completely ; but previously, that the whole is incomplete.¹

Clin. You speak well, O guest. But tell me still more clearly, for what purpose has been said, what has just now been said ?

[10.] Athen. Much, Clinias, of former (sayings) have been hymned beautifully, and nearly not the least so are the appellations of the Fates.

Clin. What are these ?

Athen. In Lachesis being the first, Clotho the second, and Atropos the third, ² the saviour of what has been asserted, things assimilated by that of those woven by fire, of working out a power not to be turned aside ; ² which in a city and polity ought not only to furnish health and safety to bodies, but a good state of law in souls, or rather the preservation of laws. But it appears to me that this is yet wanting to laws, how it is needful ³ for a power to exist in them to be according to nature not turned.

Clin. You speak of no small affair, if it is possible to find how a thing of this kind may exist in every possession.

Athen. But this is possible, as it appears to me, in every respect at present.

Clin. Let us then by all means not separate until we have supplied this very thing to the laws already mentioned. For it is ridiculous to labour at any thing in vain, and not to lay down something stable.

¹—¹ Such is the literal version of the Greek. Ficinus, followed by Taylor, has—"sed in eo potius, quod, sicut recte sunt facta, ita et firmiter stabilita sint ; in hujusmodi enim conservatione putandum est, quantum oportuit, factum esse ; aliter minime." With regard to the sentiment, Juvenal seems to have had a recollection of it, when he wrote—"Nil actum censet, dum quid superesset agendum—"

²—² Such is the literal translation of the unintelligible Greek—σώτειραν τῶν λεχθέντων ἀπικασμένα τῇ τῶν κλωσθέντων τῷ πυρὶ, τὴν ἀμετάστροφον ἀπεργαζομένων δύναμιν : where in lieu of λεχθέντων Bekker suggests ληχθέντων, and so does Sydenham. Ast, λαχόντων. Cornarius proposed φύσει for πυρὶ : but Ast, πλώσει or πλήσει : Winckelmann, τῷ συσπειρῶν : and Baiter, τολύπη— What Plato wrote might perhaps be recovered by a bold conjectural scholar.

³ Ficinus has, what is preferable, "possit—"

Megil. You correctly exhort me: and you will find me to be such another person.

Clin. You speak indeed well. What then, say you, would this preservation be, and after what fashion for our polity and laws?

Athen. Have we not said that an assembly ought to be held in our city of this kind—That ten of the oldest guardians of the laws and those, who have received the prizes for good conduct, ought ever to be gathered together at the same spot [with them]?¹ and further, that those, who had gone abroad² to make a search, if perchance it has happened to them to hear of any thing opportune for guarding the laws, (ought),³ on arriving safe at home, to be voted, ⁴after having been tested by these very doings, worthy to become partakers of the assembly?⁴ and in addition to this, that each ought to take as an ally one of the young men, not less than thirty years of age,⁵ and that he himself, after deciding that the young man was a worthy character both by nature and nurture, should introduce him to the others; and, if it should seem good to the others, that he should take him as an ally; but if not, that the judgment, which may have taken place, should be kept secret from the rest, and especially the party rejected;⁶ and that the assembly ought to be at day-break, when there is leisure for the most part to every one from all other business, both public and private? Something of this kind was stated by us in the preceding discourse.

Clin. It was.

Athen. Resuming then the subject relating to this very as-

³ Although Ast saw that kai had no meaning here, yet he did not see that perhaps it was an error for δια—

⁴—⁴ Ficinus, followed to the letter by Taylor, has "sed hi ad cœtum hujusmodi non recipiantur, nisi ex ea peregrinatione incorrupti et integri rediisse, et cœtu digni esse probentur."

⁵—⁵ Such is the literal version of the Greek. Ficinus, whom Taylor has followed closely, has most strangely only "qui natura educationeque digni esse asciscendi primum, deinde et universo cœtui, videantur: quod si quis indignus adhibeatur, nullius momenti sententia sit."

sembly, I would say something of this kind. I assert then that if any one throws out this, as an anchor¹ for the whole city, that it has in itself every thing requisite to preserve all we wish.

Clin. How so?

Athen. ²On what comes after this an opportunity will occur for our speaking correctly, and to omit nothing of our readiness (to act).³

Clin. You speak exceedingly well; and do as you intend.

Athen. It is meet therefore, Clinias, to understand that with respect to every thing there is a saviour suited to each kind of work; as in an animal, the soul and the head are naturally the greatest.

Clin. How again say you?

Athen. The power of these two, doubtless, affords safety to the whole animal.

Clin. How?

Athen. In soul there is, besides other things, intellect implanted; and in the head, besides other things, sight and hearing. And, in short, intellect being mingled with the most beautiful senses, and becoming one, it would justly be called the preservation of each.

Clin. It appears so at least.

Athen. So indeed it appears. But would not intellect, when conversant about something, and mingled with the senses, become the safety of vessels, both in storms and fair weather? Do not, in the case of a ship, the pilot and the sailors, by mingling their senses with the intellect of the pilot, preserve both themselves and what relates to the ship?

Clin. How not?

Athen. But there is no need of many examples relating to things of this kind; but let us consider, as in the case of armies, and (diseases),³ after laying down what mark would both generals and all the ministering of physicians direct their aim (for the sake) of preservation.

Athen. Does not the former (aim at) victory, and the power over the enemy? and the latter ² [of physicians and their assistants,] ³ at a preparation for the health of the body?

Clin. How not?

Athen. But if the physician is ignorant of that relating to the body, which we now call health, or the general of that relating to victory, or of the other things we have mentioned, would either appear to possess intellect relating to any of these matters?

Clin. How could they?

Athen. But what with respect to a city? If any one is ignorant of the mark, at which a statesman ought to look, could he in the first place be justly denominated a ruler? And in the next, would he be able to preserve that, of the scope of which he knows nothing at all?

Clin. How could he?

[11.] Athen. It is necessary therefore now, as it seems, if the settlement of this our country is to have an end, that there should be something in it, that knows, in the first place, what we call the mark, ³ whatever that may happen to be in a statesman's view; ³ next, after what manner it is requisite to partake of it; and which of the laws first, and, afterwards, who among men, will properly or improperly consult with a view to it. But if there shall be any state devoid of a thing of this kind, it will not be wonderful, if, by being mindless and senseless, it should on each occasion perform in each of its doings whatever presents itself by chance.

Clin. You speak the truth.

Athen. Now then, in what part of our state, or pursuits, is there any sufficient guard whatever prepared of such a kind? Have it we in our power to tell?

Clin. Not I indeed, guest, clearly. But, if I must make a guess, this discourse seems to me to tend to that assembly, which you said ought to come together at night.

Athen. You have rightly understood me, Clinias; and, as ¹—¹ This answer of Clinias seems very strange. Unless I am mistaken, ὁρθῶς belongs to the speech of the Athenian.

²—² The words between the brackets are correctly omitted by Ficinus, and after him by Taylor.

³—³ Taylor omits entirely the words between the numerals. Ficinus has—"quisnam civilis sit finis."

the present reasoning indicates, this (assembly) ought to possess every virtue; the beginning of which is not to be wandering, by guessing at many things, but by looking to one thing, always to direct every thought, like arrows, to this.

Clin. Entirely so.

Athen. Now then we shall learn that it is not a wonderful thing for the legal institutions of cities to wander; because the system of laws in each city looks, one to one thing, and another to another. And for ¹the most part it is no wonder that ¹to some the limit is that of what is just, in order that certain persons, whether they happen to be better or worse, may have dominion over the state; to others, that they may be wealthy, whether they are slaves of certain persons, or not; the attention of others again is urged on to a life forsooth of liberty; but others are regulated by laws, ²like two united, ²looking to both, that they may be free (themselves), ³and the lords of other states. But the wisest, as they think themselves, (look) to these, and to all such points as these together, and not to any one (singly), ⁴as they are unable to mention any one thing held in pre-eminent honour, to which it is needful for them to direct ⁵the rest.

Clin. Would not then, O guest, our assertion formerly laid down be right; for we said that the whole of our laws ought always to look to one point; and we conceded that this might be called very correctly virtue.

Athen. Yes.

Clin. And we laid down surely that virtue is fourfold.

Athen. Entirely so.

Clin. And that of all these, intellect was the leader, to which all other things, and three of the virtues, ought to look.

Athen. You have followed me in a most beautiful manner;

¹—¹ The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus, and after him by Taylor.

²—² So Ast explains ξύνδυο— But Ficinus “ad duo”—omitting πρόσ ἄμφω βλέποντες, whom Taylor follows, as usual.

³ Ficinus has correctly “ipsi,” in Greek αὐτοί, to balance ἄλλων— By comparing iii. p. 694, A. § 11, αὐτοὶ ἐλεύθεροι ἐγένοντο, ἔπειτα δὲ ἄλλων πολλῶν δεσπόται, Stephens would read πολλῶν for πόλεων.

⁵ Ficinus has “ad quod cætera dirigit”—as if his MS. read τρέπειν, not βλέπειν Clinias; and follow me too in what remains. For we have said, that the intellect of the pilot, and of the physician, and of the general, looks to that one point, ¹ to which it ought to look; ¹ but examining the intellect of the statesman, we are at that point now; and interrogating it, as if it were a person, we will say—O wonderful creature, to what point are you looking? What is that one thing, of which the intellect of the physician can speak in a clear manner? but of which you, who are forsooth ² superior, as you would say, to all clever persons, will not have it in your power to speak? Or can you, Megillus and Clinias, define and speak for him, and tell me what it is, as I have defined to you in behalf of many other matters?

Clin. By no means, guest.

Athen. But what, ³ ought we not to be desirous of knowing well ³ what it is, and in what it is?

Clin. ⁴ In what, for example, do you mean? ⁴

Athen. For example, when we said that there are four species of virtue, it is evidently necessary to say that each is one, since they are four.

Clin. How not?

Athen. And yet we call all these one. For we say that fortitude is a virtue, and that prudence is a virtue, and the two others (likewise), as if this virtue was not in reality many things, but only one.

Clin. Entirely so.

Athen. So far, then, as these two differ from each other, and have received two names, and the other two (likewise), there is no difficulty in speaking of them; but so far as we apply to both one (name) of virtue, and to the others (likewise), it is not easy to speak of them.

Clin. How say you?

² Although Stephens saw that ὠν-διαφέρων is scarcely correct, yet he did not see that Plato wrote ὡς δὲ—used here ironically, as elsewhere.

⁴—⁴ Ficinus, apparently unable to understand ὅλον ἐν τισι λέγεις, has “Dic plane.”

Athen. It is not difficult to explain what I mean. For let us distribute among ourselves the (business of) interrogating and answering.

Clin. How again are you speaking?

Athen. Ask me why, when speaking of virtue as one thing, we have given this appellation to two things, one of which is fortitude, and the other prudence? for I will tell you the reason. Because one of these is conversant with fear, from whence¹ both wild beasts participate in fortitude, and so do the habits of children very young. For the soul may be brave without reason and from nature; but on the other hand, without reason it never has been prudent and possessed of intellect, nor is it so now, nor will it ever be, since this is a different thing.²

Clin. You speak truly.

Athen. In what way then these are different and two, you have received from me through the reasoning; but in what way they are one and the same, do you on the other hand tell me. But bear in mind that you are going to tell me in what way, being four, they are one; and require of me (to tell),³ after you have shown that they are one, in what way they are again four. And after this, let us consider whether for him,⁴ who would know sufficiently respecting any thing whatever, to which there is both a name and a definition, it is meet to know only the name, but to be ignorant of the definition; or whether it is disgraceful for him, who knows⁵ something of what excels in magnitude and beauty, to be ignorant of all such matters as these.

Clin. It appears so.

Athen. But is there any thing of greater consequence for a legislator and a guardian of the laws, and for him, who is

¹ In lieu of οὐ Ficinus found, as remarked by Stephens, ᾧθεν, as shown by his version "unde—"

² Ficinus has more intelligibly, "aliud ergo hæc est quam illa," i. e. that prudence is a different thing from fortitude. Of this Shakspeare was well aware, when he made Falstaff say that "Discretion is the better part of Valour."

³ After τίτταρα Ast says that ἵπειν is to be supplied. I suspect it has dropt out by accident.

⁵ I have adopted with Ast γινόντα, for γε ὄντα, as suggested by Cornarius.

thought to excel all others in virtue, and who has received the rewards of victory in these very points, than fortitude, temperance, justice, and prudence?

Clin. How can there be?

Athen. On these points then ought not holy interpreters, and teachers, and legislators, and the guardians of others, to (speak)¹ to him, who requests to know and to perceive, or who requests to be punished and reproved² when erring, by teaching him what power virtue and vice possess, and by showing that they (themselves) excel the rest in every respect? Or must some poet come³ to the city, or an instructor of youth, and assert that he is seen to be better than him, who has been the victor in every virtue? And then will it appear wonderful in a state like this, where both in word and deed the guardians would be incompetent through their⁴ not having correctly⁴ a knowledge of virtue, that such a state, by being without a guard, should suffer what the majority of existing states suffer?

Clin. Not at all (wonderful), as it seems.

[12.] Athen. What then, must we do what we just now said? Or how must we make the guardians more exact with respect to virtue, in deed and word, than the masses? Or after what manner will our state be assimilated to the head and senses of the prudent, through possessing in itself a guard of this kind?

Clin. How then, O guest, and after what manner, shall we speak, assimilating it to a thing of this kind?

Athen. It is evident⁵ that, while the state itself is (the resemblance) of a cavity,⁵ the young of the guards, who are ¹ I have translated, as if λέγειν or αὐδαῖν had dropt out between δεῖ and διδάσκοντας. For otherwise the dative τῷ δεομένῳ would be without regimen. I have adopted likewise διδάσκοντας and δηλοῦντας, in lieu of the singular, which Ast vainly endeavours to defend.

² I cannot understand how the active ἐπιπλήξαι can here follow the passive κολάζεσθαι. I have therefore translated as if the Greek were ἐπιπλήσσεισθαι—

³ Ficinus has “urbem nuper ingressus,” as if his MS. read ἐλθόντα νεωστί τὴν πόλιν—

selected, as it were,¹ for the top of the head, as being of the best disposition, and possess a quickness of perception in their whole soul, survey the whole state in a circle; and, while guarding it, they deliver up the senses to memory, and become the announcers to the elders of every thing in the state; and that these [the elders],² being assimilated to intellect, through considering pre-eminently many matters and those worthy of regard, enter into consultations, and employ the young, as agents, in their joint deliberations; and thus both truly preserve the whole state in common. Whether then shall we say that they are to be established in this manner, or how otherwise? Or that they all possess all things equally,³ and that some of them have been brought up and educated in not the most exact manner?⁴

Clin. But this, O wonderful man, is impossible.

Athen. Let us then proceed to a more accurate education than the former.

Clin. By all means.

Athen. Would not that, which we almost touched just now, happen to be the very one, of which we have a want?

Clin. Entirely so.

Athen. Did we not say then, that of each trade the tip-top handicraftsman and guardian ought to be able not only to look to the majority of things, but to hasten onwards to one thing, and to know it, and, after knowing it by looking at it, to arrange every thing in order?

Clin. Correctly so.

Athen. Would there be then to any person whatever a speculation or a sight more accurate, respecting any thing whatever, than to be able to look to one form out of many and dissimilar?

"that the substance of the city itself is the resemblance to some receptacle—" Ficinus has, what is at least intelligible, "quia civitas capitis quædam capacitas erit"

¹ I have adopted ἀπειλεγμένους, found in four MSS., in lieu of ἀπειλημένους, which Ast translates "seorsim collocatos—"

² The words τοὺς γέροντας are evidently an interpolation.

³ The Greek is ὁμοίους πάντας κεκτημένους. Ficinus has "æquales omnes habendas esse censemus." But κεκτημένους is never found in a passive sense. I have translated as if Plato had written ὁμοίως πάντα πάντας κεκτημένους—

⁴ I have, with Ast and Stalbaum, adopted διηκριβωμένους, for διηκριβωμένους, as suggested by Stephens from "exacte" in Ficinus.

Clin. Perhaps (not).

Athen. Not perhaps, but in reality, O thou godlike man, there is not any method more clear than this to any one.

Clin. Trusting to you, O guest, I admit it; and in this way let us proceed in our discourse.

Athen. We must compel, then, as it seems, even the guardians of our divine polity to see accurately, in the first place, what happens amongst all the four virtues to be the same; and which, being one thing in fortitude, and temperance, and prudence, and justice, we assert would be properly called by one name, virtue. This, my friends, if we are willing, let us for the present, as it were¹ squeezing violently, not let go, before we state sufficiently what it is that we must look at, whether as one thing, or as a whole, or as both, or in whatever way it exists naturally. Or, if this escapes us, think we that we shall ever sufficiently possess the things relating to virtue, of which we shall be unable to say, whether it is many things, or four, or one thing? If, then, we follow ourselves as fellow-counsellors, we shall by some means devise a plan for this to take place in our state. But if it seems good to you² to dismiss the subject altogether, it is necessary to dismiss it.³

Clin. By the god, who presides over hospitality, we must, O guest, dismiss a subject of this kind the least of all, since you appear to us to speak correctly. But how can any one devise this plan?

Athen. Let us not at present speak of the how we can devise it; but let us first establish firmly by agreement amongst ourselves, whether it is requisite or not.

Clin. It is doubtless requisite, if possible.

[13.] Athen. But what, with respect to the beautiful and the good, ³do we think the same on this point?³ Must our guardians know only that each of these is many? Or that it is one, and how it is so?

¹ The Greek is ὅλον περ—But Plato wrote, I suspect, ὅλον Πρωτῖα—“like Proteus,” or rather ὅλον χεῖρ Πρωτῖα—For it was necessary to lay hold of Proteus with a firm grasp, before he would open his lips, as a prophet, as we learn from Homer Od. Δ. 414 and 454.

²⁻³ I have adopted the reading proposed by Baiter, δοκεῖ εἶναι, εἶναι δὲ χρῆναι. So we say in English—“If I must, I must.”

³⁻³ The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus, and after him by Taylor.

Clin. It seems almost necessary for them to understand how (each of these) is one.

Athen. But what, (ought they) to understand, but be unable to show by arguments ¹(what they understand)?¹

Clin. How so? For you are speaking of a certain habit belonging to a slave.²

Athen. But what, with respect to all serious pursuits, is there the same reasoning, that it behoves those, who are to be really guardians of the laws, to know really the matters relating to the truth, and to be competent to interpret them in a discourse, and follow them out in deeds, deciding upon the things that exist beautifully according to nature, or do not exist?

Clin. How not?

Athen. Is not then one of the most beautiful things that relating to the gods, which we went through with seriousness, how that they exist, and of how great a power they seem to be the lords; and that man, as far as he can, ought to know this; and, that we ought to pardon the greatest number of those in the state, if they will only follow the voice of the laws; but that we ought not to commit to persons a share in the guardianship, who have not laboured to acquire every faith in the existence³ of the gods; and that there should be ⁴this one object of care,⁴ namely, never to choose any one for a guardian of the laws, who is not a divine man, and has not laboured for them,⁵ nor (permit him)⁶ to become one of those selected for his virtue.

² This is said, because slaves were either foreigners, or uneducated.

⁵ Stephens was the first to object to αὐτὰ thus placed by itself; although he says that τὰ θεῖα is to be got out of τὸν θεῖον: and so too does Ast. But Plato would in that case have written τοιαῦτα—Ficinus has, what is far more elegant and intelligible—"nisi divinus sit divinisque studiis operam dederit."

⁶ The Greek is at present αὐ—It was formerly ἐγὼ—as I have translated.

Clin. It is just then, as you say, for him, who is inactive on matters of this kind, or unable to give a reply,¹ (to be)² at a distance from honourable affairs.

Athen. Do we then not know, that there are two things relating to the gods, which lead to a belief in what we have gone through in our previous discourse?

Clin. What are they?

Athen. One is that, which we asserted respecting the soul, that it is the oldest and most divine of all things, of which a motion, by receiving the generation, imparts an ever-flowing existence;³ and one too is that, concerning the movement, how orderly it is, of the stars and such other things with which⁴ mind has, by its power over them, adorned the universe.⁴ For he, who views these matters in neither a mean manner nor like a common individual, has never been an atheistical person, so as not to be affected in a manner the contrary to what would be expected by the many. For they imagine that those, who take in hand subjects of this kind through astronomy and other necessary⁵ arts in conjunction with it, become atheists from having seen that it is possible for things to exist by necessity and not from the⁶ intellect of a divine plan⁶ relating to good things to be brought to pass.

Clin. How then would it exist?

Athen. All things,⁷ as I have said, are in a contrary state

¹ Ficinus avoids the difficulty in ἀποκρίνεσθαι by omitting the word entirely, and translating—"et ineptus sit—" Did Plato write ὑποκρίνεσθαι, "to act the part" of a divine person—or rather ἢ, ὡς δὲ αἰ, ἀδύνατον ὑποκρίνεσθαι—"unable to act the part he ought."

² After τῶν καλῶν there has evidently dropt out εἶναι, as I have translated.

³ Ast conceives that Plato had in his mind the doctrine of Heraclitus, which he has developed more at length in the Cratylus and Parmenides, that all things are in a state of flowing.

⁴ This was the doctrine of Anaxagoras, to which Euripides alludes in Tro. 890, where I should have supported the conjecture of Bouhier, νοῦς κρατῶν for νοῦς βροτῶν, by referring to νοῦς ἡγερατής in this passage.

⁵ Such as Geometry and Arithmetic.

⁶ The Greek is διανοίας βουλήσεως, which I confess I cannot understand; nor could, I think, Ficinus, who has "voluntate divina." I have translated therefore, as if the Greek were διανοίας βουλήσεως θείας—remembering the Διὸς δὲ τελείου βουλή in Homer, Il. A. 5.

⁷ I have translated, as if the Greek were πάντα— If πᾶν is to be preserved here, we must prefix τὸ and read ἀψυχὸν αὐτὸ— But the other now to what they were, when those, who thought upon them, conceived them to be without soul. ¹A feeling of wonder crept even then upon the mind respecting them; and what is now really determined upon, was suspected then by such as touched upon accuracy, how that things without soul would never have made use of reasonings wonderful for their accuracy, had they not possessed intellect.¹ And some indeed dared to hazard this very doctrine even at that period, by saying that ²it was Mind, which put into order every thing in heaven.² ³But the same persons erred again³ about the nature of the soul, (by not knowing)⁴ that it is older than body; but conceiving it to be younger,⁵ they did, so to say, overturn all things, and themselves much more.⁶ For ⁷all things, that were before their eyes, while carried along the heavens, appeared to them to be full of stones and earth, and many other soulless bodies, that furnished reasons for the existence of the whole world.⁷ ⁸These doctrines it was that caused much of atheism and disgust to flit about amongst such persons.⁸ Moreover revilings is the preferable method. Hence at the end of the speech we must read likewise πάντα τὸὐναντίον ἔχει in lieu of πάν—

²—² Here again is an allusion to Anaxagoras, whose Κόσμος began with this sentence—‘Ομοῦ πάντα χρήματα ἔην· νόος δὲ αὐτὰ διήρπει καὶ διακόσμεε.

³—³ The Greek is at present, οἱ δὲ αὐτοὶ πάλιν ἀμαρτάνοντες— But unless I am mistaken, it was formerly οἱ γε ἔτι πλεον ἀμαρτάνοντες— i. e. “who erring still more about the nature of the soul.”

⁴ Ficinus alone has, what the sense requires, “nescientes—”

⁵ The same doctrine, that the soul is younger than the body, is advocated by Locke and the other Materialists of modern times.

⁶ How Anaxagoras overturned his own theory may be seen in Phædo, p. 98, B.

⁸—⁸ The Greek is ἀπρεσθαί, where Ficinus felt himself so much at a loss as to give merely the general sense of the whole passage, “his igitur have come from the poets, (so that,) while likening philosophers to dogs that make use of vain howlings, they said, ¹ on the other hand, other senseless things.¹ But now, as I have said, all the contrary takes place.

Clin. How could this be?

[14.] Athen. It is not possible for any mortal man ever to become firmly pious, who does not receive these two things, that the soul is the oldest of all things, which share in generation and is immortal; and that it rules over all bodies. And in addition to this, what has been said very often, who shall receive ² the mind said of beings in the stars,² and the necessary learning before³ these subjects,⁴ and after beholding the communion in these according to the Muse,⁴ shall make use (of it) in a manner fitting to the pursuits of morals and legal institutions; and shall be able to give a reason for such things as admit of a reason,⁵ and do not.⁵ Now he, who is not able to acquire these in addition to public virtues, will scarcely ever become a competent ruler over a whole state; but he would be a minister to other rulers. It is then, Clinias and Megillus, refactum est, ut, qui hæc tractant, philosophi tanquam impii vulgo circumferuntur." I have therefore altered ἄπτεσθαι into ἄττεισθαι. On the loss and corruption of ἄττειν, and its use in an astronomic sense, I could say not a little; suffice it to quote at present Plutarch De Fortun. Roman. t. ii. p. 326, ἄστρον φερομένου καὶ διὰ ττοντος ἐπὶ δυσμᾶς ἐξ ἀνατολῶν.

² Such is the literal translation of the Greek—τόν τε εἰρημένον ἐν τοῖς ἄστροις τῶν ὄντων, which Ast endeavours to explain by his version and paraphrase, "the reason of all things in the stars," that is, "dwelling there and most conspicuous." Ficinus has "veram esse mentem in astris," as if his MS. read τόν τε ἐν τοῖς ἄστροις ὄντα ὄντως, without εἰρημένον, omitted in another MS. Perhaps Plato wrote τόν τε, αἰωρούμενον ἐν τοῖς ἄστροις, νοῦν ὄντα ὄντως—i. e. "the mind, really existing, and suspended amongst the stars," or rather something to this effect, τόν τ' αἰωρούμενον ἐν ἄστροις ☉ ἐνιαυτῶν μόνον ἄνακτα, "the Sun suspended amongst the stars, the only ruler of years"—where ☉ is (ἥλιον). See myself on Æsch. Eum. 2.

³ In lieu of πρὸ, "before," I should prefer περὶ, "respecting—"

⁴ Here again I am quite at a loss; and so, I think, was Ficinus; whose version is "Musæ etiam his convenientis non ignarus ad mores componendos legesque servandas ipsa utatur."

⁵ Bekker, followed by Stalbaum, considers ὅσα τε καὶ μή, omitted by Ficinus, as an interpolation. But who would have inserted those words, or why, we are not told.

quisite to see ¹ in addition to all the laws already detailed, which we have gone through,¹ whether we can bring this nocturnal meeting of the rulers to be a guard,² according to law, for the sake of preservation, after becoming a sharer in the education, such as we have gone through. Or how shall we act?

Clin. But how, O thou best of men, should we not bring it, if perchance we are able, even for a little?

Athen. Let us then enter altogether into a contest for a thing of this kind at least. For I will readily be your helper in this; and in addition to myself perhaps, through my skill in things of this kind, and my thinking upon them very frequently, I shall find others likewise.

Clin. Let us, O guest, proceed in this path, rather than any other, in which even a god is almost leading us. But what is the method, which, if it took place, would take place correctly, this let us now speak of and seek out.

Athen. Laws about things of this kind, Megillus and Clinias, it is not possible to lay down, until (the whole state)³ is orderly arranged; ⁴ for then (one can) lay down, over what it is meet for them to have an authority.⁴ ⁵ But the furnishing such things at present would be, if it were done correctly, an act of instruction combined with much intercourse.⁵

Clin. How so? Why do we say that this is mentioned again?

Athen. In the first place, a list should be drawn out of those, who would be fitted for the nature of a guard by the power of their time of life, and instruction, and by their morals and manners. But after this, it is neither easy to find (oneself),⁶ what one ought to learn, nor to become the disciple

² Ficinus has "ut apicem custodemque," as if his MS. read κορυφήν καὶ φυλακήν—

³ Ficinus alone has, what the sense seems to require, "civitas universa—"

⁴—⁴ Such is the literal version of the Greek. Ficinus has "tunc enim debita cum auctoritate constituendæ videntur."

⁶ I have inserted "oneself," for αὐτὸν might easily have dropt out of another, who has found it out. In addition to this, it is a vain thing to state in writing the times ¹which and ¹in which it is requisite to obtain each particular. For not even to the learners themselves would it be manifest, what is learnt opportunely, before the science of the instruction is generated in the soul of each. Hence, all, that relates to these matters, being spoken of, would not be said to be properly secrets ; ²but they (might be said to be) not previously spoken, through nothing of what has been spoken indicating what has been previously spoken.³

Clin. Since then this is the case, what, O guest, must we do ?

Athen. According to the proverb, friends, it appears ³we are lying in a common and middle ground.³ And if we are willing to run a risk respecting the whole polity, we must do all things, by throwing, as they say, either thrice six, or thrice ace.⁴ I will, however, undergo the danger with you in stating and explaining, what appears to me respecting the education and nurture, which has been agitated in our conversations. The hazard is, indeed, neither small, nor similar to any others. But I exhort you, Clinias, to have a care of this. For you will obtain the greatest renown by establishing after οὔτε—for the sake of the balance in ἄλλον, on which see my Porpo's Prolegom. p. 254. In vi. p. 772, D. § 16, αὐτὸς is however omitted in the words σκοπῶν καὶ σκοπούμενος ὑπ' ἄλλων—

correctly the city of the Magnesians, or after what other event a god shall give it a name ; or you will at least not escape the seeming to be ¹the bravest of all born afterwards.¹ If then this divine assembly shall be established by us, O friends and companions, the city must be delivered to its care ; ²nor will there be any dispute amongst any one, so to say, of the legislators at present respecting³ these institutions ; ² but there will be completed almost ⁴a day-dream in a matter, which we touched upon in our discourse a little before as a night dream,⁴ when we mingled together a certain image of the agreement of the head with intellect ; if indeed these men are accurately mingled together by us, and properly instructed, and when instructed, reside in the acropolis of the country, and become guardians, such as we have never seen in our previous life, as regards the power of preservation.

Megil. O friend Clinias, from all that has been now said by us, we must either give up the city, as regards⁵ its settlement, or not dismiss this our guest, but by entreaties and all kinds of devices make him a partner with us in settling the city.

Clin. You speak with the greatest truth, Megillus ; and both myself will act thus, and do you also co-operate.

Megil. I will co-operate.

²—² Such is the literal version of the Greek, which differs not a little from the version of Ficinus—"neque his reliqui legumlatores tanquam minus sufficientes adversabuntur."

³ I have translated as if the Greek were περὶ, not παρὰ—

⁴—⁴ On the difference between ὕπαρ, "a day-dream," i. e. a reality ; and ὄναρ, "a night-dream," i. e. a non-reality, see at vii. 8.

⁵ I have translated as if πέρι had dropt out after κατοικίσεως—

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

PREFACE.

IN the present volume are contained those dialogues which, although considered spurious by the generality of critics, are always found in the complete editions of Plato. To these are added the three several Lives attributed to Diogenes Laertius, Hesychius, and Olympiodorus, and the two Introductions to the Platonic System by Alcinous and Albinus; also the three books of Apuleius relating to the Philosophy and Logic of Plato and Aristotle.

Of all these works, the only portions which have hitherto appeared in an English dress, are the Epinomis, the Life of Plato by Diogenes Laertius, and the Introduction of Alcinous. But even of these not one has been translated directly from the original.* In the Epinomis, Taylor followed the Latin version of Ficinus as revised by Grynæus; and Stanley, strange to say, adopted, in preference to the Greek, Ficinus's Latin version of Alcinous as revised by D. Heinsius; while Smith, in his abridged translation of Diogenes Laertius, has followed the Latin version given by Stephens.

To render this edition as perfect as possible, it has been deemed advisable to insert Sydenham's Introduction to the Doctrines of Plato ; a copious selection from the Notes of Gray, as published by Matthias in the 2nd volume of his edition of the Works of that poet ; and a General Index to the entire work.

INTRODUCTION TO THE EPINOMIS.

ALTHOUGH this dialogue is called the Epinomis, which might be rendered into English by "A Sequel to the Laws," yet it contains not a single hint for an enactment of any kind. It is in fact little more than a Homily, written for the most part on the Laws, vii. § 20—22, p. 300—308, and it seems to be the production of some Pythagorean; who, perceiving that Plato had adopted some of the ideas promulgated by that school of philosophy, was desirous of showing that he had only partially touched upon their tenets relating to numbers. For with this question were intimately connected all their ideas relating to the power and attributes of the deity. And this the writer was the more willing to dilate upon, as Plato had expressed his unwillingness to discuss the subject of religion at a greater length. For after witnessing the fate of Socrates, who had endeavoured to rationalize the creed of his country, Plato probably thought it dangerous, as Aristotle certainly did afterwards, to run counter to popular prejudices; and he was therefore led to remark, that all the enactments relating to religion should be left to the discretion of its ministers, assisted by the interpreters of the voice of the gods.

Respecting the author of the dialogue, nothing is known for certain. Thus much however is tolerably clear, that it was not written by Plato. For, as remarked by Ast on § 7, where mention is made of the five elements, out of which all living things are said to be formed, this doctrine is at variance with that promulgated in the Timæus, where only four are enumerated. But when in § 5, where the Athenian Guest alludes to some memoranda made by Clinias and Megillus of the previous conversation, Ast would infer that the Laws had been published already, he seems not to be aware that an inference the very reverse ought to be drawn. For the memoranda would rather be made shortly after the conversation had taken place, just as was done by Xenophon in the case of Socrates, with a view to their being published afterwards. And hence we can account for the tradition, that the Laws were not given to the world, till after the death of their author.

The Epinomis is indeed attributed to Plato by Nicomachus; but not by Proclus, as has been sometimes asserted. For Boeckh has shown that the Neo-Platonist on Euclid i. p. 12, originally expressed himself in a way to indicate that he did not know who was the author of the dialogue. Boeckh himself feels inclined to assign the authorship to Philip of Opuntium; who appears from Suidas to have written not a little on subjects relating to Arithmetic, Geometry, and Astronomy, all of which are discussed at greater or less length in the Epinomis.

Be however the author who he may, the dialogue itself has, like the Laws, come down to us in rather an unsatisfactory state; and hence I have been compelled to write longer notes than would otherwise have been necessary.

THE EPINOMIS;

OR,

THE PHILOSOPHER.

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE.

AN ATHENIAN GUEST, CLINIAS A CRETAN, AND MEGILLUS A LACEDÆMONIAN.

[1.] Clinias. ACCORDING to our agreement, we have all of us, guest, come correctly, being three, I, and you, and Megillus here, to consider the question of intellect, in what manner it is meet to go through in a discourse that, which we say belongs to the constitution of man, (and which,)¹ when it has been thought upon, causes² it to be in the best state with regard to itself,³ as far as it is possible for man to possess it. For, as we assert, we have gone through all the other matters, that existed, relating to the laying down of laws. But that, which is of the greatest moment to discover and to speak of, namely, by learning what will a mortal man become wise, this we have neither spoken of nor discovered. Now then let us endeavour not to leave this behind. For we should nearly do that imperfectly, for the sake of which we have all rushed onwards, with the view of making clear (every thing)⁴ from the beginning to the end.

Athenian Guest. You speak well, friend Clinias. But I

¹ I have translated, as if ὅ τε had dropt out before δραν—

^{2, 3} I have adopted ποιῶ, found in the best MS. Z., in lieu of ποιῶν: which I cannot understand; nor could, I think, Ficinus, who has omitted it in his version, adopted in part by Taylor, "quo intellecto, humanus habitus optime se, quantum natura fert, ad prudentiam habet." From which however it is easy to see that he found in his MS. πρὸς αὐτὴν, of which πρὸς φρόνησιν would be the interpretation.

think you will now hear a strange discourse, and on the other hand in a certain respect not strange. For many, who meet us in life,¹ tell² the same story, that the human race will be neither blessed nor happy. Follow me, then, and see whether³ to you I likewise appear together with them to speak correctly on a point like this.³ I assert then that it is not possible for men, except a few, to be blessed and happy ; ⁴ I limit this to as long as we live ; ⁴ but there is a fair hope that a person will after death obtain every thing, for the sake of which he would desire, when alive, to live in the best manner he could, ⁵ and dying to meet with such an end.⁵ And I assert nothing (very) wise,⁶ but what all of us, both Greeks and Barbarians, after a certain manner know, that to be produced is at the beginning difficult for every animal. In the first place, it is difficult to partake of ⁷ the state of conception, next to be born,⁷ and, further still, to be brought up and educated ; (for) all these things take place, as we all say, through ten thousand troubles. The time too would be short, ⁸ not only with respect to the calculation of annoyances, but what every one would imagine to be moderate ; and this seems to

² I have adopted λέγοντες, found in the best MS. Z., in lieu of φίροντες : for λέγον φέρειν is said only of a messenger bringing news.

⁴ The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus and Taylor, and in their place is introduced "in this life" in the sentence preceding.

⁵ Here again Ficinus and Taylor after him omit all between the numerals, and in their place substitute one word, in Latin "exegit," and in English "die," in the sentence preceding.

⁶ Ficinus has more fully "nec inauditum aliquod novumque adduco ;" but Taylor merely "Nor is my assertion novel."

⁷ Ficinus has "in conceptione et utero primum ; deinde in natiuitate et partu—" while Taylor omits "to be born—"

make almost a kind of breathing-time in the middle of the life of man.¹ Old age however, quickly overtaking a person, would make him not at all willing to live his life over again,¹ after he has considered the life he has lived,¹ unless he happens to be full of the thoughts of a child. Now of this what is to me the proof? It is, because what is sought for in our discourse exists naturally in this way. Now we are seeking by what manner we shall become wise, as if there were to each of us some such power as this. But it flies quickly away then, when any one proceeds to an² investigation of the so-called arts or notions,² or any other things of that kind, which we imagine to be sciences; whereas not one of them is worthy to be called by the name of that wisdom, which is conversant with the affairs of man; while on the other hand, the soul is very confident, and divines, as if this wisdom were existing in her by some gift of nature; but what it is, and when, and how it exists, it is wholly unable to discover. Does not then in this manner our difficulty about, and search after, wisdom,³ seem somehow greatly to be full of the hope, which exists³ to each of those amongst us, who are able to examine both themselves prudently, and others harmoniously,⁴ through reasonings of all kinds and spoken in every manner? Shall we agree that these things are not thus, or thus?

Clin. We will agree in this, O guest, in the hope perhaps, which will arise in the course of time, of having hereafter with you opinions the most true on these points.

Athen. We must then first go through the other sciences, as they are called, but which do not render him wise, who receives and possesses them, in order that, by putting them out of the way, we may endeavour to place by our side those, of which we are in want, and, after placing them by our side, learn them.

² I cannot believe that the author wrote φρόνησιν—φρονήσιων—but what he did write I am no less at a loss to know; unless it were ἐραύνησιν for φρόνησιν: for ἐρ and φρ are elsewhere confounded as I have shown in Præf. Eurip. Tro. p. xviii., and so I have translated.

³ The Greek is in one MS. σφόδρα προσίχ' ἡμῶν—πλείων—γίγνομινη—but in three, προσίχοι, in two προσίχει, and in one προσίχ'—while Ficinus has—"huc spectat—plena nimirum spe"—I have translated as if the Greek were—σφόδρα πως ίσιχ'—πλίως είναι—γίγνομίνης—for the other I cannot understand.

⁴ I confess myself unable to see what is meant here by συμφώνως.

[2.] Let us, then, first look into the sciences, of which the race of man is first in want; since these are nearly the most necessary, and truly the first. Now he, who becomes skilled in these, even though he seemed at first to be wise, yet now he is not considered to be wise, but obtains rather a disgrace by a science of this kind. We will therefore mention what they are, and (show) that nearly every one, to whom is proposed the contest of seeming to become the best man, avoids them through the possession of intellect and study. Let the first art then be that, ¹ which, withdrawing us from eating human flesh, that, as the story goes, took place formerly amongst mankind after the manner of savage animals, has recalled us to a more lawful food.¹ ² And may those before be propitious to us, and they are. For whosoever we are, who have spoken, let them be bidden the first farewell.³ The manufacture of wheaten flour and barley meal and moreover the food is indeed beautiful and good; but it will never be able to work out the man completely wise. ⁴ For this very thing, under the appellation of a manufacture, would produce a difficult handling of the things manufactured.³ Nor would the cultivation of nearly the whole country (do so); ⁴ for we all appear to take

⁴—⁴ Here again Ficinus has expressed in his Latin version, adopted by Taylor, what is far more elegant than the original Greek, "non in hand the earth, not by art, but by nature, according to a god.⁴ Nor yet would the weaving together¹ of dwellings nor the whole of house-building, and the manufacture of all kinds of utensils, and copper-work, and the preparing of instruments for carpenters and moulders, and weavers, and trades in general, although possessing what is useful for the common people, be suited for virtue. Nor yet does the whole of hunting, although various and full of art, contribute what is greatly becoming² together with what is wise. Nor yet does the diviner's and interpreter's art at all; for such merely knows what is said, but has not learnt whether it is true. Since then we see that the possession of necessities is worked out indeed by art, but that not one of these arts makes any person wise, there would be left after this a certain sport,³ imitative for the most part, but by no means a serious pursuit. For persons do with many instruments,⁴ and with many imitations, effected by their own bodies,⁴ not altogether graceful, make an imitation of things, expressed⁵ in prose and verse,⁵ and of those, of which painting is the mother, while colours many and various are worked out,⁶ by many substances moist and dry; by operating upon none of which with the greatest care does the imitative art render a person wise. ⁷And when all has been done,⁷ there would be something remaining in the assistance without number given to persons without number; the greatest of which and for the most numerous occasions is the art of war, called by the name of generalship, of the highest repute in the case of need, but requiring the greatest good fortune, and that which is assigned naturally rather to bravery than wisdom. And what persons enim arte sed natura, dei quodam favore, terræ culturam aggressi videmur—"

² I must leave for others to explain, what I cannot, why τὸ μεγαλοπρεπὲς σὺν τῷ σοφῷ is thus introduced instead of τὸ σοφὸν by itself.

³ The παῖδις is here opposed to σκουδῆ, as in Epist. 6, p. 499, where I have referred to Wyttenbach in Epist. Crit. p. 14.

⁴ Ficinus has more elegantly "corporum gestibus et figuris—" Did the author write κινήμασι?

⁵ As quoted opportunely Legg. viii. § 5, p. 835, A., κατὰ λόγον καὶ κατ' ὥδαν—

⁶ One MS. has, what seems preferable, ἀποτυπωμαίνων, "put into a form"—similar to "exprimuntur" in Ficinus.

⁷ Ficinus has—"imitatione vero sublata—" From which it is difficult to ascertain what he found in his MS.

call the medical art is ¹surely itself an assistance nearly of such (ills) as the seasons cause by cold and unseasonable heat, and make by all such matters, ¹the nature of animals their spoil. But not one of these (arts) is in good repute for the truest wisdom ; for being made the subject of conjecture, they are carried along without measure by opinions. And assistants we will call pilots and sailors likewise. But not one of these let any person, by cheating us with words, proclaim a wise man on every ground. For not one of them would know the rage of the winds or their kindness, which is the most acceptable thing in the whole of the pilot's art. Nor yet such as say they are assistants in lawsuits by their power in speaking, and, by their memory and practice, give their minds to unusual ²opinions, but stumble outside the truth in cases of real justice. There still remains a certain strange power with respect to the opinion of wisdom, which the many would then call by the name of nature rather than wisdom, when any one perceives that he is easily learning, what even a child ³could learn, and is remembering many things and firmly so, and can call to mind what is suited to each thing, and quickly do it, when it would be becoming, if it took place. Now all this some will place ⁴under nature, others under wisdom, and others under a cleverness of nature. But no prudent person would ever be willing to call any one of these a truly wise man.

² The Greek is at present δόξης ἤθει—which Winckelmann, unable to understand, would correct into δόξαις ἢ ἤθει—But the sophists, to whom the author is here alluding, were wont rather to run counter to opinions and customs, than to pay attention to them. Hence I have translated, as if the Greek were originally δόξαις ἀηθεί : for ἀηθεί and ἀληθείας would be opposed to each other here as in Euthyd. § 16, n. 35 ; Laws vi. § 5.

³ Two MSS., in lieu of πᾶσαν, read πᾶσαν, in which lies hid παῖς δ—as I have translated.

⁴ All the MSS. but the one used by Ficinus, as shown by his “nuncupabunt,” read θήσουσι for φῆσουσι.

[3.] It is however necessary for a certain science to become apparent, by which he, who possesses it, would be wise in reality, and not be so in opinion merely. Let us, then, consider. For we are endeavouring by a reasoning, difficult in every way, to find some other science beyond those already mentioned, which may be truly and with propriety called wisdom; while he, who receives it, will be a person neither vulgar nor silly, but wise and good through it; and, whether he governs or is governed by the state, in justice¹ become an elegant² person.

Let us, therefore, consider that science first, which singly proceeds from human nature, and which, amongst all that are present, would, by not being present, render the race of man of (all) animals³ the most senseless and thoughtless. Now this it is not very difficult for any one to consider. For that, which has given number to the whole race of man, would, so to say, being compared 'one against one,' effect this. I conceive however that a certain god himself, rather than a certain accident, gave it to us to preserve us; but whom I conceive to have been the god, it is necessary to state, strange although it be, and, on the other hand, somehow not strange. For how must we not conceive that he, who is the cause to us of every good thing, should not have been the cause likewise of intellect, the greatest good by far? Now what god am I speaking of, Megillus and Clinias, and making an object of worship? It is almost⁴ Heaven, whom it is most just we should honour, as all the other dæmons and gods do, and pray pre-eminently to it. For all of us would confess that it is the cause of all good ¹ Instead of ἐνδικως Ast would read ἐνδικος, and unite ἐνδικος ἄμα καὶ ἡμελῆς. Ficinus, followed by Taylor, omits ἐνδικως entirely.

² This word ἡμελῆς, strangely introduced here, is translated by Ficinus "modestus." It seems to have been one of those, to which Plato and his imitators attached no specific meaning, or at any rate to which there is no definite equivalent in English.

³ Instead of ζῶων all the MSS. read τὸ ζῶον— I have translated, as if the author had written πάντων ζῶων without τὸ— Ficinus has—"quæ ex omnibus humanis artibus ita se habet, ut si hæc una semoveatur amentissima et insipientissima hominis natura reddatur"—which has led me to read ἥτις for τις, and καὶ for ἡ— Ast too is here equally at a loss.

⁴—⁵ On this expression see Ast on Legg. i. § 14.

⁶ This σχεδόν is strangely introduced here by itself. It should be united to δικαίωταρον— things to us. And we assert to boot that it has given us number, and will give it us still, if any one is willing to follow us. For if a person will proceed to a right view of it, whether it be the pleasure of any one to call it the World, or Olympus, or Heaven, let him so call it; but let him follow, wherever it assumes a varied form, when it causes the stars in it to revolve along all their courses,¹ and when it imparts the seasons and food for all, and the remaining gift² of intellect, as we should say, together with all number, and every other good. Now this is the greatest thing, when any one, receiving from it the gift of number, proceeds through every period. Returning back still a little in our discourse, let us call to mind that we have conceived very correctly, that if we take away number from human nature, we should be intellectual not at all. For the soul of the animal, from whom reason is absent, would scarcely any longer be able to receive every virtue. Now the animal, which does not know two and three, even and odd, and is entirely ignorant of number, would never be able to give a reason respecting those things, of which it alone possesses sensation and memory; but nothing hinders it (from possessing)³ the other virtues, fortitude and temperance. But he, who is deprived of true reason, will never become wise; and he, to whom wisdom is not present, which is the greatest part of the whole of virtue, would never be perfectly good, nor happy. In this way there is every necessity for number to be laid down as a principle. But why it is necessary, there would be a discourse longer than all that has been spoken. And correctly will the present one have been stated likewise, that of the things, mentioned as belonging to the other arts, which we have gone through, 'and permitted them all to be arts,'⁴ not even one would remain, but all perish entirely, when any one

¹ Ast says that in δεξιόδους there is an allusion to the notion, that the stars formed an army, which went out upon expeditions. But, unless I am greatly mistaken, the author wrote λοξός δόους—For not only was the apparent course of the Sun through the ecliptic said to be oblique—and hence he was called Λοξίας—but those of the other stars likewise. See at the Rivals, p. 420, n. 6. On the confusion of λοξός see at Hipp. Maj. § 16, n. 65, and here, § 9, p. 26, n. 1.

² In lieu of δι οὖν, which could not thus follow καὶ τὴν ἄλλην, I have translated, as if the Greek were δόσιν, similar to ἀριθμῶν δόσιν just afterwards.

³ Ficinus alone adds, what the sense requires, "habere—" takes away the science of numbers. But to some of those, who have looked to the arts, the race of man would appear sufficiently¹ for the sake of some small matters to have no need of number. And yet is it a thing of moment. And if any one looks to what is divine and mortal in generation, in which piety towards the gods and true number are known,² he could not mention the person, who³ knows the whole of number, and of what power it is, when present, the cause; since it is evident that what relates to all music, requires numbered motion and sound; and, what is the greatest, that it (number) is the cause of all good things, but of nothing evil, this must be known well,⁴ which would perhaps take place by another road; for⁵ the movement, which is without reason, and order, and shape, and rhythm, and harmony, and all such things as partake of any evil, is deficient in nearly all number. And this it is meet for him to conceive in this way, who is about to end his days happily; and no one,⁶ except him, who knows the just, the good, the beautiful, and all such things, and has laid hold of a true opinion respecting them,⁷ will through number know how with regard to any thing⁸ to persuade himself and others at all.

[4.] Let us then proceed to consider this very thing, how we learnt to number. Say, from whence did it arise that we have understood one and two? ⁶ Do persons possess from the

²⁻³ The Greek is in some MSS. οὐκ ἂν εἴη πᾶς ἂν τις— in others πᾶς μάντις— similar to "inveniet nullum vatem" in Ficinus. But then πᾶς ought to be omitted, or τις introduced. I have translated, as if the Greek were οὐκ ἂν εἴη εἴποι τιν', ὅς—

⁴ I have translated, as if the Greek were οὐδεὶς ποτε, πλὴν ὁ γινώσκων, not οὐδεὶς ποτε μὴ γινώσκων—

⁷⁻⁸ I have translated, as if the Greek were φύσιν τοιαύτην ἰσχοῦσιν ἰσ creator a nature of this kind towards their⁶ being able to understand them? Nature, indeed, has not been present to many other animals for this very purpose, so that they are able to learn from their father to number; but the deity has established within us¹ this very thing first, so as to be competent to understand what is shown to us; and afterwards he showed it and is still showing; of which things what can a person see one, as compared with one,² more beautiful than the birth³ of day? ⁴and then, when he comes to the portion of night, he will have a sight,⁴ from whence every thing will appear to him quite different. And when⁵ he ceases not revolving upon these very matters for many days and many nights, ⁶(he will see) how⁶ Heaven ceases not in teaching men one and two, until even the most hard to learn shall learn sufficiently how to number. For⁷ thus each of us, on perceiving these, would understand three and four and many. And amongst these the deity has formed one thing, the Moon; which at one time appearing greater, and at another less, ⁸proceeds through (her path), showing continually another day⁸ up to fifteen days and nights. And this is a period, if any one is willing to establish the whole circle as one; so that the most indocile animal, so to say, would learn to number, if it were one, to whom the deity had imparted the nature of being able to learn. And up to these points, and in these matters, the whole mass of animals have the power to beτοῦ ποιούντος πρὸς τὸ δυνατός—not φύσιν ταύτην ἰσχυροῦν ἐκ τοῦ παντός πρὸς τὸ δυνατός: where τοῦ ποιούντος is similar to τοῦ πατρὸς just afterwards.

¹ I cannot believe that the author wrote παρὰ ἡμῖν—ἐνψύκισιν, contrary to the genius of the language. Hence I would read γίρας for παρὰ—

² I have adopted ἐνὸς ἀνθ' ἐνός, as suggested by Stephens, from “si unum uni conferatur,” in Ficinus.

³ I have translated γένος “birth.” Ficinus has “diei lucem,” as if his MS. read σίλας.

⁵ I have adopted δραν, furnished by three MSS., in lieu of δντα—⁶ I have translated, as if the Greek were not δς, but εἰσεται ὥς, to which I have been led by finding in Ficinus “videbis—”

⁸ Such is the literal version of the Greek. Ficinus, followed by Taylor, has “ita quotidie varia—cernitur :” which leads to ἄλλην αὐτὴν δεῖ φαίνουσα—δσημίραι—“showing itself ever different daily—” come skilled in numbers, by considering one thing, itself by itself. But always to reckon up all numbers, when compared with each other, I think is ¹ a greater work.¹ And for the sake of this, the deity having formed, as we have said, the Moon, increasing and decreasing, has put together months into the year,² and caused us to compare every number with number, with a prosperous fortune.² Hence, there are ³ fruits for us, and the earth has become pregnant,³ so that there is food for all animals; while winds and showers take place, neither out of season nor measure. But if any thing occurs contrary to this on the side of evil, it is meet to accuse not the divine, but human, nature, as unjustly distributing its own life. Now to us, while we were investigating the laws, it appeared, that the other things, which are nearly the best for man, are easy for us to know; and that every one would be competent to understand what was said, and to do it, if he knew what is that, which is likely to be a benefit, and what is not. But it has appeared, and now appears still, that all the other pursuits are not very difficult; but in what manner it is meet for men to become good, is very difficult. And, again, to acquire all the rest of good things, as the saying is,⁴ it is both possible and not difficult; but with respect to substance, how much is requisite and not requisite, and with respect to the body, how much is requisite and not requisite, and with respect to the soul, that it ought to be good, every one agrees with every one. But in what manner it ought to be good, every one (when asked)⁵ answers, by being ⁶ just, and temperate, and brave,

²—² Such is Taylor's translation of the version of Ficinus, "conferri docuit—" which Ast too seems disposed to adopt. But how the Greek words ἤρξατο συννοῦν, "he began to look together," can have that meaning, I cannot understand. Did the author write ἤρξατο τις συντίπειν, i. e. "a person began to combine—"

³—³ This mention of fruits before the pregnancy of the earth seems a rather strange ἑρμηνείαν πρότερον.

⁴ To what saying the author here alluded, I confess myself unable to explain. I would therefore read ἀ λήγομεν—"of which we have spoken," for the best MS. Z. offers δ λήγομεν—

⁵ Ficinus alone has, what is required by the sense, "interrogatus—"

and this ;¹ but (in what manner) to be wise,² or what wisdom is,³ not one, as we just now observed, agrees at all with one of the many. Now therefore, besides all the previous kinds of wisdom, we have discovered one, by no means vile for this very purpose, that he, who has learnt what we have discussed, will seem to be wise ; but whether he, who is skilled on these points, is wise and good, on this it is requisite to hold a discussion.

Clin. How reasonably, guest, did you say, that you are endeavouring to speak greatly about great things !

Athen. For they are not trifling things, Clinias ; and, what is still more difficult, they are in every respect and entirely true.

Clin. Very much so, guest ;³ but do not however be faint-hearted in stating what you mean.³

Athen. Truly so ; nor do you in hearing.

Clin. This shall be ; for I will speak to you for both of us.

Athen. It is well. [5.] But it is necessary, as it seems, to speak first of all from the beginning, especially if we are able to comprehend in one name what is that, which we consider to be wisdom ; but if we are quite unable, (to consider) in the second place, ⁴ what and how many are the (arts) ⁴ through which he, who receives them, will, according to our story, be a wise man.

Clin. Say on.

Athen. What follows after this will be without blame to the legislator ; who, making a conjecture about the gods, speaks more beautifully and better than those, who have spoken⁵ before ; and who passes his life in making use, as it were, of a beautiful discipline, and honouring the gods, and exalting them with hymns, and felicity,⁶ and thus passes through life.

² The Greek is ἦν τινα δέ— It was, I suspect, originally, ἦ ἦν τινα δέ—as I have translated.

³ Such is the literal version of the Greek. Ficinus, followed in part by Taylor, has "labori ne cedas, quin, ut cæpisti, progrediare."

⁵ Three MSS. offer εἰρηκώρων for εἰρημίωνων ; and so found Ficinus.³ In his, as Stephens elicited from his "quam prisci," adopted by Taylor.

⁶ Ast vainly, I think, endeavours to explain the strange expression

Clin. ¹ Well and beautifully ¹ are you speaking, guest; and may the end of your laws be this, that after falling down ² before the gods, and passing a life the most pure, ³ you may meet with its close the best and the most beautiful.

Athen. How then shall we speak, Clinias? Does it not seem to you that we honour the gods greatly by hymning them, and by praying that it may come into your minds to say things the most beautiful and the best respecting them? Say you in this way, or how?

Clin. In this way, wonderfully. But do thou, O' godlike man, confiding in the gods, offer up a prayer, and speak the one amongst your beautiful speeches that comes into your mind relating to the gods and goddesses.

Athen. This shall be, if the deity himself be our leader. Do you only pray with me.

Clin. Say then what is to follow this.

Athen. It is necessary then, as it seems, for me, since those, who have gone before, have represented improperly the generation of gods and of animals, to give in the first place, according to our former reasoning, a better representation, by resuming the discourse, which I took in hand against impious assertions, and to assert that there are gods, who have a care for all things both small and great; and that they are not to be softened down by those, who are engaged in unjust ⁴ acts, if you remember, Clinias; for you took down a memorandum of it; for what was then said was very true. But this was the greatεὐδαιμονία γεραίροντι. The author wrote, I suspect, ὑμνοῖς τε γεραίροντι κατ' εὐδαιμονίας διάγειν τὸν αὐτοῦ βίον, answering to "feliciter vivat," in Ficinus.

¹ The Greek is at present ἡ καλῶς λέγεις. But the formula καλῶς λέγεις, never is nor could be preceded by the interrogative ἤ—The author wrote, no doubt, Εὐ καὶ καλῶς—as I have translated.

est, that every soul is older than every body. Do you not remember (this) ? or this at least perfectly, that what is better, and older, and more divine, is credibly prior to that, which is worse, and younger, and less honourable ; and in every way that what governs, is (prior) to what is governed ; and that what leads, to what is led. Let us then receive this at least, that soul is older than body. Now if this be the case, it is more credible that, what is first in the generation of the first, would be almost the beginning ; and let us lay down that the beginning exists in a more becoming manner than a beginning,¹ and that we have most correctly come upon ²the greatest (parts)³ of wisdom, relating to the generation of the gods.

Clin. Let these things be stated ³to the best of our power.³

Athen. Come, then, let us assert that an animal is said most truly (to exist)⁴ according to nature then,⁵ when one combination of soul and body coming together produces one form.

Clin. Correctly so.

Athen. A thing of this kind then is most justly called an animal.

Clin. It is.

Athen. Now it is requisite, according to a probable account, for five solid bodies to be mentioned, from which a person might model the most beautiful and best of things ; but the whole of the other genus possesses one form. For there is nothing else, which can be generated without a body, and possessing in no respect and at no time colour, except the really most divine genus of soul. Now this is nearly that alone, to which it pertains to mould and fabricate ; but it belongs to body, as we call it,⁶ to be moulded and produced, ¹ I have translated as if the Greek were τὴν ἀρχὴν ἀρχῆς, not τὴν ἀρχὴν τῆς ἀρχῆς—which I cannot understand. The author meant, I presume, to say that the first cause is superior to any other cause.

² Ficinus omits τῶν μεγίστων—which Ast says are to follow σοφίας—But in that case σοφίας would require the article.

³ Ficinus has—"pro humanis viribus"—as if his MS. read δύνανται ἀνθρῶπινην—

⁴ From γέ I have elicited εἶναι—or else we must read γενέσθαι for λέγεσθαι—by the perpetual confusion in those words.

⁵ In lieu of τοῦτο Stephens would read τότε—obtained from "tunc" in Ficinus ; and this, which is confirmed by three MSS., the Zurich editors have adopted, as Ast too feels half inclined to do. Staibaum however scornfully rejects it, for he did not remember that the author had repeated in p. 974, B. and 976, B., the same formula, τότε, ὅτ' ἀν—

and to be visible. But to the other (soul)—for let us say it again, ¹since it is to be said not merely once, ¹—(it pertains) to be invisible, and to know and to be intelligible, ² and to have a share of memory and of the reasoning power in the changes of even and odd. As there are, therefore, five bodies, it is requisite to say that fire ³(is the first), and water (the second), ³ and air the third, and earth the fourth, and æther the fifth; and in the dominions of each of these there is produced many an animal and of every kind. Now it is meet to learn this singly, thus. Let us, in the first place, lay down the whole of the things of earth as one, namely, all human beings, and all such animals as are with many feet, or none, and such as can move on, and such as are stationary, as being held down by roots. And it is requisite to consider the one thing belonging to it as this, that all these are formed of all those genera, but that the greater part is of the earth and the nature of solidity. It is, however, requisite to lay down another kind of animal, which is generated, and, at the same time, able to be seen. For it consists for the most part of fire; but contains likewise a small portion of earth and air, and of all the other things. Hence, it is requisite to assert that animals of every kind and visible are generated from them. ⁴ It is necessary likewise to think that all in the heavens are these genera of animals, ⁴ ⁵ which it is necessary to say ⁵ is the whole divine race of the stars, consisting of a most beautiful body, and of a soul the most happy and the best. ⁶ It is requisite moreover to impart to them, at least in opinion, one of two fates. ⁶

¹—The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus, and Taylor after him.

² In lieu of νοητῇ I have adopted νοερεῖ, suggested by Sydenham from "cognitionis compos" in Ficinus.

³—I have translated, as if the Greek were πῦρ φάναι ἄ καὶ ὦ ὕδωρ—where ἄ is "first" and ὦ "second"—On ὦ as one form of β, see Bast in Palaeograph. p. 708.

⁴—Ficinus has more briefly—"hæc cœlestia putamus animalia esse."

⁵—The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus. Taylor has—"or in other words—"

For each of them is either indestructible and immortal, and altogether, from every necessity, divine, or ¹ possesses some long-aged life of life, sufficient for each, than which¹ there would be never any need of more.

[6.] Let us then consider first, that there are, as we have said, these two kinds of animals; and² let us say again that both of them are visible, the one being, as it would seem, wholly of fire, and the other of earth, and that the earthy is moved in a disorderly manner, but the fiery in all order. Now it is meet to consider that, what is moved without order, is senseless,³ as the animal, which is around us, acts for the most part;³ but that, what has its going in order and in the heavens, it is meet to make for ourselves as a great proof of its being intellectual; for it goes on ever according to the same and in a similar manner; and by doing and suffering⁴ it would afford a sufficient proof of its living intellectually.⁴ Now the necessity of a soul possessing intellect would be by far the greatest of all necessities. For it lays down laws as governing, and not governed. But when soul, which is a thing the best, deliberates according to the best intellect, that, which is not to be changed by turning, comes out perfect in reality according to intellect; and even adamant would not be superior to such a soul, and less to be changed by turning. But in reality the three Fates hold and guard, so as to be perfect, that, which has been deliberated upon by each of the gods with the best counsel. It was necessary therefore that there should be to man a proof that the stars are endued with intellect through⁵ the whole of their pro-

² In lieu of γὰρ, omitted by one MS., Ficinus found δὲ, as shown by his “rursusque—”

³ The words between the numerals are omitted by Taylor, although found in the version of Ficinus, “quod plerumque faciunt, quæcunque apud nos animalia sunt:” from which it would seem that his MS. read ὁρᾷ τὰ περὶ ἡμᾶς ζῶα, not τὸ—ζῶον.

⁵ I have translated, as if the Greek were κατὰ, not τε καὶ— For though gression, because they always do the same things, through its having been planned of old that they are to do so for some wondrous length of time, and through a change not taking place in the plan, by their doing some things at one time, and others at another, and by wandering ¹ up and down ¹ and altering their orbit. Now the very reverse of this has appeared to the majority of us, that, by their doing ² the same things and in a similar manner, they have not a soul. The masses, too, have followed persons so senseless, as to conceive that the human race is intellectual and vital, as being moved, but the divine race unintellectual, as remaining in the same movements. But it is allowable for the man, who places himself on the side of what is more beautiful, and better, and more agreeable (to the gods), ³ to conceive that he ought, on this very account, to consider as intellectual that, which does always the same things ⁴ according to the same and in a similar manner; and that this is the nature of the stars, most beautiful to behold, and which by a progression and dance, ⁵ the most beautiful and magnificent of all choirs, completes for all animals what is needful. Now (to show) that we are justly saying they possess a soul, let us consider first their size. For they are not in reality so small, as they appear to be; but each of them is of immense bulk, as is worthy to be believed; for this is admitted by competent demonstrations. For it is possible to conceive correctly that the whole Sun ⁶ is larger than the whole earth, and that all the stars, which are borne along, ⁷ possess a wonderful size. Let us then take into our thoughts what the stars might be supposed to be endued with intellect, the path they described could scarcely be thought to be equally intellectual.

² Instead of πράττειν Stephens proposed πράττει, adopted by Bekker, Ast, and Stalbaum. The author wrote rather, as I have translated, ὅτι τῷ ῥά— to which ὅτι τὸ ῥά—πράττειν in the best MS. Z. plainly leads.

³ Ficinus alone adds, what the sense requires, “diis,” to “gratiora.”

⁴ In lieu of διὰ τοῦτο Ficinus has “eadem,” which led Cornarius to propose κατὰ— The preposition διὰ was a var. lect. for κατὰ, as shown by “per eadem similiter profecta.”

⁵ On the dance of the stars Ast refers to Lucian in Astrolog. § 7, and Julian Or. iv. p. 135, A.

⁶ Ast refers to Cicero N. D. ii. 19.

would be the method of any nature in causing so great a bulk to revolve for ever for the same time¹ that it revolves at present. Now I assert that a god would be the cause, and that it could not be possible otherwise. For it would not otherwise become animated than through a god, as we have shown. But since a god is able in this respect, to him there has been every facility for every animal, in the first place, to be produced, and every body, and every bulk; and next, to cause them to move in that way, which he conceived to be the best. And now upon all these points we will make one true assertion. It is impossible for the earth and heavens and all the stars and all the bulky bodies made from them to subsist, unless a soul were present to each, or in each, so that² they proceed with such accuracy according to years, and months, and days, and for every good, which is produced, to be produced for us all. But it is requisite that, by how much the more vile is man, (the less) ought he to be seen to trifle, but to assert something clear concerning them. Should then any one assert that certain violent motions of bodies or natures or any thing of this kind are the causes, he will say nothing that is clear.

[7.] It is however requisite to reconsider seriously what we have said, whether our discourse has a reason for it, or altogether comes after it. In the first place then, (we said,) there are two things, the one, soul, and the other, body, and that many things pertain to each; but that all are different from one another,³ and each from each;³ and that there is no other third thing common to any one; and that soul differs from body; and⁴ that the former is intellectual, but the latter unintellectual; and that the one rules, but the other is ruled; and that the one is⁵ the cause of all (that happens), but the other is not the cause of any accident;⁵ so that to assert that the things in

¹ In lieu of χρόνον, which is unnecessary after αἰ, I should prefer δρόμον, "course—"

² In εἴρα, furnished by five MSS., lies hid ἔσσε, as I have translated.

³⁻³ The words between the numerals are omitted by Taylor, although found in Ficinus, who has "et quæ ad utriusque genus pertinent esse multa; eaque ab aliis in suo genere differre, et utraque genera a se invicem esse diversa," where Ast conceives that Ficinus added something for the sake of rendering the sense clearer.

⁵⁻⁵ The Greek is αἰτίον πάντων, τὸ δὲ ἀναιτίον πάσης πάθης— heaven were generated by something else, and that the productions of soul and body do not exist in this way, is a great folly and a want of reason. If then it is requisite for the reasons, relating to all such matters, to be victorious, and for all things of this kind to seem confidently to be divine, we must lay down one or the other of these two points; we must either hymn¹ those things most correctly, as being gods themselves, or (we must) consider them, like images, to be resemblances of the gods, the gods themselves having manufactured them. For they² (are the works of artificers)³ neither senseless nor of little worth. But, as we have said, we must lay down one or the other of these points. ³And what is laid down, we must honour pre-eminently before all statues.³ For never will there be seen statues more beautiful and ⁴more common of all⁴ men, or put up in pre-eminent places, and excelling for their purity, and solemnity, and the whole of life,⁵ than are these,⁶ how they have been generated altogether in this way.⁶ Let us then endeavour (to prove)⁷ so much, at least, relating to the gods, by perceiving that these are the two visible anithus translated by Ficinus, "illa omnium passionum corporibus, hoc nullius causa."

¹ From "putabimus" in Ficinus, it is evident that his MS. did not read ὑμνηρίων, but ἡμῖν νοητίων—

² Of the words between the numerals, Ast has supplied ἔργα, "works," and Ficinus, "artificibus—" Hence the author probably wrote οὐ γὰρ τὰ ἔργα τῶν ἀνοήτων ἔργ' ἔστιν—

³ To avoid the absurdity in this sentence, Ast would read ταῦτα δὲ τοῖσιν, in the sense of "and on this being laid down—" But as I cannot see what is gained by the change, I suspect the author wrote τάδε δ', ἄτε θεῖ' ὄντα, πάντων ἀγαλμάτων ἀντιτιμητίων διαφερόντως, "and these, as being divine, are to be honoured before all statues pre-eminently," and that he put those words after ἔργασαμένων just above; while ἀλλ' ὅτι εἰρηκαμεν—θερία must be placed after ἡ ταῦτα a little below.

⁴ I confess I cannot understand κοινότερα ἐμπάντων ἀνθρώπων, as if it were any praise for a statue to be common. I could have understood ἰδεμνότερα, "better made—"

⁵ Here again I am at a loss in ἐμπάσῃ ζωῇ.

⁶ Such is the literal version of the Greek—ὡς πάντα γηγίνηται: which Ficinus could not understand; for his version is—"quæ unigue similiter constructa sunt"—as if he wished to read τῇ αὐτῇ— Unless I am greatly mistaken, the author inserted here—ἀλλ', ὅτι εἰρηκαμεν, τοῦτων ἡμῖν θάτερα θερίων, before ὡς πάντα τῇ ἢ τῇ γηγίνηται, i. e. "that all things have been produced in this way or that."

⁷ I have inserted "to prove" for the sake of the sense. Ficinus for the same reason rendered ἰγχυρώμεν by "asseveremus"— mals, of which we have spoken, (one) immortal ; but the whole of the ¹ other has been created of the earth, mortal ; (and) ² let us attempt³ to speak of the three, which are in the midst of the five [between them],³ and exist according to reasonable opinion, most clearly. For after fire let us place æther ; and let us lay down that from it the soul moulds animals, which possess a power, like some other genera, the greater portions from their own nature, but the smaller portions, for the sake of a link, from other genera ; and after the æther that soul moulds from air another genus of animals, and a third from water. And it is probable that soul, after it had fabricated all these, filled the whole of heaven with living matter, by making use, to the best of its power, of all genera, since all of them exist, partakers of life ; but that the second and the third, and the fourth and the fifth, beginning their generation from the gods, who are manifest, end in us, who are men.

[8.] The gods, then, Zeus and Juno, and all the rest, (let any one place) ⁴ where he pleases, according to the same law ; and let him consider this reasoning as fixed.

We must call therefore the nature of the stars, and such things as we perceive existing together with the stars, the visible gods, the greatest and the most worthy of honour, and who as seeing on every side the most acutely, are the first in rank. And after them, and under them in due order, it is very meet to honour with prayers the dæmons, ⁵ for the sake of their silent going to and fro, ⁶ an ærial genus, that occupies a third⁶ and middle seat, and is the cause of interpreting. But of these

¹ I have translated, as if the Greek were γίγναι καί, not γυγνέναι—

² Ast says that πειραθῆναι depends upon ἐγχεσθῆναι—but what is the meaning of “let us endeavour to attempt,” he has not attempted to show. The author wrote πειραθῆναι—as I have translated.

³ The words τὰ μεταξὺ τούτων are evidently an explanation of τὰ μέσα τῶν πέντε.

⁴ Ficinus alone supplies “locato”—Ast would insert ὀνομάζων, understanding by θεοὺς—φανερῶς, the stars, or planets ; one of which, commonly called Venus, had likewise the name of Juno, as shown by Timæus Locrus, p. 96, E. and Apuleius De Mund. p. 58.

⁵ So I have translated εὐφύμην διαφορείας—remembering the passage in the Banquet, § 28, where mention is made of a race, that is ἐρημνέων καὶ διαπορευμένων θεοῖς τὰ παρ’ ἀνθρώπων καὶ ἀνθρώποις τὰ παρὰ θεῶν.

two kinds of living beings, ¹one (formed) of æther, and the other in due order of air, neither of them is entirely visible; ¹and though present and near at hand, they do not become manifest to us; but let us say that, participating in a wonderful intelligence, as being docile and of a good memory, they know all our thoughts; and that in a wonderful manner they love the honourable and good man amongst us, and hate excessively the wicked, as being himself a sharer in pain; for the deity, who possesses the completion of a divine allotment, is (placed) beyond these (two), pleasure and pain, but has had a share in thinking upon and knowing, according to all things.² And as the heaven is full of living beings, they interpret to each other and the highest gods all things and in all ways,³ through the living beings in the middle being carried to earth and through the whole of heaven with a light and rapid motion. But he, who assimilates the fifth genus of living beings, which is from water, to a demigod, will assimilate rightly; and this genus is sometimes visible, and sometimes concealed from view; but when visible,⁴ it exhibits a wonder through an obscure vision. Since then there are these five kinds of living beings really existing, in whatever manner any of us meets with them, ⁵falling in with them in a

² I scarcely understand here κατὰ πάντα. I suspect the author wrote, πάντα ἐκλήιστα, i. e. "all things in the best manner—" Ficinus has "sapientia cognitioneque penitus fruitur," and thus avoids all the difficulty in γινώσκουσιν thus standing without its object.

³ I have adopted πάντως, found in the best MS. Z., in lieu of πάντας—

⁴ Ast has adopted καὶ δῆλον from Ficinus—"et cum videtur," in lieu of καὶ ἀδῆλον—

dream, in an interpretation of a dream, or spoken by oracles and prophecies to some in hearing, healthy or sick, or being met with at the close of life, and opinions being present privately and publicly, from whence many sacred rites of many have taken place, and some will take place ;⁵ of all these the legislator, who possesses even the smallest particle of mind, will never dare, by making innovations towards a god-worship, which does not possess something clear, to overturn his own state ; nor will he, knowing nothing at all (himself), forbid any portion¹ of what the law of his country has spoken, on the subject of the gods.² For³ it is not possible for human nature to know any thing on points of this kind. And does not the same reason hold good, that those are the worst of men, who do not dare to speak to us of the gods really existing 'in a manifest form, and to make them manifest,'⁴ by permitting⁵ the other gods to be without sacred rites, and not to receive the honours that are due to them ? But now there happens a thing of this kind to take place, as if some one of us had seen the Sun and Moon existing and looking upon all of us ; and, 'although able to speak, had not said'⁶ that they remained still⁷ sharing in no honours ; nor was he anxious for his part to bring them into a place of honour, nor to cause festivals and sacrifices to take place for them ; nor, through the computed time,⁸ to distribute to each of them the seasons of fre-

¹ I have translated as if the Greek were οὐδ' ἓν—not οὐδ' ὧν—

² I have adopted θεῶν, found in the margin of two MSS., in lieu of θυσίων—

³ In lieu of ὥσπερ, which he could not understand, Ast suggested ὥς—He should have proposed καὶ γὰρ, as I have translated.. On the confusion of ὥς and καὶ see § 4, p. 12, n. 7.

⁴ Others may, but I will not, believe that the author wrote ὄντας ἡμῖν φανεροὺς ὄντας θεοὺς—and afterwards φανεροὺς ποιῖν—For if the gods were really manifest, it would be unnecessary to make them so. But what he did write, I confess my inability to discover.

⁸ Ast, unable to understand ἀπολαμβάνοντον—χρόνον, suggested ἀπολαμβάνοντα—He should have proposed, as I have translated, ἀπολαμβάνοντον—χρόνον—quently longer and shorter years.¹ Would not such a one, if he were said to be bad both to himself and to any other, who knew him, be justly said to be so?

Clin. How not, O guest, as being the worst (of men)?

Athen. Know then, friend Clinias, that this very thing has now happened respecting myself.

Clin. How say you?

[9.] Athen. Know that amongst those, relating to the whole heaven, there are eight powers, sisters to each other, on which I have looked; and yet I have done nothing of consequence; for this is easy even to another person.² Of these there are three, one of the Sun, one of the Moon, and one of the not-wandering³ stars, which I mentioned a little before, and there are five others. With respect to all these, and the (gods) in them, whether they move of themselves, or are carried along in cars, let not one of us all think even that some are gods, and others not; nor yet, that some of them are genuine,⁴ but others such as it is not lawful for any of us to mention; but let us all say that they are all of them brothers, and live in fraternal allotments; and let us honour them, not one for a year, and another for a month, nor let us ordain for others any allotment or time, in which (each) proceeds through its revolution, and completes the arrangement, which reason, the most divine of all, has ordained to be visible; (and) which he, who is under a good dæmon,⁵ has first wondered at, and then felt a desire to learn, as much as it is possible for a mortal nature, from thinking that he shall thus pass through life in the best and most fortunate manner, and after death arrive at places adapted to virtue; and being thus truly initiated and in reality participating in prudence, one in one, will pass the rest of his time as a holy spectator of things the most beautiful, as far as sight is concerned.

It now remains for us to state after this how many and ¹ By "the longer years" are meant the solar, and by "the shorter" the lunar, which were made to coincide, when requisite, by necessary intercalations.

² Ficinus has, what is preferable, "civis"—Perhaps the author wrote ἀγρίῳ τῷ τοῦτον—i. e. "to even a savage. Of these—"

³ All the MSS. offer πλανητῶν: from which Ast has elicited ἀπλανῶν—which I have adopted.

⁴ I confess I hardly understand γνήσιοι here.

⁵ So I think ἐδάμωον ought to be translated.

what they are. For we shall not be seen to be false. Thus far at least I firmly insist upon. For I say again, that of these there are eight; and that of the eight, three have been already spoken of, and there are five still remaining. Now ¹the fourth and fifth onward movement and oblique path ²are nearly ³equal in velocity with the Sun,¹ and are neither slower nor swifter. And let us say that he, who possesses intellect, is altogether competent to lead these three; and that these (movements) belong to the Sun, and Lucifer. But the third it is not possible to speak of by name,⁴ through its not being known; and the reason of this, that the person, who first saw it, was a Barbarian. For an ancient place⁵ was the nurse of those, who first thought of these matters, in consequence of the beauty of the summer season, which Egypt and Syria⁶ possess sufficiently, (enabling) persons to look upon all the stars, visible, so to say, perpetually; inasmuch as they dwelt (in a part)⁷ of the world at a distance from clouds and rain.⁸ Hence to every where else and hither too has reached what has been tested by the time of thousands of years, and even infinite; and on this account it is meet with confidence to lay down these matters as laws. For (to think)⁹ that divine (natures) are not to be held in honour, or that these are not divine, is clearly the province of persons not endued with intellect. It is necessary however for this to be assigned as the reason, why they

² Here again, as in § 3, p. 10, n. ¹, I have translated as if the Greek were λοξή ὁδός, not διέξοδος: unless it be said that διέξοδος answers to "trajecio" in Cicero, and in English to "passage across the heavens."

³ This "nearly" appears to be strangely added. For if the movement were neither slower nor swifter, it could not be said to be nearly equal.

⁵ As the adjective παλαιός is not elsewhere, I believe, united to τόπος, and as all the MSS. offer τρόποις, the author wrote, I suspect, παλαιούς—τρόποις τόπος—

⁶ Ast refers opportunely to Cicero de Divinat. i. 1.

⁷ To support the syntax, it is easy to read δει τὶ τοῦ κόσμου, as I have translated, instead of δει τοῦ—

⁸ That Syria is free, like Egypt, from rain, is not, I believe, mentioned elsewhere.

⁹ I have translated, as if ἡγήσθαι had dropt out after μὴ θεία—have no names¹ with the masses; for they have appellations with some divine persons.¹ For Lucifer and Hesperus, being the same, have the appellation almost of Venus, and are very well suited to a Syrian name-giver.² But the star, which revolves with an equal velocity with the Sun and this (Lucifer), has (the name) almost of Mercury.³ And further, let us speak of three onward movements (of those stars), that take their course to the right hand, together with the Sun and Moon. But it is requisite to call the eighth orb one, which a person may most correctly⁴ call the upper world, which proceeds contrary to all those,⁵ and draws the others along with it, as it would appear to persons who know little on these matters; but what we know sufficiently, it is necessary to speak of,⁶ and we do speak.⁶ For wisdom really existing is somehow in this way apparent to him, who has a share, although a small one, of consciousness⁷ correct and divine. Three stars then remain, one of which differs from the rest⁸ by the slowness of its motion. Some call it by the name of Phænon [Saturn];⁹ but that, which is after this in slowness, it is meet to call Phaethon

¹—¹ I have translated, as if the Greek were—πρὸς τῶν πολλῶν ἀλλὰ γὰρ ἰππωνρίας εἰλήρασιν πρὸς θεῶν ἰνίων—where πρὸς τῶν πολλῶν has been preserved by the best MS. Z, and has thus led me to elicit θεῶν from θεῶν, acknowledged by "deorum" in Ficinus, and found subsequently in five MSS. in lieu of ινίων—And thus there is a proper antithesis between πρὸς τῶν πολλῶν, and πρὸς θεῶν ἰνίων—

² In lieu of νομοθίτη Ast happily conjectured ὀνομαροθίτη, not, as Stalbaum says, ὀνομαθίτη. The words are constantly confounded, as shown perpetually in the Cratylus. With regard to the name of Venus being suited to a Syrian name-giver, Ast correctly explains it by showing that Venus was worshipped in Syria under many names.

³ Such is the reading of the MS. of Ficinus, and of all the others but the best Z, which offers Ερίδων, without σχεδόν—Now, since so rare a word could hardly be introduced as an explanation, I suspect that the more common Ἐρμού is the explanation of Ερίδωνος—

⁴ Ficinus has "jure," as if his MS. read, what the sense requires, καλλίος instead of μάλιος—for the two words are constantly confounded.

⁵ Ast quotes Cicero in Somn. Scip. 4, "Huic (extimo orbi) subjecti sunt septem, qui versantur retro contrario motu atque cælum."

⁶—⁶ The words between the numerals Ficinus and Taylor omit.

⁷ In lieu of συννοίας, Ficinus found in his MS. ἰννοίας, as shown by his "intelligentiæ"—

⁸ So Ficinus, whose "ceteris" plainly proves that he found in his MS. τῶν ἄλλων instead of ἀντῶν—

⁹ "As I have rejected just before Ἐρμού, the interpretation of Ερίδωνος, so here Κρόνον, Διός, and Ἀποός are the explanations respectively

[Jupiter];¹⁰ and after this follows Puroeis, [Mars,]¹¹ which has the reddest colour of all. Of these things when a person is speaking, it is not difficult to have a notion; but after learning, it is requisite to think of them, as we have said.

957d3 [10.] This however it is necessary for every Greek to have in his thoughts, that we inhabit a spot,¹ belonging to the Greeks,¹ nearly the best,² as regards virtue. But it is proper to say that it deserves praise for being situated in the middle of the natural qualities of summer and winter. ³ But though its nature, as regards summer, falls short of that, which belongs to the region there,⁴ as I have stated, it gave subsequently to them the mental perception relating to these gods of the world.³ Let us then admit that, whatever the Greeks have received from the Barbarians, they work it out to a more beautiful end.⁵ And the very same notion we ought to have with respect to what has been said now, that it is difficult to discover all matters of this kind without feeling a doubt. There is however a hope, both much and glorious, that the Greeks will respect all these divinities in a manner more beautiful and more just than the tradition, which has come from the Barbarians, by employing both discipline and the Delphic oracles and every attention according to the laws. Nor let any Greek be afraid of this, that mortals ought not to busy themselves about divine matters; but to think quite the contrary of this, that the deity is not senseless, nor ignorant of human nature; but knows that, where he teaches, (man) will follow, and learn what has been taught; and that he surely knows that he does teach us this very thing, and that we learn both number and to number. For being ignorant of this, he would be the most stupid of all beings. For, according to the saying,⁶ he would of Φαίνορα, Φαίδοντα, and Πυρόεις. Opportunely then does the best MS. Z. offer Φαίνορα for Κρόνον, and δρυμα instead of πυρρυσμια: for πυρρυσμιαν φθίγγεσθαι is a phrase not to be found elsewhere.

¹ The words between the numerals both Ficinus and Taylor omit.

² In the formula ἐν τοῖς ἀπύρτοις, so common with Thucydides, and even Plato, the word σχεδόν is never, I believe, added elsewhere.

⁴ By "there" is meant Syria.

⁵ On this notion Ast refers to the anonymous biographer of Pythagoras in Porphyry. ed. Cantab. p. 65.

⁶ I confess I cannot explain to what saying the author is here alluding.

in reality be ignorant of himself, if he were annoyed at a person able to learn, and did not rejoice without a feeling of envy at a person becoming good through a god. Now there is a reason great and good (for supposing) that, when men had their first notions about the gods, how they existed, and of what kind they were, and what actions they took in hand, ideas were then broached, not to the mind of the moderate, nor agreeable to them, nor even of those, who were next after them;¹ amongst whom what relates to fire and water and the other bodies, was said to be the most ancient; but posterior to them the wonderful soul; and that the movement, which the body has obtained by lot, is better and of more value for carrying on both itself (and soul)² by the aid of heat and cold, and all things of that kind; but that the soul could not (do so) to body and itself. But now, when we say that soul (exists),³ if it exists in body, it would be not at all wonderful⁴ for it to move and carry about both the body and itself; nor would, according to any reason, soul be believed⁵ to be unable to carry about a weight.⁶ Since then soul is the cause of the universe, and of all good things being such, and on the other hand of evil things being such, it is not at all wonderful that soul should be the cause of every bearing on and movement; but that the bearing on and movement towards the good belongs to the best soul, but the bearing on and movement towards the contrary, to a contrary⁷ (soul); and that it is necessary for the good to have vanquished, and to vanquish still, what are not of this kind. ⁸ Hence let these

¹ Such, I presume, is the meaning of οἱ δεύτεροι, unless it be said that the author wrote οἱ γ' ὅσπερ—

² I have adopted Ast's notion, that καὶ τὴν ψυχὴν have dropt out here, for they are required to balance σώμα τε καὶ αὐτὴν.

³ I have translated, as if the Greek were εἶναι, not μὲν—

⁴ Both the sense and syntax require, as I have translated, θαυμ' ἂν οὐδὲν ἦν, not θαῦμα οὐδέν—

⁵ In lieu of ἀπιστοῖ Stephens was led, from "dubium—nullum est" in Ficinus, to read ἀπιστοῖται, subsequently found in the best MS. Z. But the syntax would require ἀπιστοῖτ' ἂν—

⁶ In the Greek are found the words διὸ καὶ νῦν ἡμῶν ἀξιοῦντων, which Ficinus has omitted, either because they were wanting in his MS., or he could not understand them. I have transposed them to (*).

⁷ The sense evidently requires ἐναντίας in lieu of ἐναντίαν, which Ast vainly attempts to defend.

⁸— I have transposed hither the words διὸ καὶ νῦν ἡμῶν ἀξιοῦντων, and added ἴστω ταῦτα, &— elicited from τῶν ταῦτα—be the assertions of us, now thinking in this way;¹ all of which has been stated with reference to Justice, the punisher of the impious. [11.] With respect however to that, which has been brought to a test, it is not possible for us to disbelieve, that we ought not to consider the good to be wise.

Let us then see, whether to this wisdom, of which we were of old in search, we can direct our mind either by education or art ; and being wanting in the knowledge of which we should be ignorant of things just. ' Being such we seem to me,'² and we must speak. For after seeking up and down, I will endeavour to make it at the end plain to you in the way it has become very plain³ to myself. The greatest part of virtue, when it is not practised correctly, becomes the cause (of ignorance),⁴ as, from what has been said, the thing itself⁵ seems to me to signify forcibly. But let no one persuade us, that there is any (part)⁶ of virtue belonging to the race of mortals greater than piety. Now that this does not exist in the best natures through ignorance, we must declare ; since the best are those, which are produced with the greatest difficulty, and which, when produced, are of the greatest benefit. For the soul, that receives moderately and mildly what belongs to a nature slow and the reverse, would be of an easy disposition ; and admiring fortitude, and being obedient towards temperance, and, what is the greatest in these natures, able to learn, and with a good memory, it would be able to rejoice much in things of this kind,⁶ so as to be a lover of learning.⁶ For these things are not easy to be produced ; and when they are produced, and meet with the nurture and education of which there is a need, they would be able

² One MS. has μεταρυχούσα, where evidently lies hid μάλαρυχούσα, as I have translated.

³ Ficinus alone has "ignorantiæ," adopted by Taylor.

⁴ The Greek is ἀπρῆ, but one MS. has ἀν τι, which plainly leads to αὐτὸ, for thus αὐτὸ σημαίνειν is similar to αὐτὸ δηλοῖ in Hipp. Maj. § 18.

⁵ Ast would read, as Taylor had already translated, μέρος τι before ἀπειρῆς— Winckelmann prefers γίρας—

to keep down most correctly ¹ the most part of their inferiors,¹ by instructing² them to do and say respecting the gods each of the matters³ that are requisite, and when they are requisite, ⁴relating to sacrifices and purifications,⁴ connected with gods and men,⁵ and not to make use of artifice in outward shows, but to honour virtue in truth, which is of all things of the greatest moment to every state. This part, therefore, we say is naturally the most important; and if there be a person to teach, it is able to be learnt in the most beautiful and best manner possible. But no one can be a teacher unless a god leads the way. If however ⁶ a person teaches any thing correctly,⁶ but does not perform any thing of this kind in a fitting manner, it is better not to learn. However, from what has been said, it is necessary to learn these things, and for me to say that a nature of this kind is⁷ the best. Let us then endeavour to go through by a discourse what these are, and of what kind, and how it is requisite to learn them, both according to my ability, who am the speaker, and the ability of those, who are able to hear, in what manner a person may learn some things about god-worship. It is a thing almost absurd for the hearer. But we mention its name, which is, what a person through his ignorance of the subject would not imagine, astronomy. Are you then ignorant that the person, who is truly an astronomer, is necessarily the most wise? Not, indeed, he, who is an astronomer according to Hesiod, and all such, and looks to risings and settings, but he, who (looks to ⁸the circle) of the eight orbits, and the seven under the first,⁸ while each is

² I have translated as if the Greek were φρονεῖν, not φρονεῖν.

³ The sense and syntax require ἕκαστα ὧν— instead of ἕκαστα ὡς—

⁴— The words between the numerals are transposed by Taylor, although found in their proper place in the version of Ficinus.

⁵ For the sacrifices relate to the gods, and the purifications to men.

⁶— As there is nothing to which the subsequent τὸ τοιοῦτον can be referred, I have translated, as if the Greek were εἰ δὲ τί τις εὖ διδάσκει, not εἰ ἴ' οὖν, or εἰ οὖν τις— Ficinus avoids the difficulty by his version, "ab eo vero, qui modum in docendo non servat"—

⁷ So Taylor, as if he wished to read εἶναι for τε καὶ—

[12.] The Moon goes through its orbit the quickest first⁵ leads on the month and the full moon. The sec is meet to consider is the Sun, that leads on the so through the whole of its orbit, and those that describe course together with it. But that we may not freq converse in the same way about the same things, the orbits, which we mentioned before, and⁶ which it is nc to comprehend, we ought to contemplate;⁶ and for objects it is requisite⁷ to prepare natura, such as can by teaching them many things beforehand, and accus the party, while a boy or youth, to labour thoroughly a is requisite.⁸ On this account there would be a need of i matics; but the greatest and first (need) is of numbers abstract, and not of such as are connected with bodies,⁹ the whole generation and power of the even and the odd so much as they contribute to the nature of things that Now to him, who learns this, there comes in due order w

Greek was originally τὸν τῶν δευτέρου περιόδου κύκλον τὰς θ' ἐπὶ πρώτης ἰούσας, as I have translated.

² This repetition of φύσεως, omitted by Ficinus, seems rather and is scarcely intelligible.

³ In lieu of ὧς, I have translated, as if the Greek were οἷς—

⁵ Instead of πρώτην, Sydenham suggests πρώτην, which adopted.

Opportunately then do three MSS. offer οἷας, and one δι' οἷας, wl ας—call very ridiculously by the name of geometry.¹ But the similitude of numbers, that are naturally not similar to each other, becomes conspicuous, when applied to the properties of plain surfaces; which wonderful thing, not of human but divine origin, will appear very clear to him, who is able to think. And after this, those numbers, that are increased by a triple² (ratio), and are similar to the nature of a solid, and those, that are on the other hand dissimilar, and are by another art similar to this, which those, who are conversant with it, call stereometry,³ (to be considered):⁴ which is indeed a thing divine and wonderful to those, who look into it; that,⁵ while the power is ever revolving about the double, and that which is from the opposite to this, according to each analogy does every nature fashion out for itself a species and genus.⁵ Now the first power of the double, according to number,⁶ proceeds, according to pro-

² Bekker was the first to edit triple for triple, which Taylor had expressed in his "triple increase," and Sydenham suggests in Not. MSS. Ficinus has "in tres usque dimensiones—"

³ I have adopted στερεομετρίαν, found in the best MS. Z., in lieu of γεωμετρίαν.

⁴ Ficinus alone has, what the sense requires, and is adopted by Taylor, "considerandi sunt," as if his MS. had σκεπτικόν after γεωμετρίας—

⁶ Of numbers, some represent lines, others superficies, and others solid and cubic quantities. To the first belongs the number 2; to the second, 4, which is the square of 2; and to the third, 8, which is the cube of 2. Double proportion was considered likewise by the ancients as perfect. First, because it is the first proportion, produced between 1 and 2; and secondly, because it contains all proportions within itself; for the sesquialter ($1\frac{1}{2}$), sesquitercian ($1\frac{1}{3}$), and the other proportions are, as it were, parts below double proportion. The numbers, which the author here adduces, are 1, 2, 4, 6, 8, 12. The ratio of 4 to 2 is double; and that of 8 to 4 is also double. Now these two excesses are equal in ratio; for each is double; but they are not equal in number; for 8 exceeds 4 by 4, but 4 exceeds 2 only by 2. Again, if we compare 6 to 4, and afterwards to 8, in the first case we have a sesquialter, and in the second a sesquitercian ratio; but these excesses are unequal in ratio, although equal in number. For the ratio of 6 to 4 = $1\frac{1}{2}$, and the ratio of 8 to 6 = $1\frac{1}{3}$; but 6 exceeds 4 by 2, and is exceeded by 8 by 2. Again, compare 12 to 6, which is a double ratio, and between these compare 8 to each. Then, 12 to 8 will be a sesquialter ratio, and 8 to 6 will be a sesquitercian ratio; but a double ratio portion through one to two,¹ ²possessing a double by But that, which, as regards the solid and tangible, is double, proceeds from one to eight. ³But that of the quantity to the middle, and perhaps, what is more less, and less than the greater ;³ ⁴while the other by part surpasses, and is surpassed by the extremes.⁴ the middle of six to twelve, there is found the sesqui sesquitertian proportions. And in the middle of power, ⁵turned to both,⁵ has distributed to men a use voice and measure are combined, for the sake of sports, and harmony, after having been granted to the happy of the Muses.

But δὲ κατὰ δύναμιν οὔσα would mean, “that according to power bein words I confess I cannot understand. I could have understoo author written to this effect, “But the double of one, as regar fices, proceeds to four.”

⁶—⁶ Ficinus has translated χρεῖαν by “usum commodumque,” uncertain here, as elsewhere, how he ought to render it by one tercourse we must refer every individual thing to its species, '(and all things to one,)'¹ by asking questions and disproving what has been not correctly asserted. For this is truly a touchstone the most beautiful and thoroughly the first amongst men ; but in the case of such, as are not (touchstones), and only pretend to be, there is a labour the most vain of all.

Further still, the accuracy of time must be considered by us, and how exactly it completes all that takes place in heaven ; so that he, who believes the assertion to be true, that soul is a thing older and more divine than body, would also conceive it has been very beautifully and sufficiently said, that all things are full of gods ; and that we have never been neglected through the forgetfulness or carelessness of superior beings. But as regards all such things as these, we should bear this in mind, that, if any one apprehends correctly each of these matters, there will be a great benefit to him, who has apprehended them ; but if not, that it will be better for him to be ever calling upon a god,² according to method.² And let this be the method—for it is necessary to say so much at least as this—Every diagram, system of number, and composition of harmony, together with the one agreement of all the stars in their revolutions, ought to be apparent to him, who learns in a proper manner. And that, of which we are speaking, will become apparent, if a person rightly learns, looking to one thing. For to those, who think upon the matter, there will appear to be naturally one bond to all of these. But if a person will take the matter in hand in any other way, he must, as we have said, call upon fortune. For, without these, no nature will become lucky in states. But this is the method, (and) this the nurture, and through these subjects of instruction we must proceed, whether they are difficult or easy. Nor is it lawful to neglect the gods ; since the happy report, relating to all of them, has, according to a manner, become apparent. And I call him, who thus apprehends all these points, the man the most truly wise ; who, I stoutly affirm, both in jest and stand ; nor could, I think, Ficinus, whose abridged version is "quam nunquam sine dictis artibus assequemur."

²—I have transposed κατὰ πρόσωπον from the end of the preceding sentence to its present place, as required by the words immediately following.

earnest, will, when he shall have filled up by death his portion in things of this kind, ¹ if he be still almost dying, share any longer in many of his senses then, as sent; and he will, after being a partaker of one destiny and becoming one out of many, be fortunate, and, at the time, most wise and blessed; whether any one lives on the continent, or in islands; and that he will participate a fortune, which ever happens to be of this kind; and whether any one studies these questions, living a public private life, he will meet with the same fate and in a manner from the gods. But what we said at the beginning the same assertion appears even now to be really true; is not possible for men to be perfectly blessed and happy except a few. And this is rightly asserted by us. For we are divine and at the same time prudent men, and cannot participate in the rest of virtue, and in addition have access to all, that is closely connected with a blessed instructive such things as we have mentioned, to these alone have gifts of fortune fallen by lot, ² and are in a sufficient state those then, who have laboured in this way upon such things, we say privately and lay down publicly as a law, that the greatest offices ought to be given to those, who have attained at the period of an old man; and that all the others ought to follow them, and with good words hymn all the good goddesses; and lastly, that all of us, after having known sufficiently examined the nocturnal assembly, most co-exhort it to this wisdom.

²—² I have translated as if the Greek were εὐτυχέ τε καὶ ἱκανῶς not ἱκανῶς εὐτυχέ τε καὶ ἔχει. Ficinus has rather loosely—"in modo satis ad felicitatem omnia se habere videntur."

INTRODUCTION TO THE AXIOCHUS.

ALTHOUGH the Axiochus and five following dialogues, all equally spurious, have been generally appended to the complete editions of Plato, yet, strange to say, they have never been translated into English. This fact, as regards the Axiochus especially, is the more remarkable, as that dialogue has been so great a favourite with scholars of different countries, that twelve translations have been made of it into Latin, four into German, and two into French. For though Cousin asserts that his own is the only French version, yet he might have known from Fabricius and Fischer, that Dolet had preceded him in 1544; whose tiny volume, that contains a translation likewise of the Hipparchus, is so scarce, that no copy of it is to be found in the National Library at Paris, as is stated distinctly in a modern reprint of it; nor is it mentioned, I may add, in the different Catalogues of the British Museum.

Of these twelve translations nine have appeared in print; but the remaining three are to be found only in MSS. from the pens respectively of Cincius Romanus, Rainutius, and Leonardus Aretinus; unless it be said that to one of these three is to be referred the copy, once in the possession of Swart of Altorf, in the Catalogue of whose library, says Fischer, it is described in P. 2, p. 277, n. 871, under the title of "Axiochus Platonis de contemnenda morte. Venundatur ab Alex. Haliatte, Mediolanensi, s. a. 4." Of the version by Cincius MSS. are to be found in Archbishop Parker's library at C. C. Camb., as stated in the Catalogue, p. 65, and in the British Museum, Burney MSS., 226, and in the National Library at Paris, Cod. 6729; while a copy of the version by Rainutius is in MS. Harl. 4923, and in Arundel MSS. 277. To these however I have paid no attention; as they are done too loosely to enable one to ascertain what the translators found in the MSS. before them. But such is not the case with Ficinus, who has here, as elsewhere, kept very close to the original, except when he perceived the text to be manifestly corrupt. And a similar observation is applicable to the translation of Hieronymus Wolfius, printed, together with the text and notes, at Basle in 1577, 4, under the title of "Doctrina recte vivendi et moriendi," a fact not known, it would seem, to Cousin, who attributes that work to an anonymous scholar.

With regard to the author of the dialogue, Ficinus attributes it to Xenocrates, either because he found it so assigned in the MS. before him, or because he knew that the follower of Plato had written a treatise "On Death," as recorded by Diogenes Laert. iv. 12. By others the author was supposed to be Æschines, the follower of Socrates. But this idea was given up, when it was ascertained that none of the passages quoted by Athenæus and Pollux, from the Axiochus of Æschines, were to be found in the existing dialogue of that name.

But whatever uncertainty may exist as to the author, it is evident from § 8, p. 45, n. 1, as Wolf was the first to remark, that it was written at the time, when the successors of Plato occupied the Academy, and those of Aristotle the Lyceum, at Athens.

AXIOCHUS;

OR,

ON DEATH.

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE.

SOCRATES, CLINIAS, AXIOCHUS.

[1.] Soc. WHEN I had gone out on the road to Cynosarges,¹ and had arrived at the Ilissus, the voice of some one reached me, calling out, "Socrates, Socrates." And when on turning towards (the sound) I looked round to see from whence it might be, I beheld Clinias, the son of Axiochus, running towards the fountain Callirrhoe, together with Damon the musician, and Charmides, the son of Glaucon. Of these,² one was the other's music-master, and the other was, from a feeling of friendship, at once the loving and beloved. I determined therefore to give up the direct road, and to meet them, that we might come together in the easiest manner.

[2.] And Clinias, with tears in his eyes, said—Now, Socrates, is the time for you to exhibit the wisdom ever bruited by you.³ For my father has at some sudden season⁴ become ¹ This was a place, where there was a temple dedicated to Hercules, at which illegitimate children were registered, who were under the protection of the god, who was himself the illegitimate son of Zeus.

² I have adopted Wolf's correction, αἰροῖν, confirmed in part by the best MS. V., which has αἰρών, while all the rest have αἰρώ. It is however uncertain, as remarked by Wolf, which was the lover, and which the loved, Clinias or Charmides.

³ As Socrates was never known to proclaim his wisdom, but rather the want of it, we must either omit πρός with Stephens, or read περί with Wolf, similar to "de te" in the version of Agricola.

⁴ In lieu of ῥαπ, to which Stephens was the first to object, as being improperly united to αἰφνιδίον, Fischer would read συμφορᾶς, which the powerless, and is at the end of life, and with pain the idea of dissolution; although at a former period he ridicule those, who were afraid of the bugbear of death to rebuke them mildly. Come then, and console him as he wont, in order that ¹he may without a groan pursue the road of fate,¹ and that, ²together with the remainder of piety, this too may be done by me.² In no moderator, Clinias, (said I,) shall you be disappointed in me; even as you are inviting me to do a holy act. Let us then hasten; for if such is the state of affairs, there is a need.

Clin. On merely seeing you, Socrates, he will rarely often has he been on his legs again after a (serious) syncope [3.] Soc. When we had traversed rather quickly along the wall,⁴ at the Itonian gates⁵—for he dwells not close to the pillar of the Amazon⁶—we came upon him when he had already⁷ recovered his senses, and ⁸his body

Zurich editors seem disposed to adopt. I should prefer δὲ "weakness," or τινος νόσου φοβᾶς, "attack of some disorder."

¹— The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus.

²— I confess I hardly understand the words between the numerals nor could Ficinus; whose version is, "unaque cum aliis pium equere," as if his MS. read καὶ ἄμα σὺν τοῖς ἄλλοις ἵνα εὐσιβεία θῇς.

³ Although σύμπτωμα is elsewhere any symptom, yet here it means "a serious one;" unless it be said that δεινὸν has dropped ἀνασφῆλαι, as it has between γίγνεσθαι and συμπτώματος: for united to νόσων, and κακῶν with ἀνασφάλλειν, in the passages of H. Steph. in Thess. L. Gr. Ficinus has merely "ut quodam sipisceret."

⁴ In lieu of ἤμεν ταῖς, Matthiæ in Gr. Gr. would read ἤμεν. He should have retained however ἤμεν, as I have done in the text.

⁵ By the Itonian gates are probably meant those, near to which he had perhaps a shrine, and was worshipped there under the name of Itonia, and as she had the same appellation at Coronea in Bœotia, the suspect, at Athens were placed across the road that led from the town in Bœotia. Ficinus has "per Itonios agros." An critic has suggested τῆς Ἰρωνίας. The reading Σιτωννιμίας, four MSS., is to be referred to the fact stated by Steph. Byz. that a town in Thessaly called Ἰρών, had likewise the name of Σιτών.

⁶ The Amazon was Antiopé, as may be inferred from Pausanias.

⁸— Instead of τῷ σώματι, the best MS. V. has τὸ σῶμα, which to τὸ σῶμά τι, as I have translated.

strength, although his mind was weak, and he stood greatly in need of consolation ; and frequently did 'he raise himself up,' and give vent to moans, together with the shedding of tears, and the noisy beating of his hands. On beholding him, Why is this, Axiochus? said I. Where are your former boastings and frequent praises of virtue, and your boldness not to be broken down?¹ since, like a cowardly combatant, you have exhibited yourself of noble bearing in the place of exercise, but have failed in the fight. Will not you, a man of so long a life, and the hearer of (the finest)² reasonings, and, if nothing else, at least an Athenian, after surveying³ nature consider that this is surely a common (saying),³ and bruited amongst all, that life is a kind of sojourn (upon earth);⁴ and that we must pass through it in a reasonable and good-tempered manner, and take our departure, only not singing pæans⁵ on the road to fate; while to conduct yourself in so cowardly a manner, and to be torn with difficulty from existence, is to exhibit, like a child, a period of life not over-wise.⁶

Axio. This, Socrates, is true; and you appear to me to

² In lieu of ἀρρηκτον, Stephens was the first to suggest ἀρρηκτον, adopted by Boeckh. To this passage however Ruhnken refers the gl. in Timæus, Ἀρρατον ἰσχυρόν, στερεόν.

³ I have translated as if καλλίστων has dropt out between και and κατήκοος—

⁴ I have with Boeckh adopted περισκεμμένος, suggested by Horreus, in lieu of περισκεμμένος—

⁵ Although σου constantly follows δὲ, yet here it seems to conceal ἔπος, as I have translated, similar to "sententiam" in Ficinus. The sentiment emanated from the school of Pythagoras. At least Stobæus, in cvl. p. 573, Gean., quotes from Hipparchus the Pythagorean, οἱ ἄνθρωποι—ἐν τῷ βίῳ οἰοῦντι τινα παρὰ τὴν φύσιν ποιησούνται. See too Marc. Antonin. li. 17, "Ὁ βίος δὲ πόλεμος καὶ ἐίνου ᾗ τὴν φύσιν, which seems to be a verse of Menander. Cicero De Senect. § 23, "ex vita ita discedo, tanquam ex hospitio."

⁶ I have added "upon earth," what the sense seems to require.

⁷ Wolf quotes opportunely from Cicero Tusc. i. "Si quid tale acciderit—at exeamus e vita, læti et agentes gratias pareamus." Ficinus omits μόνον οὐδὲ καὶ αὐτὸν. For those words, consisting of twenty-one letters, made up one line of the MS., from which his own was transcribed.

speak correctly. And yet I know not how, when I the very point of what is dreadful, those powerful & clever reasonings unconsciously fall away,¹ and are held in honour; while in their stead a fear lays hold of me, my mind in various ways, if I am to be deprived of this here, and of the good things (of life),² and to lie wherever³ it may be, unseen and unheard of,⁴ after I am turned into worms and nondescript creatures.⁵

[4.] Soc. Through your own ignorance,⁶ Axiochus, you are combining sensation with the want of sensation; you are acting and speaking in a manner at variance with yourself; and you do not consider that you are at one and the same time lamenting your want of sensation, and perceiving the idea of your rotting away, and of being deprived of life, which is pleasant, as if you are to die and live in another state, not to pass⁷ into insensibility complete, and the same before you were born. As then none of the mischief of the political period of Draco and Clisthenes pertained to yourself—for you, to whom it might have pertained, did not

³ I have adopted ὅπου δῆποτε, from the best MS. V., in lieu of ὅπου, an adverb of motion, could not be united to ἐκκίπνουνται, καὶ ἐκεῖ. With the whole passage compare the speech of Claudio in Measure for Measure, act iii. sc. 1, "Ay, but to die," &c.

⁴ In lieu of ἀγνοῦντος Stephens was the first to edit ἀπυστος, bearing no doubt the expression in Hom. Od. i. 242, ὅχιρ' αἰστος,—where Hesych. explains ἀπυστος by ἀνήστος—

⁵ The word κνώδαλα seems strangely introduced here. Fapplied rather to the larger animals than the smaller; although I explain κνώδαλον by ζῶον μικρόν, where Heinsius refers to passage. Ficinus has "feras—"

⁶ I have omitted ἀνεπιλογίστως, which is quite superfluous and τὴν ἀνεπιστάσιαν, and has evidently come from § 16.

⁸ The best MS. offers μεταβαλῶν, in lieu of μεταβάλλων, wished to read, similar to "migratus" in Ficinus.

at all—so it will not after death occur to you; for you, to whom it might occur, will not be in existence. [5.] Throw aside then all silliness of this kind, and think upon this, that, after the union of soul with body has been once dissolved by the former being settled in its own home-place, what is left of the latter is of the earth and devoid of reason, nor is it a man.¹ For we are soul, a thing of life and immortal, pent up in a mortal prison. And nature has for some mischief² fitted round this tabernacle, ³to which pleasant things are in a recess,³ and on the wing, and mixed up with the majority of pains; but the things of sorrow are unmixed, and last a long time, and have no share in what is pleasant; (I say nothing)⁴ of diseases and inflammations in the sensoria and of internal ills, with which the soul, as if sown⁵ with pores, does, when it sympathizes, of necessity desire its congenial atmosphere of heaven, and feels a thirst for the life that is there,⁶ and a hankering after its dancing;⁶ so that a removal from this life is but a change from an evil to a good.

[6.] Axio. Since then, Socrates, you consider life to be an

² Such I presume is the meaning of πρὸς κακοῦ—

³—³ This is the literal version of the Greek, ὃ τὰ μὲν ἥδοντα μυχιαῖα— But ἥδω is a verb of naught, and μυχιαῖα, if derived from μυχός, and from nothing else it can be derived, is perfectly unintelligible. Hence from ἀμυχιαῖα in Stobæus, Stephens elicited ἀμυχιαῖα, for he found in Hesych. Ἀμυχή· ἐπιπόλαιον ἄλκος. The reading has been adopted by Boeckh; for he did not remember that nearly all words in -αῖος indicate either weight, or value, or length of time. Unless I am egregiously mistaken, the author wrote here, ὃ τὰ μὲν ἥδὲ ὄντα ὀνυχιαῖα, and shortly afterwards ἥδιον ὄντων, not ἥδόντων— For ὀνυχιαῖα would mean "the length or value of a nail." Wolf was near the sense when he suggested δαρυαῖα—although from "adulterina" in Ficinus, he was once led to μοιχιαῖα—

⁴ To preserve the syntax, I have translated, as if the Greek were νόσους ὃ ἰὼ καὶ—not νόσους δὲ καὶ—Perionius has "Quid morbos commemor." On the loss of ἰὼ, see my Poppo's Prolegom. p. 121.

⁶ Correct Greek would, instead of ἐκίσας, require ἐκεί, or ἐκείθε, to which ἐκείθεν in one MS. seems to lead. Ficinus omits ἐκίσας—ill, why do you remain in it? and this too, when you are a person of reflection, and excel us, the mass, in mind.

Soc. You do not, Axiochus, testify truly in my case; but you conceive, as the mass of Athenians do, that, since I am searcher after facts, I am acquainted with something. And indeed I would pray to know all things of even a common kind, so much am I deficient in what are superior. But what I am now saying are the proclaimed doctrines of Prodicus the wise, that have been bought, some for half a drachm, others for two drachms, and others for four; for that person never teaches any thing for nothing, but his custom is perpetually to proclaim the sentiment of Epicharmus—

Hand hand washes; give then something,¹ and get something in return.¹

[7.] And lately, when he was making a display at the house of Callias, the son of Hipponicus, he spoke so much against living, that I drew a line through (the word) life as a thing of the least value; and from that time, Axiochus, my soul yearned for death.

Ario. And what was said then?

Soc. I will tell you all² I can remember. For what part of life, said he, is free from pain? Does not the infant cry at its first birth, beginning to live from pain? Nor is it deficient in any suffering, but is affected painfully either by the want of something, or excessive cold or heat, or a blow; and being unable to tell what it is suffering, it cries continually, possessing this voice alone of its discontentment. And when it reaches its seventh year, after having gone through many troubles, there are boy-leaders, and teachers of grammar, and drilling-masters tyrannizing over him. And as he grows bigger, there is a still larger number of despots, who teach him correctness in composition,³ and geometry, and military tactics.

¹ In the fragment of Epicharmus, it is easy to restore the lost Doric words by reading δός τι, εἰ, ἤν τι λῆς, λάβ' αὖ, i. e. "give something, and, if you wish for something, receive in return:" an emendation, of which Porson would, I think, have approved; for he has restored to the same poet τίς δέ κα λῆς γενίσθαι, in Adversar. p. 303.

³ Such was no doubt the office of the κρητοί alluded to; unless it be said that the author wrote ῥητορικοί. Ficinus has, what seems to be preferable in part, as it preserves the natural order of events, "Sursum nimirum pedagogi, grammatici, gymnastici, paedotribæ—cum paulisper adoleverit, censores, arithmetæ, geometræ, distributores," although it is not easy to understand what he meant by "distributores."

[8.] And when he is registered amongst the young men, there are, what is a worse fear, the ¹Lycéum and Academy,¹ and the Gymnasiarchs and their staves, and a measureless amount² of ills. And the whole period³ of youth is under Moderators and the selection of those placed over young persons by the Council of the Areopagus. And when he is forced from them, cares straightway come upon him in secret, and considerations as to what road of life he is to tread; ⁴ and (compared with)⁵ the after difficulties the first appear to be childish, and the terrors in truth of infants; for there are campaigns, and wounds, and continuous contests. [9.] And then old age stealthily and unconsciously comes on, to which flow together all that is on the verge of death and hard to be remedied. And should a person not pay, as a debt, his life rather quickly, Nature, like an usurer, stands near and takes as a pledge from one his eye-sight, and from another his hearing, and frequently both; and should he still delay,⁶ she brings on a paralysis, (or) a mutilation (or) a distortion of limbs; ⁷ while they, who on the threshold of old age are still vigorous,⁷ ⁸ in mind, be-

² I have adopted ἀμετρία, found in Stobæus and the two best MSS. V. Z. Ficinus, "immoderatio—"

⁴ I have translated as if the Greek were ἐμβήσεται, not ἐνστήσεται, found in one MS. in lieu of ἐνστήσονται. Ficinus too leads to ἐμβήσεται, by his "ingredi."

⁵ Wolf acutely saw that παραβαλλόμενα had dropt out here, or something similar, answering to "comparations" in Ficinus.

⁶ Ficinus, "quod si resistat quis."

⁷— I have translated as if the Greek were, not ἄλλοι πολυγέρωσ ἀκμάζουσι, words that have hitherto baffled the sagacity of critics, but ἀλλ' οἱ ἐκ' οὐδ' ὧ γήρωσ— The phrase first introduced by Homer in a passage quoted in § 10, has been restored by Valckenaer on Herodot. iii. 14, to Lycurgus from Suidas, in Ἐπὶ γήρωσ οὐδ' ὧ, and by myself to the Banquet, § 21, n. 7, where I have corrected this passage. According to Pollux ii. 15, it was adopted by Hyperides. See too Meineke on Menander, Fr. Inc. 125. Ficinus has "nonnulli ad extremum usque senium vivunt."

⁸— In the words τῶ νῦν δις παῖδες οἱ γέροντες γίγνονται, lies hid a Choliambic verse, Δις παῖδες οἱ γέροντες εἰσιν ἐν τῶ νῦν— written probably by Socrates, and adopted in part by Aristophanes in Νεφ. 1419, where see the Schol. and Bergler.

come twice children, though grown¹ old. And hence the gods, who take cognizance of human affairs,² release quickly from life² those, on whom they set the greatest [10.] For example,³ Agamenes and Trophonius,³ v up the close, sacred to the god at Pytho,⁴ did, after that the best thing might befall them, lay themselves bed⁵ and never rise from it again. So too the sons priestess at Argos, after their mother had in like prayed for some honour to be paid them by Juno i for their piety, when, through the pair (of mules) b late, they undressed themselves,⁷ and drew her (in th the temple, they did, after the prayer, change, during t their existence. And long would be the story to go of the poets, who, with their more divine mouths,⁸ hav holy hymns the tales relating to life, how they utter lame against living. Of one alone I will however remember most worthy to be spoken of, who says, (Il. xxiv. 526

The gods for mortals, in a hapless state
To live, in sorrow wove the web of fate—

and, (Il. xvii. 446,)

Of all that breathe and creep upon the earth,
There's nought than man more wretched (from his bir

And what does he say of Amphiraus? (Od. xv. 246.)

The threshold reach.

¹ I have adopted with Wolf διὰ τοῦτο, found in Clemens A Strom. vi. p. 625, A., and subsequently in the best MS. V. Fi has "quapropter—"

² Ficinus, "quos amat, ad se ex hac revocat vita."

³ The same story told by Cicero in Tuscul. i. 47, and the quoted there by Davis.

⁴ Delphi is rarely called by this name. See at Alcib. i. p. 35

⁵ Ficinus renders κοιμηθῆντες by "somno pressi—"

⁶ These were Cleobis and Biton, as we learn from Herodotus i. was probably the first narrator of the anecdote.

⁷ Ficinus renders ὑποδύντες by "subeuntes—"

⁸ I have adopted with Boeckh στίμασι, from Stobæus, in lieu μασ. On the loss by corruption of στίμασι, see at the Laws ix. p. 4

⁹ I have added "from his birth," for the sake of the rhyme.

¹⁰ Namely Euripides, from whose lost play, called Ctesphor

Weep for the ill, to which the new-born comes.

But I will stop¹ here, lest, contrary to my engagement, I become prolix by making mention of others likewise. [11.] With what pursuit or art does not he,² who has chosen it, find fault, and is discontented with his present state?³ Let us go to handicraftsmen and workers at a furnace, who labour from night to night, and with difficulty procure the necessities of life, and let (us hear)⁴ them bewailing their fate and filling up their sleepless hours with lamentations and tears. Or let us reckon up the sailor's (life),⁵ passed in the midst of so many dangers, and which, as Bias has shown, is neither amongst the living nor the dead;⁶ for the man who belongs to earth, has, as if he were amphibious, thrown himself upon the sea, and become wholly in the power of fortune.⁶ But⁶ farming is at least a pleasant thing. Clearly so. But is it not wholly a sore, for ever finding for itself a pretext for sorrow? crying now at a drought; now at a continued rain; now at a burning up; now at a mildew; now at unseasonable heat or cold.⁶ [12.] And the much-honoured states-verse is quoted, and has been wretchedly translated by Cicero in Tusc. i. 48.

¹ I have adopted παύσομαι from the best MS. V., in lieu of παύομαι. Ficinus too has "desinam—"

^{2,3} Compare Horace—"Qui fit Mæcenas, ut nemo, quam sibi sortem Seu fors seu ratio dedit,—Contentus vivat?"

³ I have translated as if ἀκούωμεν had dropt out after δακρύων: for otherwise the preceding genitives would be without regimen. Respecting the similarity of δακρύων and ἀκούωμεν see myself on Philoct. 367.

⁶ In the Greek words between the numerals there evidently lies hid a dramatic fragment, taken probably from the Γεωργοί of Aristophanes—Α. ἀλλ' ἡ γεωργία γλυκὺ ἦν δῆλον. Β. ἀλλ' ἦν οὐχ ὑπουλον, ὡς λόγος. Κάλλος, πρόφασιν λύπης τιν' εὐρὺν εἰσαί; Νῦν μὲν δὲ αὐχμὸν, νῦν δ' ἐπομβρίαν θεῖ. Ἦν ἐγκαλῶν, νῦν δ' ἐρυσίβην, νῦν θάλαρος αὐ' Ἀκαίρον, ἐκαύσαν δὲ νῦν ἀγροῦς κρύος—a passage that Horace plainly had in mind while penning his stanza in Od. III. i. 29, "Non verberatæ grandine vineæ Fundusque mendax, arbore nunc aquas Culpante, nunc torrentia agros Sidera, nunc hyemes iniquas." And hence it is easy to see that manship—for many things I pass over—through revolutions¹ how great is it driven, while it possesses a pleasure, like that of a state of fever, in its quiverings and palpitations, but a failure, full of pain, and worse than a thousand deaths. Who then living for the mob can be happy? even if he has been favourably received with a gentle buzz, or noisy hubbub, as the plaything of the people, (but afterwards)² rejected, hissed, fined, put to death, and pitied. ³Tell me this,³ thou statesman, Axiochus, where died Miltiades? where Themistocles? where Ephialtes? and where recently the ten army-leaders?⁴ when I did not put (the question) to the vote; for it did not seem to me a solemn act ⁵to hold office in union with⁵ a maddened mob;

the author wrote not οὐχ ὅλον—ἔλεος, but οὐχ ὑποῦλον—κάλλος, similar to κάλλος κακῶν ὑποῦλον in Soph. Œd. T. 1386, and not εἰδῶν, which neither ἔλεος nor κάλλος could be said to do, but ὑπεκαλῶν: and lastly, not νυνὶ δὲ ἱπικαύσαν, which is superfluous before or after θάλασσαν, but νυνὶ δ' ἱπικαύσαν ἀγροῦς κρύος: for thus ἱπικαύσαν ἀγροῦς κρύος would be properly opposed to θάλασσαν ἀκαιοῦ, and the expression ἱπικαύσαν ἀγροῦς κρύος be similar to "tellus hiscit adusta gelu—" in Ovid.

¹ In lieu of δεινῶν, I have translated as if the Greek were δινῶν. On the confusion of the two words, see myself on Philoct.

² The sense requires ἱεβαλλόμενον δ' αὖ—as I have translated, opposed to πομπησθεῖν καὶ κρηνηθεῖν: which Ficinus not understanding has thus translated—"irridetur atque exploditur."

³—³ In ἐνὶ τοῖς γε evidently lies hid εἰπ' οὖν τοῦτό γε—as I have translated.

⁴ This is supposed to allude to the ten naval officers, for whose condemnation Socrates, in his character of chairman of a public meeting, refused what he had the power to do, to put the question to the vote; as he knew well that they would in the then excited state of the people be put, as six of them subsequently were, to death, for neglecting to take up the dead bodies of the Athenians, who had fallen into the sea, in the naval battle at Arginusæ. With regard to the text, two MSS. read πρῶν βασιλεῖς καὶ στρατηγοί: of the rest, some omit βασιλεῖς καὶ, and others only βασιλεῖς; and while Ficinus has "duces reliqui," Stobæus offers πρῶν οἱ δόκα στρατηγοί, adopted by Boeckh. But as it is difficult to account for the introduction of βασιλεῖς καὶ, I suspect that those words are a corruption of β. ποσι λίουσι, i. e. "two-footed lions," and that διποσι λίουσι ought to follow ἡπρόρμην τὴν γνώμην, i. e. "I did not put the vote to the two-footed lions"—for such might Socrates fairly consider the Athenians, roaring for their prey, just as Clytemnestra is described by Æschylus in Agam. 1231, διπορος λίαυα. The error is to be referred to the fact that β means "two:" as I have shown on the Statesman, p. 250, n. 66, where β. ποσι, i. e. διποσι has been corrupted into ποσι.

⁵—⁵ I have translated as if the Greek were ἀναμιξ ἄρχων, not συνε-ἀρχων, where ἱξ has no meaning. For though ἱξάρχων is applied to the whereas Theramenes and Callixenus did on the day after introduce secretly fictitious chairmen (of the meeting), and got against the men a vote of death without a trial; and yet did you (Axiochus) lawfully¹ defend them and Euryptolemus² likewise, while thirty thousand were at the general meeting.

[13.] Axio. It is so, Socrates. And from that time I have had enough of the platform,³ and nothing has seemed to me more disagreeable than statesmanship. And this is plain to those who have been engaged in the business. And you indeed speak thus, as taking a view from a look-out; but we, who have made the experiment, know it more accurately. For the mob, my dear Socrates, is a thing ungrateful, satiated with the mere touch, cruel, envious, uneducated, as being made up of a mass of persons brought together, violent (and)⁴ triflers; while he, who acts the courtesan to it, is more miserable by far.

[14.] Soc. Since then, Axiochus, you lay down the science, which is the most free, as the least to be prayed for amongst the rest, what shall we think of the remaining pursuits? Are they not to be avoided? I once indeed heard Prodicus saying that death does not exist as regards either the living or those, who have changed their existence.

Axio. How say you, Socrates?

Soc. That as regards the living, it does not exist; while they, who are dead, do not exist; so that neither, as regards you, does it exist; for you are not dead; nor, should you suffer aught, will it exist, as regards you; for you will then not exist. Vain then is the sorrow in Axiochus grieving for leader in a dance or song, as shown by Eurip. Tro., 148; yet ὄν could scarcely be united to it. Fischer indeed asserts that συνεξάρχειν means to "gratify"—But he has not been able to prove his assertion, nor could he do it. Wolf has suggested συνεξαμαρτύν, well aware that συνεξάρχειν would be here out of place.

To avoid the absurdity in μόνος—καί—I have translated, as if the Greek were νομίμως—καί—Ficinus omits μόνος entirely.

² I have adopted Εὐρυπτόλεμος, suggested by Stephens, and found subsequently in a good MS., and confirmed by Xenophon, H. Gr. i. 7, 8. Ficinus has—"Eriptolemo—"

³ This is the English idea, answering to the βῆμα of the Athenians, the place to which those went up, who wanted to harangue the people.

⁴ To obviate the objection started by Stephens, I have translated, as if καί had dropt out between βιαιῶν and φλυνάρων. Ficinus omits βιαιῶν.

Axiochus, touching a thing that neither is nor will be; and it is just the same, as if a person were to grieve for Scylla or the Centaur, which, as regards you, do not exist now, nor will they, after your close of life, exist. For what is fearful is so to those, who exist; but to those, who do not exist, how can it be so?

[15.] Axio. These clever things you have said from the talkativeness, which is floating on the surface (of society) just now. For from thence is this idle speaking, which has been cleverly got up for the young men. But the deprivation of the good things of life is what gives me pain, even should you rattle out reasons, Socrates, still more plausible than those just now.¹ For the mind, when it is wandering, thinks nothing of fine-spoken words; nor do these touch even its surface, ²which affect indeed a mere pomp² and splendour of diction, but are wanting in truth. Now sufferings do not endure sophisms; and upon those things alone, that can reach the soul, rests there any aid.³

[16.] Soc. You are putting together, Axiochus, (words)⁴ without reason, in bringing the perception of things that are bad as opposed to the deprivation of things that are good, through your forgetting that you are dead.⁵ For the counter-suffering of ill pains him who is deprived of good; but he, who does not exist, does not lay hold even of deprivation. How then should there be a grief for that, which is about to furnish no knowledge of the things that will cause pain?

¹ I have adopted τὴν ἀπρί in lieu of ἀπρί, as suggested by Fischer, who refers to τὴν γὰρ ἀπρί δινότερα, in Theætet. p. 165, A.

² I have translated, as if the Greek were ἄλλως μὲν—ἀνέται— not ἀλλ' εἰς μὲν—ἀνέται— For τείνει, not ἀνέται, requires the preposition εἰς. With regard to ἄλλως πομπήν, see Ruhken on Tim. p. 199. Ficinus, apparently unable to understand ἀνέται, has "etsi audit, negligit."

³ In lieu of ἀπειραι, which is perfectly unintelligible, Hemsterhuis suggested ἀείραι, of which Wesseling approves on Herodot. iv. 91; and the same alteration is proposed by Segaar in Epistol. ad Valckenær, p. 19, and in Præf. ad Observat. in S. Luc. p. 9. But it is rejected both by Fischer and Boeckh; for they doubtless knew that ἀείσθαι is a deponent, not a passive, verb. I have therefore translated, as if the Greek were ἀπειρί τι ἐν τοῖς— Ficinus has "solæ hæc attendit."

⁴ Although γὰρ might stand here, yet as συνάπτεις requires its object, I have translated, as if the author had written τὰ ῥήματα—

⁵ This seems strangely said to a person who was still alive.

⁶ In addition to their being many and beautiful reasons for the immortality of the soul.⁶ For a mortal nature would surely not ⁷ have proceeded and been lifted up ⁷ to such a greatness in action,⁸ as to despise the violence of superior wild animals, and to pass over seas, and to build cities, and to lay down forms of polity,⁸ and to look up to heaven and behold the revolutions of the stars, and the courses of the sun and moon, and their eclipses, and rapid return to their former state, and the equality of days,⁹ and the two tropical movements, during winter and summer, and the rising and setting of the Pleiades,⁹

² I have inserted, what is required by the sense, τοῖς θανούσιν, which might easily have dropt out after αἰσθῆσιν.

⁵—⁵ Here again I must leave for others to understand, what I cannot, all between the numerals.

⁶—⁶ Unless I am greatly mistaken, there is a lacuna here; for the train of thought exhibits a sad want of connexion, which Ficinus supplies by "ex eo quod—"

⁷—⁷ By the aid of the two best MSS. V. and Z., that read τοσόνδε, and of one, that offers τόσον διους, and of V., that has also ἀν ἥπαρ, I have been able to elicit τοσόνδε τοῦσ' ἀν ἥπαρ, as I have translated, in lieu of the unintelligible τοσόν τοῖσιν διούσιν διήπαρ, found in all the other MSS. Ficinus has "in tantam excellentiam surrexisset—"

⁸—⁸ With this passage compare Soph. Antig. 332—368.

⁹—⁹ I have adopted Wolf's certain restoration, who reads καὶ τροπὰς διττὰς χειμῶνος καὶ θέρους, καὶ ἀνατολὰς τε καὶ δύσεως τῶν Πλειάδων: where καὶ ἀνατολὰς τε καὶ δύσεως have been brought from the place they previously occupied between σελήνης and ἐκλείψεις. For not only do and the winds, and the fall of rain, ¹and the ill-fated trailing along of fiery meteors,¹ and to lay down on a tablet what the universe is to undergo for ages,³ unless there had been in the soul some ³breath of divinity,³ through which he possessed the power of thinking upon and knowing subjects of so vast a kind; so that you are not, Axiochus, changing your existence for death, but for immortality; nor will you have a deprivation of good things, but a still purer enjoyment of them; nor pleasures mixed up with a mortal body, but unmixed with every pain. For you will, when released from this prison, depart thither, where all is without trouble, and moanings, and old age, and life is a calm, and with no taste⁴ of ill, and where in a mild atmosphere of unruffled tranquillity you (will dwell),⁵ looking round upon Nature, and acting the philosopher not before a mob and a theatre, but in the presence of Truth, blooming around.⁶

[18.] Axio. You have by your discourse brought me round to a contrary point. For I have no longer a fear of death, but already a desire to say myself, in imitation of the orators, something still more; and for a long time I have been thinking upon things on high, and I will go through the eternal and divine course, since after my weakness I have collected my strength and am become a new man.

[19.] Soc. (Hear too),⁷ if you are willing, another account which Gobryas related to me—a man of the Magi, (who)⁸ said that during the expedition of Xerxes, his grandfather, we thus recover a noun, required to govern Πλειάδων, but perceive likewise why the Pleiades are introduced here; since, as we learn from Hesiod Epy. 383 and 615, both farmers and sailors were wont to pay attention to the rising and setting of the Pleiades.

² Wolf refers here to the statement of Pliny, that Hipparchus had calculated the eclipses of the sun and moon for 600 years to come.

³—³ So Horace, “divinæ particulam aures.”

⁴ I have adopted Matthiæ's correction, ἀγευστος for ἀγοτος, remembering the expression κακῶν ἀγευστος in Soph. Antig. 590.

⁵ In καί, which Bekker has incorrectly omitted, with a single and inferior MS., lies hid οὐκ ἔστις—

⁶ Fischer refers to Cicero de Finib. v. 19, and Augustine de Trin. iv. 2.

⁷ I have adopted ἀκοῦσαι, supplied by the best MS. V. and Stobæus. Ficinus has “Referam—”

⁸ I have translated, as if ὅς had dropt out between μάγος and ἐπε— Ficinus, to supply the want of connexion, has “Inquit enim—” who was his namesake, was sent to Delos to watch over the island, where the two deities¹ presided, according to some brazen tablets, that Opis and Hecaergus² had brought from the Hyperboreans; and that he learnt that after³ the soul was released from the body, it departed to the uncertain⁴ spot, and some dwelling under ground, where is the royal palace of Pluto,⁵ not less than the hall of Zeus, inasmuch as the earth possesses the middle portion of the world, and the pole (of heaven) is spherical; of which the gods of heaven have obtained by lot one portion of the hemisphere, and the gods below the other, being some of them brothers,⁶ and others the children of brothers;⁷ and that the gates before the road to Pluto's domain are fast bound by iron locks and keys; and that the river Acheron receives him, who has opened them, and, after it, Cocytus, both of which it is necessary for him to pass over, and to be led to Minos and Rhadamanthus,⁸ (where is)⁹ what is called the plain of Truth. [20.] There are they seated as judges to sift each of the comers as to what life he had led, and in what pursuits he had dwelt in the body;⁹ and that to tell a falsehood is out of his power. On such then as a kind daemon has breathed during life, these are located in the region of the pious. ¹⁰There without stint the seasons bloom with every kind of produce, and fountains of pure

¹ The two deities were Apollo and Artemis.

² By Opis was meant Artemis, and by Hecaergus, Apollo.

³ In lieu of κατὰ Horreus once proposed to read μετὰ, which I have adopted, confirmed, as it is, by the best MS. V. Fischer however says that Horreus changed his opinion in Miscell. Crit. p. 171.

⁴ Since a good MS. Z. reads "ἄδον in lieu of ἀδελον, perhaps the author wrote Αἰδον ἀνήλιον, similar to τὰν ἀσιβῆν Ἀπόλλωνι—χίρσον in Æsch. S. Th. 857. Ficinus has "occultum—"

⁵ In Ficinus it is "Junonis," evidently a literal error for "Plutonis."

⁶ These were Zeus, Poseidon, and Pluto.

⁷ Namely Minos, Æacus, and Rhadamanthus.

⁸ I have translated, as if ἔν' had dropt out between Παράμανθον and δ, and ἴσσι after κλέζεται. Ficinus has, what the sense requires, "in eam videlicet regionem, qui veritatis campus cognominatur."

⁹ As the subject of ἐνψύισθη is wanting, it is to be supplied, I suspect, by reading ἐν τῷ σώματι ἢ ψυχῇ οὖσα— For ἢ ψυχῇ οὖσα might easily have dropt out before ψεύσασθαι. Ficinus avoids all the difficulty by omitting βεβίωκε—σώματι, and rendering "cujusque vitam," as if his MS. read ἐκαστον τὸν βίον in lieu of ἑκαστον, τὴν βίον—water flow;¹⁰ and every where are meadows made beautiful¹ by flowers of varied hues, and places of discussions for philosophers, and theatres of poets, and cyclic choirs,² and the hearing of music, and elegant³ banquets, and feasts self-furnished, and an unmixed freedom from pain, and a delightful mode of living. Nor is produced there violent cold or heat, but a well-tempered air is diffused around, mixed with the sun's mild beams. There is the seat of honour to those, who have shared in the Mysteries;⁴ for they perform together their holy rites even thither.⁵ How then is there not to you first⁶ a share in the honour, as being of the family⁷ of the goddesses?⁸ And there is a report that Heracles and Dionysus descended to Hades after having previously shared in the Mysteries here; and that they put on⁹ a boldness for the journey thither from the Eleusinian (rites).⁹ [21.] But they, whose life has been passed in a course of evil doings, are driven by the Furies to Erebus and Chaos through Tartarus, where where it is easy to elicit a distich, probably of Sophocles, "Ἐνθ' ἄρδοναι μὲν ἦρε παγκάρπῳ γέαι Βρούνοσι, καθαρῶν δ' ἐκρίονσι ναμάτων Πηγαί: Ficinus too has—"ver eternum—"

¹⁰—¹⁰ Wolf was the first to remark the poetical colour of this passage;

¹ In lieu of ἱεριζόμενοι, which is not a Greek word, I have translated, as if the author had written ῥοιζόμενοι—

² From the juxta-position of ποιητῶν, I have taken κύκλιοι in the sense of "cyclic." It may however mean "circular"—for κυκλίων χορῶν is found in Eurip. Helen. 1328.

³ Instead of εὐμελῆ, five good MSS. read ἡμελῆ, similar to "jocunda" in Ficinus, which I have adopted; although the author wrote, I suspect, πυμελῆ—"rich."

⁵ Correct Greek would require ἐκεῖ, not ἐκεῖσε—in which word lies hid, however, κατὰ εἰστας. On the box, used at the Mysteries, see Lobeck's Aglaophamus, p. 25, who quotes from Clemens Alex. Cohortat. p. 18, ἐλαβον ἐκ εἰστας—ἀπεθίμην εἰς κάλαθον καὶ ἐκ καλάθου εἰς εἰσταν.

⁶ In lieu of πρώτῳ one would prefer εἴπερ τῷ, i. e. "if to any one—" For Axiochus was not the first who had a share in the honour.

⁷ So Fischer understands γεννήτη. But as three MSS. read γενήσῃ, and two γενεῖτῃ, little doubt can remain of the truth of Wolf's correction, γῆ μύστη—

⁸ I have adopted Wolf's elegant ἐνδύσασθαι, in lieu of ἐνδύσασθαι, which Fischer vainly attempts to explain. Ficinus has "suscipere"—

⁹— Although τελετῆς might perhaps be understood after τῆς 'Ελευσινίας, yet I should prefer τῆς 'Ελευσίνι ἀγνείας—

To whom begins again his labour's end.¹

There too are persons licked round by wild beasts,² and ³terrified by the torches of the Furies glaring around them ;³ and enduring every kind of ignominious treatment, they are by eternal punishments worn down. This account did I hear from Gobryas ; and you, Axiochus, can decide upon it. For carried along myself by reason I know firmly this alone, that the soul is wholly immortal, and that, when it is removed from this spot, it is there⁴ without pain ; so that it must needs be, Axiochus, that, if you have lived piously, you will be happy either below or above.

Axio. I am ashamed, Socrates, to say a word.⁵ For so far am I from fearing death, that already I feel a desire for it ; ⁶so greatly has this beautiful discourse⁶ of yours⁷ persuaded me, as if it were a heavenly one.⁸ And even now I

² I do not remember to have read elsewhere of persons in Hades being licked round by wild beasts, except in the case of Bacchus, as described by Horace—"Te vidit insons Cerberus—leniter atterens Caudam et recentis trilingui Ore pedes tetigitque crura"—nor in fact could the act of licking indicate any thing of a dreadful kind. Hence in lieu of περιλιγόμενοι one would prefer περιάλλα χασμωμένους—i. e. with jaws very widely opened. Ficinus avoids the difficulty by his version—"ubi feræ mordaces inseparabiliter corporibus se circumplicant."

³—³ The Greek is λαμπάσιν ἐπιμόνως πυρούμενοι, i. e. "fired continually with torches." But as Stobæus offers δασίν instead of λαμπάσιν, I have translated, as if the Greek were δρασι περιλαμπομένους πυρούμενοι : for πυρούμενοι would be another example of the verb πύρισθαι, found in § 16, where the best MS. V. reads incorrectly πυρίης for πυρρείης. Ficinus, unable to understand satisfactorily the Greek, has given, what I suspect he did not find in his MS., "ubi faces inextinguibiles carnes exurunt."

⁴ I have translated as if the Greek were not καί, but ἐκεῖ, to balance ἐς τοῦδε τοῦ χωρίου.

⁵ Ficinus has "ulterius loqui," as if his MS. read, τε εἰπεῖν πλείον—

⁶—⁶ The Greek is at present οὕτω με καὶ οὕτως—but three MSS. read οὕτω μὴν καὶ—and one omits καὶ. Hence the Greek was, I suspect, originally, οὕτως μ' ἄγαν καλῶς—

⁷ I have adopted ὁ σός, furnished by two MSS., in lieu of ὁ simply.

⁸ Three MSS. omit correctly ὁ before οὐράνιος— One would prefer, however, ὦν οὐράνιος— Ficinus has "quasi cœleste oraculum."

Soc. I will do as you say. And for a while² I will go back for a walk to Cynosarges,³ from whence I was sent for hither.

¹ In lieu of ἀναριθμήσομαι, the best MS. V. reads ἀναριθμήσομαι, which seems to lead to πάντ' ἀριθμήσομαι—Ficinus has "animadvertam—" Wolf suggests ἀναμνησέσομαι, i. e. "nominabor—"

² In lieu of δέ, two MSS. read γάρ. I have translated as if the author wrote τίνας—

³ Matthiae, as I learn from the Zurich editors, proposed to reject ἐς Κυνόσαργας. Why, I know not.

INTRODUCTION TO THE ERYXIAS.

Of this dialogue, which Fischer has, on the authority of Suidas, attributed to Æschines, a follower of Socrates, but Boeckh to an unknown writer, five translations have appeared in Latin, one in German, and one in French. But as they have been all made from a printed text, they are in a critical point of view of very little use. And a similar observation is applicable to the notes of the different editors, who have been apparently unwilling to meddle with the text, even when they could scarcely have failed to see it was corrupt. I have therefore been reluctantly compelled to supply partially their omissions, and to attempt to do, what would have come with a better grace from Boeckh.

From the allusion in § 2, to the embassy sent from Sicily to Athens, as recorded by Thucydides in iii. 86, Fischer infers that the dialogue is supposed to have taken place about Ol. 88, 2; and as regards the subject of it, that the wise alone are the really wealthy, he refers to Cicero, Paradox 6, and to Iamblichus, Protrept. p. 23, ed. Arceer.

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE.

SOCRATES, ERYXIAS, CRITIAS, ERASISTRATUS.

SOCRATES.

[1.] We happened to be taking a walk, myself and Eryxias, of the ward of Steiria, in the portico of Zeus, who presides over Freed-men, and there came to us Critias the son of Phæax, (and)¹ the nephew of Erasistratus. Now Erasistratus happened at that time to be recently arrived from Sicily and those places;² and on approaching near he said—"Hail, Socrates." And (hail)³ too thou, said I. What then, can you tell us of any news⁴ from Sicily? And very (good) too, said he; but are you willing for us to sit down first? for I am tired from having walked yesterday from Megara.⁵ Perfectly so, (said I,) if it seems good to you. What then of the events there, said he, do you wish to hear the first? Is it of the people there, themselves, what they are doing, or how they are affected towards this state of ours? For they appear to me to ¹ I have translated, as if kai had dropt out after Φαίλας: and I have thus got rid of the difficulty, which others had seen, but failed to overcome.

² In the words τὸν τόπον τοῦτον there is an error, which I am unable to correct.

³ In this formula χαῖρε is wont to be repeated. See Porson on Eurip. Orest. 470, and myself in Tro. Præf. p. xxiii.

⁴ In lieu of καλόν, Bas. 2, has καίνον—Corradus renders "Ecquid novi—affers? An habes pulchri aliquid?" thus uniting both readings. But καλόν ought to follow kai πάντ, as I have translated.

⁵ Megara was about 14 English miles from Athens.

be in a case similar to wasps; for if any one excites latter in any slight manner to anger, they become difficult battle against, until one falls upon them and destroys nest and all. So, I think,¹ are the people of Syracuse. unless, after entertaining angry feelings, one² shall go th with a very large fleet, it is not possible for them to come our power; but by all these little doings they will be en the more, so as to become the most difficult of all (to man and they have just now sent ambassadors,³ intending, seems to me, to deceive in some way the state.

[2.] During our conversation the ambassadors from cuse happened to pass by; when, pointing to one of Erasistratus observed—That person, Socrates, said he, most wealthy of the⁴ Siceliotes and Italiotes;⁴ and how s he not be, who has land without stint; so that it is ea him, if one wished it, to cultivate a great deal of it; and i such a kind, that there is none other so good,⁵ at least an the Greeks; and he has still many⁶ things leading to w chattels,⁶ (and)⁷ slaves, and horses, and gold and silver. seeing him excited,⁸ as if about to dilate upon the man's stance, I asked him—What kind of person, Erasistratus this man seem to be in Sicily? This man, said he, both to be and is the most knavish of all the Siceliotes and Ita by how much he is the wealthiest; so that, should y

¹ Instead of οὖν the sense requires οἶμαι, as I have translated.

² I cannot understand ἔργον ποιησάμενος. Hence I have translated as if the author had written ὄργην ποιησάμενος, a phrase found in cyd. iv. 122, and Demosth. F. L. p. 370, R., where Shilleto might satisfy the doubts of Markland by quoting the two passages introduced.

³ The embassy, to which allusion is here made, is mentioned in cydides in iii. 86. From which it would seem that the dialogue was ten much earlier than is commonly supposed.

⁴—⁴ By Siceliotes and Italiotes were meant the settlers in Sicily, not the native people called Σικελοὶ and Ἰταλοὶ.

⁵ Although ἑρίπας ἄλλη is found elsewhere, yet here the sense requires as I have translated, ἑρίπα καλή—

⁶—⁶ The Greek is τάλλα—ἀπλά. But Hemsterhuis and Thibaut suggested ἑπιπλά, adopted by Boeckh; and they should have suggested wise πολλὰ—as I have translated.

⁷ In lieu of καὶ the sense requires καί—

willing to ask any Siceliote whom he thought to be the greatest rogue, not one would mention any other person than him.

[3.] Conceiving then that he was holding a conversation not upon trifling matters, but what seemed to be the greatest, namely, virtue and wealth,¹ I asked him which would he say is the wealthier person, he, who happened to have ²two talents³ of silver, or he, who had a field worth two talents? I think, said he, the person who has the field. By the same rule then, said I, he, who happens to have garments, or bed-furniture, or other goods of greater value than are those, which the stranger possesses, would be the wealthier. To this he assented. Now, should any one give you the choice, which would you wish? I would wish that, said he, which is the most valuable. Would you not (say so), as conceiving yourself to be more wealthy? Just so. For the present then he appears to be the wealthiest, who possesses things the most valuable. Yes, said he. [4.] Would not then, said I, persons in health be more wealthy than those who are ill? at least if health is a possession more valuable than the property of a person who is ill. For surely there is no one, who would not set a higher value on health, although he possessed only a little money, than on illness, although he possessed the property of the great king,³ through his conceiving, it is plain, that health is of greater value; for he would never prefer it, unless he considered it of greater value than property. He would not. If then any thing else seems to be of greater value than health, the person, who possesses that thing, would be the wealthiest. Yes. If then a person were to come to us and ask—Can you, Socrates, and Eryxias, and Erasistratus, tell me, what possession is the most valuable to man? not that, by possessing which a person would deliberate best on this point, how he could best transact his own affairs and those of his friends? What should we say is this? To me it appears, Socrates, that happiness is the thing of the greatest value to man. And not wrongly so, said I. But shall we consider those the most happy, who are the best to do, or those who appear so. [5.] Would not those then be the best to do, who err the least, in the case of themselves and the rest of mankind, and regulate affairs the most successfully? By all means. They then, who know what is evil and what is good, and what is to be done and what is not, would regulate affairs the most successfully, and err the least. To this too he assented. Now then, the same persons appear to be the wisest and the best to do, and the happiest, and the wealthiest: indeed wisdom is a possession of the greatest value. But, said Erasistratus,¹ taking up the discourse, of what advantage would food and drink, and if there is anything of this kind, be to a person, if he were wiser than Nestor, yet did not happen to have the necessaries of life? Would his wisdom be a benefit? Or how could he be the wealthiest, when nothing prevents him from being poor, if he possesses no resources for the necessaries (of life)? he thought indeed he had said something extremely (wise). But would the person, said I, who possesses wisdom, suffer in this way, even if he were in want of these things?² For if a person possessed the residence³ of Polytion, and the treasures⁴ were full of gold and silver, would he be in want of anything? Nay, said he, there is nothing to prevent that person from immediately disposing of his property, and obtain-

¹ I have omitted τίσι, which could not be thus repeated; for ἀρετῆς and πλοῦτος are put in apposition with τῶν μεγίστων.

²⁻³ The Greek is δύο ταλάντι τάλαντα. But six MSS. read ὃν ταλάντι, and one τάλαντον. Both are adopted by Boeckh. But no one would ask whether the owner of a field, worth two talents, was not richer than the owner of one talent; although he might compare a certain amount of money with the same amount of money's worth. Some reason should however be given to prove how the field was superior to the silver. Hence I suspect that something has been lost here to this effect, "For the talents might be taken away by force or fraud, or lost by accident, or be diminished in value by rust; none of which events would happen in the case of the field."

¹ Fischer was the first to correct 'Ερασίστρατος into 'Ερυξίας, as by all subsequent editors except Bekker.

² I have translated, as if the Greek were Σφόδρα οὖν ἰδόναι εὖ not καὶ λῆγειν, remembering the phrase in p. 399, B. § 16, σφόδρα εὖ διελίχθαι.

³ In lieu of τούτων the sense requires πάντων, or rather τοιούτων—

⁴ Instead of δὲ the train of reasoning requires γὰρ, as I have translated. The words are constantly confounded.

in return for it whatever he happens to want for his living, or money even; in exchange for which he will be able to procure them,¹ and to have on the instant all things in plenty. [6.] Provided, said I, persons existing happen to be in want of his residence,² more than of the wisdom of that person; since, if they were such as to value more the wisdom of the man,³ and what results from it, he would have⁴ much more to dispose of, if he happened to be in want of any thing, and wished to dispose both of it and the works resulting from it. Surely⁵ of the residence⁶ the use happens to be much and necessary; and great is the difference to a person in the case of things relating to life, as regards his living⁷ in a dwelling of this kind, or in a small and mean tenement; but of wisdom the use costs little,⁸ and slight⁹ is the difference for a person to be wise¹⁰ or untaught in questions of the greatest moment. And oh! that men should despise the one,¹¹ and not be buyers of it! but that of cypress for their residence, and Pentelican¹² marble, many should be in want, and willing to purchase! Now would not a person, if he were a clever pilot, or a skilful physician, and able to practise well and creditably his art,¹³ or any other of such kind of arts,¹³ be of greater value

² Here again we must read οἰσίαν for οἰκίαν.

³ Since the name of Nestor, who is here alluded to, has not been mentioned recently, I suspect that in ἀνθρώπου lies hid γενηνίου ἱππότου—with reference to the γενηνιος ἱππότα Νίστωρ in Homer.

⁴ I have adopted ἀν ἔχοι from Fischer, who correctly saw that ἀν had dropt out after μᾶλλον—

⁵ In lieu of ἦ, which I cannot understand, I have translated, as if the interrogative ἦ were written originally.

⁶ Here again one would prefer οἰσίαν to οἰκίαν—

⁷ Instead of οἰκίαν, which is without regimen, the syntax and sense require οἰκοῦντι, as I have translated.

⁸ Such seems to be here the meaning of ὀλίγου ἀξία, which elsewhere signify "of little value."

⁹ Instead of σικερά, one would have expected οὐ σικερά—

¹⁰ To support the syntax, we must suppose that ὥστε has dropt out before ἦ—

¹¹ The Greek is ἦ τοῦτον μὲν καταφρονεῖν— I have translated, as if it were ἦ τὸ τοῦ μὲν καταφρονεῖν—where τοῦ μὲν, referring to τὸ σοφὸν εἶναι, is opposed to τῆς δὲ ευπαιττου; while on the syntax in τὸ καταφρονεῖν, it will be sufficient to quote Τὸ Δία νομίζειν, in Aristoph. Nep. 817.

[7.] (On this) Eryxias, taking up the discourse, and ⁴
 ing with his eyes under, ⁴ as if he had been injuri-treated, ⁵ observed—And would you, Socrates, if one must the truth of you, assert that you are wealthier than Cal-the son of Hipponicus? And yet you would acknowledge you are not less taught (than he is) on matters of the gremoment, but wiser rather; and still you are not on this count the wealthier. For perhaps you imagine, Eryxias
 I, that these arguments, which we are now discussing, sport, since the facts are not really so; but that they are pebbles in the pebble-game, which if a person cleverly ⁷ b forward, ⁸ he will be able to cause the opposite players beaten, ⁹ so as not to have what they can bring forward as those movements. Perhaps then you imagine, that ters are thus without any reference to the rich; and there are certain arguments in no respects either tr literally "no one not—"

²—² Although this may perhaps be understood, yet I should κελημίνων to κτημάτων, in English, "of those called the grea

³ I have added "of his skill," to complete the sense.

⁴—⁴ In lieu of ὑποβλήσας I should prefer the Homeric ὑπόδρα β where the Schol. explains ὑπόδρα by δεινόν, ὀργίλον.

⁵ How Eryxias could fancy he had been injuriously treated, I understand. Hence I suspect the author wrote δακνόμενος, not μινος. See my note on Soph. Philoct. 377.

⁶ On the wealth of Callias see Schol. on Aristoph. Barp., 4.
 Hemsterhuis on Lucian Timon, § 24.

⁷ Instead of φείσοιτο, which could not be thus used in the middl as shown by the subsequent ἀντιφείρωσι, the author wrote, Ι φείσοι εὖ, as I have translated.

⁸ The description here given of the pebble-game, applies equal to chess, draughts, and backgammon.

 prefer ιστάσθαι, "to be at a stand-still—"

false, by detailing which, a person may get the better of his opponents, how that the wisest are likewise the wealthiest, ¹ and by saying these of such a kind of falsehood of persons saying true.¹ And perhaps there is nothing wonderful in this; just as if two persons should be speaking about letters, one asserting that sigma (σ) begins the word Socrates, but the other alpha (α), the argument of the party, who says that alpha (α) begins, should be superior to his, who says that sigma (σ) does.

[8.] And, looking round to the parties present, Eryxias observed, smiling at the same time, and blushing,² as if he had not been present³ during what had been said before, I did not imagine, Socrates, that there was any need of arguments of that kind, by which a person would be able to persuade not one of those, who are present,³ nor be benefited by them. For who is there with any intellect, who would be persuaded that the richest are the wisest? ⁴but would rather be informed with greater delight, if it is necessary⁴ to talk about being wealthy, from whence it is honourable to be wealthy, and from whence disgraceful, and what it is to be wealthy, whether a good or an evil. Be it so, said I. Henceforth then we will be on our guard; and you do right in admonishing me. But why do not you yourself, since you have introduced the subject, endeavour to state whether it seems to you to be a good or an evil to be wealthy? especially since the previous arguments do not appear to have been spoken with reference to this point.

[9.] To myself then for the present⁵ it seems that to be

¹ Such is the literal version of the unintelligible Greek. The author wrote, what might be got at, I think, by a bold conjecture.

² Why Eryxias should blush, in consequence of his being supposed to have been not present at the former part of the discourse, I cannot understand. I could have understood, had the author written, what I suspect he did write, ὡς περ ἀπορῶν ἐν τοῖς ἐμπροσθεν λελεγμένοις, "as if having been in a difficulty during the preceding conversation—" for that would have been a fair ground for blushing. And similarly one would prefer ἀπορούντων for παρόντων—just afterwards (³). The error has arisen from § 12.

⁴ I have translated, as if the Greek were originally, ἰσχυροί, αἱ δὲ ἡδύον—not as at present, ἐπιδὲ δαῖν—which I cannot understand. On the loss or confusion of ἰσχυροί, see my note on Legg. ix. p. 127, n. ⁵, while on ἡδύον, or ἡδύον, or ἡδύονα, united to verbs of hearing or understanding, see Ast's "Lexicon Platonicum," in "Ἠδύον."

⁵ In lieu of τοῖνυν, the sense requires τὰ νῦν, as I have translated.

wealthy is a good. But while he was still desirous to something, Critias suddenly interrupted him¹ (by saying Tell me, Eryxias, do you consider it a good to be wealthy? Yes, I do, by Zeus. For I should be mad (if I did not) I think there is not a single person, who would not say so. And yet, said the other,² I think too that there is not a person, whom I could not cause³ to say with myself that some men it is an evil to be wealthy. If then it were a it would not have appeared to some to be an evil. Her I said to them that—If ye happened to be at variance on this point, which of you two is speaking with the greater truth about horsemanship, how a person would ride the horse and had I myself happened to be skilled in horsemanship, I would have endeavoured to cause you to cease from your differences in opinion; for I should have been ashamed not, if present, prevented, as far as I could, your being at variance; or if you had been at variance upon any other point whatever, and were about to separate not at all, unless agreed upon⁴ this, rather as enemies instead of being friends. But now,⁴ since you happen to be at variance upon an point of this kind, of which there must needs be the use throughout the whole of life, and a great difference, whether we are to give to it, as being beneficial or not; and this too as being not of trifling questions, but of those that are thought to be the greatest by the Greeks, since fathers recommend the first point to their children, as soon as they arrive at age for reflecting upon⁵ what they ought;⁵ and⁶ the

² Boeckh would read ὁ ἱταῖρος, "his friend," for he says that it scarcely found thus used elsewhere in Plato or his imitators.

³ The sense and syntax evidently require ποιήσῃς, the Attic optat., or ποιήσας, in lieu of ποιήσαι, which is without regimen.

⁵ In τοῦ ἡδὴ φρονεῖν, where ἡδὴ is perfectly unintelligible, lie hid τοῦ, & δεῖ, φρονεῖν—

to consider from whence they shall become wealthy; ¹so that should you possess anything you are worth something, but if not, nothing.¹ [10.] If then this object is made so violently a serious pursuit, and you, who agree on other matters, differ upon this one of such great moment, and still in addition you are at variance on the question of wealth, not whether it is of a ²black colour or white,² nor whether of a light weight or heavy, but whether it is an evil or a good, so as even to be arrayed to the extreme of enmity, should you be at variance about things evil and good, and this too, although you are friends as much as possible, and relations, I will not, as far as rests with myself, neglect you, while at variance with each other; but, if I were able myself, I would tell you how the case stands, and cause you to cease from your difference (in opinion). But now, since I happen to be not able, and each of you thinks himself able to cause the other to agree with him, I am prepared to take a part (in the discussion), as far as I can, in order that it may be agreed upon by you how the matter stands. Do you then, Critias, said I, endeavour to cause us to agree with you, as you have undertaken to do.

[11.] I would, said he, as I have begun, gladly ask Eryxias here, whether there seem to him to be men unjust and just. By Zeus, said he, and very much so. Well then, to act unjustly seems it to you to be an evil or a good? To me at least an evil. Would a man, who commits adultery with his neighbours' wives by means of money, seem to you to act unjustly? and this too when the state and the laws forbid it. To me at least he would seem to act unjustly. Consequently, said he, if the unjust man happens to be wealthy, and ³both able and willing to expend money,³ he would go astray; but if it were not his fortune to be rich, he would not have the means of expending, nor would he be able to accomplish what he wished, so that he would not even go astray. Hence it would be a greater benefit to the party to be not wealthy, since he would the less accomplish what he wished. Now he wished to do what was wrong. And again, would you say that to be ill is an evil or a good? I would say an evil. Well then, do there seem to you to be some men, who are without self-control? Yes, to me at least. If then it were better for a person of this kind for the sake of his health to abstain from food and drink, and the rest of things that are thought to be pleasant, while he is unable (to do so) through his want of self-control, it would be better for that person, that there should not be from whence he could procure those things for himself, rather than have a great superfluity in the necessaries (of life); for thus there would not be the power for him to go astray, not even if he vehemently wished it.

² Here is an allusion to the dark colour of iron, the coin of Sparta, and the white colour of silver, the coin of Athens.

[12.] So well and beautifully was Critias thought to have spoken, that had not Eryxias felt a respect for those, who were present, nothing would have prevented him from getting up and striking Critias; of so great a thing did he deem himself to have been deprived; since it was evident to him, that he had previously formed not a correct opinion on the subject of wealth. Perceiving then that Eryxias was in this state, and careful that abuse and opposition should not proceed too far, I remarked, that Prodicus, the wise man of Ceos, had, when detailing this very argument, seemed to those, who were present, to be such a trifler as to be unable to persuade a single person present that he was speaking what was true; and thereupon a lad very young and a clever talker, who was sitting by, laughed at and jeered him, and put him up, desirous to get at the reasons for what he was saying; and in truth he became in much higher repute amongst the auditors than Prodicus himself. Might you have it in your power, said Erasistratus, to tell us his reasons? Completely so, if indeed I remember it. For it was, I think, something to this effect.

[13.] The lad asked him, in what way he conceived wealth to be an evil, and in what a good? when he taking up the discourse, observed—Just as you do likewise, that to persons beautiful in body and mind it is a good, and to such as know how to use it, to these likewise it is a good; but to the depraved and those who do not know, it is an evil. And all the rest of things, said he, are in this state. For of what kind are some of those, who make use of things, such to them it is necessary for the things to be; and prettily, said he, appears to have been put into verse the sentiment of Archilochus—

As the actions are men meet with, so the thoughts are, which they frame. Now then, said the lad, if any one should make me wise in that very wisdom, by which the good become wise men, it is necessary for him to make at the same time the rest of things good for me, without his troubling himself at all about those very things, because he has made me wise instead of being untaught; as if a person should make me now a grammarian, it is necessary for him to make the rest of things grammatical for me; and if a musician, musical; just as when he makes me good, (it is necessary) to have made things good at the same time for me. To the latter assertion Prodicus however did not assent; although he acknowledged the former. [14.] Does it seem to you, said he, that as it is¹ the work of a man to make a dwelling, so it is to make things good? or is it necessary for things to continue to the end to be such, as they may have been at the commencement, whether evil or good? And Prodicus seemed to me to suspect to what point the argument was about to proceed in so² very clever a manner; (and),³ in order that he might not appear before all present to be confuted by the lad—for he thought it would be a thing of indifference for him to suffer this when alone—he said it was the work of a man. Does⁴ virtue, said (the lad), seem to you a thing to be taught,⁴ or is it innate? To be taught, he replied, at least by⁵ me. Would not then, said he, a person appear to be silly, if he thought that, by praying to the gods, he should become a grammarian or a musician, or obtain any other science, which it is necessary for a person to obtain by either learning from another or discovering himself? To ¹ I have with Stephens followed Cornarius, who suggested ἐστιν for εἶναι, which is without regimen.

² I have translated as if the Greek were οὕτως σφόδρα πανούργως, not αὐτῶν σφόδρα πανούργως: where Stephens, unable to understand αὐτῶν, tacitly changed it into αὐτῷ— On οὕτω σφόδρα united to another adverb see my Poppe's Prolegom. p. 178.

³ I have added καί, what might easily have dropt out after πανούργως, since ὅς and καί are, as I have observed on § 9, frequently confounded.

⁴—⁴ On this doctrine see the Meno.

⁵ I have translated “by” instead of “to—” For Prodicus was probably the promulgator of that doctrine.

this too he assented. Do not you then, Prodicus, said when you pray to the gods to do well, and for good to happen, pray at that time for nothing else but to be beautiful in body and mind; since to men beautiful and mind things likewise happen to be good, but be depraved. If then virtue happens to be able to be you would appear to be praying for nothing else than taught, what you do not know.

[15.] I said then to Prodicus, that he seemed to me suffered a thing of not a trifling kind, if he had happen fail in this; at least if he conceived that, what we learn from the gods, would take place ¹even at the same time should you go in haste on each occasion to a city,² and prayers ask of the gods to give good things, you never would not know whether they are able to give you what happen to ask for, as you would do, if you were to go doors of a grammar-master, and beg of him to impart knowledge of grammar, and to trouble himself about else but the science, which you can receive on the instruction (by which) you will be able to do the works of the grammar-master. On my saying this, Prodicus directed his countenance the lad, as about to defend himself, and to make a display of what you have done just now; and taking it to heart should appear to have prayed to the gods in vain. And thereupon ruler of the Gymnasium advancing, bade him take himself from the Gymnasium, as he was conversing upon subjects unsuited to young persons; and if not suited, evidently so.

[16.] This account have I detailed for the sake of that you may see how situated are the persons engaged in philosophy. For if Prodicus had been present, and spoke he would have appeared to those present to be so mad, be ejected even from the Gymnasium.³ But you should have now talked so extremely well, as not only to have persuaded those present,⁴ but to cause likewise the speaker

² This mention of a city seems very strange, where one would expect that of a temple.

³— As the present conversation is feigned to take place in the and not at the Gymnasium, I suspect the author wrote, ὥστε καὶ θῆναι νῦν, ὡς τότε ἐκ τοῦ γυμνασίου, "as to be ejected now, as then from the Gymnasium."

opposite side to agree with you; (and)¹ it is evident that, as in courts of law, if two persons happened to give the same evidence, one seeming to be correct in body and mind, but the other depraved (in both), the judges would, on account of the testimony of the depraved character, be not at all convinced; but, as it might happen, do even the reverse; but if the person, who seemed to be correct in body and mind, had so stated (alone),² the statement would have seemed to be vehemently true. Perhaps then the parties are situated in some such manner with respect to yourself and Prodicus; and one they consider a sophist and a vain talker, but yourself a statesman and a man of much worth; and then they imagine that they ought not to look to the speech itself, but to the speakers, of what kind they may be. But nevertheless, said Erasistratus, although you are speaking in ridicule, Socrates, it seems to myself at least, that Critias appears to say something (well). Nay, said I, by Zeus, nothing whatever. But why, since you have conversed upon these matters well and beautifully, do you not finish what remains of your discourse? For there seems to me something still remaining of the inquiry, especially since this appears to be acknowledged, that (wealth) is to some a good, but to others an evil. There remains then to inquire what is wealth in the abstract. For if we do not know this first, we shall not be able to agree as to what portion is an evil, and what a good; and I am prepared, as far as I can, to make the inquiry with you. Let then the person, who asserts that to be wealthy is a good, say on this point how the case happens to be.

[17.] Nay, said he, I do not, Socrates, define wealth in any way more cleverly than the rest of mankind. For this is to be wealthy, to possess much money. And I conceive that Critias here does not think that to be wealthy is any thing else. Even thus, said I, there will be something still left to consider, of what kind is the money, in order that you may not shortly afterwards appear to be at variance on this point again. For instance, you know³ that the Carthaginians make use of money of this kind. In a small skin there is bound up as much as is the weight of a stater¹ at most. But what is so bound within, no one knows, except those who make it up. They deem it a legal tender,² when a seal has been put upon it; he, who possesses the greatest number of these skins, is thought to possess the most money, and to be the wealthiest. But any one amongst us were in possession of such things to the greatest amount, he would be not a whit more wealthy, if he possessed many pebbles from the mountain;³ but a Lacedæmonian they deem a weight of iron a legal tender, and when it is⁴ the useless part of iron; and he, who possesses a great weight of such kind of iron, is thought to be wealthy but elsewhere its possession is worth nothing; while in Laconia they make use of engraved stones, of which a man in Laconia would not have the power to make any use. But amongst the nomade Scythians, if a person possessed the assistance of Polytion, he would be thought to be not at all wealthy, than if a person amongst us were the owner of a mountain Lycabettus. [18.] It is plain then that these things cannot be property; since some of those who have possessed them, appear to have been not at all wealthy on this account. But each of these, said I, exerts reality⁵ as property to some persons, and they who possess them are wealthy; but to others they are not property, and to others persons on this account more wealthy; just as the things⁶ are neither honourable nor disgraceful to all, but referent to different persons. If then we are willing to inquire why amongst the Scythians houses are not property, but so with us; or why amongst the Carthaginians skins are property but not with us; or why amongst the Lacedæmonians iron is property, but not with us, should we not discover⁷ (th

² The antithesis evidently requires καὶ αὐτὸς—where αὐτὸς might easily have been lost through καὶ αὐτὸς, which Orelli would change into καὶ αὐτὸς.

³ I have translated, as if the Greek were ὅτι οὐκ ὅτι, not οὐκ ὅτι, which Horreus changed into οὐκ ὅτι, adopted by Boeckh.

² This is the best translation of νομιζουσι.

³ In τοῦ ὄρους evidently lies hid the name of some mountain author wrote, I suspect, Πάρνηθος, a mountain near Athens.

⁴ Although καὶ ταῦτα μέντοι is found in § 10 and 11, yet here I prefer καὶ ταῦτά γ' ὄντι, as I have translated.

⁵ I have translated as if the Greek were ὄντως, not ὄντα, which be united to ἔστιν—son) best in this way?¹ For example, should any one at Athens possess a thousand talents-weight of the stones in the Market-place, of which we make no use, is it that he would be deemed to be wealthier on that account? It appears not, at least to me. But if he possessed a thousand talents-weight of the stone called lychnite,¹ we should say that he was very wealthy. Very indeed. [19.] Is it, said I, on this account, because the latter is useful to us, but the former useless? Yes. Especially since amongst the Scythians houses are on this account not property to them, because they have no use for a house; nor would a Scythian put any value upon the most beautiful house for himself rather than a sheep-skin cloak; because the latter is useful to him, but the former useless.

⁶ Clericus was the first to suggest ταῦτά for τὰ τοιαῦτα, answered, "eadem," in the versions of Pirkheimer and Corradus.

² Again, on the other hand,² we do not consider the money of Carthage as property. For there is not an article of those we are in want of, which we can carry off by it,³ as we can by silver; so that it would be useless to us. It is likely. Whatever things then happen to be useful to us, these are property; but whatever are useless, are not property. How is this, Socrates? said Eryxias, taking up the discourse. Is there not what we make use of for conversing with each other, and ⁴for doing a hurt,⁴ and many other things? And would these be a property? And yet they appear to be useful. ⁵Not even thus then⁵ has it appeared to us what is a property. For that it is necessary that a property, if it is about to exist at all, should be useful, is acknowledged nearly by all. But what is the kind of property, since it is not of every kind. [20.] Come then (say), if we are to pursue the inquiry again in this way, ⁶would what we are in search of be discovered still ¹ The lychnite stone was, I suspect, something like crystal, in which, as being transparent, an oil-wick was placed, as is now done in glass tubes or globes.

² As αὐθις αὐ cannot begin a sentence, I suspect that πάλιν δ' have dropped out between ἰστίον and αὐθις— The three words αὐθις αὐ πάλιν are elsewhere united, as remarked by Porson in Supplem. Præf. Hec. p. 49.

³ I have with Boeckh adopted Fischer's αὐτῶν in lieu of αὐτοῦ—

⁴ Although nearly all the editors have justly found fault with βλάπτειν, yet none have suggested a satisfactory correction; nor can I.

⁵ I have translated as if the Greek were οὐκ αὖν οὐδ'—not οὐκ αὐ οὐδ', where αὐ has no meaning.

better,⁶ (by asking)¹ what is that, for which we make property, and for what has the possession of property discovered, as drugs have² for causing diseases to grow for perhaps it would thus become more clear. Since it seems a thing of necessity, that, whatever happens to property, must be useful likewise, and that of this there is one kind, which we call property, it will be left to inquire,³ for what need are the things, which are to be called property, useful?⁴ For all things are useful, of which we make use for any⁴ operation, of which that have life are living things; of which living things of this kind we call man. If then a person were to ask what thing being removed out of the way shall we need of the physician's art, nor of its instruments? we shall be able to say—If diseases were removed from our bodies and did not exist at all, or if existing, were removed instantly. Of sciences then the medical is, as it seems, the most useful for this purpose, to cause the removal of [21.] And if a person should again ask us—By the removal of what thing are we in no need of property, shall we be able to tell? But if not, let us consider the matter. Come (say), if a man could live without food and drink and were neither hungry nor thirsty, is there a reason why he should want those very things, or silver, or any thing in order that he might obtain them? To myself it does not seem (he would). In the same manner the same of the rest of things. For if we did not want the things, we are at present in want, for the care of the body both of warmth and of cold sometimes, and of the other of which the body¹ [being deficient]¹ is in want, that, which is called property, would be not used by us; at least if no one wanted at all any one of these things, for the sake of which we should wish to possess property, in order that² we may possess what is sufficient³ for our desires, and the wants of the body, of which we may on each occasion stand in need. If then the possession of property is useful for this purpose, namely, the attention to the wants of the body, should this be taken away from the midst of us, we should not be in want of property, and property would perhaps not exist at all. It appears so. [22.] It appears then, as is likely, that what are useful for this doing of things, are property. That such was property he acknowledged indeed; the reasoning nevertheless troubled him exceedingly. But what are these kind of things? (said he). Shall we say that the same thing can be useful for the same operation at one time, but useless at another? I would not say so; but if we have any want of the same thing³ for the same operation, it seems to me it would be useful; but if not, not. Hence, if we could work up a brazen image without fire, we should not be in want of fire for such an operation; and if we did not want it, it would not be useful to us. And the same reasoning applies to the rest of things. It appears so. Of such things then as it is possible for a thing to exist without them, not one of them would appear to be useful, at least for that thing. It would not. If then we should appear at any time able, without silver and gold, and the rest of such kind of things, which we do not use for the body, as we do food, and drink, and clothing, and bedding, and dwellings, to cause the wants of the body to cease, ⁴[so that there is no longer a need of them,]⁴ neither silver nor gold nor the rest of things would appear to be ⁵useful for it,⁵ if it were able to exist without them. They would not. Nor would those things appear to be property, unless they were

⁶ I have translated, as if τιν', not τήν, had been written or fore ἰργασίαν.

¹ The words between the numerals are evidently superfluous.

² The Greek is ἐν ἱκανοίμεθα—Stobæus offers ἐκκοίμεθα. From the two united it is easy to elicit, as I have translated, ἐν, & ἱκανοί, σπόμεθα—

³ I have translated, as if the Greek were τοῦ αὐτοῦ, not τούτου—

⁴ The words between the numerals are perfectly unnecessary.

⁵ I have adopted the reading furnished by Stobæus, xcv. p. 526. χρήσιμα—πρός γε τούτου—which Fischer was the first to approve of, in lieu of χρήματα—πρός γε τούτου— useful. But those things would be (property), by which we are able to obtain what are useful.

[23.] I could never, Socrates, be able to be persuaded of this, that gold and silver and the rest of things of that kind are not property. For of this I am strongly persuaded, that, as things without use are not property, so of things the most useful ¹property is useful for it.¹ Nevertheless (I am not persuaded) of this, that these things happen to be not useful to us; since by them we obtain the necessities (of life). Come then (say), how shall we speak of these things? Are there not certain persons, who teach music or letters, or any other science, who in return for such instruction obtain for themselves the necessities (of life) by bargaining for a remuneration for such things? There are. Would not then these persons by such science obtain for themselves the necessities (of life), by making an exchange for it, as we now do for gold and silver? I confess it. If then they obtain by this act, what they make use of for living, this act would be useful for their living; for we have said that silver is useful on this account, that we are enabled by it to procure what is necessary for the body. It is so, said he.

[24.] If then the sciences of things useful for it are these, sciences would appear² to be property for the very same reason that gold and silver are. ³It is evident. It is evident too³ that those, who possess these sciences, are rather wealthy. But we admitted a little before with so much difficulty the reasoning, whether they were the wealthiest. But from what has been just now admitted, this would of necessity happen, that the rather intelligent are rather wealthy. For should a person ask us—Do we think that a horse is a useful thing for every man? ⁴Would you not say that,⁴ to those who know how to use a horse, it would be a useful thing, but to those who do not know, not? I should say so. Then said I, by the same rule a drug is not useful for every man, but only to him, who happens to know how to take it? I say so. Are not then all the rest of things in a similar condition? It is likely. Gold then and silver and the rest of things, which are thought to be property, would be useful to him alone, who happens to know how to use them. Just so. Did it not seem before to be the part of persons superior both in body and mind to know where and how to make use of each of these things? I admit it. [25.] To those men alone then, who are superior in body and mind, these things would be useful; since they (alone)¹ know how to use them. If then they are useful to these alone, to these alone they would appear to be property. ²Is it so? It is likely.³ Him too, who is unskilled in horsemanship, yet possesses horses that happen to be useless to him, should a person render skilful, would he not at the same time make him more wealthy, since he makes things to be useful to him which previously happened to be useless? For by imparting skill to the person he at the same time makes him wealthy likewise. It seems so. And yet I think I could swear on behalf of Critias, that he is persuaded by none of these arguments. (And truly so), by Zeus. For I should be mad if I were persuaded. But why have you not completed that part of the argument, how that gold and silver and the rest of things of that kind are not, although they seem to be, property? since I am very much delighted to hear those arguments, which you happen to be just now going through. Thereupon I observed that you appear to me, Critias, to be thus delighted at hearing me, as are such of the rhapsodists, as chaunt the verses of Homer; since not one of these arguments are thought by you to be true. [26.] Come then (and say) nevertheless, how shall we speak upon such matters? Would you not say that there are some³ things ever useful

² Although φαίνονται might stand after εἰ—εἰσι, yet here I should prefer φαίνοντ' ἄν—

³— I have adopted Δῆλον. Δῆλον δέ—furnished by one MS., similar to φαίνεται. Φαίνεται ἄρα—in § 22.

¹ I have inserted "only," for μόνοι might easily have dropt out after ἐκιστήμονες—

² The Greek is at present ἀρα ὡς τοις, where ἀρα is perfectly unintelligible. It was formerly, as I have translated, ἢ γὰρ; Ὡς τοις. The Platonic ἢ γὰρ used interrogatively at the end of a sentence is found every where.

to house-builders for making a dwelling? So it seems to me. Whether then shall we say that those things useful, which they ¹ make use of for house-building stones and bricks, and wood, and if there be any of this kind? or that there are tools, with which they dwell, and by which they obtain these things, i.e. wood and the stone, and again, the tools for them? at least it seems, said he, that all these (the tools) for those (the materials). Hence, said I, in the rest of operations, not only are those things ² (useful) make use of for each of the works, but those also we obtain them, and without which they would not be entirely so. Hence, both for those, who possess tools), and ³ if there be any thing further up, ³ and who possess these (the materials) ⁴ and what is fit so that at last they come to some infinite multitude necessary for all these to appear useful for their use. There is nothing, said he, to prevent such from being [27.] Well then, if food and drink, and clothing, and things which a person is about to make use of for himself were in his power, would he want in addition gold or any thing else, by which he could obtain what was in his power? It appears to me he would not. Would it appear to us, that sometimes a person does not want those things, which relate to the needs of the body? For he does not want them. Hence if they appear useless for this operation, they could not, on the other hand, be deemed to appear useful. For it has been laid down that it is not possible for things to be at one time useful, and at another useless, as regards the same operation. In the least, said he, the same reasoning would hold good to me. For if these were at any time useful for any purpose, it never would happen for them to be on the other hand useless. ⁵ But now to some operations of deprave but to others of good.⁵ I should say so. ¹Is it not possible then for a depraved act to be useful for the working out of some good?¹ It does not seem so to myself at least. But good acts we should say are those, which a man does through virtue. I admit it. Is it not possible for a person to learn some of the things, which are taught by conversation, although he were deprived of hearing,² or any thing else?² By Zeus, it does not seem so to me at least. Hence, of the things useful for virtue hearing would appear³ to be one,³ if at least virtue is to be taught by hearing, and we make use of it for instruction. It appears so. [28.] Hence, if medical art is able to cure⁴ a person diseased, even medical art would sometimes appear to be one⁵ of the things useful for virtue, if⁶ through it be furnished the power of hearing what relates to the thing to be taught.⁶ There is nothing to prevent it. If then again we obtain medical science in return for property, even property would appear to be useful for virtue. Yes, said he; for such it is. Hence, again, in like manner, that (would be useful), by which we could obtain property. Yes, all such by all means. Now does it not seem to you that a person could from acts depraved and disgraceful obtain for himself silver, in return for which he might obtain medical science, or be able to hear, after being unable? and to use that very (hearing) for virtue, or any other things of that kind? To me at least it does seem very much so. Would not then the depraved be useful for virtue? It would. It is not necessary then for those things, by which we can obtain what is useful for each, to be themselves useful for the same. For things depraved would sometimes seem to be useful for a thing that is good. And they would be still more evident in this case. For if useful for each (of those), without which they would unless these had existed previously, come (say), how speak of things of this kind? Is it possible for ignorance to be useful for science, or disease for health, or vice for virtue? I should say, not. [29.] And yet we should agree that it is impossible for science to be produced in whom ignorance had not existed previously; or health in whom disease had not (existed); or virtue, in whom vice had not. The fact, said he, is so, as to me. Hence it would not be necessary for things to be useful, without which a thing is not able to be. For (otherwise)¹ ignorance would appear to be useful for science; and disease, for health; and vice, for virtue. In these arguments too he was very hard of belief, and all these things shall be property.² And I, knowing thoroughly, that it would be an equally hard task to convince him, as, according to the saying, to boil a stone. Let us bid a long³ farewell to these arguments; since we are unable to agree, whether the same things are useful, or not. But how shall we say on this? Whether shall we consider a person happier and better in want of the greatest number of things necessary for the body and living, or him, who (is in want) of the fewest? Now this question would perhaps be asked in the best manner,⁴ thus. Should one compare a person with himself, and consider which of his states is the better, whether, when he happens to be ill, or in health. At least, said he, does not require any great consideration. Perhaps, said I, it is easy for every simpleton to know the state of the person in health is better than that of the person ill. Well then, at what time do we happen to be better of things more in number and variety? when we are health? When we are ill. When therefore we happen to be lying in the worst condition for ourselves, we then are greatly in the desire, and the want of the greatest number of things that¹ relate to the pleasures of the body. It is so. [30.] According to the same rule then,² as a person is in the best condition for himself, when he is in want of the fewest of these things, so on the other hand, if there were two persons, one of whom happened to be greatly in the desire and want of many things, and the other of few things and moderately so, as for example things of this kind, such men as are dice-players, others wine-tiplers, and others of a voracious appetite, for all these happen to be nothing else than desires. Very much so.³ Now all desires are nothing else than the want of some things. (Nothing).³ The persons then, who have suffered the most of these, are in a more depraved state than those, who have suffered things of this kind either not at all, or to the least extent. I consider then persons of this kind to be very depraved; and the more they are of this kind, the more depraved. It seems then to us that it is not possible for these things to be useful for this purpose, unless we happen to be in the want of these things for this purpose. I admit it. It is necessary then, if these are about to be useful to us for the care of the wants of the body, that we too should want them for this purpose. So it seems at least to me. He then, to whom the greatest number of things useful for this purpose belongs, would appear to be in want of the greatest number for this purpose, since it is necessary for him to feel a want of all useful things. To me at least it seems to appear in this way. It is necessary therefore, according to this reasoning, for those, to whom there happens to be much property, to be in much want of the things necessary for the care of the body. For the things useful for this purpose have appeared to be property; so that of necessity they, who should appear to us to be the wealthiest, are in the most depraved state, since they are in want of the greatest number of things of this kind.

² I have adopted, what Horreus suggested, αὐτά for αὐτά. Fischer calls an hyperbaton.

¹ In lieu of $\tau\alpha$ the syntax and sense require $\tau\omega$ —as I have translated.

³ I have with Boeckh adopted the notion of Cornarius, that Οὐδὲν has dropt out before Οἱ οὖν —

INTRODUCTION

TO

THE DIALOGUE ON VIRTUE.

Of this dialogue, which contains little more than two portions of the Meno, the authorship is attributed to Æschines by Suidas, whom Fischer has followed; but by Boeckh to Simon, the shoemaker, in consequence of his remarking that the follower of Socrates had written two treatises respectively on Justice and Virtue, both of which are found amongst the titles of the spurious dialogues. It is however difficult to believe that any person, who was contemporary with Plato, would condescend to pilfer from a fellow-writer; unless it be said that Simon has given the dialogue as it really took place, with the view of showing that nearly all of what Plato put into the mouth of Socrates was the produce of the writer's own fertile imagination.

Be however the author who he may, it is a curious fact, that the dialogue contains allusions to circumstances not mentioned by Plato, but which could hardly have been known except to a contemporary, as I have remarked in § 7, n. '—'.

No less curious is another fact, that amongst the confessedly spurious dialogues of Plato, mentioned by Diogenes Laertius in iii. 62, there is one under the title of Μένων ἢ Ἱπποτρόφος. But as the Vienna MS. reads there Ἱπποτρόφος, and the Vatican MS. of Plato, marked Ω by Bekker, gives the word Ἱπποτρόφος, as the name of the person conversing with Socrates, and as "Hippotrophus" is found as one of the Interlocutors in the Latin version of this dialogue made by Cincius Romanus, preserved amongst the additional MSS. No. 11,760, in the British Museum, it is fair to infer that the real title was Μίδων ἢ Ἱπποτρόπος. For thus Midon the horse-breeder would be the origin of Menon of Thessaly, a country famous for its breed of horses. And it was from this coincidence in the name furnished by three different sources, that I have been led to examine more attentively than I should otherwise have done, the version of Cincius; where I have discovered, what I little expected, that the translator had, like Ficinus in other parts of Plato, met with a MS. more full than any subsequently collated, as may be seen in my notes.

With regard to the next dialogue "On Justice," I have only to remark, that it was in existence in the time of Thrasyllus, from whom Diogenes Laertius drew the greater part of his information relating to the Platonic and Pseudo-Platonic writings.

ON VIRTUE.

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE.

SOCRATES AND A FRIEND.

[1.] Is Virtue a thing to be taught, or to be not taught? but ¹ do men become good by nature, or by any other means? I cannot, Socrates, state at present. But let us consider the matter in this way. Come then, (say,) if a person wished to become good in the virtue,² in which clever cooks are good, from whence would he become so? It is evident, if he learnt from good cooks. Well then, if a person wished to become a good physician, by going to whom would he become a good physician? It is evident, by going to some one of the good physicians. But if he wished to become good in the art, in which clever carpenters (are good)? To (some one) of the (good) carpenters.

[2.] If then he wished to be good in the virtue, in which men are good and clever, whither must he go and learn? I conceive to (some one) of the (good) men (to learn) this, if it is to be learnt; for from whence else? Come then, (say,) who are the men that have become good? in order that we may see whether these are the persons, who make men good, Thucydides,³ and Themistocles, and Aristides, and Pericles.

¹ This ἀλλὰ is strangely introduced here. But as it is found in the Meno, § 1, although in a manner perfectly proper there, it would be uncritical perhaps to remove it. Cincius however has what is preferable, "Estne virtus o Hyppotrophe, res quæ doctrina percipi possit? an contra? Num viri boni natura efficiuntur, sive alio quodam modo?"

² By "virtue," was meant not merely a moral quality, as with us, but "excellence," generally.

³ This word should evidently follow καὶ Περικλῆς, to preserve the order in which they are taken subsequently, not only in this dialogue, but

Have we it in our power to say who was the teacher of these? We have not; for it is not told. Well then, we mention) any pupil, either amongst strangers or citizen any one else, either a free man or a slave, who assigns a cause of his having become wise and good his course with them? This too is not told. But they do surely grudge to share their virtue with other persons. haps so. Was it that there might not be rival artists, just cooks, and physicians, and carpenters feel a jealousy; ¹ sin is not to their advantage for many rival artists to exist for them to dwell amongst many similar persons. Is it in like manner not an advantage for good men to dwell amongst many similar persons? Perhaps so. [3.] Are not the and the just the same? Yes, they are. Is there the individual to whom it is an advantage to live not amongst good persons but amongst bad? I cannot tell. Can you not tell this whether it is the work of good men to do a hurt, and of men to do a benefit, or the reverse? The reverse. They then do a benefit, the bad do a hurt. Yes. Is there a person who wishes to be hurt rather than to be benefited? no means. No one therefore wishes to live amongst bad persons, rather than amongst good. It is so. Not one of the good is so jealous of another, as (not) ² to make him a person and similar to himself. From this ³ reasoning it see [4.] You have heard that Cleophantus was the son of Thucles. I have heard it. It is evident then that Themis was not jealous of his son becoming the best possible; why jealous of) ⁴ no one else, if indeed he was a good man (good) ⁵ they say he was. Yes. You know then that Thucles caused his son to be taught to be a clever and horseman. For instance he used to remain ⁶ standing up in the Meno, § 33, 4, where Sydenham was the first to remark that Thucydides was not the historian, but a political opponent of Pericles.

² After ὥστε I have inserted, what has evidently dropt out, μή—however omits ὥστε, and has, "sed bonum—"

³ I have adopted ἐκ τοῦ λόγου τούτου, found in MS. Aug. as to Fischer.

^{4, 5} I have inserted "envied," requisite to complete the series similarly "good," just afterwards.

⁶ I have adopted ἐπίμνε, the conjecture of Horreus, who upon horses, and upright too hurled a javelin from (the backs of) the horses, and did many other wonderful feats,¹ and taught him, and made him wise in many other things,¹ such as are closely connected with a good education. Or have you not heard so from elderly persons? I have heard it. No one then could find fault with the son's nature as being bad.² Not justly so at least from what you have said. [5.] But what is this? that Cleophantus, the son of Themistocles, became a good and wise man in the matters where his father was wise, have you ever heard from any younger or older person? I have not heard it. Do we then conceive that he wished to instruct his own son in these matters; but in the wisdom, in which he was wise himself, not to make him better than any of his neighbours, if virtue were a thing to be taught? It is not likely at least. [6.] Of such a kind then is this your teacher of virtue, to whom you have alluded?³ Let us then look to another, by name Aristides, who brought up Lysimachus, and instructed him the best of the Athenians on such subjects as are connected with (good)⁴ teachers; and yet he made him a man no better than any body; for both you and I have seen and associated with him. It is true. [7.] You know too that Pericles brought up well⁵ his sons Paralus and Xanthippus,⁶ of the latter of whom you seem to me to have been the lover.⁶ These, as you know yourself, he taught to be horsemen inferior to none of the Athenians; and he instructed reading from Meno, § 32, in lieu of ἐπιβαίνει, although in both places the author probably wrote something more fit to be read than what is found here at present.

² Cincius adds, “Quandoquidem eum ad percipiendas disciplinas adipiscendasque aptum idoneumque esse cognoscit—”

³ In lieu of ὃν ὑπείπεις, Cincius has—“quem majorum esse profitabaris,” as if his MS. had here something similar to what is found in Meno, § 33, ὃν καὶ σὺ ὁμολογεῖς ἐν τοῖς ἀρίστον τῶν προτέρων.

⁴ Both here and in Meno, § 33, I suspect that καλῶν has been lost after διδασκάλων—

⁵ In lieu of αὖ I have translated, as if the Greek were εὖ, similar to μεγαλοπρεπῶς in the Meno.

⁶ The words between the numerals have dropt out in Meno, § 33, after Πάραλον καὶ Ξάνθιππον.

them to be inferior to no one in the rest of contests, and all the other things that are learnt by art. But did he not wish to make them good men? But perhaps, Socrates, they would have become so, had they not died young. 'You reasonably come to the aid of your beloved.' But Pericles would have much rather made them clever in his own wisdom, than in music and contests, had virtue been a thing to be taught, and had he been able to make them good men. [8.] But (I fear) that it is a thing not to be taught; since Thucydides brought up well² his two sons, Melesias and Stephanus, ³in behalf of whom you will not have it in your power to say, what you have done in behalf of the sons of Pericles; for one of these you surely know lived to old age, and the other much beyond,³ And yet their father taught them well other pursuits, and they wrestled the best of the Athenians. For he put one under Xanthias, and the other under Eudorus; and these were surely thought to wrestle the best of those of that period. Yes, they were. [9.] Is it not evident then, that he would not have taught his sons these things, where⁴ it was requisite to instruct them at an expense to himself, but those where⁵ without expending any thing it was requisite to make them good men. Now would he not have taught them this, if it were to be taught? It is likely at least. But perhaps Thucydides was a man of small means, and had not very many friends amongst the Athenians or their allies; and⁶ he was of a great family, and of great power in the state, and amongst the rest of the Greeks, so that if this had been a ¹—¹ Here again has been preserved another supplement of the Meno. For in § 30, Plato wrote, ΑΝ. δοκῶ μὲν, ἰβουλευτοῦ ἰσως δ' ἂν ἰγίνοντο, ὡ Σώκρατες, εἰ μὴ νῖοι ὄντες ἰτελεύτησαν. ΣΩ. σὺ μὲν εἰκότως βοηθεῖς τοῖς παιδικοῖς· ἀλλὰ μὴ οὐκ ἢ διδάκτρων. For it seems unreasonable to suppose that the writer of this dialogue was cognizant of facts, which Plato either did not know, or was unwilling to mention.

² Here again I have substituted εὖ for αὖ —and so I would in Meno, § 33.

³—³ Here too is another supplement of the Meno; for all the words between the numerals ought to be inserted in § 33, after Στρίφανον, and γὰρ between καὶ and τοῦτους—

⁴, ⁵ I have adopted οὐ, "where," found in Meno, § 34, in lieu of οἶ, "whither;" and similarly in (⁶), to which ὅπου in 3 MSS. plainly leads.

thing to be taught, he would have discovered a person amongst those of the country, or foreigners, who would have made his son a good man, if he himself had, through his attention to state affairs, no leisure. But (I fear) that virtue is a thing not to be taught. Perhaps not. [10.] But if it is not to be taught, are the good naturally so from their birth? But this perhaps we shall discover by considering the matter in this way. Come then, (say,) do there exist the natures of good horses? They do exist. Are there not men, who possess an art, by which they know the natures of good horses, both as regards their body, with reference to running, and their feelings, which of them are full of spirit or devoid of it. Yes. What is this art, and what its name? Equestrian. Is there not in like manner an art relating to dogs, by which persons discriminate between the good and bad natures of dogs? There is. What is it? The hunter's art. There are too assayers amongst us of gold and silver, who, by looking, decide upon both the better and the worse (metal). There are. And what do you call them? Silver assayers. [11.] The boy-drillers¹ moreover know, by examining the natures of the bodies of men, which of them are useful and which not, for each of their labours, and which of the bodies of persons older and young, are about to be worthy of note, and in which there is much hope of their executing works connected with the body. It is so. [12.] Whether then are good horses and dogs, and other things of such a kind, of more importance in states, or good men? Good men. Well then, do you conceive that, if the natures of men were good for virtue, that mankind would not have planned in every way to discover those natures? It is likely at least. Can you then mention any art, which has been exhibited and applied to the natures of good men, so as to enable persons to decide upon them? I cannot. And yet the art would be worth much, and so too the parties possessing it. For they would have pointed out the young men, who, when they were still boys, were about to be good; and whom we should have taken and kept in the Acropolis for the public use, as if it were silver, and something more beautiful,² in order that they might not suffer any mischief, either in a fight or in any other danger, but be

² As in Meno. § 25, the expression in a similar passage is ἐφελάττομεν ἐν ἀκροπόλει—πολύ μᾶλλον ἢ τὸ χρυσίον—I have translated here, as laid up as the saviours and benefactors of the state, since¹ they should have arrived at a proper age. But it seems almost that virtue does not exist to mankind either by nature or instruction. [13.] How then, Socrates, would persons seem to become (good),² if they do not become so by nature or instruction? By what other means could the good exist? This, I think, could not be shown easily; but I conjecture that the property (of goodness) is something especially divine, and that good men exist, as prophets do and oracle chaunters. For these exist neither by nature nor by art, but become such by the inspiration of the gods. And so too good men point out to states what is about on each occasion to happen, and what is about to be, from the inspiration³ of a god, much more, and more clearly, than oracle chaunters do: and even women⁴ somehow say that such a person is a divine man; and the Lacedæmonians too, when they praise in a very handsome manner, say that a man is divine,⁵ and often does Homer make use of the same expression, and the rest of poets likewise. When therefore a god wishes a state to do well, he causes some men in it to be good; but when a state is about to do ill, the god takes away the good men from it. Thus then it is likely that virtue is a thing not to be taught nor (derived) from nature, but exists by a divine allotment to those who possess it.

if the Greek were καλλιον, not μᾶλλον— The two words are constantly confounded. Cincius however has, "multo quoque hercle magis—"

¹ Instead of ἰκεδὴ, which is unintelligible, Cincius seems to have found in his MS. ἴως δὲ—for his version is "quousque—"

² I have translated, as if ἀγαθοί, absolutely requisite for the sense, had dropt out after γίγνεσθαι.

³ Cincius, here and just below, renders ἐπιπνοια by "providentia."

⁵ On the Laconian θειός, or rather σιεός ἀνὴρ, see Meno, § 41, n. 95.

ON JUSTICE.

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE.

SOCRATES AND A FRIEND.

[1.] CAN you tell us what is justice? or does it seem to you not worth entering into a discourse about it? To me at least (it seems) very much so. What is it then? What else than the things considered just. Do not (speak)¹ to me in this way; but, as if you had asked me—What is the eye? I should have said to you—It is that, by which we see; and if you should bid me to prove it, I would prove it. And if you should ask—To what is given the name of soul? I would say—To that, by which we know (something).² And if again—What is the voice? I would answer—That, by which we converse. In this way then do you tell me that justice is that, which we use for something, as are the things, of which I was just now asking. I have it not in my power to reply in this way at all. But, since such is the case, perhaps we shall discover it more easily in this way. Come then, (say,) by what do we, on consideration, distinguish the greater and the less? Is it not by a measure? Yes. And together with a measure by what art? Is it not by that of measurement? Yes. And how things light and heavy? Is it not by weight? Yes. And together with a weight by what art? Is it not that of weighing? Certainly.³ Well then, by what instrument do

¹ On the ellipse of λίγε after μή μοι, see my note on Æsch. Suppl. 284.

² I have translated, as if τι had dropt out before γινώσκωμεν, which can hardly dispense with its object.

³ After πάνν γε, Boeckh proposes to insert, ΣΩ. τί δὲ τὰ πολλὰ καὶ we, on consideration, distinguish what is just and unjust? and together with the instrument, by what art previously? Is it not somehow manifest to you thus? No. [2.] But ¹(let us consider it)¹ again in this way. When we are disputing about things greater and less, who decides between us? Is it not the measurers? Yes. And when about things many and few, who are the persons to decide? Is it not the numberers? But what, when we are disputing with each other about things just and unjust, to whom do we come? and who are the persons to decide on each occasion between us? Say. Do you not, Socrates, mean the judges? You have correctly made the discovery. Come then and try to tell this likewise. By doing what do the measurers decide respecting things large and small? Is it not by measuring? Yes. And respecting things heavy and light? Is it not by weighing? Yes. And respecting things many and few? Is it not by numbering? Yes. But how, respecting things just and unjust? Answer me. I cannot say. Say, by speaking. Yes. By speaking then do judges decide between us, when they are forming a judgment respecting things just and unjust. Yes. And by measuring, those skilled in measuring things small and great? for a measure is that, by which these things are judged. It is so. And by weighing, those skilled in weighing things heavy and light? for a weight is that, by which these things are judged. Yes, it is. And again by numbering, those skilled in numbering things many and few? for number is that by which these things are judged. It is so. But by speaking, as we just now agreed, the judges decide respecting things just and unjust. You speak correctly, Socrates. [3.] It is true then; and speech is that, it seems, by which things just and unjust are judged. What then are things just and unjust? As if a person had asked us—Since a measure, and the measuring art, and the person skilled in measuring, decide which is the greater and the less, what is the greater and the less? Shall we say to him that the greater exceeds, and the δλίγα; ἀρ' οὐκ ἀριθμῶ; 'ET. Ναί. ΣΩ. μετὰ δὲ τοῦ ἀριθμοῦ τίτιν εἶχον; οὐ τῷ ἀριθμητικῷ; 'ET. πάνν γε. For not only might these words have been lost through τὸ ὁμοιοτάεινον, but they are requisite likewise for the train of thought; since the subject of number is touched upon in § 2, just as all the others are.

¹— I have introduced what is requisite for the sense.

less is exceeded? and since a weight and the weighing art and the person skilled in weighing decide the heavy and the light, shall we say to him, that the thing going downwards in the scales is heavy, but the thing (going) upwards is light? In like manner if he should ask us—Since speech and the art of judging and the judge is the party who decides what is just and unjust, what is the just and unjust? What answer shall we have to give him? ¹Or have we not a single word to say? ¹We have not. Whether willingly or unwillingly do men, think you, have this injustice? I mean in this way. Think you that they do injustice ²[and are unjust] ²willingly or unwillingly? Willingly, I imagine, Socrates; for they are wicked. [4.] You conceive then that men are willingly wicked and unjust. I do; and do not you? No; at least if we are to be persuaded by the poet.³ What kind of poet? He who said—

Not one is wicked willingly, nor blest Unwillingly.

But still on the other hand,⁴ Socrates, well is the old proverb,⁵ that Poets do many falsehoods sing.

But I should marvel, if this poet has told a falsehood. Come then,⁶ if you are at leisure, let us consider, whether he is saying what is false or true. Nay, I am at leisure. Come then, (say,) do you deem it just to tell a falsehood, or to tell the truth? To tell the truth. To tell a falsehood then is unjust? Yes. But whether to deceive or to not deceive? To not deceive, assuredly. To deceive then is unjust? Yes. But what, is it just to hurt, or to benefit? To benefit. To hurt then is unjust? Yes. [5.] It is just then to tell the truth, and to not deceive, and to benefit; but to tell a falsehood, and to hurt,

²—² The words between the brackets are evidently an interpolation.

³ Who is the author of the Iambic verse, Οὐδ' εἰς ἐκὼν πονηρὸς οὐδ' ἄκων μάρτυρ, is to be still discovered. It is quoted by Aristotle in Nicomach. Eth. iii. 5.

⁴ As τοι does not, I believe, elsewhere follow τοι, I have translated as if the Greek were ἀλλ' ἔρ' αὖ—

⁵ The words πολλὰ ψεύδονται δοῖδοι, are the end of an hexameter of some unknown poet.

⁶ In lieu of εἰπαι I have translated, as if the Greek were εἰπ' οὖν— and to deceive, unjust. Yes, by Zeus, and greatly so. What, to do so to enemies? By no means. But it is just to do a hurt to enemies, but to do a benefit, unjust. Yes. It is then just by deceiving enemies to do them a hurt? How not? Well then, to tell a falsehood in order that we may deceive and do a hurt to enemies, is it not just? It is. But what, do you not say that it is just to do a benefit to friends? I do. Whether by not deceiving or by deceiving for their benefit? By deceiving even, by Zeus. But is it just to do a benefit by deceiving, and yet not by telling a falsehood? or by telling a falsehood? It is just by telling even a falsehood. To tell a falsehood and to tell the truth is, as it seems, both just and unjust. Yes. And to not deceive and to deceive is both just and unjust. So it seems. And to do a hurt and to do a benefit is just and unjust. Yes. All things of this kind are it seems the same, both just and unjust. To me at least they appear so. [6.] Hear then. I have, like other men, a right eye and a left. Yes. And a right nostril and a left. Certainly. And a right hand and a left. Yes. Hence, since after giving the same name, you say that some of my (members) are on the right side, and others on the left, would you not be able to say, if I asked you, on which side they were, that some on one side are the right, and others on the other side the left? Yes. Come then, likewise, to that point,¹ since after giving the same name, you say that some acts are just, and some unjust, can you tell which are the just, and which the unjust? To me then it now appears that each of these acts, taking place at a proper time,² are just; but at not a proper one, unjust. And correctly does it appear to you. He then, who does each of these acts at a proper time, does what is just; but he, who does not at a proper time,³ (does) what is unjust. Yes. He then, who does what is just, is just; but he who does what is unjust, is unjust. It is so. [7.] Who then at a proper time⁴ is able to cut and burn and to make lean? The medical man. Because he knows, or for some other reason? Because he knows. And who (is able) at a proper time to dig, and to plough, and to plant? The land-tiller. Because he knows, or because he does not? Because he knows. And in this way as regards other matters, he who knows, is able to do what is proper at a proper time;¹ but he who does not know, is not. Thus it is. And he who knows how to tell falsehoods, and to deceive, and to do a benefit, is able to do each of these things at a proper time;² but he who does not know, is not. You say what is true. And he who does these acts at a fitting time is just. Yes. He does them then through knowledge. How not? The just man then is just through knowledge. Yes. The unjust man then is unjust through what is opposite to what is just. It appears so. Now the just man is just through wisdom. Yes. And the unjust man is unjust through the want of instruction. It seems so. [8.] That, which our ancestors left us, as wisdom, seems near to being justice; but that, which (they left) as want of instruction, to be injustice. It is likely. Are men uninstructed willingly, or unwillingly? Unwillingly. Unwillingly then they are unjust. It appears so. But the unjust are wicked. Yes. Unwillingly then persons are wicked and unjust. By all means. But they act unjustly through there being the unjust. Yes. Through an act of unwillingness. Certainly. But that, which is willing, does not take place through what is unwilling. It does not. But the doing of injustice takes place through the existence of injustice. Yes. Now injustice is an involuntary act. Involuntary. Unwillingly then persons do an injustice, and are unjust and wicked. Unwillingly, as it appears. The poet then did not in this case tell a falsehood. It seems not.

¹ I have translated, as if the Greek were, what the language requires, ἐκείνη, not ἐκείν—

^{2, 3, 4} I have here omitted ἐν τῷ καιρῷ, which is evidently an interpretation of ἐν τῷ δέοντι, as shown by (³) ἐν τῷ δέοντι καιρῷ, and similarly in (⁴). Boeckh in all the three places would read ἐν τῷ δέοντι καὶ τῷ καιρῷ.

^{1, 2} I have twice omitted kai τῷ καιρῷ after ἐν τῷ διορί. See just above.

INTRODUCTION TO THE SISYPHUS

AND DEMODOCUS.

Of these dialogues, the former is said by Diogenes Laert., iii. 62, to be decidedly not written by Plato, and was one of those entitled Ἀσίσφαλοι, and attributed to Æschines, son of Charinus, the sausage-maker; of whom Socrates remarked, as we learn from Diog. L. ii. 60, that he was the only person who knew how to honour him properly. Now though no reason is there assigned for the remark, it is not difficult to conceive, by comparing what we know of the conduct of some other pupils of Socrates, such as Critias and Alcibiades, and even Plato, that Æschines not only put in practice the precepts of his master, but gave a true representation of his sentiments, without altering them to suit, as Plato did, his own peculiar notions.

With regard to the subject matter of the dialogue, it may be expressed in the words of Xenophon in Cyrop. i. 6, 46, that "the wisdom of man no more knows how to choose what is best, than if a person were to do whatever might arise from the throw of a die;" a passage quoted opportunely by Davies on Cicero de Nat. Deor. i. 35, "Hoc est non considerare, sed quasi tortiri, quid loquare." And it was doubtless from the similarity of subject that Boeckh was led to attribute the Demodocus to the author of the Sisyphus; of which the only separate edition is to be found in my "Plato's Four Dialogues, the Crito, Hippias, Alcibiades, and Sisyphus," published by Valpy in 1831; while the Demodocus is one of the small portions of the Platonic and Pseudo-Platonic writings, that have never appeared in a separate form.

SISYPHUS;

OR,

UPON TAKING COUNSEL.

PERSONS OF THE DIALOGUE.

SOCRATES AND SISYPHUS.

[1.] Soc. And¹ we too waited a long time for you yesterday, Sisypheus, at the display made by Stratonicus, in order that you might, together with us, hear a clever man, who both by word and deed exhibited many and beautiful things;² and³ when we thought you would no longer be present, we were by ourselves the hearers of the man.

Sis. 'Truly by Zeus.⁴ For a want of leisure of rather a compulsory kind occurred to me, so that I neglected⁵ the display. For our rulers had a consultation yesterday, and they compelled me to consult with them. Now with us Pharsalians⁶ it is a law to obey the rulers, should they order any of us to consult with them.

Soc. And honourable it is to obey the law and to be reputed by fellow-citizens to be a good counsellor, as you are ¹ As this dialogue is one of those called "Ἀσιφαλοὶ, "headless," we need not wonder at the appearance of δε kai, here.

² With the mention of πράγματα here, may be compared that of ἔργα, in another Pseudo-Platonic dialogue, called Hipparchus, p. 228, B. ἀλλὰ τε πολλὰ καὶ καλὰ ἔργα σοφίας ἀπεδείξατο.

³ In lieu of καὶ ἐπεὶ, one would have expected ἐπεὶ δὲ—

⁴— Although Ναὶ μὲν are found thus united in Hom. Il. A. 235, Ναὶ μὲν τόδε σκῆπτρον, and elsewhere, yet here the sentence seems rather too abrupt.

⁵ I have omitted μὴ after ᾧστε, for it is hardly intelligible in this place.

⁶ Instead of καὶ, which has no meaning here, the author wrote γὰρ, for γὰρ is thus found after proper names, as I could show by numerous passages. And γὰρ and καὶ are frequently confounded, as I have remarked on Eurip. Tro. 520.

¹ [reputed to be a good counsellor as one of the Pharsalians].¹ But, Sisyphus, although I should not be able to enter upon a discussion against you on the subject of consulting correctly, conceiving it to be a work requiring much leisure, and a lengthy argument, still I would endeavour to converse with you first about consulting in the abstract, what it is. Can you then tell me what it is to consult in the abstract? Do not (tell)² me what it is to do so well or ill or in any manner,³ but what kind of thing it is alone by itself. For you could well and easily tell,⁴ being so good a counsellor. But (I fear) lest it is a superfluous work for me to make of you the inquiry.

Sis. Is it then unknown to you what it is to consult?

Soc. It is, Sisyphus, to myself at least, if it be any thing else than for a person, who does not know any thing of those matters respecting which it is requisite to do some act, to speak like a diviner and off-handed, whatever may present itself, and to make a guess⁵ according to the same things for himself:⁶ like persons playing at odd and even,⁶ who, knowing nothing about the even and odd, which they hold in their own⁷ hands, nevertheless happen by accident to say what is true about the same⁸ things. To consult then is oftentimes a thing

² On the ellipse of λίγῃ after μή μοι see myself on Æsch. Suppl. 284.

³ The Greek is at present ἢ τὸ καλῶς πως— It was originally ἢ τὸ γ' ἄλλως πως— For καλῶς would be superfluous after the preceding εὖ— On ἄλλως πως compare Alcibiad. II. § 13, n; Phædr. p. 272, B.; Protag. p. 333, B.; and on γ' ἄλλως and καλῶς, see Crito. § 13, n.⁴

⁴ The Greek is ἢ καὶ πάνν ῥαδίως αὐτὸς— But the sense requires, as I have translated, εὖ γὰρ καὶ πάνν ῥαδίως εἰποῖς ἀν οὕτως γ'— Compare Euthyph. p. 14, A. ῥαδίως ἀν εἰποῖς. Hipp. Maj. § 15, καὶ σμικρὸν τί που τοῦτ' ἀν εἴη μάθημα, ὥν σὺ γ' οὕτως πολλῶν ἐπίστασαι. With regard to εὖ καὶ ῥαδίως, see Schæfer on Bos. v. Κινδύνος.

⁵ Such is the literal version of the Greek, καὶ κατὰ ταῦτα αὐτῷ— out of which I am unable to make a particle of sense. I could have understood εἰκάζοντα κατὰ πάντα εὖ πως, "making a guess on all points somehow successfully," as I suggested twenty years ago.

⁶ On this game see the commentators on Lysid. p. 206, F., Aristoph. Plut. 817, and Horace's "Ludere par impar."

⁸ Here again I am at a loss in περὶ τῶν αὐτῶν. For the sense leads at once to περὶ πάντων— of this kind, that a person, although knowing nothing of the matters, about which he is consulting, yet happens by accident to say what is the truth. If then it is a thing of this kind, I know what to consult is; if however it is not a thing of this kind, I should not know it at all.

Sis. It is not of such a kind as not to know in reality any thing at all, but to know partly something of the matter in hand, and partly not to know at all.¹

[2.] Soc. Do you mean that to consult is, by Zeus, a thing of this kind; that, as I seem to myself to divine somewhat your notions relating to the act of consulting well, it is the seeking to discover the best things for a person to employ himself in for his own benefit, but not to know them clearly,² but for this to be, as it were, in some form of a thought?³ Do you not mean somehow in this way.

Sis. I do.

Soc. Whether do men seek such things as they know, or such as they do not know?

Sis. Both.

Soc. Do you mean by this something of this kind, that men seek both what they know and what they do not know? just as if a person should know Callistratus, who he is;⁴ but not know to find where he is,⁴ not who is Callistratus.⁴ Do you mean that to seek both is after this manner.

Sis. I do.

Soc. He then, who knows Callistratus, would not seek that matter, namely, to know him.

Sis. He would not.

Soc. But he would, where he might be.

Sis. It seems so to myself at least.

Soc. Nor would he seek even this, namely, where it was possible to find him, if he knew already; but he would find him forthwith.

¹ On account of the antithesis in εἰδέναι τι, I have translated as if the Greek were μηδὲ πᾶν, not μηδὲ πῶ— Compare Xenoph. M. S. iv. 6, 7, 'Ἀρ' οὖν δοκεῖ σοι ἀνθρώπῳ δυνατόν εἶναι τὰ ὄντα πάντα ἰστιάσθαι; Οὐδὲ μὰ Δι' ἔμοιγε πολλοστὸν μέρος αὐτῶν. Of course I am aware that μηδίπῳ ἰστιάσθαι is found just afterwards, but there is not, as here, any antithesis.

²⁻³ Such seems to be the meaning of the words, ἀλλ' ὥσπερ ἐν νοήσει τι εἶναι τοῦτο—

⁴ In the formula Καλλίστρατον γινώσκει ὅς τις ἴσται, the noun is not elsewhere, if I rightly remember, repeated. I have therefore omitted it.

⁴⁻⁴ The words between the numerals, I confess, I cannot understand.

Sis. Yes.

Soc. Men then do not seek the things, which they know, but, as it seems, what they do not know. But if this reasoning appears to you to be of a captious kind, and to have been spoken, not for the sake of a practical purpose, but for conversation merely, consider the matter in this way, if the case seems to be such as has been just now stated. Do you not know that this takes place in geometry? that by geometers the diameter is not unknown, whether it be a diameter or not,—for this I well know¹ is not sought to be discovered by them,—but how great it is in measurement in proportion to the sides of the space which it intersects? Is not this the very thing which is sought respecting it?

Sis. So it seems at least to me.

Soc. For it is that, which is unknown. Is it not so?

Sis. Certainly.

Soc. Know you not that the doubling of the cube is sought to be discovered by geometers, how great it is by calculation? But the cube itself is not sought for by them, whether it is a cube, or not; for that at least they know well.² Is it not so?

Sis. Yes.

Soc. Respecting the air likewise, do you not know that Anaxagoras and Empedocles, and the rest of those,³ who talk about meteorology,³ are all seeking whether it is boundless or has a limit?

Sis. Yes I do.

Soc. But not the question, whether it is air. Is it not so?

Sis. It is.⁴

[3.] Soc. Will you then agree with me that such is the case with all other things⁵ now⁶ that to no person is there

² The Greek is τοῦτό γε. It was, I think, τοῦτό γ' εἶναι—

³⁻³ The word in Lucian's Icaromenipp. § 5, is Μετεωρολογίας; in Aristophanes Nep. 359, Μετεωροσοφιστῶν; and in 332, μετεωροφίνακας.

⁴ After ἢ γὰρ, the answer generally expresses an assertion, not a negation; which however is found again towards the end of this §, n. ⁴.

⁵ The Greek is καὶ κατὰ τῶν ἄλλων—which I cannot understand. I have translated as if it were originally καὶ τὰ τῶν—

⁶ Instead of ἤδη one MS. has ἂν δὴ, which leads to καὶ δεῖ—any seeking¹ after the things he knows, but rather after those which he does not know?

Sis. I will.

Soc. Did not the consulting appear to us to be this very thing, namely, that a person is seeking after the best things relating to what he would require to employ himself in for his own benefit.

Sis. Yes.

Soc. And the seeking was, like the consulting, about things to be done. Is it not so?

Sis. Entirely.

Soc. Must we not consider then at present, what impediment is in the way of those, who are seeking, to the discovery of the things, about which they are making the search?

Sis. So it seems at least to me.

Soc. Could we say that any thing else was an impediment to them except a want of knowledge?

(Sis. Nothing else).²

Soc. Let us, by Zeus, consider the matter very much, letting out,³ as the saying is, every rope, and sending out every voice.⁴ And view thou this point with me. Think you that a man could consult about music, who knows nothing of music; or how he ought to play on the guitar, or to perform any thing according to the musician's art?

Sis. Not I indeed.

Soc. What then, as regards generalship, or piloting? Do you think that the person, who knows neither of those arts, ¹ The syntax requires instead of ζητεῖν, either ζήτημα or τὸ ζητεῖν.

² I have introduced, what the sense requires, οὐκ ἄλλο. Bekker indeed assigns Σκοπῶμεν νῆ Δία to Sisyphus, on the authority of four MSS. But such an answer could never be given to the question, Ἄρ' οὖν ἄλλο τι φαίμεν ἄν—would' have it in his power to consult about either of those matters, ¹as to what is to be done by him, and how,¹ who knows not to act the general or pilot?

³ In lieu of ἰφύντες, Bekker would read ἀφύντες— But we meet in Protagor. p. 338, A., with ἰφύναι καὶ χαλάσαι τὰς ἡνίας τοῖς λόγοις; although a little afterwards one MS. reads οὐρία ἀφύντα; where the rest have ἰφύντα. Winckelmann prefers ἰξύντες, similar to ἰξιᾶσι πάντα δὴ κάλων, in Eurip. Med. 278, and πάντα δὴ κάλων ἰξύναι, in Aristoph. 'Ικκ. 753, to which he might have added ἰξίη κάλως in Tro. 94, and Herc. F. 837. But the play in the words requires here, κάλων ἰφύντες and φωνῶν ἀφύντες— where the latter expression is similar to φωνῶν ἀφῆεν, in Phœn. 1449, and φθογγὴν ἀφῆ in Hippol. 418.

Sis. I do not.

Soc. Do you think then that the case is so respecting all other matters, of which a person knows nothing; that it is not possible for him even to consult,² who knows nothing about them?

Sis. I do.

Soc. But it is (possible) for him to seek (to know).³ Is it not?

Sis. Certainly.

Soc. To seek then would not be the same as to consult.

Sis. How could it?

Soc. Because to seek is surely applied to the matters, which a person does not know; but it seems to be not possible for a person to consult about those matters, of which he is ignorant. Or has not this been said correctly?⁴

Sis. Very much so.

Soc. Ye were then yesterday seeking to discover what was best for the state; but ye did not know it. For if ye had known, ye would not surely have been seeking it, just as we do not seek any thing amongst those which we know. Is it not so?

Sis. It is.⁵

Soc. Whether does it seem to you, Sisyphus, if a person does not know, that he ought to seek or to learn?

Sis. To myself at least it seems, by Zeus, to learn.

Soc. And correctly does it seem so. But does it seem to you that he ought to learn rather than seek on this account, because a person would discover more quickly and easily, if

²— The Greek is $\mu\eta \epsilon\iota\delta\acute{\iota}\nu\alpha\iota \mu\eta\delta\epsilon \beta\omicron\upsilon\lambda\epsilon\upsilon\epsilon\sigma\theta\alpha\iota \pi\omega \delta\upsilon\nu\alpha\tau\acute{\omicron}\nu$ — where $\mu\eta \epsilon\iota\delta\acute{\iota}\nu\alpha\iota$ is at variance with the train of thought; for the question is about the being able to consult, not about the being able to know. Hence I have omitted $\mu\eta \epsilon\iota\delta\acute{\iota}\nu\alpha\iota$ here, and, after changing those words into $\eta\nu \epsilon\iota\delta\acute{\iota}\nu\alpha\iota$, inserted them in (³), for there $\zeta\eta\tau\epsilon\iota\nu$ could hardly stand by itself.

⁴ I have translated, as if $\epsilon\upsilon$ had dropt out after $\epsilon\lambda\acute{\iota}\chi\theta\eta$.

⁵ Here, as in (¹), the negative assertion is an answer to $\eta \gamma\acute{\alpha}\rho$.

he learnt from those, who know, than if he were to seek himself what he did not know? Or is it on some other account?

Sis. ¹ On no other than this.¹

[4.] Why did ye not then yesterday, disregarding the act of consulting about matters, of which ye knew nothing, and of seeking to do the best for the state,² learn from some one of those, who did know, how ye might do the best for the state? But ye seem to me to have been sitting the whole of yesterday and speaking off-hand, and prophesying about matters, of which ye were ignorant, and neglecting to learn, both the rulers of the state and you together with them. But perhaps you will say that this has been played off by myself against you for the sake of a conversation merely, and it has not been proved to you seriously. Consider then, by Zeus, this question at least for the present with seriousness. If it were conceded that to consult is something, and not, as now discovered, to be ³ nothing else than a knowledge according to conjecture, and a speaking off-hand,³ making use of merely a more solemn name,⁴ but nothing else,⁵ do you think, that as regards the act of consulting well and being good counsellors, persons differ one from another on that point,⁶ as persons ⁷[differ one from another]⁷ on all the other kinds of knowledge,

¹— I have translated, as if the Greek were, Οὐκ ἀλλ' ἢ διὰ τοῦτο, not οὐκ ἀλλὰ διὰ τοῦτο, although a similar impropriety is found in another Pseudo-Platonic dialogue, Hipparch. p. 227, B. ἢ ἄλλο τι; οὐκ' ἀλλὰ—

² I have translated, as if the Greek were τῇ πόλει, not ἐν τῇ πόλει, where the preposition is superfluous, as shown by the very next sentence.

⁴ Compare Lucian in Icaro-Menipp. § 29, ὄνομα σιμνόν τὴν ἀρετὴν περιθήμενοι; and see Valckenaer in Eurip. Diatrib. p. 258, who might have quoted Eustath. Il. i. p. 762, 62, Βασ. σιμνότητος περιπετάσματος τὸ τοῦ πράγματος δυσπρόσωπον συγκαλύπτεται; and have corrected παραπετάσματος by the aid of ταῖς τίχνας ταύταις παραπιτάσμασιν ἰχρήσαντο, in Protagor. p. 317.

⁵ I confess I can scarcely understand ἀλλῃ δ' οὐδενί— The sense evidently requires ἀλλθι δ' οὐδαμῇ— “but true not at all.”

⁶ In lieu of αὐτῶν the sense and syntax require ἐν αὐτῶν, similar to ἐν ταῖς ἄλλαις ἐπιστήμαις, just afterwards.

⁷— The words between the numerals are a manifest interpolation.

(such as) carpenters from carpenters, physicians from physicians, and hautboy-players from hautboy-players, and all the rest of handicraftsmen differ from each other?¹ As then those engaged in these arts (differ),² think you that in the act of consulting persons would differ at all in this manner, one from another?

Sis. Yes I do.

Soc. Now tell me, do not all, both those who consult well, and those who do so ill, consult about matters that are about to be?

Sis. Certainly.

Soc. ³Is the future any thing else than what is not as yet?³

Sis. It is not.

Soc. For if it were, it would not surely be still about to be, but it would be already. Is it not so?

Sis. Yes.

Soc. ⁴Therefore that, which is not yet, in reality has not been produced.⁴

Sis. It has not.

Soc. ⁵Therefore that, which is not and has not been produced, has no existence in reality.⁵

Sis. It has not.

[5.] Soc. Do not all, then, who consult well or ill, consult about things which neither are, nor have been, and which have no existence, when they consult respecting things about to be?

Sis. At least they seem so.

Soc. Does it seem to you possible for a person to hit well or ill a thing, that does not exist?

¹ I have translated, as if the Greek were αὐτοὶ ἑαυτῶν, not αὐτοὶ τῶν αὐτῶν, where ἑαυτῶν is ἀλλήλων, as elsewhere.

² I have neglected the unintelligible ἢ found between τίχναϊς and οὕτω—

³—³ The Greek is ἄλλο τι οὖν ἢ τὰ μέλλοντα οὕτω ἔστιν. But the sense requires, as I remarked long ago, ἄλλο τι οὖν τὰ μέλλοντα ἢ ἂ οὕτω ἔστιν, and so I have translated.

⁵—⁵ Here again the chain of reasoning leads to οὐκοῦν, ἂ μὴ πῶς ἔστιν, οὕτως οὐδὲ γίγνεται, οὕτω οὐδὲ φέσιν ἔχει οὐδεμίαν ὄντως, as I have translated, not οὐκοῦν εἰ μὴ πῶς ἔστιν γίγνεται—αὐτῶν—where αὐτῶν has nothing to which it can be referred.

Sis. How say you this?

Soc. I will explain, what I mean to say. Consider then. How would you distinguish out of many archers, which of them was the good and (which) the bad?

Soc. For perhaps you would bid them shoot at some mark. Is it not so?

Sis. Certainly.

Soc. Would you not decide that he is the conqueror, who hits most often the mark in a direct way.²

Sis. Yes, I would.

Soc. But ³if there were no mark laid down³ for them to shoot at, but each shot where he⁴ liked, how could you distinguish between the good and bad archer?

Sis. Not at all.

Soc. Would you then not be at a loss to distinguish between

¹—¹ I have attributed all between the numerals to Sisyphus, not, as commonly, to Socrates; and altered η into $\eta\upsilon$ —

² I scarcely understand $\kappa\alpha\tau' \delta\rho\theta\acute{o}\nu$ — The sense evidently requires something like "in the bull's eye," which is in the centre of a target, and would be expressed probably in Greek by $\kappa\alpha\tau' \acute{o}\mu\phi\alpha\lambda\acute{o}\nu$ —

³—³ Here is evidently an allusion to an Æsopo-Socratic fable, first published in a latent metrical form by De Furia, from a Vatican MS., but recently in a more complete state from an Athos MS. by Boissonade; who however did not perceive some errors in the Greek, which I corrected in Revue de Philologie, vol. ii. p. 225, and I will therefore present the reader with an English version of it.

"To the gods Apollo, his long arrows holding,
Spoke thus—Who knows the arrow to let fly,
Than the far-darting farther? On the strife
With Phœbus enter'd Zeus, his weapons handling.
In Ares' helmet Hermes shook the lots,
Which Phœbus first obtaining, with his hands
The bent bow pushing from him, and the string Letting go sharply, first his arrow fix'd
Within the distant gardens of the West.
When with his stride did Zeus the distance clear,
And cried—Where shall I shoot? no space have I.
And no bow drawing, bow-man's glory gained."

To the same fable an allusion is made by Lucretius in i. 968, "si quis procurrat ad oras Ultimus extremas jaciaturque volatile telum," quoted by Davies on Cicero de N. D. i. 20, "animus—ita late longeque peregrinatur, ut nullam tamen oram ultimam videat, in qua possit insistere."

⁴ Common sense requires "where," not "how," in Greek $\delta\pi\omicron\upsilon$, not $\delta\pi\omicron\varsigma$, and so I have translated.

those consulting well or ill, if they did not know what they were consulting about?

Sis. Yes, I should.

Soc. Do not those then, who consult respecting things about to be, consult respecting things not in existence?

Sis. Certainly.

Soc. It is not therefore possible for any person to hit the thing not in existence. For how does any one seem to you to be able to hit, what is not in existence?

Sis. Not at all.

Soc. Since then it is not possible to hit, what is not in existence, no one would be able to hit any thing¹ of those not in existence by consulting. For things that are about to be, belong to those not in existence. Is it not so?

Sis. So it seems at least to me.

Soc. He then, who does not hit things about to be, would be amongst men neither a good counsellor, nor a bad counsellor.

Sis. It seems he would not.

Soc. Nor is a person (said)² to be either a better counsellor, or a worse counsellor, not even if he should be more successful or less successful in hitting, what is not in existence.

Sis. He is not.

Soc. Looking then to what circumstance men call certain persons by the name³ of good counsellors, or bad counsellors, is it not worthy, Sisyphus, to think again upon this matter?

Sis. (I say so).⁴

¹ I have translated as if the Greek were ἀν γὰρ τι, not ἀν ἕκ—

² As there is nothing on which εἶναι can depend, I suspect the author wrote Οὐδὲ λέγεται, not Οὐδὲ γὰρ—as I have translated.

³ To avoid the strange expression ἀποκαλοῦσιν—εἶναι, I have translated, as if the Greek were ἀποκαλοῦσιν—ὀνόματι—

⁴ The dialogue is generally thought to be imperfect; but it will be complete, if we suppose that φημί has dropt out after Σίσυφος—and so I have translated.

DEMODOCUS.

[1.] You are, Demodocus, requesting¹ me to advise you on the matters, about which you are come together to deliberate. But it has come into my mind to consider, what avails this meeting of yours, and the eagerness of those, who think to advise with you, and the vote, which each of you thinks of giving. For, in the first place, unless it be possible to advise correctly and skilfully on the points, respecting which ye are come to deliberate, how is it not ridiculous for you to come together to deliberate on points, respecting which it is not possible to advise correctly? And in the second place, if it be possible to advise correctly and skilfully upon matters of this kind, still the knowledge, by which it is possible to advise correctly on them, is none. How then is it not out of place? But if there be any knowledge, by which it is possible to advise correctly on such matters, is it not necessary that there should be certain persons skilled to advise correctly on matters of this kind? And if there are certain persons, skilled to advise on those points, about which you are come together to deliberate, is it not necessary for you likewise to know how to advise on these matters, or not to know? Or that some persons should know, and some not? If then all of you know, what need is there for you to come together to deliberate? for each of you is competent to advise. But if, on the other hand, all of you do not know, how will you be able to deliberate? Or what advantage would there be to you in this meeting together, if you are not able to deliberate? But if some of you know, and others do not know, but these are in want of counsel, whether it is possible for an intellectual person to advise the unskilled, even a single person is sufficient to advise with those of you, who do know. Or do not all, who know, advise the same thing? so that it is fitting, after you have heard that person, to separate. But now you do not this; but you wish to hear many giving their advice; for you do not take upon yourselves to know those, who are attempting to advise with you on points, on which they are advising. For if you had taken upon yourselves to know those, who were advising with you, it would have been sufficient for you to have heard one person alone. To come together then with the view of hearing those, who do not know, as if you were doing something of importance, how is it not a thing out of place? Respecting then this meeting of yours, I am in this way at a loss.

[2.] And that too is a thing of difficulty relating to the eagerness of those, who think they can advise with you. For if, while advising, they do not give the same advice upon the same points, how can they all advise correctly, when they do not advise what he, who advises correctly, would advise?¹ Or how can the eagerness of those, who are eager to advise on points, in which they are unskilled, not be out of place? for being skilled, they would not choose to advise incorrectly. But if, on the other hand, they advise the same, what need is there for them all to advise? for a single one of them would, if advising the same, be sufficient. To be eager then on such matters, as would be of no importance, how is it not ridiculous? Neither then would the eagerness of the unskilled be not out of place, when it is of such a kind; nor would men of sense feel an eagerness on such matters, knowing that even one of them would do the same thing by advising what was fitting; so that I am unable to discover how the eagerness of those, who fancy they are advising, is not ridiculous.

[3.] But as regards the vote which you are thinking to give, I am the most at a loss, what it can avail. For whether are you giving a judgment upon those, who know how to advise? ²But more persons will not advise at all any better than one, nor some one way and others another correctly upon the same matter ;² so that respecting them there will be no need for you to give a vote. But are you giving a judgment ¹ upon some, who are unskilled and who ought not to advise any persons ?¹ Surely it is not fitting to intrust to such persons, as if they were madmen, to advise. But if you are to give a judgment upon neither the skilled nor the unskilled, upon whom are you to give it ? But what need is there for other persons to advise with you at all, if you are competent to give a judgment upon such matters ? But if on the other hand you are not competent, of what avail are your votes ? Or how is it not ridiculous for you to come together, as if about to consult, when you yourselves are in want of advice, and are incompetent, and yet fancy that you ought to come together and give a vote, as if competent to form a judgment ? For neither by being taken singly are you ignorant, and become sensible by being taken together ; nor, on the other hand, are you at a loss individually, but by coming together are no longer at a loss. But do you become competent to see together what things are to be done by you ? and this too, when you have neither learnt them from any one, nor discovered them yourselves ; which is the most shocking thing of all. For being unable to see together, what is to be done, you will not be competent to give a judgment upon the party, who is advising you correctly upon these matters ;³ nor, if a person, standing alone, as an adviser, should say this, that he himself will teach you what is to be done, is it in your power to form a correct judgment² upon those, who are advising you correctly or not. Now this would be a state not less shocking than that. If then neither the meeting nor the (single)³ adviser is able to make you competent to give a

¹ I have translated, as if the Greek were ἂν ἐν συμβουλευοίσι—not ἂν συμβουλευέιν.

² The Greek is at present ἀλλ' οὐ πλείονες ἐνὸς συμβουλευέουσιν, οὐδὲ ἄλλως καὶ ἄλλως περὶ τοῦ αὐτοῦ, which I cannot understand. I have therefore translated, as if it were originally ἀλλ' οὐ γὰρ πλείονες πλείονες ἐνὸς συμβουλευέουσιν, οὐδ' εἰ ἄλλοι ἄλλως περὶ τοῦ αὐτοῦ.

²—² The Greek is at present οὐδ' αὖ τοῦτό γ' ἱρεῖ εἰς ὧν ὁ ξυμβουλευῶν ὑμῖν ὅστος ὑμᾶς διδάξειν ἃ πρακτίον ὑμῖν ἴσθι καὶ κρίνειν—where I can discover neither sense nor syntax. Opportunely then do three MSS. offer διδάξει, which has led me to οὐδ' εἰ τοῦτό γ' ἱρεῖ εἰς ὧν ὁ ξυμβουλευῶν, ἅτι αὐτὸς ὑμᾶς διδάξει, ἃ πρακτία ἐν ὑμῖν ἴσθιν, εὖ κρίνειν—what I have translated.

³ For the sake of the antithesis I have translated as if the Greek were originally μηΘΕΙΣΟΣ—not μηΘΟΣ— judgment, what need is there to you for voting? Or how is this meeting of yours not opposed to your votes, and the vote to the eagerness of those advising you? For this meeting of yours is that of persons not competent, but in need of advisers; while the votes are given as of persons not wanting advisers, but able to form a judgment, and to advise; and the eagerness of those advising you, is as of persons who know; but the votes are given by you, as if the persons advising did not know. Now if any one were to ask you, who have voted, and the person advising you, respecting the matters on which you have voted—do you know what will that be, for the sake of which you think of doing what you have voted? you would not, I think, be able to say. And even if that should take place, for the sake of which you have it in your thoughts to do every thing,¹ do you know how it will benefit you? I think that neither you nor the party advising you would be able to tell this. But you conceive that some of those with intellect² know somehow this. But if a person should ask you who is the party,³ I do not think you would agree on this point. When therefore both the things, about which you are consulting,⁴ are such as not to be manifest, and the persons likewise, who vote and advise, are unskilled, reasonably will you say that it often falls out that persons have no faith in, and repent of, those things, for which they have taken counsel and voted. Now such events it is not becoming to fall out to the sensible. For they know the things, about which they give advice, both of what kind they are, and that they exist firmly to the parties persuaded, for the sake of whom they give the advice, and that neither to themselves nor to the parties persuaded will there be a repentance for any thing senseless.⁵ On matters

¹ In lieu of ἀν, omitted in two MSS., the author wrote, I suspect, πᾶν, as I have translated. On the phrase πράττειν πᾶν and its frequent corruption see my note on Æsch. Eum. 995.

² I have translated, as if the Greek were ἐννοῦν, not ἀνῶν. See my Poppo's Prolegom. p. 106.

⁴ Correct Greek would require ἐμβουλεύεσθε, not ἐμβουλεύετε—

then of this kind I conceive that those, who possess any sense, should think it fit to give advice; but not about the matters on which you are requesting me to advise; for from their advice the result is good fortune, but from the trifling of these misfortune.

[4.] I was once present with a person while he was admonishing his friend, because the latter had trusted to an accuser, not having heard the other party making an apology for himself, but hearing only the accuser. He said that (the friend) had done a terrible thing, in deciding against the party without having been present himself, or having heard from the friends of the party, to whose statements it was reasonable for him to trust. For,¹ after having heard both, he would not have so hastily trusted to the accuser; but that it was just, before conferring praise or blame, to hear the party make his defence, as well as the accuser. For how could any one decide correctly a suit, or judge in a proper manner between persons, without hearing the opposite parties? for that it is better that assertions, like a purple colour and gold-money, should be judged of by being placed side by side. Or for what purpose has time been allowed to both the opposite parties in a suit? or the judges sworn to hear both sides equally? unless the lawgiver conceived that suits would be decided more justly and better by the judges. But you seem to me to have not even heard of what is said by the multitude. What is it? said (the other).

² Decide no suit, till both accounts you've heard.²

And yet this would not have been thus circulated, if it had not been well said, and as is fitting. I advise you therefore, said he, for the future not to blame or praise persons so hastily. The other then said that it appeared to him an absurd thing, if it were impossible to know, when one person was speaking, whether he was telling the truth or a falsehood, and yet possible to know, when two persons were speaking; and impossible to learn from a person, when telling the truth, but possible to be taught by that very person and another, when telling a falsehood; and if one by speaking straightforwardly and truly should be unable to show what he is saying clearly, but that two, one of whom should tell a falsehood, and not speak straightforwardly, should be able to show clearly that, which the party speaking straightforwardly was not able to show clearly. And I am at a loss, said he, on this point likewise, how they are to show it clearly; whether by being silent, or speaking. For if they are to show it clearly by being silent, there would be a need of hearing neither, much less both. But if by speaking both are to show it clearly, and both parties speak according to no regular manner and time¹—for both think they have a right to speak in turn—how is it possible for both to show the matter clearly? For if both are showing the matter clearly at the same time, both will be speaking together at the same time. ² But this they are not wont to do, nor do the laws permit it; ² so that if they are to show the matter clearly by speaking, each of them will do so by speaking; and when either party speaks, then either party will show the matter clearly; so that they will speak one before and the other after; and they will show the matter clearly, one before and the other after. Now if each party in turn shows the same matter clearly, what need is there to hear the latter? for the matter will have become clear by the party first speaking. But if both parties show clearly ³ that matter, said he,³ how will not either of them have done so? for how would both be able to show clearly that, which one of

¹ I have translated as if the Greek were οὐ γὰρ δὲ— not οὐδ' αὖ—

¹ In lieu of χρόνον one MS. affords as a var. lect. χρόνον—and hence
 another has ῥῥονον— By the aid of both united I have been led to ῥῥονον kai χρόνον, what I have translated. For in a law-suit at Athens both the manner and the time were, in some cases, defined by law.

²—³ The Greek is at present, τοῦτο δ' οὐκ ἰσῶσι— But as there is nothing to which ἰσῶσι can be united, opportunely does one MS. read οὐκαθῶσιν, where evidently lies hid οὐκ εἰσῶσιν— while from ἰσῶσιν it is easy to elicit ἰσῶσι οἱ νόμοι— what I have translated; for custom and law are thus perpetually united.

them shall not have done so? But if either shall have shown it clearly, it is evident that the former will have spoken of it, and the former will have shown it clearly; so that how is it not possible for the person hearing him alone to know all correctly?¹ On hearing them I was at a loss, and unable to decide. For the others, who were present, said that the first reasoning was true. If then you can advise me² on this matter, whether it is possible,³ when one person is saying any thing, to know correctly what he is saying, say so;³ or whether there is need of a speaker on the opposite side, if a person would know which is speaking straightforwardly. Or whether it is not necessary to hear both parties? Or how do you think?

[5.] The day before yesterday a person was finding fault with another, because he was unwilling to lend money or to trust him; and the party, with whom he was finding fault, was defending himself; whereupon another person amongst those, who were present, inquired of the party finding fault—whether he, who had not trusted nor lent the money, had erred? and have not you too, said he, who did not persuade him to lend, erred? In what, said the other party, have I erred? Which of the two, said (the inquirer), seems to you to err? the person, who fails in what he wishes, or he, who does not (fail)? The person who fails, said he. Have you then not failed in wishing to borrow; while he, who did not wish to give up (his money), has not failed in that point. Truly so, said he; but in what have I erred, even if he has not given it me? Because, said (the inquirer), if you have begged the things which you ought not, how do you think that you have not erred? while he has acted correctly in not giving them up; but if, on the other hand, you have begged

¹ I have translated as if πάντ' εὖ had dropt out between ἀκούσαντα and γινῶναι.

² In lieu of συμβαλίσθαι, the sense evidently requires συμβουλεύεσθαι—For the party himself could make a conjecture, but could not give the advice he wanted.

³—³ Here again I suspect that something has dropt out. The Greek is at present ἐνός λίγοντος γινῶναι τί λέγει— It was originally ἐνός λίγοντός τι, γινῶναι εὖ, ὅ, τι λέγει, λέγει— what I have translated.

what you ought, and failed in this point, how have you not of necessity erred? Perhaps so, said he; but how has he not erred, who did not trust me? If you had treated with him, said (the inquirer), as was fitting, you would not have erred at all. Not at all. But now you have not treated with him, as was fitting. I appear so, said he. If then he was not persuaded, when you were treating with him, as was not fitting, how can you justly find fault with him? I am unable to say. Nor can you say that one must not pay attention to those, who conduct themselves ill? This (I can say) very much, said he. Do not then those persons seem to you to conduct themselves ill, who treat with a party in a manner that is not fitting? To me at least (they seem so), said he. In what then did he err, if he paid no attention to you, when conducting yourself ill? It appears, said he, in nothing. Why then, said (the inquirer), do persons find fault on such matters with each other, and blame those, who are not persuaded by them, because they are not persuaded, but do not find fault with themselves at all, because they have not persuaded them? Here-upon another party who was present, observed—When a person has conducted himself well towards any one, and has assisted him, and subsequently requests that party to conduct himself in a similar manner towards him, but does not meet with such conduct, how does he not reasonably find fault? Is not, said (the inquirer), the person whom the party requests to conduct himself in a similar manner, either able to conduct himself well, or unable? (Yes.)¹ And if he is unable, how can he properly make the request, who requests him (to perform)² what he cannot? but if he is able, how did he not persuade him (to do so)? or how do persons, who speak in this way, speak correctly? But, said (the other), it is requisite, by Zeus, to find fault with such a person,³ in order that both he may for the remainder of his life conduct himself better, and the other mean fellows,⁴ who hear the party finding fault. Think you, said (the inquirer), that any persons will conduct ¹ I have introduced the answer "Yes," which could hardly be dispensed with.

² The Greek is ἵκω— I have translated as if it were ἀνύκω—

³ The train of thought evidently leads to ροῦόντω instead of ροῦτο—

⁴ Instead of ἄλλοι φίλοι, the author wrote either ἄλλοι οὐ φίλοι, or ἄλλοι φαῦλοι, as I have translated.

themselves better when they hear a party speaking correctly,¹ or when in error? When speaking correctly, said he. ²Now the party, who was speaking not correctly, did not seem to you to make a request correctly?³ Truly so, said he. How then will those, who hear a person finding fault in this way, conduct themselves better. Not at all, said he. For what purpose, then,³ would a person find fault³ in this way? He confessed he could not discover

[6.] Some one was accusing a person of stupidity, because he had given credence quickly even to parties he happened to meet with,⁴ while they were speaking. To fellow-citizens and familiar friends, when speaking, it is reasonable to trust. But to persons of that kind, whom he had never seen nor heard of before, to give credence, and this too when he was not ignorant that the majority of men are braggarts and knaves, was no little proof of silliness. When one of those present observed—For my part I thought that you considered a person of greater value, who could quickly understand even any one he met with, rather than him, who did so slowly. And so I do consider, said the other. Why then, said (the former), do you find fault, if a person gives credence quickly, even to those he meets with, when they speak the truth? But, said (the other), I do not find fault with this, but because he gives credence to those, who tell falsehoods. But, if after a longer period even to those not accidentally met with he had given credence, and suffered annoyance,⁵ would you not have found fault with him still more? Yes; I should have done so, said he. Is it, because he gave credence slowly, even to those not acci-

¹ The words καὶ ἀξιούντως, commonly found here between λέγοντος and ἡ, were properly omitted originally in one MS.

²⁻³ To preserve the chain of reasoning the author evidently wrote, not 'Ο δὲ γὰρ οὐκ ὁρθῶς ἀξιούν ἰδόκει σοι— which I cannot understand, but 'Ο δὲ λέγων οὐκ ὁρθῶς οὐκ ὁρθῶς ἀξιούν ἰδόκει σοι— what I have translated.

³⁻³ Since all the MSS. but one read ἐγκαλοῖ, it is evident the author wrote τοιαῦτ' ἂν— not τοιαῦτα—

⁴ So I have translated τοῖς τυχοῦσιν all through this section, although οἱ τυχόντες generally means "ordinary persons." For οἱ τυχόντες are here opposed to οἱ οἰκίοι, and compared with οἱ ἀγνώτες.

⁵ In lieu of the unintelligible ᾗτις, I have substituted ἡμᾶς— dentially met with? No, by Zeus, said he. For I suppose, said the other, you do not conceive that it is right to find fault with a person on this account, but because he gives credence to those, who state what is not credible. I do so, said he. Whether then, said (the other), do you think it is not right to find fault with him for giving credence slowly even to those not accidentally met with, but right (to do so) for giving credence quickly even to those accidentally met with? Not I indeed, said he. Why then do you find fault with him? said (the other). Because he errs in giving credence to persons accidentally met with, previous to making an inquiry. But if he had slowly given credence, previous to making an inquiry, he would not have erred. Not so, by Zeus, said he; but he would have erred even thus not the less; but I think one ought not to give credence to persons accidentally met with. But if, said (the other), you think one ought not to give credence to persons accidentally met with, how is it fitting to give credence quickly to persons unknown? and do you think that it is requisite to make an inquiry, whether they are speaking the truth? I think so,¹ said he. Say then, said (the other), is it not requisite to make inquiry about familiar friends and acquaintances, whether they are speaking the truth? I should say so, said he. For perhaps, said (the other), some of these state what is not credible. And very much so, said he. Why then, said (the other), is it more reasonable to give credence to familiar friends and acquaintances than to persons accidentally met with? I cannot tell, said he. What then, if it is requisite (not)² to give more credence to familiar friends than to persons accidentally met with, is it not requisite to consider them less trustworthy than persons accidentally met with? How not? said he. If then there are familiar friends to some persons, and persons unknown to others, how will it not be necessary to consider the same persons more trustworthy than the same? For it is requisite to consider familiar friends and persons unknown, as not ¹ I have translated, as if the Greek were Εἰπέ, ἔπει—not ἔπει—which I cannot understand.

² This negative, wanting in all the MSS., is found only in the Latin version of Corradus.

³ I have adopted ῥῶν αὐτῶν, suggested by Stephens, in lieu of αὐτῶν, which is unintelligible.

equally trustworthy, as you say yourself. This does not please me, said he. Equally, said (the former), do some believe what is stated by them, but others disbelieve? And this too is strange, said he. If then, said (the other), both familiar friends and persons accidentally met with state the same things, would not all things stated equally to all be credible or incredible (equally)? Necessarily so, said he. Must we not give credence then equally to those who state the same things?² It is probable, said he.

On their conversing in this way, I was at a loss to whom one ought to give credence and to whom not, and whether to the trust-worthy and those who know what they are speaking about, or to familiar friends and acquaintances. Upon these matters then how think you?

¹—¹ I have translated, as if the Greek were ἅπαντα—πᾶσι, not ἰπείρα—πῶς, where ἰπείρα seems quite inadmissible.

² The Greek is at present τοῖς λίγουσιν αὐτὰ—λίγουσιν αὐτὰ— where Stephens was the first to suggest λίγουσι—ταὐτὰ, and to reject λίγουσιν αὐτὰ— But those words are not to be rejected entirely. They ought to be inserted after γνωρίμοις just below, and thus corrected, λίγουσιν, ἀ οἶωνται εἰδέναι, i. e. “say, what they think they know—” for thus the parties, who think they know, are properly opposed to those, who really know.

INTRODUCTION TO THE DEFINITIONS.

Or these Definitions, which are appended to all the complete editions of Plato, and found likewise in eleven MSS. collated by Bekker, the authorship is attributed in the Vienna MS. to Speusippus. (Φ.) But since the writing relied upon, as the authority for this statement, is more modern than the rest of the Manuscript, the remark is probably due to Sambucus, once the possessor of it; who, says Menage, on Diogen. L. iv. 5, asserted that the "Οροι, mentioned in the Life of Speusippus, had been falsely attributed to Plato; and he might have added, that although the Definitions are attributed to Plato by Casaubon, they are distinctly assigned to Speusippus by Ficinus; whose version of them is to be found towards the end of a volume in folio, containing his translation of "Iamblichus de Mysteriis," and other Greek treatises of a similar character, printed by Aldus in 1497. Stobæus, however, found the Definitions at the end of his MS. of Plato; to whom he says they were attributed, in iii. p. 49, 35. But instead of Speusippus being the author of these Definitions, internal evidence would rather lead to the supposition of their being the production of some more recent philosopher of Alexandria. For we find δόμα twice used in the sense of a "gift," a word first met with in Holy Writ, and subsequently in Plutarch, as remarked by H. Stephens; and while its compound πρόδομα is found in Hesych. Ἀρράβων, as duly noticed by Lobeck on Phrynichus, p. 249, the simple δόμα is reckoned amongst irregular formations by Herodian, Περὶ Μονηροῦς Δείξεως, p. 30, 5, where Lehr refers to Lobeck's Παραλειπόμενα, p. 424.

But granting even that from this fact no inference could be fairly drawn against the supposed authorship and antiquity of the Definitions, yet the matter of them is such as to disprove their being written by a disciple of Plato, and suggests rather that they are the production of some philosopher, who concocted them from a faithless representation of the doctrines promulgated in the Socratic, Stoic, Academic, and Peripatetic schools; and this too with so little judgment, as frequently to give an unintelligible definition, when he might have found an intelligible one elsewhere, as I have shown on various occasions in the notes. Socrates, it is true, as remarked by Menage on Diogenes L. vii. 60, is said by Aristotle in Metaphys. i. 6, and xiii. 4, and Theopompus the rhetorician, quoted by Arrian on Epictetus ii. 17, to have paid considerable attention to Definitions; and this may be inferred from some instances furnished by Xenophon in Memorab. iv. 6. But it is to Zeno and his followers that we must refer the practice of laying down Definitions, as the basis of subsequent discussions. For they were accustomed to apply to moral philosophy the principle they had learnt from the Pythagoreans, as the groundwork of physical philosophy, developed by mathematics, as may be inferred from the Life of Pythagoras by Diogenes; who appeals to Phavorinus to prove that "Pythagoras made use of definitions through his 'Mathematical Wood;' and still more so did Socrates and his followers; and so did Aristotle and the Stoics." Menage too, on Diogen. L. vii. 60, remarks that a mass of such definitions are to be found in the Life of Zeno alone.

To the preceding proofs that the author of the Definitions was some philosopher of Alexandria, may be added those which Cousin has adduced. He remarks that Ἀξιώσις, in the sense of "dignity" or "majesty," does not belong to the period of Plato, nor even to any age of good Greek; and neither does λογισμὸς συνόρατος. So too Ἀγάπησις is not a word of Plato or his time; while on the unintelligible definition of the word ὄνομα, "a noun," he observes that "the language used there is altogether of the Alexandrine school, and is better suited to a treatise by Dionysius the Areopagite than to one attributed to Plato."

DEFINITIONS.

¹ Eternal—that which has existed formerly through all time, and is now not destroyed.¹

God—an immortal living-being,² sufficient in itself for happiness; an eternal existence; the cause of the nature of the good.

Generation—a movement towards existence; ³ a sharing through a change³ in existence; a progression towards existence.

The sun—a fire in heaven, which can alone be seen from morning to evening by the same;⁴ ⁵ the greatest star, visible by day;⁵ a perpetually living being, possessing a soul.⁶

Time—⁷ a movement of the sun; a measure of progress.⁷

¹— As the idea of eternity necessarily includes the idea of continuance through the three periods of time, past, present, and future, this definition is evidently defective.

² I have translated ζῶν "a living being," to avoid the incongruity of considering god as an "animal," the ordinary meaning of ζῶν.

³— This is the proper version here of μάλαψις, not merely "a sharing."

⁴ Instead of "by the same," in Greek τοῖς αὐτοῖς, one would have expected "the same," in Greek ὁ αὐτός: for the question is not about the parties seeing, but the thing seen. Hence Corradus has "Sol—idem videri potest."

⁵— I have followed the reading of four MSS., ἄστρον ἡμεροφανὲς τὸ μέγιστον, and placed the words ζῶν διδίων ἐμψυχον after μέγιστον, not before them, as Bekker has done. Ficinus omits ἡμεροφανὲς. Corradus has correctly, "astrum maximum de die lucens."

⁶ On the sun possessing a soul, see Epinomis, p. 982, C. § 6.

⁷— Although this definition coincides in part with that of Eratosthenes, who, as we learn from Plutarch, ii. p. 884, B., described Time as "the journeying of the sun," yet it would be more correctly defined as "the measure of the motion of the sun, or of the progressive movement of

Day—a journeying of the sun from its rising (east) to its setting (west); a light, the opposite to Night.¹

Morning—the beginning of day; the first light from the sun.

Mid-day—the time when the shadows of substances have the least length.

Evening—the close of day.

Night—darkness, the opposite to Day;² a deprivation of the sun.

Chance—a proceeding from uncertainty to uncertainty, and from what is spontaneous;³ the⁴ cause⁵ of a fortuitous action.⁶

Old Age—the wasting away of a thing with life, the result of time.

*Wind*⁶—a movement in the air around the earth.

Air—an element, all of whose movements⁷ according to space are according to nature.⁷

Heaven—a substance, surrounding all things perceived by the senses, except the uppermost air.⁸

any thing," in Greek Χρόνος ἡλίου κινήσεως μέτρον ἢ φορᾶς του, not Χρόνος ἡλίου κινήσεως, μέτρον φορᾶς. The Stoics defined it as "the interval during (two) motions of the world." Corradus has, "mensura celestis conversionis."

¹ From this definition it would seem as if Night were a light, as well as Day. Hence one would have preferred ῥῶς, τούναντιον νυκτὸς σκότῳ, not simply τούναντιον νυκτὶ, and similarly in ², Νύξ σκότος τούναντιον ἡμέρας φωτί, not ἡμέρᾳ merely. Corradus makes this a new definition, "Lux, id, quod nocti est contrarium."

³ So Suidas, Τύχη—ἡ φορὰ ἐξ ἀδῆλου εἰς ἀδῆλον καὶ αὐτόματον. But Aristotle, according to Plutarch, ii. p. 885, C., made a distinction between Τύχη and τὸ αὐτόματον.

⁵ So I have translated δαιμονίας πράξεως. Stephens has, "causa felicitis successus;" but as "chance" is the cause of an unsuccessful as well as a successful action, the version in English should be as ambiguous as δαιμονίας is in Greek. Ficinus, too, "felicit actionis causa." Corradus, "et felicit actionis fortuita causa."

⁶ Why πνεῦμα is written here, where one would have expected ἀνεμος, I must leave for others to explain. Corradus renders πνεῦμα by "spiritus."

⁸ Here seems to be an allusion to what is called ὑπερουράνιος τόπος in Phædr. p. 247, C. Ficinus omits αἰσθητά—

Soul—¹that which moves itself; ¹ the cause of vital motion in living beings.

²Power—that, which is able by itself to produce an effect.²

Vision—³the (bodily) habit³ of distinguishing substances.

Bone—marrow, consolidated by heat.

Element—⁴that, which combines and separates (particles) brought together.⁴

Virtue—⁵a (mental) constitution of the best kind; a habit of a mortal living being; ⁶the object of praise on account of itself; ⁶ a habit, according to which that, which possesses it, is said to be good; ⁷a just communion of laws; ⁷ a disposition, according to which ⁸that, which is constituted perfectly,⁸ is called steady; ⁹ a habit, effective of a good state of law.

²—² There is another definition of power given in p. 144.

³—³ Although ἔξις and διάθεσις seem to be synonymous in p. 136, yet ἔξις appears to be applied to the body, and διάθεσις to the mind; and hence I have introduced between the lines "bodily" here, and shortly afterwards "mental" in ⁴.

⁴—⁴ A similar definition was given by the Stoics, as we learn from Diogenes L. vii. 136, ἔστι δὲ στοιχείον, ἐξ οὗ πρῶτον γίνεται τι (so Suidas correctly in Στοιχείον in lieu of γινόμενα) καὶ εἰς ὃ ἴσχατον ἀναλύεται. Ficinus has "ex quo componuntur, et in quod composita dissolvuntur."

⁶—⁶ So Cleanthes the Stoic, in Diogenes L. vii. 89, defined virtue as διάθεσιν—δι' αὐτὴν—αἰρετὴν, οὐ διὰ τινὰ ῥόβον ἢ ἱλπίδα ἢ τι τῶν ἐξωθεν: from whence one would prefer here αἰρετὴ to ἱπαινετὴ.

⁷—⁷ How virtue can be said to be "a just communion of laws" I cannot understand; nor could Ficinus; and hence he considered this as a fresh definition. But the two following sentences plainly prove that Virtue is still the subject of the definition. Did the author write ἔξις ποιητικῆς εὐνομίας καὶ κοινωνίας νόμων δικαίας? And so perhaps Stephens wished to read; for his version is—"Communio, legum est justa affectio, secundum quam id, quod habet perfecte affectum, honestum dicitur; aut habitus, qui æquitatis et concordie faciendæ vim habet:" which he got perhaps partly from Ficinus—"Communio, legum justa constitutio: qua quod præditum est, probum dicitur; habitus concordiam præstans." Corradus too considers this a new definition. His version is—"Communitas, legum justa dispositio, quam quicumque est adeptus, si modo sit optime affectus, honestus appellatur; habitus bonas legum lationem efficiens."

⁸—⁸ I have followed Bekker; who says, "libri τὸ ἔχον:" where he meant by "libri" printed books, not MSS., where those two words were, it seems, wanting.

⁹—⁹ I have translated σπουδαῖος "steady," i. e. a person who pursues an object in view without swerving and earnestly.

¹ Discretion—a power effective by itself of the good fortune of man ; a knowledge of things good and evil ; ² a knowledge effective of felicity ; ³ a (mental) constitution, by which we determine what is to be done and what is not to be done.¹

Justice—³ an agreement of the soul with itself, ³ and ⁴ a correct arrangement of the parts of the soul towards each other and about each other ; ⁴ ⁵ a habit, distributive to each person of that, which is according to worthiness ; ⁵ a habit, according to which he, who possesses it, can select what seems to him to be just ; a habit in life, ⁶ subservient to law ; ⁷ an equality that can share in common ; ⁷ a habit ministering to upright⁸ laws.

Temperance—a moderation of soul relating to the desires and pleasures, which exist in it according to nature ; a fitness in, and correct ordering of, the soul, as regards its natural pleasures and pains ; a harmony in the soul touching the states

¹—¹ The whole of this definition is found in Stobæus iii. p. 49, with a slight change in the position of the sentences.

²—² The words πιστήμη ποιητική εὐδαιμονίας, although acknowledged by Stobæus, have been cut out by Bekker from the text on the authority of a single MS.

³—³ How Justice can be said to be "an agreement of the soul with itself," I confess I cannot understand ; and still less how, in "⁴," it is a "correct arrangement of the parts of the soul towards each other and about each other ;" especially as a similar definition is given of Temperance in Stobæus v. p. 78, l. Σωφροσύνη ἴσθιν ὁμολογία τῶν τῆς ψυχῆς μερῶν πρὸς ἀλλήλα. Stephens too seems to have been at a loss ; for he renders πρὸς ἀλλήλα καὶ περὶ ἀλλήλα by merely "inter se," similar to "ad invicem cui mutuus" in Ficinus. Corradus has more closely "inter se et secum ordinis conservatio."

⁴—⁴ A similar definition is given from a not-mentioned author by Stobæus, ix. p. 125, 40. Δικαιοσύνη δὲ ἴσθιν ἀρετὴ ψυχῆς διανεμητικὴ τῶν κατ' ἀξίαν—where ἐκάστω seems to have dropt out between διανεμητικὴ and τῶν— of ruling and being ruled ; a self-acting according to nature ;¹ [a well-ordering of the soul ;]¹ an² intercourse of the soul,² founded on reason, relating to things honourable and base ; a habit according to which he, who has it, can select and be cautious of what he ought.

⁵ Since one MS. offers βία for βίη, perhaps the author wrote ἐνευ βίας, not ἐν βίῃ, and thus showed that Justice is subservient to law, not by force, but willingly.

⁶—⁶ How Justice can be "an equality sharing in common," I cannot understand ; nor could, I think, Stephens ; whose version is—"socialis equalitas." I could have understood ισότητος κοινωνία, or ισότητος κοινωνικὴ ἕξις—"a habit sharing in equality."

Fortitude—a habit of the soul, not to be moved by fear ; a boldness in war ;³ a knowledge of the things relating to war ;³ a command over the soul relating to things of fear and dread ; a boldness subservient to discretion ; a bold bearing under the expectation of death ; a habit, preservative of right reasoning in dangers ;⁴ a strength (of mind) balancing (the apprehension) of danger ;⁴ a strength, bearing up on the side of virtue ; a tranquillity of soul with reference to things that appear, according to correct reasoning, to be full of dread and daring ; the safe preservation⁵ of uncertain determinations⁵ relating to things of dread ;⁶ a skill in war ;⁶ ⁷a habit, that can abide in law.⁷

Continence—a power enduring pain ;⁸ a following of correct reasoning ;³ ⁹a power not exceeded by that which is perceived by correct reasoning.⁹

²—² I confess I do not understand how Temperance is ὁμιλία τῆς ψυχῆς ; nor could Corradus ; for his version is—"animi quasi sermo—"

³—³ Most assuredly Fortitude could never be correctly defined as "a knowledge of the things relating to war."

⁵—⁵ Of the meaning of δογμάτων ἀδήλων, I confess myself quite in the dark. I could have understood οὐ δειλῶν—"not cowardly." Ficinus has—"observatio eorum, quæ ratio dictat, in rebus pavidis." Corradus, "incertarum opinionum de rebus adversis liberatio."

⁶—⁶ Here again Fortitude is said incorrectly to be "a skill in war."

⁷—⁷ Instead of νόμον one MS. has λόγον : which seems to lead to φόβον, "blame : " while in ἐμμελητική, found in two MSS. for ἐμμενητική, perhaps ἀμελητική, "neglectful," lies hid.

⁸—⁸ and ⁹—⁹ These definitions of Ἐγκράτεια are quite beyond my comprehension. How much more intelligible is the language of an unknown author, quoted by Stobæus, xvii. p. 157, who defines Continence as "the being able to restrain by reason the desire, that is rushing to the enjoyment of improper pleasures ; and the bearing up against and under the

Self-sufficiency—a completion in the possession of good things; ¹a habit, according to which they, who possess it, are the masters of themselves.¹

Reasonableness—a reduction in what is just and useful; a moderation in compacts; a well-ordering of the soul, founded on reason, as regards things honourable and base.

Endurance—the bearing-up against pain, for the sake of what is honourable; a bearing-up under labour for the sake of what is honourable.

²*Boldness*—the non-expectation of an ill; an imperturbability in the presence of an ill.²

Non-perception of pain—a habit, according to which we do not fall into sorrows.

The love of labour—a habit, that accomplishes what a person chooses (to do); a voluntary endurance; ³a habit not to be cavilled at on the subject of labour.³

Modesty—a voluntary shrinking from daring on just grounds towards what seems to be the best; a voluntary laying hold of the best; a cautious care of blame on just grounds.

✓ Freedom—the ruling power of life; a power ruling by itself on every occasion; ⁴a power over that, which relates to oneself in life; ⁵an unsparingness in the use and possession of property.⁵

Liberality—a habit in transacting money matters in a way want of, and pain from, that, which is a natural desire:” where I have translated as if the Greek were τῆς κατὰ φύσιν ἐπίσεως ἰνδύας—to which I have been led by Gesner’s conjecture, κατὰ φύσας in lieu of κατὰ φύσιν—See too the definition in Diogen. L. vii. 93, τὴν δὲ ἐγκράτειαν, διαθέσιν ἀνυπερβατον τῶν κατ’ ὁρθὸν λόγον ἢ ἔξιν, ἀήττητον ἡδονῶν τὴν δὲ καρτερίαν, ἐπιστήμην ἢ ἔξιν ὧν ἐμμανητίον ἢ μὴ. Ficinus has here—“potestas, quæ nunquam dejicitur e rationis proposito,” which is intelligible indeed, but not to be got from the Greek.

¹—The words between the numerals are a definition rather of Continence than of Self-sufficiency. Corradus renders Ἐγκράτεια by “Beatitude” —

²—³ Ficinus has elegantly, but not closely—“Audacia securitas, qua quis malum neque futurum expectat, neque præsens horrescit.”

⁴—⁵ Ficinus—“adversus labores inconcussus habitus.” Corradus—“habitus laborem nunquam reprehendens.”

⁶—⁷ Such, I presume, is the meaning of Ἐξουσία τοῦ καθ’ ἑαυτὸν ἐν βίῳ: Ficinus—“licentia propria vitæ.” Corradus—“in uno quoque sita potestas vivendi”—as if he wished to read ἐν ἑκάστῳ—that is fitting; the adding to, and possession of, property, as is meet.

⁸—⁹ The words between the numerals are the definition rather of the following Ἐλευθεριότης, than of Ἐλευθερία.

Mildness—the settling down of an excitement arising from passion; a moderated temperament of soul.

Decorum—a voluntary yielding to what appears the best; a well-ordering respecting the movement of the body.

Felicity—a good composed of all good things; a power self-sufficient towards living well; a consummation as regards virtue; an utility self-sufficient for a living being.¹

Magnificence—the estimation according to correct reason² of that which is the most worthy of respect.³

Sagacity—a natural ability in the soul, according to which he, who possesses it, makes a conjecture³ in the quickest (time)³ relating to what is needful; an acuteness of intellect.

Honesty—a simplicity in moral conduct in union with fair speaking; a steadiness⁴ in moral conduct.

*Kalokagathia*⁵—a habit of selecting things that are the best.

High-mindedness—a gentlemanly⁶ use of accidental circumstances; a majesty of soul in union with reason.

¹ Stephens renders "vita," as if he wished to read ζωής in lieu of ζών, or else he got "vita" from Ficinus.

² Instead of τὸν σεμνότερον, which could not be applied to λογισμὸν, I have translated, as if the Greek were τοῦ σεμνότερου. One MS. has τὸ and another καί, which seem to lead to καὶ τὸ σεμνότερον. Ficinus too, "et honorandum." Corradus has, what to myself is unintelligible, "Magnificentia, amplitudo a gravissima mentis agitatione, et propositiones profecta."

³ Since one MS. offers ἐν ἑκάστῳ in lieu of ἐκάστῳ, it is easy to elicit from thence ἐν ἑκίστῳ. So the Stoics defined ἀγχινοῖαν by ἔξιν εὐπερικῆν τοῦ καθήκοντος ἐκ τοῦ παραχρήμα, as we learn from Diogenes L. vii. 93, where Casaubon refers to Aristotle, Ethic. vi. 9, who says that ἀγχινοῖα is κατὰ ταχὺ τι εὐστοχία. Ficinus however found in his MS. ἐν ἑκάστῳ: for his version is "in singulis"—

⁴ Here, as before, I have translated σπουδαΐτης by "steadiness."

⁵ As there is no single nor even compound word in English to answer to the Greek Καλοκαγαθία, by which was meant the union of bodily and mental accomplishments, I have put the Greek word into English letters, just as Philanthropy is in the next definition but one, where, for a similar reason, Ficinus has left in his Latin version the Greek word Φιλανθρωπία; but translated Καλοκαγαθία by "bonitas." The whole definition is omitted by Corradus.

⁶ By ἀστυῖος, literally, "living in a city," was meant also "a person of elegant manners," for such those in the city were, as opposed to those of inelegant manners, who lived in the country and were called ἀγροῖκοι. Ficinus has "moderatus"—

Philanthropy—a habit of moral conduct that easily leads to a friendship with man; a habit of acting kindly towards men; ¹the having thanks; a recollection with kind conduct.¹

Piety—justice relating to the gods; a power² paying attention to the gods willingly;³ a correct perception of the honour due to the gods; a knowledge of the honour due to the gods.

Good—⁴that on account of itself.⁴

Fearlessness—a habit, according to which we do not fall into fear.

Apathy—a habit, according to which we do not fall into sufferings.

Peace—a quietness as regards enmity in war.

Listlessness—an easiness of soul; apathy respecting the objects of anger.

*Skilfulness*⁵—a habit, according to which he, who pos-

² Instead of δύναμις the sense evidently requires διάθεσις, similar to "affectio" in Ficinus.

³ I have translated, as if the Greek were ἐκουσίως, not ἐκούσιος. Ficinus has "voluntaria veneratio dei; recta honoris divini scientia"—Corradus, "voluntaria religionis deorum susceptio; recta cultus deorum scientia;" one or both of whom Stephens has followed in his version, "voluntaria de deorum cultu existimatio; recta cultus deorum scientia," as if he wished to unite ἐκούσιος with ὑπόληψις, and ὁρθή with ἰπιστήμη, not, as Bekker has done, ἐκούσιος with δύναμις, and ὁρθή with ὑπόληψις. The definition of piety given by the Stoics in Diogen. L. vii. 119, is shorter, if not better, Εὐσίβεια, ἰπιστήμη θεῶν θεραπείαις.

⁴—The words between the numerals, in Greek, Ἀγαθόν, τὸ αὐτοῦ ἵκεν, are too few to make either syntax or sense. Stephens' version in English is, "Good is that, which exists for its own sake," a definition scarcely intelligible. Did the author write Ἀγαθόν, ταῦτόν ἢ οὐχ ἔρεπον ὠφελίας, which is the very definition given by the Stoics in Diogen. L. vii. 94; for ὠφελίας might easily have dropt out before ἀφοβία. Ficinus has supplied the word, requisite for the sense, in his version, "Bonum, quod sui ipsius gratia expetendum:" and so too has Corradus, "Bonum, quod sua ipsius causa appetitur."

⁵ There is no single word in English to answer to the Greek δαιμόνης, sesses it, is able to form a conjecture about the peculiar termination (of a thing).

Friendship—a union of sentiment, relating to things honourable and just; the choice of the same kind of life; a union in opinion on questions of sect¹ and practice; a union in sentiment relating to a communion in life in combination with kind feelings; ²a communion in doing well and in suffering.²

³*Nobility of birth*—the virtue of a noble moral conduct; an easy leading of the soul to words and deeds.³

Selection—a correct approval after examination.

Kind feeling—⁴the selection of a person for the purpose of embracing by a person.⁴

Familiarity—a sharing in the same family.

by which was meant, as explained by Suidas, a power in speaking and a cleverness in acting.

¹ Such seems to be the meaning here of προαίρεσις, similar to the simple αἵρεσις. Stephens' version is, "consensio de proposito et actione." Ficinus has "in deliberando atque agendo." Corradus, "de eligendo et faciendo opinionum consensus."

^{2—3} Such is the literal translation of the Greek. Stephens' version is "societas beneficiorum mutuum." Ficinus has "communio in dandis accipiendisque beneficiis."

^{3—5} Orelli, unable to understand how Εὐγένεια is ἀπὸ τῆς εὐγενούς ἡθους, proposed to read συγγενούς, by which he probably meant "cognate." But what is gained by the alteration I confess I cannot discover. The author wrote, I suspect, Εὐγένεια, ἀπὸ τῆς οὐ γίνουσι, ἡθους δὲ, εὐαγωγικῆς ψυχῆς πρὸς λόγους καὶ πράξεις, "Nobility is an excellence, not from birth, but moral conduct, leading the soul to words and deeds;" where the definition is best explained by the sentiment of Juvenal in viii.,

Tota licet veteres exornent undique ceræ

Atria, nobilitas sola est atque unica virtus—

But even thus the definition is defective. For as words and deeds are of different kinds, it should be stated of what kind they are, to which nobility leads. Ficinus has, "Generositas, virtus ingenui moris; facilitas animi ad dicenda pariter atque agenda." Corradus, "Generositas, generosi moris virtus; animi ad rationes et actiones facilis inductio."

^{4—} Here again Orelli was, as I am, at a loss about the meaning of the definition; and hence he wished to cut out αἵρεσις. But to my mind the difficulty lies in πρὸς ἀνθρώπων ἀσπασμός, or as eight MSS. read, ἀσπασμῷ. Stephens' version is, "Benevolentia est electio hominis; hominis amplexus et salutatio," as if he wished to omit πρὸς—Ficinus has, "Benevolentia, electio hominis ad hominem grata atque accepta." Corradus, "Benevolentia, electio; complexus hominem cum homine copulans."

¹ Agreement—a sharing in all things existing; a concordance in thoughts and conceptions.¹

² Lovingness—a perfect exhibition.²

*Statesmanship*³—the knowledge of what is honourable and advantageous (for a state);⁴ a knowledge productive of justice in a state.

*Sociality*⁵—a friendship arising from an association amongst persons of the same age.⁶

⁷ Good counsel—the cognate virtue of reasoning.⁷

Belief—the correct conception⁸ of a thing being really as it seems to be;⁹ a firmness in moral conduct.⁹

²— Of the words between the numerals I am quite content to express my perfect ignorance. Ficinus has "Charitas integra animi declaratio," as if he had found ψυχῆς in his MS.

³ So I have translated Πολιτικὴς in the dialogue of that name.

⁴ The words between the lunes have been added for the sense.

⁵ By ἑταιρεία was meant "a political club," as it would be called in England, not merely domestic sociality.

⁶ In lieu of γενημένους, which seems superfluous after καθ' ἡλικίαν, one would have expected συννημένους, "united." Ficinus has "ex diuturna æqualium consuetudine conflata."

⁷— With this unintelligible definition of Good Counsel, may be contrasted the very intelligible one given by the Stoics, as found in Diogenes Laertius, vii. 93, τὴν δὲ εὐβουλίαν, ἐπιστήμην τοῦ σκοπεῖσθαι ποῖα καὶ πῶς πράττοντες πράττομεν συμφερόντως, i. e. "good counsel is the science of considering by doing what, and in what manner, we can act advantageously." Stephens' version is "Consilii præstantia est virtus rationi insita," as if he wished to read Εὐβουλίας ἀρετὴ ἀρετὴ λογισμῷ ἐμφυτος. Ficinus, however, translates Εὐβουλία by "Sagacitas," evidently for the sense. Corradus, "Consilium bonum, vis cogitationis insita:" as if he wished to read ἐμφυτος in lieu of συμφυτος.

⁸— Bekker's text is τοῦ οὕτως ἔχειν ὡς αὐτῷ φαίνεται, which I cannot understand. Opportunely then does one MS. offer αὐτῷ: for the author probably wrote, as I have translated, τοῦ ὅντως ἔχειν τι, ὡς αὐτῷ φαίνεται. Stephens' version is "Fides—persuasio, quæ res ita se habet, velut ipsi videtur," which, to myself, is quite as unintelligible as the Greek. Ficinus, "Fides, recta presumptio quod res sic se habet, ut sibi videtur." Corradus, "Fides, opinio recta rem ita, ut ipsi videtur, habere: certa veri comprehensio."

⁹— The author has evidently confounded πίστις, "belief," with πιστότης, "fidelity."

A wishing—a desire with right reason; a reasonable longing; a longing with reason, according to nature.

Counselling—an exhortation to another person, previous to acting, as to what manner it is meet to act.

Fit opportunity—the meeting with the time in which it is requisite to suffer or do something.

Caution—a guard against ill; the care of guarding (oneself).

Order—the working out a similarity in² all things existing with a relation to each other; a symmetry of communion; the cause of all things existing with a relation to each other; ³a symmetry towards learning.³

Application—a bracing up of the soul for learning.

Natural ability—a quickness in learning; a good production of nature; an excellence from nature.

Docility—a natural ability in the soul towards a quickness in learning.

Judgment—a peremptory decision⁴ respecting a disputed matter.

Law—⁵the (process of a) contest⁵ respecting the having done, an injury or not.

¹—¹ Here again is another definition, which not even the author of it could have understood. For to say that Truth is a knowledge of things true is to say nothing, without previously defining what true things are. Moreover Truth could never be called a ἕξις, "a habit or state of the mind." For it is the result of a discovery made by science from assertion and denial respecting what has been well said, in Greek, Ἀλήθεια εὑρεσις ἐν καταφάσει καὶ ἀποφάσει δι' ἐπιστήμην τῶν εὖ λεγθέντων—which might have been corrupted into Ἀλήθεια ἕξις ἐν καταφάσει καὶ ἀποφάσει ἐπιστήμη ἀληθῶν—but that it was so corrupted, is more than I dare assert. Ficinus, however, renders Ἀλήθεια by "Veracitas," i. e. Truthfulness; which will get rid of a part of the difficulty, but not of all.

² I have adopted ἐργασία ὁμοιότητος, found in one MS., in lieu of ἐργασίας ὁμοιότης. Ficinus too has "concentus operationum." But Corradus—"actionis—similitudo."

³—³ I must leave for others to explain the meaning of the words with in the numerals as a definition of Order. Ficinus—"contemperatio ad percipiendum idonea."

⁴ I have translated as if the Greek were κατάφασις, "assertion," not ἀπόφασις, "denial." Stephens—"sententia rata"—what the sense requires; but such is not the meaning of ἀπόφασις. So too Ficinus—"rata pronuntiatio." Corradus—"Judicium, eventus rei, de qua ambigebatur, ratus."

⁵—⁵ So I have translated ἀμφισβήτησις, for the sake of the sense.

Good legal conduct—an obedience shown to proper laws.

Cheerfulness—a delight¹ at the acts of a temperate person.

Honour—a gift of good things presented on actions done through virtue; a mark of esteem in return² for virtue; ³ the outward bearing of what is an object of reverence; ⁴ the watching of a mark of esteem.⁴

Alacrity—⁵ the exhibition of a practical preference.⁵

Favour—a voluntary act of kindness; the return for a good act; a ministering at a fit time.

Concord—a similarity of opinion between rulers and ruled, how they ought to rule and be ruled.

A polity—the community of a multitude of persons, self-sufficient for a happy state; the community of a multitude according to law.

Forethought—a preparation with respect to things about to be.

Counsel—a consideration respecting future things how they may be advantageous.

Victory—a power having the superiority, as regards contention.

⁶ A ready-way-finding—a ready discrimination,⁶ that possesses a power over what is thought upon.⁷

Ficinus, with a similar view, has—"Lex, norma ad quam quæritur"—Corradus—"Lex, de rebus justis vel injustis disceptatio."

¹ Here χαρά, like ἀμφοσβήτης, has a pregnant sense; for it is not merely "delight," but "the result of delight."

² I have translated, as if the Greek were ἀντ', not ἀπ', which I can hardly understand. Corradus has—"dignitas ex virtute comparata."

³ Such seems to be the meaning of σχῆμα συμνόητος, which will be best understood by turning to the Menæxenus, § 2.

⁴ I hardly understand the words τήρησις ἀξιώματος as applied to τιμή. Stephens' version is "observatio dignitatum;" that of Ficinus—"conservatio dignitatis;" that of Corradus—"autoritatis conservatio."

⁵ Stephens has, what the sense requires, "declaratio voluntatis ad agendum:" but that can scarcely be got from the Greek. Ficinus, still more widely—"patens expeditio propositi ad res agendas." Corradus—"voluntatis ad agendum propter se significatio."

⁶ Instead of defining Εὐπορία by Εὐρίπνευα, one would have expected to see Εὐρίπνευα defined by Εὐπορία; and so Corradus—"Perspicientia, facultas ejus, quod cogitatur, assequendi." Cousin's version is—"Le succès dans la discussion vient du coup d'œil sur qui domine une question:" and his note—"Peut-être voudrait-il mieux entendre par εὐρίπνευα l'art de faire des distinctions; car c'est avec des distinctions qu'on triomphe dans la discussion."

⁷ Here λογίζομένου is used, contrary to custom, in a passive sense.

Bribe—the exchange for a favour.

Opportunity—the point of time suited to what is advantageous; a time that works for some good.

Memory—a disposition of the soul preservative of the truth that is in it.¹

The keeping in mind—the having thought on the stretch.

Thinking—the commencement of knowledge.

Holiness—a religious dread of sins against the gods; ²an attention to the honour due naturally to a deity.³

A prophecy—a knowledge, that points out beforehand an action, without a demonstrative proof.

The prophetic art—a science, that speculates upon what is now and will be to a mortal being.

Wisdom—a science not-hypothetical;⁴ a knowledge of things as they happen to exist;⁵ a science that speculates upon the cause of things existing.

Philosophy—a longing after the knowledge of things as they happen to exist;⁶ a habit of speculating upon the truth as to how it is true; a careful study in combination with correct reasoning.

Knowledge—a comprehension by the soul, ⁶not to be changed or cast down by reasoning;⁶ ⁷[the power of compre-

Ficinus—"Facundia, perspicacia et facultas obtinendi quod propositum est."

¹ As ἀλήθεια, the Greek word for truth, would mean literally "non-forgetfulness," and as memory is "non-forgetfulness," perhaps ἀλήθεια ought to be taken here in its literal sense; although such a meaning is not, I believe, given to ἀλήθεια elsewhere. The more correct definition of Μνήμη is in Suidas—ἡ τῶν πάλαι ἠγνωσμένων κατοχή, i. e. "the retention of what have been known of old."

^{2,3} Since six MSS. read θεραπείας, and one τε μνημης, perhaps the author wrote τῆς θεοῦ τημίαια ἢ κατὰ φύσιν θεραπείας—i. e. the natural care of the attention due to a deity.

³ By "not-hypothetical" is meant that which is founded on facts. Stephens' version is, "nullius certi argumenti," which would be strangely applied to a definition of wisdom. Ficinus more correctly—"scientia, quæ nihil penitus præsupponit." Corradus too—"scientia non supposita."

^{4,5} I have translated, as if the Greek were not τῶν ὄντων ἀπλ, but τῶν διὰ ὄντων, as in the preceding definition. In both places Corradus has—"rerum divinarum."

^{6,7} So I have translated ἀμετάπτωτος, to preserve the idea of change conveyed by μετά—

⁷ The words between the brackets are properly omitted in the three best MSS., for they are merely an explanation of the preceding sentence. They are, however, acknowledged by Ficinus and Corradus.

hending a thing or things, not to be changed or thrown down by reasoning;]⁷ a true reasoning not to be changed or cast down upon¹ reflection.

Opinion—a conception² to be changed by the persuasion of reason;² a rational³ impetus; a notion falling upon falsehood and truth by (not-)reason.⁴

Sensation—an impetus of the soul; a movement of mind; a heralding of the soul through the body to⁵ the seasons of man;⁵ from which there results a power of the soul devoid of reason,⁶ having a cognizance through the body.⁶

Habit—a disposition of the soul, according to which we are said to be with certain qualities.

¹ So I have translated ἐν, although I have some doubts about the reading. Stephens' version is—"in mente," similar to "in cogitatione," in Ficinus and Corradus.

²⁻³ As in the case of ἀμετάπτωτος, so here in that of μεταπιστός, I have introduced the idea of a change to answer to μετα—

⁶— I confess my inability to understand the words between the brackets. For after γνωριστικῆς there is wanting something, to which that word may be referred. Hence as one MS. has δι' ἀνθρώπων, expressed by δι' αὐτῶν, in lieu of διὰ σώματος, perhaps the author wrote—γνωριστικῆς τῶν διὰ σώματος ἰόντων—"having a cognizance of what is passing through the body:" with which may be compared the expression in the Phædrus, p. 250, D., τῶν διὰ σώματος αἰσθήσεων: or else in ἀνθρώπων lies hid αἰσθητήριον. Compare Diogenes L. vii. 52, αἰσθήσεις λίγεται—ἡ περὶ τὰ αἰσθητήρια κατασκευή, καθ' ἣν τινες πηροὶ γίνονται: where one would have expected to find πόροι, Anglice "pores," as in Plutarch, quoted by Stephens in Thesaur. Gr., τῶν περὶ τὰ αἰσθητήρια πόρων. Corradus avoids the difficulty by translating γνωριστικῆς "cognitionis particeps."

² Speech—voice expressed by letters descriptive of each of things existing;² a form of language, compounded of nouns and verbs, without melody.³

Noun—a form of language uncompounded, the interpreter of that which is predicated 'against being, and of every thing which is not spoken of against itself.⁴

*Language*⁵—the voice of a man, expressed by letters, and some common symbol, acting as an interpreter, without melody.

Syllable—an articulation⁶ of the human voice, expressed by letters.

Definition—a sentence⁷ composed⁸ of difference and genus.⁹

²—Something similar is given as a definition in Diogenes L. vii. 56, Δίξις—φωνή ἰγγραμματος—λόγος δὲ φωνῆ σημαντικῆ.

³ Ficinus has "sine harmonia cantus," and so he renders shortly afterwards ἀνευ μίλου.

⁵ Although I have just above translated διάλεκτος "a form of language," for the sake of the sense, yet here I have rendered it merely by "language," for a similar reason.

⁷ I have followed Twining on Aristotle's Poetics, § 34, in translating λόγος "a sentence."

⁸ To avoid the ὑστερον πρότερον in διαφορὰς and γένους—for the genus should be mentioned before that which differs from it—Stephens has, after Ficinus, rendered, "ex genere et differentia." There is a better definition in Diogenes L. vii. 60.

Proof—the showing forth of a thing not evident.

Demonstration—true reasoning ¹founded on syllogisms; ¹a reasoning, that makes a matter plain by what is previously known.

Element (of voice) ²—³a vocal sound uncompounded; the cause to the rest of vocal sounds of their being vocal sounds. ³

Useful—the cause of doing well; the cause of good.

Advantageous—that which conduces to good.

Honourable—that which is good. ⁴

Good—the cause of safety to things existing; the cause of all that relates to itself; from which it happens to choose what is meet. ⁵

Temperate—the orderly conduct of the soul.

Just—an ordonnance of law, productive of justice.

Voluntary—that which is drawn on by itself; ⁶ that which is selected with reference to itself, ⁷(and) completed according to design. ⁷

² Since στοιχείον by itself frequently means “a letter,” the word φωνή has been added to show what kind of element is here intended by the word, which generally means an “element” in physical philosophy. Corradus too, “Elementum vocis, vox simplex.”

³ Here, again, I am quite ignorant of the meaning of the words between the numerals; where I have designedly translated φωνή by “a vocal sound,” not merely “a voice.”

⁴ Instead of καλὸν τὸ ἀγαθόν, Stephens would seem to have wished to read Καλοκράθον, τὸ ἀγαθόν, for his version is “Honestum et pulchrum est bonum.”

⁵ Here too I am at a loss; and so too, I think, was Stephens; whose version is, “Bonum est causa salutis his, quæ sunt causa cuiusvis, quod ad ipsum refertur; a quo contingit electio eorum, quæ conveniunt.” Ficinus more closely, but not more intelligibly, “Bonum, quod in omnibus, quæ sunt, salutis est causa; causa omnis, quod ad ipsum tendit id, a quo veniunt quæcunque sunt eligenda.” Corradus, “Bonum, causa ut ea, quæ sunt, serventur; causa rei omnis quæ spectat ad ipsum, a quo proficiuntur omnia, quæ sunt eligenda.”

⁶ As Bekker has edited αὐτοῦ from one MS. in lieu of αὐτὸ, he should have inserted from conjecture, δι' before αὐτοῦ, for the sake of the syntax and sense. Stephens' version is, “Voluntarium idem est quod blandum et illectans:” where προσαγωγόν is taken in an active sense; and so it is in the version of Ficinus, “Voluntarium quod se ipsum ducit;” and of Corradus, “quod se ipsum insinuat.”

⁷ I have translated as if the Greek were not κατὰ, but καὶ τὸ κατὰ, to which τὸ καὶ in five MSS. and τὸ κατὰ in two manifestly lead. Ficinus has “quod cogitationem perficit,” as if his MS. read τὸ διάνοιαν διατελοῦν.

Free—that which rules itself.

Moderate—a mean between excess and deficiency ; and sufficient according to art.¹

Moderation—a mean between excess and deficiency.

Prize—the reward of excellence, that is chosen for its own sake.

Immortality—²an existence endowed with soul³ and a remaining for ever.

A holy thing—service paid to a god, acceptable to a god.

Festival—a holy time according to law.

³*Man*—an animal, wingless, biped, with wide nails ;³ the only one of beings that is a recipient of knowledge founded on reason.

Sacrifice—the gift⁴ of a victim⁵ to a god.

Prayer—an asking for good things, or that seem so, ⁶by man from gods.⁶

King—a ruler according to laws ; ⁷not subject to the audit-

¹ I must leave for others to explain this reference to art in a definition of Moderation.

² Corradus—"natura, quæ οὐσία dicitur, animata." But as four MSS. offer ἐμψύχον in lieu of ἐμψυχόν, perhaps the true reading is Ἀθανασία, οὐσίας ἐμψύχον ἢ αἰδίου μόνῃ, "Immortality, the remaining for ever of an existence endowed with soul : " where ἡ has been corrupted into καὶ by a very common confusion.

⁵ To avoid the absurdity of saying that a sacrifice is the gift of a sacrifice—for such is the ordinary meaning of θύμα—I have translated θύμα by "victim." Some would, however, prefer perhaps to read θυσία, θνητοῦ δόμα ἀθανάτου in lieu of θυσία, θεῷ δόμα θύματος. Corradus has—"Sacrificium, donum ad rem sacram deo dicatum."

⁶ I have translated as if the Greek were not αἰτήσεις ἀνθρώπων—παρὰ θεοῖς, where both the datives are without regimen, but αἰτήσεις ἀπ' ἀνθρώπων—παρὰ θεῶν—where θεῶν is due to one MS.

⁷ A similar definition in Diogenes L. vii. 122.

ing of his accounts ;⁷ the chief magistrate in a political constitution.

Government—the care of the whole.

Law-giver—a maker of laws according to which it is meet for a polity to exist.

Law—a decree, relating to the state, made by the multitude, not limited to any time.

Hypothesis—a principle not demonstrated ; the summary of a discourse.

A vote—a decree of the state limited to a certain time.

Statesman—a person skilled in the constitution of a state.

A state—the residence of a multitude of persons making use of decrees in common ; a multitude of persons existing under the same law.

The excellence of a state—a constitution of a correct polity.

The science of war—skill in war.

Alliance—a communion in war.

Safety—a protection from injury.²

Tyrant—a person ruling a state according to his own notion.

⁴ Sophist—a mercenary hunter after the young, rich, (and) in high repute.³

Wealth—a possession suited for happiness ; an abundance of means tending to happiness.

Deposit—a thing given⁴ with faith.⁵

Purgation—a separation of the worse from the better.

¹ This definition I confess I cannot understand. Ficinus has—“Licentia, legis concessio,” a meaning that ἐπιτροπή would hardly bear. Corradus—“Potestas, legis procuratio.” Perhaps the correct reading is ἀποτροπή, “a turning aside from law.”

² Such seems to be the meaning intended by περιποίησις ἀβλαβής : where, however, one would prefer ἀβλαβείας ; and so perhaps Ficinus found in his MS. ; for his version is—“Salus, munitio ab omni damno secura.” Corradus—“Salus, securi status comparatio.”

³ This very definition of a Sophist is found in Sophist, § 17, p. 223, B., and § 36, p. 231, D. From the first passage I have introduced καὶ before ἐνδόξων. So too Ficinus—“nobilium atque divitum ;” and Corradus—“et gloriosos.”

⁴ Here again we meet with δόμα, where Attic Greek would require δόσις.

⁵ The expression—“a gift with faith,” is strangely applied as the definition of a deposit. One would have expected διὰ πίστewος—“through faith,” in the honesty of the party receiving the deposit.

To conquer—to possess the power, when having a difference.¹

A good man—such a one as is able to effect good for a person.

A temperate man—one who has moderate desires.

A continent man—one who has a power over the portions of the soul contending against right reason.

A steady² man—one who is perfectly good; one who preserves his virtue.

³ Conscience—a reflection with pain without reason.³

Indocility—a slowness in learning.

Lordship⁴—a just government, not subject to the auditing of accounts.

Dislike of wisdom—a habit, according to which he, who has it, dislikes reasoning.⁵

⁶ Fear—a consternation of the soul on the expectation of ill.⁶

Passion—a violent impetus without reason; ⁷ mind of regulation of soul without reason.⁷

⁸ Consternation—a fear on the expectation of ill.⁸

² Here, as before, I have translated σπουδαῖος by "steady."

³ Stephens, not perceiving that Σύννοια means here "Conscience," thus renders incorrectly the whole definition—"Meditatio est cogitatio cum dolore, absque ratione." Ficinus has—"Conscientia, cogitatio tristis absque ratiocinatione." But the sense evidently requires—"not without reason"—in Greek οὐκ ἄνευ λόγου, or else "without speaking;" for Conscience has a still voice; so Corradus—"Conscientia, tacita cum mœrore cogitatio."

⁴ This seems the exact rendering of δεσποτία, not "despotism."

⁵ Here again Stephens has missed the meaning of μισολόγος, as shown by his version—"eruditionis et doctrinæ osor est." Ficinus correctly—"rationes odit." Corradus, too, "rationem odit."

⁶ A similar definition in Aristotle's Rhetor. § 5, 1.

⁷ Such is the unintelligible English of the unintelligible Greek—νοῦς τῶν πάθους ψυχῆς ἀλογιστοῦ. Stephens's version is—"Animi concitatio est impetus violentus animæ irrationalis, absque ratione et ordine mentis," as if he wished to read the whole definition thus—θυμὸς, ὁρμὴ βίαιος ψυχῆς ἀλογιστοῦ ἄνευ λογισμοῦ νοῦ τε τῶν πάθους: at least Ficinus found this in this MS., as is evident from his version—"Animositas, impetus violentus irrationalis animæ absque ratione et ordine mentis." Corradus has—"Iracundia, appetitio sine cogitatione vehemens et violenta: significatio ordinis in animo perturbati."

⁸ By comparing the definitions of Fear and Consternation it would seem the two words were synonymous. The Stoics, however, made a distinction, as we learn from Diogenes L. vii. 112, by whom φόβος was Flattery—a conversation to gratify¹ without the best;¹ a habit of conversing to gratify, exceeding moderation.

² Anger—an exhortation by passion to revenge.²

Insult—an injury leading to dishonour.

Intemperance—a habit forcing a person, contrary to right reason, towards what seem to be pleasant.

³ Hesitation—a flight from the commencement of labours.³

Cowardice—that which lays hold of (and detains)⁴ a rushing on; ⁵ the cause of a (mental) contraction.⁵

(A beginning)⁶—the first cause of existence.

⁷ Calumny—the setting friends apart by a word.⁷

Opportunity—that in which it is fitting to do and suffer each thing.

Injustice—a habit disregarding of laws.

Want—a diminution of good things.

defined προσδοκία κακοῦ: but Ἐκπληξίς, φόβος ἐκ φαντασίας ἀσυνήθους πράγματος, i. e. "Consternation, a fear from the appearance of an unusual event."

¹—I am completely at a loss in the words between the numerals. I could have understood οὐκ ἐπὶ τῷ βελτίστῳ, the very phrase used by Theophrastus, where he defines τὴν ἀρίσκειαν, "obsequiousness," by saying that ἔστιν, ὡς ὄρω περιλαβεῖν, ἐντευξίς οὐκ ἐπὶ τῷ βελτίστῳ ἡδονῆς παρὰ σκευαστική. But "without the best" is not the same as "for not the best." Ficinus fills out the sense by his "absque ratione boni"—Corradus evades the difficulty by his "colloquium—fallax et improbum."

²—A similar definition in Aristotle's Rhetor. § 2.

³—A similar definition in Diogenes L. vii. 112, Ὀκνος, φόβος μελλούσης ἐνέργειας.

⁵—For this part of the definition we are indebted to a solitary MS. that offers αἰρία συστολῆς: where συστολή is used as in Diogenes L. vii. 111, λυπὴν εἶναι συστολὴν ἄλογον.

⁶ On the word ἀρχή, found, in none of the MSS. examined by Bekker, Stephens remarks that he has translated as if ἀρχή had dropt out. He got the idea from Ficinus, who has—"Timiditas, prima causa subcurrentis impetus," as if he had found in his MS., Δαλδία, ὁρμήν πρώτην τοῦ εἶναι αἰρία, without ἀντιληπτική. Corradus—"Ignavia, causa prima rei alicujus appetitionem faciendæ reprimens."

⁷ Corradus has rather strangely—"Disputatio, amicorum in sermone dissensio."

Vain-gloriousness—a habit of laying claim to a good or good things, not belonging to a person.

Sinning—acting contrary to right reason.

Envy—a pain at the good things of friends,² which either are or have been.

Shamelessness—a habit of the soul, that endures dishonour for the sake of gain.

Rashness—the excess of boldness in the case of dangers, which it ought not.³

A love of honour—a habit of the soul, lavish of every expense without consideration.

Natural depravity—a badness by nature, and a sinning in that, which is according to nature; ⁴a disease of that, which is according to nature.⁴

Hope—the expectation of a good.

Madness—a habit destructive of a correct perception.

Talkativeness—intemperance in speech, devoid of reason.

Contrariety—the greatest standing apart of things, that according to a certain difference fall under the same genus.

Involuntary—that which is brought to an end contrary to intention.

Instruction—a power that has the cure of the soul.

Instruction—the delivering of instruction.

Legislation—the science that renders a state ⁵firmly fixed (and without suffering).⁵

² Although φῶλον seems to be defended by Aristotle in Rhetor. ii. 10, yet one would have preferred ἄλλων, similar to the definition in Diogenes L. vii. 111, φθόνον, λυπήν ἐπ' ἄλλοτριούς αγαθοίς. Proclus, ii. p. 110, φθόνος ἰστίον ἢ ἐπὶ τοῖς ἄλλοτριούσι αγαθοῖς λυπή. Corradus seems to have wished to read ποτε γενησομένοις in lieu of ποτε γεγενημένοις. For his version is, "vel olim futura sint."

³—Such is the literal version of οὐς μὴ δεῖ, which I cannot understand; nor could Stephens, whose version is "ubi non est opus," as if he wished to read οὐ—Ficinus has "quæ metuenda sunt," which seems to lead to οὐς ᾗ δεῖμα.

⁴—Such is the version of νόσος τοῦ κατὰ φύσιν, which is equally unintelligible in Greek, and in English, and in the Latin of Ficinus and Stephens, "morbus ejus quod est secundum naturam," and of Corradus, "morbus in natura insitus."

⁵—In lieu of εὐπαγής three MSS. offer ἀπαθής, one ἀγαθοῦ, and one ἀγαθῆς. By selecting from all what seems to be the best suited to the Admonition—a speech that finds fault from design; a speech for the sake of turning aside from error.

Assistance—the hindering an ill either existing or in the way of existing.

Punishment—a curing of the soul for an error committed.

¹*Power*—a superiority in doing or speaking; a habit according to which that, which possesses it, is powerful; a strength according to nature.

To preserve—to protect from hurt.¹

²(Science—is a knowledge without stumbling.)³ sense, I have elicited, ἐπαιγὼς καὶ ἀπαθὼς, what I have translated. Ficinus has "tumultu vacuam," answering to ἐπαιγὼς.

¹— These two definitions are thus separated in the version of Ficinus, "Potestas, excellentia in agendis seu dicendis; habitus, quo potentes efficimur. Robur, vis unum quidque in natura servans eo, quod detrimenta devitat;" but united in that of Corradus, "Potentia, in actione vel in sermone præstantia; habitus, quem qui habet, potens est; vis hominem naturaliter servans vel tutum efficiens."

²—³ This last definition, omitted by Bekker, is found in one MS. alone.

INTRODUCTION

TO

THE TREATISE OF TIMÆUS.

OF this short treatise, relating to a Cosmogony according to the Pythagorean theory, the authorship used to be attributed to Timæus the Locrian, until Meiners adduced arguments to show that the work was the production of a more modern writer. The genuine writings of the Locrian philosopher had so completely disappeared before the time of Aristotle, that he seems to have known nothing about them, as may be inferred from what he says in Metaphysic. i. 6, p. 649, B.

In confirmation of this decision, which has been adopted by nearly all subsequent writers on the subject, De Gelder has been led to express his belief that the work was written by some philosopher, who lived in the second century of the Christian era, and amused himself with drawing up an abridgment of the Timæus of Plato, adopting what he conceived to be the Doric dialect, with the view of enabling him to palm it off as a genuine production of the Locrian philosopher. But though we know that similar deceptions have been practised at different times, yet even De Gelder himself confesses his inability to discover the motives that could lead the unknown author to commit the forgery. Hence we may fairly imagine that it was done at an earlier period, when the Ptolemies were collecting the works of older writers to adorn their library at Alexandria. And this deception the writer was enabled to carry on with the greater success, as he has been careful to introduce, doubtless from the work of a Pythagorean, some marked discrepancies, duly noticed by De Gelder in Præf. p. xi., from the Timæus of Plato, of whose treatise his own is in other respects little more than an abridgment.

At the present day the treatise is held in so little honour, that De Gelder offered an apology for publishing it at Leyden in 1836. But the time has been, when it was highly esteemed as the genuine production of that very philosopher, whose ideas Plato was thought to have developed in his Timæus; and it was accordingly translated into Latin by Georgius Valla, Simon Passiensis, called likewise Bevilaqua, and Nogarola, whose versions were printed respectively at Venice in 1488, 1498, and 1555, and subsequently by Cornarius, fol. Bas. 1561. Of versions of it in modern languages, a French one appeared at Berlin, 1763, by the Marquis d'Argens, and another at Paris in 1768, by the Abbé Batteux, the former accompanied with an elaborate Preface and Commentary, and the latter with some sensible notes and a few various readings from three Paris MSS. There is likewise a German translation by Schulthes, first published at Zurich in 1779, and again in 1842. It is said by Fabricius to have been translated into English by T. Stanley, in his "History of Philosophy;" but such is not the fact; and equally incorrect is the Bipont editor of Plato, by whom De Gelder has been misled, in attributing a Latin translation of the treatise to Ficinus.

THE TREATISE
OF TIMÆUS THE LOCRIAN

OR
THE SOUL OF THE WORLD AND NATURE.

[1.] TIMÆUS the Locrian asserted this—that of all the things in the Universe there are two causes, (one) ¹ Mind, (the cause) of things existing according to reason; (the other) Necessity,¹ (the cause) of things (existing) by (some) force, according to the powers of bodies; and that the former of these is of the nature of the good, and is called god, and the principle of things that are the best; but what come after this and are co-causes, are referred to Necessity; but that, as regards the things in the Universe, there are Form, Matter, and the Perceptible, which is, as it were, a production from the two (others); and that the former (namely, Form)² is unproduced, and unmoved, and stationary,³ and of the nature of the same, and perceptible by the mind, and a pattern of such things produced, as exist by a state of change; for that some such thing as this is Form spoken of and conceived to be; but Matter is a mould,¹ and a mother and a nurse, and procreative of the third kind of being; for receiving the resemblances upon itself, and as it were remoulding them, it perfects these productions. He asserted moreover that Matter is eternal, not however unmoved; and although it is of itself without form and shapeless, yet it receives every kind of form, and that what is around bodies, is divisible and partakes of the nature² of the different; (and that) persons call moreover Matter by the name of Place and Space. These two principles, then, are opposite to each other; [of which]³ Form has a relation to a male (power) and a father; but Matter to a female and a mother; and being three they are recognisable by three marks; Form by mind, according to knowledge; Matter by a spurious kind of reasoning, through its not being perceived mentally by a direct course, but by analogy; and their productions by sensation and opinion.

¹—¹ What the author here, and Plato in Tim. p. 48, A., and 68, E., consider as the two distinct powers of Mind and Necessity, are said by Euripides in Tro. 890, to be singly another name for Ζεύς.

² As there are three things mentioned, Valck. wished, to prevent all uncertainty, to read τὸ μὲν εἶδος in lieu of τὸ μὲν εἶμεν, referring to Tim. p. 51, A. Had he lived to know that five MSS. offer τὰν for τὸ, and eight add δὲ after εἶμεν, he would perhaps have suggested τὰν μὲν εἶμεν ἰδίαν.

[2.] Before, then, heaven existed, there were, through reason, Form and Matter, and the god, who is the worker-out⁴ of the better. But since what is older⁵ is superior to what is younger, and what is put in order before what is without order, the deity, being good, did, on seeing that Matter receives Form, and is altered in every way, but without order,⁶ feel the necessity⁶ of bringing it into order, and to establish a change from the undefined to the defined, in order that the differences between bodies might have a similar relation, and not receive various turns at hap-hazard. He made, therefore, this world out of the whole of Matter, laying it down as a limit to the nature of being, through its containing all the rest of things in itself, (and being) one, only-begotten, perfect, endued with

² Instead of φύσιος, Valck. would read οὐσίας. For the expression τὰς περισσότερὰς οὐσίας is found shortly afterwards, p. 96, A. § 3.

⁴ By δημιουργός is meant elsewhere the power that made something out of nothing; but here it is merely the worker-out.

⁵ By πρεσβύτερον De Gelder understands "the more intelligent," referring to Hesych., Πρεσβύτερος . . . φρονιμώτερος.

soul and with reason—for these (qualities) are superior to the soulless and the irrational—and of a sphere-like body; for this is more perfect than the rest of forms. Desirous, then, of making a very good production, he made it a deity, created, (and) never to be destroyed by any other cause than the god, who had put it into order, if indeed he should ever wish to dissolve it. But on the part of the good there is no rushing forward to the destruction of a very beautiful production. (The world) therefore, being such, continues without corruption and destruction and blessed. And it is the best of things created; since it has been produced by the best cause, that looks not to patterns made by hand, but to Form (in the abstract) and to Existence, perceived by the mind; to which the created thing, having been carefully adjusted, has become the most beautiful, and ¹to be not wrongly taken in hand.¹ And it is ever perfect according to the things perceived by sense; because the pattern perceived by mind² contains in itself³ all the living things perceived by mind, and has left nothing else out of itself, as being the limit of things perceived by mind, as this world is of those perceived by sense. And as being solid, and perceptible by touch and sight, it has a share of earth and fire, and of the things between them, air and water; and it is composed of bodies all perfect, which are in it as wholes, so that no part might ever be left out of it, in order that the body of the Universe might be altogether self-sufficient, uninjured by corruptions from without and within; ⁴for apart from these there is nothing else:⁴ for the things that are put together according to the best proportions, (and) with equal powers, neither rule over, nor are ruled by, each other in turn, so that some receive an increase, others a de-

² I have adopted νοητόν, found in the best MS. 1, in lieu of τῆνο: for τῆνο, in common Greek κείνο or ἐκείνο, could not thus follow τὸ παράδειγμα.

By comparing the expression ἐν αὐτῷ περιέχεν a little above, it is evident that we must read here ἐν αὐτῷ περιέχον instead of αὐτῷ περιέχον.

⁴—⁴ I have translated as if the reading were ἄλλο, not ἄλλὰ—crease, but they remain in a bond of union indissoluble according to a proportion the very best.

[3.] For when there are three terms whatever, and their intervals are fixed according to the same proportion as regards each other, we then perceive that, after the manner of an extended string,¹ the middle term is to the first, what the third is to it; and (taking) also² inversely and by alternation³—according to the fitting of their places and order; and it is impossible for every one to arrange numerically⁴ these, so as not to have an equality of force. (The world too) is in a good state, as regards its shape and movement; as regards the former, in being a sphere, so that it is similar to itself on all sides, and is able to contain all the rest of shapes of the same kind as itself;⁴ as regards the latter, in exhibiting for ever the change dependent on a circle. Now the sphere alone is able in a state of quietness and of motion to preserve a fitness in the same place, so as neither to leave it, nor to receive another place, through its being on every side equally distant from the centre; and, being very smooth to exactness, as regards its external appearance, it has no need of mortal organs, which are fitted to, and carried through, the rest of animals for the sake of their wants. But the soul of the world has (the deity)⁵ united with the centre and led it outwards, investing the world wholly with it, and making it a mixture of Form undivided, and of Substance divided, so as to become one mixture from those two; for which (world) he mixed up two forces, the origin of motion, one connected with the

² I have followed the reading suggested by De Gelder, ἀνάπαλιν καὶ ἑναλλάξ, and confirmed by κατ' ἑναλλαγὴν—καὶ ἀνάπαλιν in p. 99, B.

³ In lieu of ἀριθμῶμεναι, the best MS. has ἀριθμῶμενα: which evidently leads to ἀριθμῶν θεμίνα, as I have translated. De Gelder takes ἀριθμῶμεναι in the sense of εἰς φιλίαν ἰλθεῖν, as explained by Hesychius, while referring to Hom. Il. B. 124. But there the sense is "to number;" while, as Soping remarked, the words εἰς φιλίαν ἰλθεῖν are the explanation of ἀριθμῶμεναι.

⁵ I have translated, as if ὁ θεός had dropt out after μεσότην— same, the other with the different; which (soul), 'being mixed with difficulty, was mixed not in the easiest way.'¹ Now all these proportions are combined harmonically according to numbers; which proportions he has divided according to a scale scientifically, so that a person is not ignorant of what things and by what means the soul is combined; which the deity has not ranked after the substance of the body,—²for, as we say, that which is before is in greater honour as regards both power and time,²—but he made it older by taking the first of unities, which is 384.³ Now of these, the

² So I have translated, by placing γάρ, which is found at present after πρότερον, where it is however omitted by the best MS. I, between ὥσπερ and λέγομεν: for the author alludes to what he had said in p. 94, B. § 2, τὸ πρεσβύτερον κάρρον ἐστὶ τῷ νεώτερω. Vainly, then, does De Gelder produce this passage in proof of an imitation of Plato's language in Tim. p. 34, B. § 12, τὴν δὲ δὴ ψυχὴν οὐχ, ὡς νῦν, ὁσπίαν ἐπιχειροῦμεν λέγειν: for there the author probably wrote—οὐχ, ὡς οἱ νῦν—i. e. "like persons of the present day,"—and shortly afterwards—ἀλλὰ παῖς ἄνους ὥς—ταύτῃ πῃ καὶ λέγομεν—i. e. "but we too perhaps speak in this way, like a senseless child,"—in lieu of ἀλλὰ πῶς ἡμεῖς—καὶ λέγομεν. For πῶς could not thus follow ἀλλὰ—while the allusion to the child will be best understood by remembering that an Egyptian priest is feigned in Tim. p. 22, B., to have said even to Solon, one of the wise men of Greece, "Ἕλληνες αἰεὶ παῖδες ἐστέ.

³ Why this number should have been fixed upon as the first term, may perhaps be guessed at, from knowing, what is stated by Plutarch, De Anim. Procreat. p. 1020, C., that Plato's first term was 192, the half of 384, which last was adopted by Eudorus, a disciple of Crantor; and hence too we can obtain perhaps a clue, if not to the author of this treatise, at least to the time, when it was probably compiled. With regard to Plato's first term of 192, Plutarch must have learnt the fact from some other source than the Timæus itself, where there is not the most distant allusion to it; unless it be said that in his copy of that treatise there was found the identical number 192, in Greek letters ρ ζ β, written after μῆαν ἀφ᾽ αὐτῆς τὸ πρῶτον ἀπὸ παντὸς μοῖραν in p. 35, B. Be this, however, as it may—for Macrobius, in Somn. Scipion. ii. 2, has translated the passage as it is found at present, without any allusion to a specific number, while Stalbaum, after Boeckh, makes the first term of the series 384, without alluding even to Plutarch—we may perhaps arrive at the reason for the selection of this term, by bearing in mind that 192 is the product of first being assumed, it is easy to reckon the double and triple; and all the terms, together with their complements and eighths, 16 into 12; where 12 would represent the twelve signs of the Zodiac, or the twelve months of the year, made up of 4 quarters, each consisting of 3 months; while 16 would represent the square of 4; which last number was, as I learn from the erudite treatise of Meursius, "De Denario Pythagorico," who, collecting, as usual, all that can be found in ancient authors on this subject, refers to Hierocles on "The Golden Verses," connected with the four elements of matter, and the four seasons of the year; and probably, I may add, with the four first digits, whose sum made up the Pythagorean Tetractys, or Tetras, according to Procopius Gazæus in Genesin—"Unitas, binarius, ternarius, et quaternarius, inter se additi, denarium constituunt." Nicomachus, however, in Harmonic., says that four represented harmony; and so too does Joannes Protopspath. on Hesiod, ἡ τετραὰς λίγυρας Ἀρμονίᾳ ἔχει γὰρ τὸν τετρίπυρον; where, from the mention of the musical term τὸν τετρίπυρον, there is an evident allusion to the story about the hammers, which will be discussed more at length in the Supplementary Note, or because it is the common difference between the odd numbers, 3, 7, 11, 15, taken in an arithmetical progression, whose sum makes 36, one $\frac{1}{12}$ of the 360 degrees into which the supposed orbit of the sun was divided, when the months were 10, not, as subsequently, 12. But why the square of 4 was taken instead of 4 itself, may perhaps be explained by supposing that, as the square would be the emblem of the surface of matter at rest, and the circle that of the surface of matter in motion, without which musical sounds cannot exist, the square may be considered as surrounding the circle of musical sounds, and the difference between the semidiagonal of the circumscribing square and the semidiameter of the circumscribed circle, may be taken as the first term of an harmonical scale. For other explanations of the reason, which led to the selection of 384, as the first term of the harmonical series, the reader is referred to Boeckh's "Philolaus," and to Schneider's "Dissertatio de Numero Platónico," quoted by Lindan on Tim. p. 45, who conceives with Plutarch that 384 was selected, as being the lowest number on which it was possible to operate for the eighths continually without the introduction of fractions; while, to understand the whole passage thoroughly, De Gelder says we must adopt, as already remarked by Batteux, λήμματα, found in a Par. MS., in lieu of συμπληρώματα; and that we must add likewise καὶ ταῖς ἀποτομαῖς after καὶ τοῖς ἐκγονδοῦς; for otherwise there would be two terms, namely, 2187 and 6561, wanting to complete the series of 36 terms. The proper word, however, was λείμμα, by which was meant the lesser of two unequal sections, into which a number was divided; as in the case of 7; which, divided into two unequal sections, gives 3 and 4, of which 3 would be called λείμμα. So too, if between any two notes, taken as extremes, two semitones are introduced, not having the same ratio to their contiguous notes, but represented, for example, respectively by $\frac{1}{2}$ and $\frac{1}{3}$, the semitone represented by the greater number ($\frac{1}{2}$) was called ἀποτομή, that by the less ($\frac{1}{3}$) διέσις.

To return, however, to the question about the τετραπύρες, I have said that it meant the number 10; which, as it is made up of the four odd numbers, taken in pairs, 1, 9; 3, 7; and of the four even numbers, taken must amount to 114695; 'and the divisions likewise are 114695.¹

similarly, 2, 8; 4, 6, the former of which were the symbols of male powers, and the latter of female, contained in itself all the four powers of each sex to be found in the four quarters of the Universe. Plutarch, however, De Isid. et Osirid. ii. p. 381, F., and again, De Anim. Procreat. ii. p. 1027, E., says that the Tetractys was 36, as being the sum of the four first odd and the four first even numbers. But what could lead Pythagoras to select those numbers, or how, when selected, they would be called τετρακτὺς, Plutarch has not told us, nor probably could he have told. Much more reasonable then is the statement of Athenagoras in Apolog., that the Tetractys meant 10; for he had perhaps found in some older writer that it was compounded of τετράς (4) and ἑκτάς (6), whose sum is 10, and not merely the sum of the first four digits, as stated by Sext. Empiric. iv. p. 332. Hence, since the names for 10 were Κόσμος, Order, Οὐρανός, Heaven, Εἰμαρμίνη, Destiny, Αἰών, Eternity, Πίστις, Confident Belief, Κράτος, Power, Ἀνάγκη, Necessity, and Ἄγλας, the Supporter of Heaven and Earth, as enumerated by one writer, quoted by Meursius De Denario Pythagorico, ch. 12, and by another Θεός, God, and Σφαῖρα, a Sphere, we can easily understand the oath of Pythagoras—

Ναὶ μὰ τὸν ἡμίτερον ψυχῇ παραδόντα τετρακτὺν
Παγὰν, ἀνάου φεῦρος ῥιζώματ' ἔχουσαν—

By my Tetractys, which has given to Soul
The fount, that feeds of ever-flowing Nature
The roots—

And hence too we can understand that, when Sextus Empiricus says, Advers. Mathemat. iv. p. 333, ὥστε εἰκότως τὸν τίσσαρα ἀριθμὸν παρὰ τοῖς Πυθαγορικοῖς εἰρησθαι πηγὴν ἀνάου φύσεος ῥιζώματ' ἔχουσαν, he is drawing an inference, as regards a reason, not stating a simple matter of fact. So too Hierocles in Aur. Carmin., where he identifies the τετρακτὺς with τετράς in the words—τὰ ὄντα πάντα ἡ τετράς ἀνείδησαντο στοιχείων—οὐκ ἔστιν εἰπεῖν ὃ μὴ τῆς τετρακτύος, ὡς ῥιζὸς καὶ ἀρχῆς ἡρηται: ἔστι γάρ, ὡς ἔφαμεν, δημιουργὸς τῶν πάντων καὶ αἰρία ἡ τετράς—they indulged merely in a conjecture as to the real meaning of τετρακτὺς, and in the closing words has improperly attributed to the number (4), what really belonged to the number (10); and so too has Macrobius in Somn. Scipion. i. 6. Stalbaum, however, on Tim. p. 35, B., says that "Tetractys est quatuor membrorum geometricorum complexio;" by which he means, I presume, the combination of the four terms of a geometrical progression. But as he thus loses sight of the letters -κτς, we may dismiss his interpretation without further notice; unless it be said that as ῥιακτὸς is derived from ῥιζάω, so τετρακτὸς might come from τετραζέω, while the verbal termination -κς is similarly found in φρασ-κς from φράζω.

¹—To meet the objection raised by D'Argens against the repetition of this clause, De Gelder says that the series of numerals, explanatory of the harmonical progressions alluded to, has been omitted by some MSS., although it was duly found in the one used by Aldus, and in that possessed by Proclus, as shown by his Commentary on the Timæus, iii. p. 197.

[4.] God the eternal, the chief ruler of the universe, and its creator, the mind alone beholds; but that which is produced we behold by the sight, both this world and its parts, how many soever they are in heaven; which, as being ethereal, must be divided into kinds; so that¹ some may be of the nature relating to the same, and some to the different. Of which the former lead from without all that are within them, along the general movement from the rising (east) to the setting (west). But the latter, relating to (the nature of) the different (lead) from within² the portions, that are carried along from west to east, and are self-moved, and they are whirled round and along, according as it may happen, by the movement of the same, which possesses in the world a superior power. Now the movement of the different, being divided according to an harmonical proportion, assumes the order of seven circles. The Moon, then, as being the nearest to the Earth, exhibits its monthly revolution; but the Sun after her completes his orbit in the period of a year. But there are two³ that run an equal course³ with the Sun; namely, (the stars) of Mercury and⁴ Juno, which the many call (the star of) Venus⁴ and Lucifer. For shepherds and the masses of

But this does not get rid of the objection, touching the word διαίσεις, "divisions." For though the sum of the series is 114695, the divisions or terms of the series are only 36, as will be seen by the Supplementary Note, taken for the most part from the annotations of Batteux.

¹ I have translated as if the Greek were ὅσα τὰ—not ὅς τὰ—

² To preserve the balance of the sentences, the author probably wrote ἐντόςθεν τὰ ἀπὸ ἐκείρας, to answer to ἐξωθεν—τὰ ἀπ' ἀνατολῆς—not ἐντός ἀπὸ ἐκείρας τὰ—

³ De Gelder says that Mercury and Venus are called ισόδρομοι, because the former was supposed to be distant from the Sun by only one sign of the Zodiac, equal to 30°, and the latter by not more than two; and he refers to Cicero N. D. ii. 20, "Mercurius—a Sole longius nunquam unius signi intervallo discedit—stella Veneris—nunquam a Sole duorum signorum intervallo longius discedit." But he should have referred to Pliny, H. N. ii. 8, who says that Venus performs her annual revolution in 348 days; and as the Earth, or, on the supposition that the Earth is at rest, the Sun completes its revolution in 365 days, Venus and the Sun might be said to be ισόδρομοι. It must, however, be confessed that a similar solution is not applicable to Mercury. Cicero, in Somn. Scipion, is content to translate ισόδρομοι by "comites."

mankind are not wise in sacred astronomy, nor skilled in the risings that take place in the west and east. For the same (star) becomes at one time (visible) in the west, when it follows the Sun so far, as not to be hidden by its light; and at another time in the east, when it leads on the Sun and rises before it, and is the herald of day. Hence the star of Venus becomes, through its running together with the Sun, frequently Lucifer, ¹ but not always; since ¹ there are many (that become so), both of those that are planets and are not; since every star of any magnitude that is seen above the horizon, before the Sun rises, heralds the day. But the three other stars, Mars, Jupiter, and Saturn, have their peculiar velocities, and ² unequal years; and they complete their course while making their periods of effulgence, ³ and of being visible, and of obscuration and eclipse, and giving birth to accurate risings and settings. Moreover, they complete their appearances conspicuously in the east or west according to their position as regards the Sun; who during the day exhibits its course from rising (in the east) to setting (in the west); but during the night it makes a movement in another direction from west to east, while it is carried on by the motion of the same; whereas, during the year (it is carried) according to its own inherent motion. From these two kinds of motion it rolls out a spiral, creeping, according to one portion, in the time of a day, but, whirled round under the sphere of the fixed stars, according to each revolution of darkness and day. Now these revolutions men call the portions of time, ὃν Ἀφροδίτης, οἱ δὲ Ἡρας προσαγορεύουσιν, translated by Apuleius de Mund., "Quintus Phosphorus, Junonia, immo Veneris, stella censetur;" and to Augustine De Civitat. Dei vii. 15, "Luciferum quidam Veneris, quidam dicunt esse Junonis." Hence De Gelder proposes to read Ἐρμᾶ τε καὶ Ἀφροδίτας, τὸν Ἡρας—καλίουτι.

¹— So we must translate, or else adopt the conjecture of Stephens—ὅτε εἰς δὲ, of which De Gelder approves, in lieu of οὐκ εἰς δὲ—

² Instead of καὶ ἑναυτῶς—VI. would read κατ' ἑναυτῶς—

which the deity has arranged together with the world. For the stars did not exist before in the world; and hence there was neither a year, nor periods of seasons, by which this generated time is measured, and which is the representation of the time not generated, which we call eternity. For as this heaven has been produced according to an eternal pattern, (namely,) the idea-like world, so,¹ according to a pattern, (namely,) eternity, has this time been made together with the world.

[5.] The Earth, fixed at the centre, becomes the hearth² of the gods, and the boundary³ of darkness and day,⁴ producing both settings and risings, according to the cuttings off (made by) the things that form the boundary,⁵ as we circumscribe by a cutting off the things of earth, sufficient for sight.⁵ And it is the oldest of bodies within (the circle of) heaven. And neither has Water at any time been produced without Earth, nor Air without moisture; nor could Fire continue without moisture and the materials which it burns; so that (the Earth) is fixed, as the root and base of all other substances,

² De Gelder refers to Ovid, Fast. vi. 299, "Stat vi terra sua; vi stando Vesta vocatur."

³ In lieu of ἄρος VI. would read ἄρος, i. e. ὁ οὐρανός— referring to Tim. p. 40, C., γῆ—φύλακα—νεκρός τῆ καὶ ἡμῶν and to Hesych. Οὐρανός—φύλαξ.

¹upon its own balance.¹ The principles of things produced are Matter, as the substratum, and Form (in the abstract), as the reason of (each) shape; and the result from these (two) are Earth and Water, and Air and Fire; the creation of which is of this kind. ²(Now) every body is composed of surfaces;² and this is (composed) of triangles; of which one is rectangular, the half of a square, with two equal sides; the other, whose sides are all unequal, ³having the greater angle thrice the size of the lesser; while the least angle in it is the third of a right angle, and the middle one is the double of the least; for it is two parts out of three; but the greatest is a right angle, being one and a half greater than the middle one and the triple of the least.³ Now this triangle (with all its sides unequal) is the half of an equilateral triangle, cut into two equal parts by a line let down from the apex to the base. Now in each of these triangles there is a right angle; but in one the two sides about the right angle are equal; in the other all the sides are unequal. Now let this be called a scalene (triangle); but the other, the half of a square, (be considered) the principle of the constitution of the Earth. For the square (produced) from this (scalene triangle) is composed of four half-squares; and from such a square is produced the cube, a body the most stationary and steady in every way, having six sides and eight angles; and on this account the Earth is a body the heaviest and most difficult to be moved, and its substance not to be changed into any thing else,⁴ through its not having a communion with a triangle of another kind. For the Earth alone has the half-square, as its peculiar element; and this is the element of the (three)⁵ other substances, Fire, Air, and Water. For on the half-triangle being put together six times, there is generated

² Aristotle, De Cælo, iii. 1, p. 369, B., quoted by De Gelder, denies that bodies can be formed of plane surfaces merely; an observation that does not apply to Tim. p. 53, C., τὸ δὲ τοῦ σώματος εἶδος πᾶν βάθος ἐχέει.

³ The words between the numerals Batteux would reject as an interpolation; but they are defended by De Gelder.

⁴ I have adopted ἄλλο, furnished by three MSS., in lieu of άλλα.

⁵ Batteux, "trois autres elemens—" as if he wished to read τῶν τριῶν ἄλλων σωμάτων—in lieu of τῶν ἄλλων— from it an equilateral (solid) triangle; of which is formed the pyramid, having four faces, and their angles¹ equal, the form of Fire, which is the most easy to be moved, and made up of the finest particles. After this is the octohedron, with eight faces and six angles, the element of Air; and the third is the eikosihedron, with twenty faces and twelve angles, the element of Water, made up of particles the most numerous and heaviest. These then, as being composed of the same element, are changed into each other. But (the deity) has made the dodecahedron, the image of the Universe, as being the nearest to the Sphere. Fire then, by the fineness of its particles, passes through all things; and Air through the rest of things, with the exception of Fire; and Water through Earth. All things are therefore full, and leave no vacuum.² But they are brought together by the revolving movement of the Universe, and are pressed against, and rubbed by, each other in turn, and produce the never-failing change from production to destruction.

[6.] By making use of these the deity put together this world, sensible to touch through (the particles of) Earth, and to sight through (those of) Fire; which two are the extremes; but through (the particles of) Air and Water he has bound (the world) together by the strongest chain, namely, proportion; which is able to hold together both itself, and the things kept in subjection through it. Now if the thing bound together is a plane surface, one middle (term) is sufficient; but if a solid, there will be need of two. With two middle terms then he combined two extremes, so that as Fire is to Air, Air might be to Water, and Water to Earth; and by alternation, as Fire is to Water, Air (might be) to Earth; and by inversion, as Earth is to Water, Water (might be) to Air, and Air to Fire; and by alternation, as Earth is to Air, so Water (might be) to Fire. Now since all are equal in power, their ratios are in a state of equality. This world then is one, through the bond of the deity, made according to proportion. Now each of these four substances possesses many forms; Fire, those of Flame, and Burning, and Luminousness, through the inequality of the triangles in each of them. In the same manner, Air is partly clear and dry, and partly turbid¹ and foggy; and Water partly flowing and partly congealed, according as it is Snow, Hoar-frost, Hail, Ice: and that, which is Moist, is, in one respect, flowing, as honey, oil; but in another, is compact, as pitch, wax; and of the forms of what is compact there is a portion fusible, as gold, silver, copper, tin, lead, and purified iron;² and a portion friable, as sulphur, pitch, nitre, salt, alum, (and)³ stones of a similar kind.

¹ Since two MSS. read τὰς τοῦτων γωνίας in lieu of τὰς ἰσὰς γωνίας, the author probably wrote τὰς τοῦτων γωνίας ἰσὰς— for ἰσὰς might easily have dropped out after γωνίας—

[7.] After putting together the world, (the deity) planned the creation of living beings, subject to death, in order that, being perfect himself, he might work it out perfectly according to his image. He mixed up therefore the soul of man out of the same proportions and powers; and, after taking the particles and distributing them, he delivered them over to Nature the alterative. And she, succeeding him in working out living beings both mortal and ephemeral, the soul of whom she 'brought in flowingly,'⁴ some from the Moon, others from the Sun, and some too from the other bodies, that wander in the portion of the different, with the exception of one power belonging to the same, which she mixed up in the rational

² Such is the meaning commonly assigned to σταγών, according to Hesych., Σταγών ἢ τοῖς μεταλλικοῖς τὸ καθαρὸν σιδήριον. But De Gelder says that by σταγών must be meant some metal in a natural state, not one purified artificially. He considers it therefore the same as what Aristotle, De Admirand. Narrat. p. 877, B., calls κασσίτερος Κελτικὸς, which the philosopher says is reported to melt quicker than lead. But as the metal, called by itself κασσίτερος in ancient times, is supposed to be the tin of Cornwall, in Aristotle's language κασσίτερος Κελτικὸς, there would be two words here descriptive of the same metal; unless indeed De Gelder intended, of which he says nothing, to reject κασσίτερος as the explanation of σταγών. I would rather understand by that word "quick-silver," which generally assumes the form of globular drops.

³ I have translated as if the Greek were λίθοι τε—not λίθοι τοι—

portion (of the soul), as the image of wisdom in those of a happy fate. ¹ Now of the soul of man a portion is rational and intellectual, and a portion irrational and unintellectual; but of the logical the better portion is from the nature of the same, but the worse is from that of the different; and each is seated around the head, so that the other portions of the soul and body may minister to it, as being the uppermost of the whole tabernacle.² But of the irrational portion, that which represents passion is around the heart, and that (which represents) desire is around the liver. But the principle of the body and the root of the marrow is the brain, in which is the leadership; and from this, like an effusion,³ flows through the back-bone⁴ what remains, from which are separated the particles for seed and reason:⁵ but of the marrow⁶ the surrounding defences are the bones; of which the flesh is the covering and concealment. And to the nerves he united joints by ligatures, suited for their movement. And of the internal (members there are) some for the sake of nourishment, and some for safety; and of the movements, some of those from without are conveyed to the intelligent place of perception; but others, not falling under the power of apprehension,⁷ are unperceived, either through the bodies affected being too earth-like, or through the movements being too feeble; and

² On the word σκήνω, as applied to the body, the tabernacle of the soul, see Axioch. p. 366, A. § 5.

³ Batteux, with the approbation of De Gelder, renders ἀπόχυμα, "une espèce de liqueur dense."

⁴ Instead of νῆστιον, four MSS. νῆστιον: which confirms νῆστιον, suggested by VI., who refers to νῆστιον μυελόν in Tim. p. 74, A.

⁶ As the marrow is always spoken of in the Timæus in the singular number, Valckenaer on Phœniss. 1085, corrected μυελῶν here into μυελῶ.

⁷ Such seems to be the meaning of ἀντίλαψιν: for which however De Gelder would read ἀνάλαψιν, forgetting that ἀντιλαπτικόν is used a little below as it is here.

as many, as cause nature to start from itself, are painful; but such as cause it to remain in itself, are called pleasures.

[8.] But amongst the senses the deity has lit up in us the sight for viewing objects in the¹ heavens, and for² the reception of knowledge; while as the recipient of speech and melody, he has implanted in us hearing,³ of which he who is deprived from his birth will become dumb, nor be³ able to give vent to any portion⁴ of speech; and hence persons say that this sense is related the nearest to speech. But as many of the affections of the body, as have a name, are so called with reference to the touch; and some too from their tendency to its seat. For the touch judges of the properties connected with life,⁵ (such as) warmth, coldness, dryness, moisture, smoothness, roughness, (and) of things, yielding, opposing, soft, hard. The touch too decides upon what is heavy and light. ⁶But reason defines them by their inclination to the middle (of the world) and from the middle.⁶ Now men mean the same thing by below and middle. For the centre of a sphere is the below; but that, which is above it to the circumference, is the up. Now what is warm appears to consist of fine particles, and such as cause bodies to separate; but what is cold (consists) of gross particles, and such as cause bodies to condense. The circumstances relating to taste are similar to those (relating) to touch. For by concretion and secretion, and further, by entering the pores and by (assuming) shapes, substances are either rough or smooth. For those that cause the tongue to

² Hence Milton, in allusion to his blindness, complains of "knowledge at one entrance quite shut out."

⁴ The sense evidently requires λόγον γὰρ τι, as I have translated, not λόγον ἔτι, where ἔτι is without any definite meaning.

⁶ In these words there is evidently an allusion to a centripetal and centrifugal force.

melt away or that scrape it, appear to be rough; but those that act moderately in scraping (appear) brackish; but those that inflame or separate the skin, acrid; but their opposites, the smooth and sweet, are reduced to a juicy state.¹ Of smelling the kinds have not been defined; for, from their percolating through narrow pores, that are too stiff to be either brought together or separated, things (seem) to be sweet-smelling or bad-smelling from the putrefaction or concoction² of the earth and substances like the earth. But a vocal sound is a percussion in the air, arriving at the soul through the ears; the pores of which proceed, until they reach the liver; and amongst them there is breath, by the movement of which hearing exists. Now of the voice and hearing that portion which is quick, is acute; but that which is slow, is grave; but the medium is the most in harmony. And that which is much and diffused, is great; but that which is little and compressed, is small; and that which is arranged according to musical proportions, is in tune; but that which is unarranged and out of those proportions, is out of tune, and not to be properly adjusted. The fourth kind of things relating to the senses is the most multi-form and various, and they are called objects of sight, in which are all kinds of colours, and an infinity of coloured substances; but the principal are four, white, black, brilliant,³ and red; for all the others are produced from a mix-

² In lieu of πίψεισι, VI. proposes ρήξεισι. But that would be a mere tautology after σάψισι.

³ Batteux renders λαμπρόν "jaune." But such is not the meaning of λαμπρός elsewhere. That some specific colour is however intended, is evident from the whole tenor of the passage. By comparing then Tim. p. 68, B., λαμπρόν τε ἱρυθρῷ λευκῷ τε μὲνύμενον ξανθὸν γίγνεται, it would seem that by λαμπρόν was meant a light-blue; for that colour mixed with red and white would make what is now called gamboge, in Greek ξανθός. And hence we can understand λαμπρός καὶ φοινικεύς quoted from Plutarch by H. Steph. in Thes. Λαμπρός. Rudolph indeed on Ocellus Lucanus, p. 20, πρός τε τὸ λαμπρόν καὶ ξανθὸν καὶ λευκόν, explains λαμπρόν by λευκόν; and would reject therefore λευκόν as a gl. One would prefer, however γλαυκόν, if λαμπρόν means there "white;" but if light-blue, as here, λευκόν must be retained. With regard to the whole tenor of the passage, it is worth while quoting the words of Apuleius de Mundo, "Pictura ex discordibus pigmentorum coloribus, atris, ture of these. Now what is white causes the vision to expand, but what is black to contract; just as what is warm is able to expand the touching, but what is cold to contract it; and what is rough naturally contracts the tasting, but what is sharp dilates it.

[9.] And (it is natural) for the covering of animals, that live in the air, to be nourished and kept together by the food being distributed by the veins through the whole mass, in the manner of a stream, conveyed as it were by channels, and moistened by the breath,¹ which diffuses it, and carries it to the extremities. And respiration is produced through there being no vacuum in nature, while the air, as it flows in, is inhaled in the place of that which is exhaled, through unseen mouths, through which the drops (of sweat) are visible on the surface; but a portion is got rid of by the natural warmth (of the body). It is necessary then for a portion, equal to what has been got rid of, to be introduced in its place; for, if not, there would be a vacuum; which is impossible: for the animal would no longer be flowing together² and one, when the covering had been separated by the vacuum. Now the same organization takes place in the case of lifeless substances, according to the analogy of respiration. For the gourd and amber are the likenesses of respiration. Now the breath flows through the body to an orifice outwards,³ and is introduced in turn through respiration by the mouth and nostrils, and again, after the manner of the Euripus, is carried albis, luteis, et puniceis, confusione modica temperatis, imagines iis, quos imitatur, similes facit."

² De Gelder observes that σύρπον means here, that "which flows together and coheres," but, in p. 104, A., § 11, σύρπον, applied to πνεῦμα, means only that "which flows together," without any idea of coherence. But how τὸ ζῶον could be said to be σύρπον, I confess I cannot understand. Hence I suspect the author wrote—οὐ γὰρ ἐστὶ εἷη καὶ κατὰ σύρπον γὰρ τὸ ζῶον, i. e. "for the animal would be no longer one, like something that has flowed together,"—instead of εἷη καὶ σύρπον καὶ τὸ ζῶον.

in turn to the body, which is extended according to the flowing out. ¹The gourd (too), when the air within it is got rid of by fire, attracts to itself moisture: and amber, when the air is separated from it, receives an equal substance.¹ Now all nourishment is from the heart, as the root, and from the stomach, as a fountain, and is conveyed to the body, to which, if it be moistened by more² than what flows out, there is said to be an increase; but if by less, a decay; but the point of perfection is the boundary between those (two), and is considered (to exist) in an equality of efflux and influx; but when the joints of the system are broken, should there be no longer any passage for the breath, or the nourishment be not distributed, the animal dies.

[10.] Now there are many things hurtful to life and the causes of death. One kind is called disease. And of diseases the commencement is the want of harmony between the principal powers, when the simple powers, such as heat, or cold, or moisture, or dryness, are too much or deficient; and after these the turns and alterations of the blood from corruption, and the deterioration of the flesh, when wasting away, should the turns take place according to the changes to what is acid, or brackish, or bitter, in the blood, or wastings away of the flesh. For from hence arises the generation of bile and of phlegm, (and) diseased juices, and the rottenness of liquids, weak indeed, unless deeply seated,³ but difficult (to cure), when their commencement is generated from the bones, and painful, if in a state of inflammation from the marrow. The last of disorders is (those of) the breath, bile, and phlegm, when they increase and flow into situations foreign to them, or into places inappropriate;⁴ for then by laying hold of the situation, belonging to what are better, and by driving away what are congenial, they fix

¹ There is an allusion to the gourd and amber in Tim. p. 79, E. But in neither passage is it very easy to see what the allusion to either substance is intended to illustrate.

² I have translated, as if the Greek were πλείονι, to which πλείον in the best MS. I leads, in lieu of πλείω: and similarly, as if the Greek were not μείω, but μείονι, to which μείων in one MS., and μείων in another, seem to lead.

³ On the phrase ἐν βάθει De Gelder refers to Ælian, V. H. ii. 14, and Clemens Alexandr. Pædag. iii. p. 219, B.

⁴ I have translated, as if the Greek were ἀποκαίσις, not ἐκκαίσις: for which De Gelder would substitute ἐκκησις, i. e. "exposed to fatal disorders."

themselves there, injuring the bodies and resolving ¹(them) into those very things.¹ These then are the sufferings of the body; and from these are many diseases of the soul, some from one faculty, others from others; of the perceptive (soul the disease is) a difficulty of perception; of the recollecting, a forgetfulness; of the forward, a want of desire and of eagerness;² of that subject to affections, a violent suffering and excited madness; of the rational, an indisposition to learn and think. But of wickedness, the commencements are pleasures and pains, desires and fears, inflamed by the body and mixed up with the mind, and are called by various names. For there are loves, and regrets, and desires let loose, and passions on the stretch, and heavy resentments, and appetites of various kinds, and pleasures without measure. ³In all simplicity, to be unreasonably disposed towards affections and to be under their rule³ is the limit of virtue and vice; for to abound in them or to be superior to them places us in a good or bad position. Against such impulses the temperament of our bodies is able to co-operate greatly, whether quick or hot, or varied in various ways, by leading us to melancholy and violent lewdness; and certain parts, when affected by a flowing, produce itchings and forms of bodies more like a state of inflammation than of health; through which a sinking of the spirits,⁴ and a forgetfulness, and a silliness, and a fearfulness, are worked out.

[11.] Sufficient too are the habits, in which persons are brought up in the city or at home, and their daily food, enervating by luxury the soul or fortifying it for strength. For

¹—¹ Such is the literal version of ἐς αὐτὰ ταῦτα ἀναλύοντα. But perspicuity would require rather ἐς ἀνιάτα, or something similar.

² In lieu of ἀποπειρία De Gelder would read ἀποστρία, referring to Galen's Exegese. Hippocrat., ἀποστρίας καὶ ἀνορεξίας ποιητικὰ, and rendering ἀποστρία "cibi fastidium." But that would be rather a bodily than mental affection.

⁴ In lieu of δυσθυμία De Gelder would read δυσμαθία, referring to Tim. p. 87, A., λήθης ἅμα καὶ δυσμαθίας.

the living out of doors, and simple¹ fare, and gymnastic exercises, and the morals of companions, produce the greatest effect in the way of virtue and of vice. And these causes are derived from parents and the elements rather than from ourselves, provided there be no remissness on our part in keeping aloof from acts of duty. And for the animal to be in a good condition, it is requisite for the body to possess the better properties under its control, (namely,) health and correct perception, and strength and beauty. Now the principles of beauty are, a symmetry as regards its parts, and as regards the soul. For nature has arranged, like an instrument, the body to be subservient to, and in harmony with, the subjects of life. And it is requisite for the soul likewise to be brought into harmony with its analogous good qualities, (namely,) in the case of temperance, as the body is in the case of health; and in that of prudence, as in the case of correct perception; and in that of fortitude, as in the case of vigour and strength;² and in that of justice, as in the case of beauty.³ Of these the beginning is from nature; but their middle portions and end are from carefulness; those relating to the body, through the gymnastic and medical arts; those to the soul, through instruction and philosophy. For these are the powers that nourish, and give a tone to, the body and soul by means of labour and gymnastic exercise, and a pureness⁴ of diet; some through druggings (applied to the body),⁵ and others through discipline applied to the soul by means of punishments and reproaches; for by encouragement they give strength and excite to an onward movement, and exhort to advantageous works. The art of the gymnastic trainer,⁶ and its nearest

² To preserve the uniformity of the periods, and to prevent a tautology, we must omit either ῥώμην καὶ or καὶ ἰσχύον—

³ Here too the balance of the sentences requires the omission of ῥῶμα, as done in the translation.

⁴ Battenx has "purgations"—as if he wished to read καθαρῖσματος—

⁵ Here again the balance of the sentences shows that τῶν σωματίων is required to answer to τῶν ψυχῶν—relative, that of the medical man, do, on being ordered to attend upon bodies, bring their powers to the greatest symmetry, and cause the blood to be pure and the breath to flow equably,¹ in order that, if there be any diseased virulence there, the powers of the blood and breath may be in a state of strength; but music, and its leader, philosophy, that have been ordained by the gods² and laws for the regulation of the soul, ³accustom, and persuade, and partly compel,³ the irrational to obey reason, and the two irrational, passion and desire, to become, the one mild, the other quiet, so as not to be moved without reason, nor to be unmoved when the mind incites either to desire or enjoy something; for this is the definition of temperance, (namely,) docility⁴ and firmness. And intelligence and philosophy, the highest in honour, after cleansing (the soul) of false opinions, have introduced knowledge, recalling the mind from excessive ignorance, and setting it free for the contemplation of divine things; in which to occupy oneself with a self-sufficiency, as regards the affairs of man, and with an abundance, for the commensurate period of life, is a happy state.

[12.] Now he, to whom ⁵the deity has happened to assign something of a good fate,⁵ is led through opinion the most true to the happiest life. But if he be morose and indocile, let the punishment that comes from law and reason, follow him, bringing with it the fears ever on the stretch, both those that proceed from heaven and those from Hades, how that punishments, not to be begged off, are laid up for the unhappy below, and the rest

² In lieu of θεῶν VI. has suggested ἰθῶν—

⁴ In lieu of εὐπείθεια VI. proposed to read εὐπάθεια— But that would differ only a little from καρπεία.

of the things, which I praise the Ionic poet of old for making 'the crime-defiled (to suffer) for their wickedness.'¹ For as we sometimes render bodies sound by means of diseased substances, if they will not yield to the more healthy, so we restrain the soul by false reasoning, if it will not be led by true. And they would be called of necessity strange² punishments; since the souls of cowards enter by a change into the bodies of women,³ who are given to insulting conduct;³ and those of the blood-stained into the bodies of wild beasts for punishment; and of the lascivious into the forms of sows⁴ and boars; and of the light-minded and elated into the shapes of air-traversing birds; and of those who do nothing, learn nothing, and think of nothing, into that of aquatic animals who do nothing. But on all these matters has Nemesis given a judgment at a second period, together with the deities who preside over murderers, and those under the earth, the inspectors of human affairs, to whom god, the leader of all, has intrusted the administration of the world, filled with gods and men, and the rest of living beings, as many as have been made by the demiurgus according to the best image of a form not begotten, and eternal, and to be perceived by the mind.

¹— The Greek is at present ἐκ παλαιᾶς ποιῦντα τὼς ἰναγίας: where, since ἐκ παλαιᾶς is perfectly unintelligible, Wytttenbach suggested, what De Gelder has adopted, ἐκλάσαι— But that would be superfluous, thus united to ποιῦντα— I have therefore translated, as if the text were originally—ἐν ἀπλᾶσι ποιῦντα τίσαι ἰναγίας. The passage of Homer alluded to is in Od. M. 571—599.

² Wytttenbach, says De Gelder, understood by ἕναι, "new." But such a meaning that word could not bear. In The Church of England Quarterly Review, No. 1, p. 116, I proposed to read Ἰξίωνιαι—"after the manner of Ixion"—and hence I should have read likewise κατὰ συνέλῳσιν, in lieu of πορὶ κέλασιν shortly afterwards, and have inserted those words between ὡς and μετενδουμέναν: and instead of οὐκ εἰκαίως, I should have proposed εἰσέως. For the allusion is to the revolutions of the wheel, to which Ixion was feigned to be eternally bound; and with which are compared those which the soul in its transmigrations is destined to undergo.

³— The words between the numerals should be inserted after λαγῶν δὲ—for ἔβρι means here not "insolence," but "intemperance in lusts."

⁴ To avoid the tautology in σὺν ἡ κάρων, one would prefer ἐνὶ ἡ κάρων: to which δὲ ὕν in one MS. seems to lead; or else σὺν ἡ γράων. So in Phileb. p. 67, C. § 160. Porphyry seems to have found in his MS. not βέες καὶ ἵπποι, but ὄνες καὶ γράων, as Sydenham was the first to remark. We meet indeed with σοὶ κάρποις in IA. E. 783. But there one would prefer σοὶ καρποῖσι— Hesych. Καρπός—ἐκτίων.

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTE.

As the Notes of Batteux, to which reference is made in p. 153, n. 1st, would scarcely furnish all the information requisite for the complete elucidation of this passage, I have introduced some preliminary matter, which, it is hoped, will afford clear notions on a rather difficult subject.

When Pythagoras was endeavouring to discover in respect to sounds a test for the ear, similar to that for the eye in respect to colours, as furnished by a lens, and to that for the hand, in respect to different substances, solid and liquid, by means of measures and weights, he happened to pass by the workshop of a coppersmith, where he heard a variety of sounds, produced by different hammers, as they came in contact with the metal; and after making various experiments, he discovered that the difference in the sounds was according to the weight of the hammers, and not according to the force with which the metal was struck. For the sounds were really the same, though differing in intensity, whether the hammers were wielded by hands more or less powerful; just as a key on the pianoforte gives the same note, but differing only in loudness, whether it be struck by a grown person or a child.

Perceiving thus that certain vibrations were produced in a bar of metal, when struck by different hammers, and suspecting probably that the sound was connected in some measure with such vibrations, he is reported to have noted down the weights of the different hammers, and on his return home to have suspended from a beam, stretched diagonally from two corners of a room, four strings of the same substance, length, and twist; to each of which he attached four weights of 12, 9, 8, and 6 pounds, respectively, which were fastened to the ground. He then struck the strings first singly, and found that the sounds were more or less acute, according as the strings were attached to the less or greater weight; he then struck the two extreme strings, and found that the sound proceeding from the string connected with the greatest weight, was, as compared with the sound proceeding from that connected with the least weight, in the proportion of 2 to 1: and by ringing the changes on the other strings, he found the sounds to be always in proportion to the weights attached to the strings.

His next step, it is said, was to transfer the strings, now called cat-gut, a corruption of cut-gut, to the bridge of a musical instrument, where the bridge answered the purpose of the beam previously used; while, in the place of the weights originally attached to the strings, he invented pegs, around which the strings were wound, and by which they were extended or contracted to the proper pitch, as they are at present in all stringed instruments; and the names assigned to the four strings were, ὑψίστη, the highest, μέση, the middle, κατωμέση, near to, but lower than, the middle, and βῆστη, the lowest; with which may be compared the four strings that produce the four notes, E, A, D, and G, on the modern violin.

According, however, to Boethius, De Musica, i. 20, this four-stringed lyre was invented even before the time of Orpheus. His words are—"Simplicem principio fuisse musicam refert Nicomachus, adeo ut quatuor nervis tota constaret; idque usque ad Orpheum duravit, ut primus qui- dem et quartus diapason harmoniam (nervi) resonarent—ad imitationem mœnicæ mundanæ, quæ ex quatuor constat elementis.” While Manuel Bryennius in Harmonic. § i. p. 362, carries the invention still higher. For he says that “before the time of Mercury there was a four-stringed lyre, κατὰ μίμνησιν τῆς τῶν στρογγύλων τετρακτῖδος—where, be it remarked, τετρακτῖδος is used for τετράδος—but that Mercury, having joined two systems, formed a seven-stringed lyre;” where, as he says nothing of the other system, one may hazard a conjecture that he had heard of the tradition, mentioned by Diodorus Sic. i. 16, that the first lyre was with only three strings, to answer to the three seasons, called in Greece ῥοαί—

Be, however, the inventors of the four and seven-stringed lyres who they may, it is evident that the latter could not have been applied to any scientific purpose, until the three intermediate notes had been discovered requisite to make up the scale of seven notes; which were called respectively ῥαποράτη, near to, but under, the highest; ὑπαρίστη, near to, but above, the middle; and ῥαπαράτη, near to, but above, the lowest; thus making two semitones between the middle and highest. But instead of these semitones having the same ratio to their contiguous primary tones, Pythagoras discovered that they might be represented by a string divided into two unequal parts, bearing the ratio to each other of 243 to 256, (or of 3^5 to 4^4 .) And these seven names, invented originally for the seven strings of the lyre, were subsequently applied to the seven planets, when they were considered as giving what was called the music of the spheres.

By what means Pythagoras was enabled to arrive at the proportions, which two unequal semitones bear to each other, has not, as far as I know, been handed down. But he probably got at the fact by carrying out the experiments which led him to discover that, when a string is stretched so as to produce a certain sound, a string of the same thickness and twist, but of half that length, will give an octave higher; the third of that length, a fifth higher; and the eighth, the next note higher. So too if a string of a certain length gives a sound represented by a , the next note lower (b) will be represented by $a + \frac{1}{2}$, and (c) the next lower by $b + \frac{1}{2}$, and so on, except when the series is interrupted by one or more semitones, when instead of $\frac{1}{2}$ another quantity must be substituted, dependent on the ratio which 243 bears to 256.

With these preliminary observations we may turn to the Remarks of Batteux, who has drawn out the series of 36 terms and adjusted them to a musical scale—where the letters in Italics refer to the vocal gamut, and the Roman capitals to the instrumental—after prefacing the series with some observations, from which I will make such extracts as bear directly upon the matter in hand, and this with the greater willingness, as Batteux's little volume is not easily to be met with.

“By an harmonic proportion Timæus understands that of the numbers, which represent the concords in a musical scale. These were amongst the ancients only three. The octave, called diapason,¹ where the lowest note was to the highest as 4 to 2; the fifth, called diapente,² in the ratio of 3 to 2; and the fourth, called diatessaron,³ in the ratio of 4 to 3. To these were added, to complete the intervals of the concords, the single notes, which are in the ratio of 9 to 8, and the semitones in that of 243 to 256.

"Now as the ancients identified the Soul of the world with its movement, the quantity of the movement became in their eyes the measure of the quantity of the Soul; and as the movement appeared to them to be the greatest at the circumference of the Universe, but nothing at the centre, the quantity of the Soul was considered to be the minimum at the centre, but the maximum at the circumference. Hence if the Soul were fixed, like a radius at one end, at the centre, it would, when turned along its whole length through all parts of the Universe, move with greater or less velocity, according as those were nearer to the circumference or centre.

"To understand then how the degrees of velocity were calculated, let us conceive this radius to be divided according to a musical scale; when such a division will represent the degrees, considered harmonically, of the Soul of the world.

"Let then 1 be assumed as the first term of the radius, fixed at the centre, or, to avoid fractions, that would otherwise occur in the calculations connected with the series following, let it be 384.¹ The second, which will be the distance of the next note, will be $384 + \frac{1}{2} = 432$. The third, $432 + \frac{1}{2} = 486$. The fourth, being a semitone, will be 512; for as 243 is to 256, so is 486 to 512. The eighth will be 768, the double of 384, or the first octave; and the 36th will be 114695, as shown by the table following:

"That these 36 numbers are those which Timæus had in view, there can be but little doubt; since they fulfil all the conditions he has laid down. For we find there a progression of tones and semitones; of tones, which increase by adding to the number that precedes its eighth to make up the number that is to follow; and of semitones, by finding a number that is to follow, which shall bear to the preceding one the same ratio that 243 does to 256.

"It is requisite however to pay attention to the four numbers, 1944, 2048, 2187, and 2304, where the difference between the first and second is that of a semitone minor (104); and between the second and third of a semitone major (139); while these two semitones united make up 243, the difference between 2187 and 1944, or the equivalent of one tone. But between 2187 (Si^b) and 2304 (La) there is not more than a semitone minor, or the ratio of 243 to 256. And a similar arrangement in the four numbers, 5832, 6144, 6561, and 6912.

"But why were these terms fixed at 36? The reason is to be found in the mysteries of the school of Pythagoras, where it was thought proper to multiply 384, the first assumed term, by 27. But why by 27? Because that number is the sum of the first numbers, which represent lines, surfaces, solids, squares, and cubes, added to unity. Thus, 1 is unity; 2 and 3, the first numbers representing lines; 4 and 9, the first surfaces, and both squares, the former of an even number (2), and the latter of an odd number (3); and lastly, 8 and 27, both representing solids and cubes, the former of an even number (2), and the latter of an odd number (3). Taking then the number 27 as the symbol of the world, and the numbers which it contains as the symbols of the elements and their combinations, it was only reasonable for the Soul of the world, which is the very basis of order and of the combinations, which constitute the world, to be composed of the same elements (of order) as the number 27 is itself."

²— Here again there is something arbitrary in this introduction of a semitone, marked by the same letters of the gamut as the tone itself.

³— Batteux's note is, " $5832 + (\text{the lemme}) 312 = 6144$, and $6144 + (\text{the } \textit{apotomé}) 417 = 6912$."

THE LIFE OF PLATO,
ACCORDING TO DIOGENES LAERTIUS.

[1.] PLATO, an Athenian, was the son of Ariston and Perictioné, or Potoné,¹ who carried up her family to Solon. For Solon's brother was Dropides; whose son was Critias, the father of Calæschrus, whose children were Critias, one of the thirty,² and Glaucon, from whom were sprung Charmides and Perictioné, of whom and of Ariston Plato was the son, the sixth in descent from Solon, who carried up his genealogy to Neleus and Poseidon. They say that his father likewise carried his family up to Codrus, the son of Melanthus, who, according to Thrasyllus, were historically descended from Poseidon. [2.] But Speusippus, in his work entitled "Plato's Funeral Supper,"³ and Clearchus, in his "Praise of Plato," and Anaxilides, in the second book "About Philosophers,"

¹ Since the mother of Plato is not called elsewhere Potoné, it would seem, that the name of the daughter (in § 4) has been by some mistake attributed to the parent, contrary to the usual custom of Greece, where girls were never, I believe, called after their mothers, although they were, perhaps, after their grandmothers, just as boys were after their grandfathers. Hence for ἡ Πορώνης one might read ἐκ or ἀπὸ Πορώνης—

² By "the thirty" are meant "the thirty tyrants," as they were called, who were appointed by Lysander to be the Board of Directors at Athens, after the city had fallen into the power of the Lacedæmonians.

³ In lieu of περὶ δειπνῶν, I have adopted περίδειπνον, as recommended by Menage. For περίδειπνον, as we learn from Suidas, was a supper in honour of the dead, and one at which it was customary to speak an eulogy on the deceased. Now as Plato died at a marriage feast, according to the account given just afterwards, and alluded to in § 45, it is not difficult to see what was probably the subject of the Περίδειπνον written by Speusippus, the nephew of Plato.

state that there was a story at Athens, how that Ariston attempted to violate Perictioné, then in her prime, and not succeeding, beheld, on ceasing from his violence, a vision of Apollo, ¹ from which time he kept her undefiled by the rights of marriage until her delivery; ¹ when Plato, says Apollodorus, in his "Chronicles," was born in Ol. 88, on the seventh of Thargelion, (i. e. April,) the day on which the Delians say Apollo was born; and he died, as Hermippus states, while supping at a marriage feast, ² in the first year of Ol. 108, having lived 81 years. ³ [3.] But Neanthes says he died in his 84th year. He was therefore younger than Isocrates by 6 years; ⁴ who was born in the archonship of Lysimachus; but Plato in that of Ameinias, ⁵ during which Pericles died. He was of the ward of Colyttus, as Antileon states in the second book "On Chronology;" but according to some he was born at Ægina, in the house of Phidiades, the son of Thales, as Phavorinus says in his "Various History," through his father having been sent (thither), together with some others, as an allotment-holder, ⁶ but who returned to Athens, when those parties were driven out by the Lacedæmonians, who assisted the people of Ægina. He acted moreover as a Choregus, the means being furnished by Dion, ⁷ as Athenodorus

¹ The story, told here rather indistinctly by Diogenes, is given more clearly by Plutarch in Sympos. viii. 1, and the other authors quoted by Casaubon and Menage; from whom it appears, that Plato was said to have been the son of Apollo, and not of Aristo, who married Perictioné, not knowing that she was already pregnant by the god.

² But Cicero, de Senect. § 5, says that Plato died while in the act of writing. Here, instead of γάμος, Clinton in Fast. Hellenic. p. 139, = 149, ed. Krueger, would read γενεθλίου, "his birthday."

⁴ Meursius, De Archont. Athen. iii. 2, would read ζ (7) for ς (6), on the authority of Pseudo-Plutarch's Life of Isocrates.

⁵ Instead of "Ameinias," Salmasius proposed to read "Ameinon." The word in Diodorus is Epameinondas. But no Athenian, eligible for the Archonship, would have been called by a name with the Doric termination in "das," instead of the Attic in "des." Athenæus has Epameinon. In such a variety of readings, who, asks Menage, can detect the true one?

⁶ On the allotment-holders sent to Ægina, see Thucyd. ii. 27.

⁷ The same fact is mentioned by Plutarch likewise, in Dion. p. 964, F., quoted by Casaubon.

states in the eighth book of his "Peripatetics." [4.] He had two brothers, Adeimantus and Glaucon, and a sister, Potoné, of whom Speusippus was the son. ¹ He received his boyhood's education¹ under Dionysius, of whom he makes mention in "The Rivals;" but became a gymnast under the wrestler Ariston of Argos; by whom he was called Plato on account of his fine habit of body, having borne previously the name of Aristocles after his grandfather,² as Alexander states in his "Successions;"³ but some (say) he was called so from the breadth of his interpretation,⁴ ⁵ or because he was of a broad face, as Neanthes asserts.⁵ There are also those who state that he wrestled at the Isthmus,⁶ as Dicaearchus does in his first book "On Lives;"⁷ [5.] and that he paid some attention to painting; and wrote poetry, at first dithyramba,⁸ and subsequently songs and tragedies; and they say⁹ he had a thin voice,¹⁰ as Timotheus of Athens states in his work "On Lives." It is said moreover that Socrates saw in a dream

¹ Such is the proper translation of ἐκ παιδείης γράμματα. For by γράμματα, literally "letters," was meant every thing that a boy was taught in his earliest years.

² As the name of Aristocles does not appear in the genealogy on the mother's side, the person alluded to was of course the father of Ariston.

³ By the word "Successions" are to be understood those that occurred in the different schools of philosophy.

⁴ Such is the literal version of τὴν πλατύτητα τῆς ἑρμηνείας, which Menage renders "orationis ubertatem." But such neither is, nor could be, the meaning of ἑρμηνείας. Diogenes probably wrote εἰρωνείας. For "irony" is the figure of speech constantly adopted by Socrates. Compare Sympos. p. 218, D. μάλα εἰρωνικῶς. Rep. i. p. 337, A., ἡ εἰρωνία εἰρωνεία Σωκράτους. And thus the expression ἡ πλατύτης τῆς εἰρωνείας may be compared with πλατὺς γίλως, which Herodian, at the end of Phrynichus, p. 471, ed. Lobeck, says is more elegant than γίλως πολὺς.

⁵ The words between the numerals ought to be placed after μετανομάσθη a little above—for thus the three different reasons, why Plato's name was changed from Aristocles, will be properly assigned to three different authorities.

⁶ Where the Isthmian games were celebrated.

⁷ Of these Lives by Dicaearchus, a fragment of one has come down to us, under the title of Βίος Ἑλλάδος—

⁸ Ælian, in V. H. ii. 30, says that Plato first wrote Heroic verses, not Dithyramba.

⁹ Instead of φάσιν, "they say," one would prefer φύσιν, "by nature." The two words are constantly confounded.

¹ that he was holding on his knees a cygnet, which became on the instant full-fledged and flew up, singing sweetly; ¹ and that the (next) day Plato ² was placed with him (as a pupil); ³ when he said, "This is the bird."³ He began his philosophical career in Academia; afterwards in the Garden near Colonus, as Alexander says in his "Successions," on the authority of Heracleitus. Subsequently, however, when about to engage in the contest with a tragedy, he did, after hearing Socrates, commit before the temple of Dionysus, ⁴ his poems to the flames, saying,

Come hither, Vulcan, Plato has need of thee.⁵

[6.] And from that period they say, being now twenty years old, he became a hearer of Socrates; and when the latter departed (from life),⁶ Plato attached himself to Cratylus, the follower of Heracleitus, and to Hermogenes, who adopted the philosophy of Parmenides. Afterwards, when he was 28 years old, as Hermodorus says, he retired to Megara with some other disciples of Socrates to Euclid. Subsequently he went to Cyréné to Theodorus the mathematician; and from thence to Italy to the Pythagoreans, Philolaus and Eurytus; and from thence to Egypt to the prophets;⁷ whither they say that Euripides⁸ also followed him, and falling sick there he was cured by the priests with the salt-water cure; from whence he said,⁹

The sea doth wash out all the ills of man.

[7.] And in truth, according to Homer,¹⁰ persons say that all

¹—¹ This story is told more fully by Apuleius, who says that the cygnet appeared to fly up from the altar of Love, that was in the Academia, before it settled in the bosom of Socrates.

²—² Such seems to be the meaning of αἰτῶ συσπῆναι.

³ The sense seems to require τὸν ἐν ὀνείρῳ ὄρνιν, "the bird in the dream;" where ἐν ὀνείρῳ might easily have dropped out between τὸν and ὄρνιν.

⁴ I have followed Menage in adopting Διονυσιακοῦ, found in MS. Par. and ed. Steph., in lieu of Ὀλυμπιακοῦ.

⁵ This is a parody of Hom. Il. E. 392, where Θέτις is the word in the place of Πάριον.

⁶ The Greek is merely ἀπελθόντος, by an euphemism, similar to that in Soph. Phil. 494, δίδου' ἐγὼ Μή μοι βεβήκοι, quoted by Casaubon.

⁷ These are called "priests" by Cicero, de Finib. v.

⁸ This, says Stanley, is an anachronism. For Euripides died before Socrates, after whose death Plato is here said to have visited Egypt.

⁹ In Iph. T. 1193.

the Egyptians are physicians. Plato had determined moreover to mingle with the Magi; but on account of the wars then raging in Asia, he swerved from his purpose, and, returning to Athens, passed his time in Academia. Now this was a grove-like gymnasium in the suburbs, so called from a certain hero Academus, as Eupolis says in his "Non-campaigners,"

In the well-shaded courses¹ of the god, (Call'd) Academus.

But Timon likewise, speaking against Plato, says—

The broadest² man led all; but with sweet voice
He talk'd, ³the picture of the tectix kind,³
That settling on the trees of Hecademus,
Their pleasant note pour forth—

for previously it was called, with an E, Hecademia. [8.] The philosopher was likewise a friend of Isocrates; and a disputation, that took place between them on the subject of poets, which occurred in the country, when Isocrates was a guest of Plato, Praxiphanes has put into writing. ⁴Aristoxenus moreover states that he served thrice in the army; once at Tanagra; a second time at Corinth; and the third time at Delium, where he obtained a prize for good conduct.⁴ In his discourses he has made a mixture of the doctrines of Heracleitus, Pythagoras, and Socrates. For as regards what are perceptible by a sense, he philosophized according to Heracleitus; in what are perceptible by the mind, according to Pythagoras; but in what relates to politics, according to Socrates. [9.] And some, amongst whom is Satyrus, assert ¹ In lieu of δρόμοις, Meursius in Exercitat. Critic. ii. 12, would read δρόμοις, answering to "silvas Academi" in Horace.

² Instead of πλάτυστατος, some MSS. read πλατιστατος, which seems to lead to πλατύσκυτος—where κύτος (body) would answer to μῆκος mentioned in § 4, or τὸ στίγμα in Hesych. Miles., similar to "latitudo pectoris" in Senec. Epist. 69.

³ Such seems to be the meaning of τίρτιξιν ἰσόγραφος—

⁴ In this account of Plato's serving in the army, it has been shown that either Aristoxenus has been guilty of anachronisms, or else that Diogenes has applied to Plato, what Aristoxenus had probably done to Socrates. For the first battle at Tanagra took place in Ol. 80, 4, seventeen years before Plato was born; that at Delium in Ol. 89, 1, when he was only four years old. He might indeed have been present at the battle near Corinth, if it be the one, to which there seems to be an allusion in Menexen. § 17, compared with Xenophon, Hell. iv. 2, and Demosth. in Leptin. § 41.

that he sent to Dion in Sicily to purchase¹ three Pythagorean treatises from Philolaus for 100 minæ. For they say he was in good circumstances, through having received from Dionysius above 80 talents, as Onestor states in his work entitled, "Whether shall the wise man engage in a money-making business?" To Epicharmus, the comic writer, he was much indebted, and had transcribed very many² things (from him), as Alcimus states in his treatises, which are four, addressed to Amyntas; where he says thus in the first—"Plato appears to have spoken³ much from the writings of Epicharmus. For let us look into the matter. Plato asserts⁴ that what is perceptible by a sense, is never permanent either as regards quality or quantity, but is ever in a state of flux and change."⁵ [10.]⁶ So that from which things should a person take away, these being neither equal, nor of a certain kind, nor possessing quantity nor quality:⁷ and these are they, of which there is a generation always, but never a substance; but that is perceptible by mind, from which nothing is taken away or added. Now this of things eternal the nature, which happens to be similar and the same for ever." And in fact Epicharmus has spoken very clearly about things perceptible by a sense and mind.

- A. Gods have ever present been, nor ever have they fail'd (to be);
 Similar too things present round us,⁸ and for ever through the same.
 B. Still before the gods 'tis said' that Chaos did exist the first.

¹ To this purchase Timon alludes in a tristich, preserved by A. Gellius, iii. 17, and thus translated partly by Stanley,

You Plato, with the love of learning caught,
 With a great sum a little treatise bought,
 Where all, that you have written, you were taught.

² So we may translate τὰ πλείονα, which generally means "the most;" unless it be said that the true reading is τὰ κάλλιστα—

³ In lieu of λέγων one would prefer λαβών, "to have taken—"

⁴ Compare Parmenid. § 13.

⁵ Such is the literal version of the Greek, which, I confess, I cannot understand; nor could, I think, Stanley, whose translation is, "as if we should subtract number from them, which are neither equal, nor certain, nor quantitative, nor qualitative."

⁶ By τὰδε is meant "the Universe." Compare Plato, Politic. p. 269, B., and Timæus, p. 41, A., τὸ πᾶν τόδε.

⁷ In Aristoph. Opv. 693, and Ovid Met. i. "Ante mare et tellus et, quod tegit omnia cœlum, Unus erat toto naturæ vultus in orbe, Quem dixere Chaos."

A. How? It cannot be that aught should from what's nothing¹ come the first.

B. Nothing came by Zeus, the first; nor second (came) of things that here

We are talking of.

A. And, as they now are, they will aye remain.²

[11.]

A. Should a person³ to an even number⁴ wish to add an odd,
Or to take a sum in pebbles,⁵ that is ready to his hand,
Would the number wholly seem to you the same?⁶

B. To me not so.

A. Or if one to a cubit-measure⁷ wish'd another length to add,⁷
Or to cut off from the former, would the measure still remain?

B. Not so. A. Well then, cast your eyes thus on mankind; one shows increase;

And decrease one; all through all time are to changes subject found.

But that, which by nature changes never, in the same remains;
But will something different from its form⁸ already past become;
And both you and I now flourish different from yesterday;
And again, we by this reason different, not the same, (shall be).⁹

³ The asterisks indicate the loss of something, as pointed out by the want of connexion in the ideas.

⁴ In the letters αὶ δὲ λῆς τὸν ἄρτιον, where λῆς is not only superfluous, but at variance with λῆ in the next verse, there seem to lie hid ὧδε γ' εἰς τιν' ἄρτιον: where τιν' is due to Hermann.

⁵ Such, I presume, is the meaning of ὑπάρχουσιν.

⁶ In the Greek letters, καὶ οὐ αὐτος, there seem to lie hid καὶ ποῦ αὐτος, as I have translated.

⁷ In lieu of καὶ τὸν, I have adopted Scaliger's splendid restoration παγεαίον, and rejected with Casaubon στερεὸν before ἔτερον: confirmed by MS. Monac. that omits στερεόν.

⁸ I have translated, as if the Greek were, not ε' αὐτὸ δὲ, in some MSS., nor ε' ἀπὸ δὲ, in others, but ε' ἀπ' εἶδους— Hermann's αὐτὸ δὲ, as, adopted by Huebner and Ahrens, I cannot understand.

⁹ Both the sense and metre prove that the author wrote something

[12.] Alcimus states likewise this too—The wise assert that the soul perceives some things through the body, when, as it were, ¹it hears (or) sees; ¹ but on other things it reflects through itself, and makes no use of the body. Hence of things existing, some are perceptible by sense, and some by mind. On which account Plato likewise has said that it is requisite for those, who are desirous of understanding the principles of the Universe, in the first place to preserve ideas separate by themselves, such as similitude, and unity, and multitude, and magnitude, and rest, and motion; and, secondly, beauty, and goodness, and justice, each taken abstractedly, and to lay down points like these, as the basis (of philosophy). [13.] Thirdly, to take a combined view of ideas, how they exist in relation to each other, such as ²science, or magnitude, or power, ³ while bearing in mind that ³what exist with us have, through sharing with them, the same name with them; ³ I mean, for instance, that things are just, inasmuch as they (share) in abstract justice; and things beautiful, inasmuch as they (share) in abstract beauty.⁴ Now one of every species is eternal, perceptible by the mind,⁵ and moreover insensible to suffering; and hence he asserts that ideas exist, like models in nature; and that the rest of things are assimilated to them, and exist as their resemblances.⁶ Now Epicharmus discourses about the good and ideas in this manner.

like Καὶ οὗτοι ἄλλοι, καὶ πολλοὶ αὐτοὶ μνείμεν καττὸν λόγον, where μνείμεν has been lost accidentally. Hermann and Meineke would insert εὐλόγηται. But a future is required.

¹— On the power of the soul to see, and hear, and speak, see my note on Hipp. Maj. § 38. With regard to the sense, ἡ has evidently dropt out between ἀποφύγεσαν and βλέπουσαν.

²— I confess I cannot understand what relation can be said to exist between each other in the case of science, magnitude, and dominion. Hence I suspect some words have been lost here; or else that Diogenes has carelessly made the extract from Alcimus; unless it be said that the relation intended is of one science, one magnitude, and one power with another science, magnitude, and power.

³— Here again I am at a loss in comprehending all between the numerals.

⁴ Had Alcimus read the Hippias Major, he would have seen that there is no such thing as beauty in the abstract, although Hippias pretended to prove the contrary.

⁵ I have adopted νοητὸν, the correction of Menage, in lieu of νόημα.

⁶ Stephens says he found some where ομοιώματα, instead of ομοιώματα, which is in three MSS., and ομοιότητες in MS. Cant.

[14.]

- A. Is piping then a thing? B. It is. A. Is man
A piping then? B. By no means. A. Come, then, say What is a piper? What to you does he seem?
A man? or not? B. Assuredly a man.
- A. Seems not the case then to be thus about
The good? that of itself it is a thing;
And he, who learning knows it, good becomes;
Just as a piper, who has learnt to pipe,
Or to dance has a dancer learnt, or some
Weaver to weave, or what you will of trades
Like these, himself's the artist, not the art.

[15.] Now Plato, in the view he takes of ideas, says,¹ that "since there is recollection, ideas exist amongst the things that are, through the recollection being of something, that is in a quiet and permanent state. Now nothing is permanent but ideas. For in what manner, says he, would animals be preserved,² that have no connexion with ideas, and which, on this account, have received a mind from nature? and, moreover,³ they call to recollection their similitude and nourishment, of what kind it is for them, and they show why there is implanted in all animals the contemplation of similitude; from whence they perceive those of a similar kind. How then says Epicharmus?

[16.]

Wisdom, Eumæus,⁴ does not with one 'race
Alone exist.⁵ But all that live have mind.⁶
The female race of fowls,⁷ if to observe

² Instead of "be preserved," the sequence of ideas seems to require "preserve any thing in memory;" in Greek, διασώζω τὸ τι, not διασώζω—

³ I have translated, as if the Greek were not νῦν, but ἀμα—

⁴ From this mention of the Homeric Eumæus Kruseman conceives the fragment to belong to some play, where Ulysses was the hero.

⁵—⁶ I have translated, as if the Greek were καθ' ἑν γένος Μόνον, ἀλλ' ὅσα πτερ, not καθ' ἑν μόνον 'Αλλ' ὅσα πτερ—

⁷ As one MS. reads πάντα γνῶμαν ἔχει, it is evident that the author wrote πάντα τὰν γνῶμαν ἔχει, not πάντα καὶ— for the article cannot be dispensed with, and καὶ is unintelligible.

⁸ With this passage Scaliger aptly compares the fragment of the work of Ennius, called Epicharmus, preserved by Varro de Ling. Latin. iv., "Ova parere solet genu' pennis condecoratum Non animas;" and shortly afterwards, "Inde venit divinitu' pullis insinuans se Ipsa anima."

Attentively you are willing, brings not forth
Its young alive; but, sitting on its eggs,
Makes them a soul possess; and Nature knows Alone how it gets wisdom, and is taught
'The best by her.'

And again—

It is no wonder that I speak these words,
And say that ²she to ³hee² are pleasing, and Seem to be lovely born. For seems not² bitch
To dog most lovely? cow to bull? and ass
Female to male? and lovely sow to boar?⁴

[17.] And these or⁵ such like statement does Alcimus tack together through his four books, and ⁶stamp with the mark of spurious coin⁶ the assistance Plato had got from Epicharmus. Now that Epicharmus was not ignorant himself of his own wisdom, may be learnt from those verses in which he foretells the person, who would emulate him—

And I think—for clear to me this thought is⁷—that the memory
Still shall live of these my sayings; and that some one taking them Shall the measures, which they now have, strip off all; and dressing give Dyed with purple and hues many, and in language fine invest,
And, himself⁸ unconquered, show forth others conquered easily.

[18.] The book of Sophron likewise, the mime-writer, which had been neglected, Plato appears to have brought first to

² From the following examples, where a female animal is said to be pleasing to a male one, it is evident that the author wrote here ἀνδραῖσις ἀνδράς—not ἀνδραῖσιν αὐτοῦς—which is perfectly unintelligible.

³ Since the article is omitted before βοῦς, ὄνος, and ὄς, so it ought to be before κύων. Hence I have translated, as if the word were οὐ—and the sentence taken interrogatively.

⁴ To complete the verse, we must insert εἰμὲν after κάλλιστον—

⁵ Instead of ταῦτα καὶ τοιαῦτα, the correct phrase is ταῦτα ἢ καὶ τοιαῦτα—as I have shown in Porpo's Prolegom. p. 114.

⁶ Such is the exact meaning of παρασημαίνων.

⁷ I have translated, as if δν, required by the metre, had dropt out before ἔμμι. Hermann's suggestion, δοξά γάρ δ' ὁ σαφὲς ἔμμι, is adopted by Huebner. Clinton in Fest. Hellen. p. xxxvii. ed. 2, would read δοξά γὰρ μὲν σάφ' ἔμμι τοῦθ', ὅτι—

⁸ I have adopted δ' αὐτὸς ἄλλους, as suggested by Toup on Longin. § 34.

Athens, and to have modelled the manner ¹(of the speakers in his dialogues)¹ after them, which (were said) to have been found under his head. He thrice made a voyage to Sicily; the first time to see the island and the craters (of Ætna),² when the tyrant Dionysius, the son of Hermocrates, compelled him to form an acquaintance with himself. But he, after conversing on the subject of tyranny, and asserting that, what was advantageous to him (Dionysius) alone,³ was not the better thing, unless he excelled in virtue likewise, gave offence to Dionysius; who becoming enraged said (to Plato)—Thy language is that of an old (dotard); and Thine, replied the other, is that of a tyrant. [19.] From whence the tyrant, being much annoyed, was at first eager to destroy him; but, on being subsequently dissuaded by Dion and Aristomenes, he did no such thing; but handed him over to Pollis the Lacedæmonian—who had opportunely come upon an embassy—for the purpose of selling him; who, after carrying Plato to Ægina, was going to sell him; when Charmandrus, the son of Charmandrides, indicted Plato on a capital charge, according to a law laid down amongst the Æginetans,⁴ that the first Athenian, who should come upon the island, should perish without the form of a trial. Now it was Charmandrus himself who introduced the law, as Phavorinus states in his "Various History." But on some one saying, in mere joke, that the person, who had landed, was a philosopher, they let him go free; while some say that he was brought before the Ecclesia; and that, guarding himself against saying a word, he was ready to endure whatever might happen; and that they determined not to kill him, but to sell him⁵ after the manner of prisoners of war; [20.] when Anniceris of Cyrenæ, who was accidentally present, ransomed him for 20 minæ,—but some say for 30,—and sent him back to Athens to his friends; who immediately sent out the silver money, which Anniceris declined, ¹ The words between the numerals have been added for the sake of perspicuity.

² In καὶ τῶν κρητῶν lie hid either καὶ τῶν καὶ κρητῶν, or else καὶ τῶν Αἰγναίων κρητῶν—

³ I have translated, as if the Greek were αὐτῷ μόνῳ, not αὐτῶ μόνον—

⁴ As there is nothing to which αὐτοῖς can be directly referred, it is probable that Diogenes wrote Αἰγινήταις— remarking that "Not they alone were worthy to take care of Plato." But some say that Dion sent the money, which Plato did not accept, (for that purpose,) but to purchase a small garden for himself in Academia. And there is a story that Pollis was defeated by Chabrias, and subsequently¹ swallowed up by the sea at Helicé,¹ through the divine power being angry for his conduct towards the philosopher, as Phavorinus states in the first book of his "Memoirs." [21.] Dionysius did not however remain quiet; but, on learning (his escape), sent to Plato an order not to speak ill of him; who sent word in return, that his leisure was not such as to enable him to recollect even Dionysius. His second trip was to the younger Dionysius, to ask him for some land and persons, who were to live according to his notion of a polity. But Dionysius, although he made a promise to that effect, did not act up to it; and some say that Plato was imperilled, as having persuaded Dion and Theotas² to effect the freedom of the island; on which occasion the Pythagorean Archytas begged him off, by writing a letter to Dionysius, and sent him in safety to Athens. And this was the letter.

⁵ After πᾶσι I have omitted ἀργύρας, evidently unnecessary after διγύσαν.

[22.] ARCHYTAS TO DIONYSIUS—HEALTH.

We all, the friends of Plato, have sent Lamescus and Photidas to receive the man, according to the agreement made by thyself; and³ thou wouldest do well³ in remembering that anxiety of thine, when thou didst entreat all of us touching the coming of Plato, and didst beg us to solicit him and to undertake all other matters, and those especially relating to his safety, while remaining and quitting again the port. Remember too how that thou didst set much store by his coming, and that thou didst from that time love him, as thou didst never any one of those near thee. But if any asperity has been produced, it is requisite to act with human feelings, and to restore to us the man unhurt. For by so acting thou wilt do what is just, and gratify us.

¹— This event took place probably when Helicé itself was swallowed up by the sea, as we learn from Strabo, and Steph. Byz. in 'Ελική.

² Instead of Θεώτας, Wesseling would read Θεόδοτον, referring to Epistol. 3, p. 318, C. and p. 348, and Plutarch in Dion. p. 963, A.

³— I have adopted αὐτοῖς, the suggestion of Emper, instead of αὐτοῖς: where, however, αὐτοῖς is due to Mange.

[23.] The third time he came, was to reconcile Dion to Dionysius; but not being successful, he returned to his country, having accomplished nothing. There he meddled not with state affairs, although he was, from what he wrote, a politician; and the reason was, that the people were already habituated to other forms of polity. And Pamphila states in the 25th book of her "Memoirs," that ¹the Arcadians and Thebans, when they were building Megalopolis, called upon him to be their law-giver; but on his learning that they were unwilling to have an equality, he did not go. [24.] (There is a report too) that he accompanied ¹Chabrias the general, when he was put on his trial on a capital charge, and not one of the citizens were willing to do so; and that when Crobylus, the informer, met him, as he was going up to the Acropolis in company with Chabrias, and said, "Are you come to act the pleader for another person, when you are not ignorant that the poison-cup of Socrates is waiting for you?"—he replied—"When I served in the army for my country's sake, I endured dangers; and now for duty's sake I will endure them for a friend."

He was the first who introduced reasoning by asking questions, as Phavorinus states in the eighth book of his "Various History;" and he expounded to Leodamas of Thasus the method of inquiry by analysis; and he first invented for the use of philosophy, the word "Antipodes,"² and "Element,"³ and "Dialectic," and "Poems,"⁴ and "the Oblong of Number,"⁵ and "the Superficial Plane of Boundaries,"⁶ and "the Provi-

² By this Plato meant, as we do now, the persons who live on the other side of the world, and whose feet are opposite to those who live on this.

⁴ In lieu of ποίηματα, Menage would read ποιόγητα. For he probably remembered the passage in Theætet. p. 182, A., τὸ δὲ ποιῶν ποῖόν τι δὲλλ' οὐ ποιόγητα.

⁵ Stanley says that by this expression Plato meant the product of a greater number multiplied by a less; and he refers to Theætet. p. 148, A.

⁶— So far was Plato from introducing the expression, τὴν ἐπίπεδον dence of God." [25.] He was the first of the philosophers who opposed the reasoning of Lysias, the son of Cephalus, by exposing it in detail¹ in his Phædrus; and he first examined theoretically the power of the science of grammar. But, as he first spoke against nearly all before his time, it has been made a subject of inquiry, why he has never mentioned Democritus. On his going up to the Olympic games, Neanthes of Cyzicus says that all the Greeks turned their eyes towards him, when he had a meeting with Dion, then about to lead an army against Dionysius. And it is reported, in the first book of "The Memoirs" of Phavorinus, that Mithridates the Persian put up a statue of Plato in the Academy, with this inscription—

Mithridates, the son of Rhodobates, a Persian, has dedicated to the Muses an image of Plato, which Silanion executed.

[26.] Heracleides says, that when Plato was a young man he was so modest and orderly behaved, that he was never seen to laugh excessively; and though he was such a kind of person, he was scoffed at by the Comic writers. For instance, Theopompus in his "Autochares"² says thus—

³ For one is none,

And two, as Plato holds, is scarcely one;⁴

and Anaxandrides too in his "Theseus"—

When olives he devoured, 'that Plato loves';⁵

and Timon likewise, while thus playing on the letters (of his name)—

⁶ As Plato plait, in plaited⁷ wonders skill'd.

ἐπιφάνειαν, that, according to Proclus on Euclid ii., the word ἐπιφάνεια is not found in the sense of ἐπιπιδον, either in Plato or Aristotle. There is doubtless some error here, which I must leave for others to correct, by the aid of Suidas, Ἐπιφάνεια ἰστί σῶματος πίρας ἢ τὸ μήκος καὶ πλάτος μόνον ἔχον, βάθος δὲ οὐ, transcribed from Diogen. L. vii. 135.

² Casaubon would read Ἐδυχάρει in lieu of Ἀβρυχάρει—

³ This is Stanley's version.

⁴ I have translated, as if the Greek were ἓς γ' ἐρᾷ Πλάτων, not ὅσπερ Πλάτων, at variance with the metre; which Hermann supported by reading ὅσπερ καὶ Πλάτων.

⁵ The Greek is ὣς ἀνέκλαττε Πλάτων, πεπλασμίνα θαύματα εἰδώς: where however one would prefer πλατύσημα τὰ θαύματα— to preserve

[27.] Alexis in "Meropis"—

Thou'rt come in time ; since I, in doubtings tost,
Am walking up and down, and, Plato-like,
Find nought that's wise, but merely tire my feet ;

and in "Ancyliion"—

A. Thou speak'st of what 'thou knowest not one jot.

B. Mind has with Plato been a-running.

A. Know'st thou,¹
What is a pound, and 'onions what ?

B. Not I.²

Amphis in "Amphicrates"—

A. What is the good, which you are about to have Through her, I know still less than does my master,
Of the good in Plato.

B. Ear then give.

[28.] And in Dexidemides—

Oh Plato ! how thou nothing know'st, except
To wear a scowling look, and eyebrows raise,
Like one who's bilious,³ with a solemn air.

Cratinus in "Pseud-Hypobolimaëus"—

A. Thou art a man, 'tis plain, and hast a soul.

B. By Plato's doctrine, I know not ; but⁴ I Conceive, at least, I have.

the alliteration : and for the same reason I have translated πλαττειν, "to plait," instead of "to mould."

²—² I have translated, as if the Greek were, not κρόμμων, but κρόμμυ'. ὄς for it seems hardly likely that onions would be spoken of in the singular number.

⁴ I have translated, as if the Greek were ὁδ', ἀλλ' ὑπονοῶ γ' ἔχειν—not ὁδ', ὑπονοῶ δ' ἔχειν—contrary to the metre, where Hermann would read ὁδ', ὑπονοῶ δ' ὥδ' ἔχειν.

Alexis in "Olympiodorus"—

A. My mortal body has become quite dry;
The immortal portion has been lifted up¹
To the air.

B. This is not from the school of Plato.

And in "The Parasite"—

Or to hold idle talk with Plato staid'st thou?²

And Anaxilas likewise makes him his butt in "Botrylion," and "Circé," and "The wealthy women."

[29.] Aristippus too, in his fourth book "On Ancient Luxury," says that he became enamoured of a certain youth, Aster, while studying with him astronomy, and likewise of the before-mentioned Dion; and, some say, of Phædrus too; and that these epigrams, which are from his hands upon them, plainly prove his love.

³The stars, my Star, thou see'st. I heaven would be,
That I with many eyes might gaze on thee.³

And another—

⁴Like morning star, when living thou wast bright;
Now dead, thou art of eve's pale star the light.⁴

[30.] But on Dion in this manner—

For Hecuba and Troy's matrons tears has Fate
Woven, well suited to their hapless⁵ state;
But for thee, Dion, who hadst won the wreath
Of victory by brilliant deeds, the breath

¹ In lieu of ἔξωτε, the sense evidently requires ἔξωπρο, as I have translated. C. F. Hermann, as I learn from Huebner, would read ἔξωτε—

² For the sake of what seems to be the sense, I have translated, as if the Greek were not καρμώνας, but καρίμνεας.

³—³ This is Stanley's version, slightly altered.

⁴—⁴ Stanley's version is—

A Phosphor 'mongst the living late wert thou;
But shin'st among the dead a Hesper now—which is rather closer to the original, literally—"Formerly thou didst shine amongst the living, the star in the east; but now, when dead, thou shinest an Hesperus amongst the dead."

It has been thus translated by Shelley;

Thou wert the morning star among the living,
Ere thy fair light had fled;
Now, having died, thou art as Hesperus, giving
New splendour to the dead.

⁵ I have adopted here the emendation δύσφορμα for δύσφορα, which I proposed in "The Greek Anthology, Prose and Verse," p. 443.

Of dæmons has blown down hopes built in air,¹

²And all that seem'd for Sicily good and fair;³

³Thou liest by people honour'd in the grave;³

For whom my heart did erst love-madden'd rave.

And this they say was inscribed on Dion's tomb at Syracuse.
[31.] They say moreover that, being enamoured of Alexis and Phædrus, as stated above, he acted the poet in this manner—

Alexis, now how great, was then⁴ how small!

I merely said—he's pretty; when by all

⁵The boy was stared at; all to him their feet

Turn'd. Why to dogs didst thou, Soul, show their meat?⁶

For this thou'lt sorrow feel.⁷ Bird-like⁸ e'en so

Did I not lose my Phædrus long ago?

He kept likewise Archæanassa, on whom he made these words—

From Colophon Archæanassa came;

She's mine; and on her wrinkles sits Love's power.

Unhappy ye had run through what a flame!

Who met her⁹ blooming in youth's bursting flower.⁹

¹ Here too I have translated my own ἀερίας ἐλπίδας, in lieu of εὐρείας ἐλπίδας.

²—³ This verse has been introduced, not so much for the rhyme, as to point out the native country of Dion.

³—⁴ The original is literally—"Thou liest in thy extensive country, honoured by citizens;" where the expression εὐρυχώρῳ is strangely applied to the country round Syracuse, which, as being hilly, is rather contracted than extensive.

⁵ The Greek is at present ὅπται, καὶ πάντῃ πᾶς τις—It was originally ὅπται παῖς πάντῃ πᾶς τις—as I have translated. For though πάντῃ πᾶς would be perfectly correct, yet in that case τις would not be added; at least it is not so elsewhere.

⁶ Literally "bone."

⁷ I have adopted Stephens' ἀνήσει (2nd pers. fut. med.) in lieu of ἀνήσει (3rd pers. fut. act.).

⁸ In lieu of ὕστερον I have translated, as if the Greek were ὥς πτερόν—remembering the expression ὥσι πτερόν in Homer, descriptive of a rapid flight.

⁹—⁹ Such is the meaning given by Jacobs to πρωτοβόλου, which he has suggested in lieu of πρωτοπλόου. Stanley's version is—

To Archæ'nassa, on whose furrow'd brow
Love sits in triumph, I my service vow:

[32.] And these on Agathon—

While kissing Agathon, my soul
 I felt upon my lip;
 For there it hapless came, I ween,
 To take its final trip.¹

And another²—

I pelt thee with an apple; if a love
 Thou feel'st, accept the gift, my fair:
 And in return—³ that I the truth may prove—⁴
 Grant of thy virgin charms a share.
 But if thou think'st, what ne'er may be, (of wrong,)
 This counsel take (by lover told):
 Thy youthful years consider well; not long
 They'll last; and soon thou wilt be old.
 I am the apple, that a lover throws;
 'Consent, ere on us both age sends its snows.'⁵

[33.] They say too that the epigram on the Eretrians, who were caught in a net, is his—

'We are of the race of Eretria in Eubœa; but near Susa
 We are lying. Alas! how far from our own land.'⁶

If her declining graces shine so bright,
 What flames felt you, who saw her noon of light!

¹ This epigram has been thus translated by Shelley—

Kissing Helena, together
 With my kiss, my soul beside it Came to my lips, and there I kept it,—
 For the poor thing had wandered thither,
 To follow where the kiss should guide it:
 O, cruel I, to intercept it!

² Before ἄλλο has evidently dropt out εἰς καλὴν, or the name of some female; for to such only would the following epigram be addressed, as shown by Virgil's—"Malo me Galatœa petit, lasciva puella."

³— For the words between the numerals there is no warrant in the original.

⁴— Literally—"Nod kindly, Xanthippé; I and thou are decaying." Stanley's version is—

An apple I, Love's emblem, at thee throw;
 Thou in exchange thy virgin zone bestow.
 If thou refuse my suit, yet read in this,
 How short thy years; how frail thy beauty is.
 I cast the apple; loving, who loves thee,
 Xanthippé, yield. For soon both old will be.

⁵— Stanley's translation is—

We, in Eubœa born, Eretrians are Buried in Susa, from our country far.

And that one—

¹The Cyprian (goddess said) to the Muses, "Damsels, Venus Honour, or I will arm Love against you."

The Muses (replied) to Venus, "These mouthings are for Mars: That little boy flies not to us."¹

And another—

²A man, on finding gold, left a rope; but he the gold,
Who had left it, not finding, tied (to himself) the rope he found.²

[34.] But Molon,³ who had a feeling of enmity against Plato, observed, that "It was not a wonderful thing for Dionysius to be in Corinth, but for Plato to be in Sicily."⁴ Xenophon, too, appears to have been not kindly disposed towards him; for, as if through a love of contention, the two wrote a Symposium, an Apology for Socrates, and Memoirs relating to ethical subjects: further, one wrote a polity, and the other,

With regard to the fact of their being caught in a net, the story is told by Herodotus, vi. 101, and alluded to by Plato in Menex. § 10.

"Virgins," said Venus to the Muses, "pay Homage to us, or Love shall wound your hearts."
The Muses answer'd—"Take those toys away;
Our breasts are proof against his childish darts."

Another translation will be found in the "Greek Anthology, Prose and Verse," p. 2.

²— Stanley's translation of this Epigram, where the terseness of the original defies a modern metrical version, is not the worst attempt that has been hitherto made—

One, finding gold, in change his halter quits;
Missing the gold, t'other the halter knits.

Shelley has translated it thus—

A man, who was about to hang himself,
Finding a purse, then threw away his rope;
The owner coming to reclaim his pelf,
The halter found and used it. So is Hope Changed for Despair—one laid upon the shelf,
We take the other. Under heaven's high cope
Fortune is god. All you endure and do Depend on circumstance as much as you.

³ Instead of ἀλλὰ τοι Μολων, MS. Cantab. offers ἀλλὰ Τιμολίων, correctly, it would seem; for τοι never, I believe, thus follows τοι.

⁴ To understand this remark, it should be borne in mind that Dionysius, after being the tyrant of Syracuse, turned schoolmaster at Corinth, where he could practise the virtues he had been taught by the philosophers, whom he had attracted to his court; whereas Plato would stand a chance of forgetting there all the lessons of virtue he had inculcated upon others.

the education of Cyrus; while Plato in the "Laws" asserts that the education of Cyrus was a fiction; for he was not such a kind of person; and though both make mention of Socrates, neither of them do so of each other, except Xenophon of Plato in the 3rd book of his "Memoirs." [35.] It is reported likewise that Antisthenes, being about to read something he had written, invited Plato to be present; and on Plato asking what he was about to read, he said—¹ On the being to not contradict; ¹ when on Plato saying—How then are you writing on this very subject?—and on his showing that Antisthenes was turning round on himself, ² the latter wrote a dialogue against Plato with the title of "Sathon;" from whence they continued through life estranged from each other. They say, too, that Socrates, on hearing Plato read his Lysis, remarked—How many falsehoods, by Hercules, has this young man told against me! For the man had written not a little that Socrates had never said. [36.] Against Aristippus likewise Plato had a feeling of hatred. At least in his dialogue "On the Soul," he slanders Aristippus, by saying that he was not present at the death of Socrates, but absent in Ægina, although it was close at hand. ³ He had likewise a feeling of rivalry towards Æschines; and they say that, ⁴ although he was himself in good repute with Dionysius, yet, that Æschines, who had come (to Syracuse) on account of his poverty, was looked down upon by Plato, ⁴ but was taken under his protection by Aristippus; and Idomeneus asserts that the reasons which Plato assigns to Crito, while consulting (with Socrates) in person about his flight, were those given by Æschines; but that Plato assigned them to Crito through his ill-feeling towards the other party.

[37.] Of himself Plato has no where in his writing made any mention, except in the dialogue "On the Soul," and in the "Apology." Of his dialogues Aristotle says that their

² Such, I presume, is the proper meaning here of περιτρέψας.

³ I have translated, as if οὐσιν had dropt out after συνεγγός—

⁴ I have adopted the emendation, suggested by Wyttenbach on Plutarch Moral. p. 504, ed Ox. = i. p. 407, Lips., who reads καὶ τὸν for ὁν before ἰθακίαν.

style¹ is between poetry and prose; while Phavorinus states some where, that Aristotle alone remained, when Plato was reading his dialogue "On the Soul;" whereas all the others rose up (and departed). And some affirm that Philip of Opuntium transcribed his "Laws," when still on the wax-tablet; and they say that to Philip belongs the Epinomis. Moreover, Euphorion and Panætius have stated that the commencement of "The Republic" was found to have been frequently turned about,² nearly the whole of which, says Aristoxenus, had been written in "The Opposite Reasonings"³ of Protagoras; [38.] and that the first dialogue he wrote was the Phædrus; for the question mooted there has something of a juvenile character; while Dicæarchus blames the whole manner of writing as being rather gross.⁴

Plato, when he saw a person playing at dice, is reported to have found fault with him; and on the party saying "It was for a trifle," he replied, "But the habit is not a trifle."

On being asked whether any thing of his would be, like those of former men, kept in recollection? he replied, "There is need of a name first; and then there will be many."

On Xenocrates once coming into his house, Plato told him to whip his slave; for he himself was not able, through being in a passion: and to one of his slaves he said, "You would have been flogged, had I not been in a passion."

[39.] After sitting upon horse-back, he got down immediately, observing that he was careful not to be convicted of horse-pride.⁵

To drunkards he recommended to look into a mirror; for they would abstain from conduct so unbecoming: and he said (in the Laws, vi. p. 775, B.) it was not proper to drink to ¹ So I have translated ἰδίαν, without any regard to the philosophical meaning attached to that word; which Hermogenes has used in a similar sense in his Criticisms on Demosthenes.

² The metaphor in τορραμίνην will be best understood by Horace's "Sæpe stylum vertas."

³ Of these "Opposite Reasonings" of Protagoras, some idea may be formed by a perusal of the Pseudo-Platonic Demodocus.

⁴ Such is the proper meaning of φορτικός. For Dicæarchus, doubtless, saw through the real meaning of that dialogue, of which the Neo-Platonists, judging from Hermias' Commentary, had not the most distant idea.

⁵ In the word ἵππορασις there is a play on ἵππος, which, in composition, means "great as a horse." So in English we say, "horse-radish," and "horse-mackerel."

intoxication, except during the festival of the god, who gave wine (to man).

To sleep much was displeasing to him. At least he observes in the "Laws," (vii. p. 808, B.,) that "a person sleeping is worth nothing."

[40.] On the subject of truth he speaks thus in the "Laws," (ii. p. 663, E.,) "A beautiful thing, and enduring, O stranger, is truth: but it seems to be not easy to persuade (persons of this)."

Moreover he thought himself worthy of some memorial being left of him either by his friends or in (his own) books.¹

He went from place to place for the most part by himself;² as some say.

He died in the manner we have mentioned above, in the thirteenth year of the reign of Philip (of Macedon), as Phavorinus states in the third book of his "Memoirs;" and from him (Philip), says Theopompus, he met with some reproof.³

Myronianus remarks in his "Similar," that Philo makes mention of the lice of Plato, as if he had died in that way.⁴

[41.] He was buried in⁵ Academia, where he had passed the greatest part of his life as a philosopher: from whence his sect was called "The Academiaick;" and his funeral was attended by the people there in a body, after he had made his will in this manner:—"Plato has left this property and (thus) disposed of it, (to wit,) the plot of ground in the ward of Hephæstia, on which the road, that leads from the temple in Cephisia, borders on the north side, and on the south the temple of Hercules in Hephæstia, and on the east is Archestratus, the Phrearrian, and on the west Philip, the Chollidean; and let it be lawful for no one to sell it, or to exchange it;

¹ I have inserted "his own." For the remark seems to have been an answer to some person, who probably found fault with Plato for making mention of himself in the "Phædo" and "Apology."

² I confess I cannot understand what αὐτὸς means here. Perhaps in καὶ αὐτὸς lies hid ἀελητος, "uninvited—"

³ It is to be regretted that Theopompus did not state, or that Diogenes did not transcribe more fully from Theopompus, what and for what was the reproof alluded to.

⁴ The subject of "The Similar" of Myronianus may be guessed at by knowing that Pherecydes and others mentioned by Plutarch and Heladius, quoted by Menage, died of the "morbus pediculosus."

⁵ Not "in," but "near," says Menage on the authority of Pausanias, Ἀκαδημίας οὐ πόρῳ Πλάτωνος μνημῆϊ ἴσιν.

but let it be, as far as is possible,¹ the property of the boy Adeimantus. [42.] Likewise the plot of ground in the parish of Eroiada², which I purchased from Callimachus, whose neighbour on the north side is Eurymedon the Myrrhinusian, and on the south side Demostratus of Xypeté,³ on the east Eurymedon the Myrrhinusian, on the west the (river) Cephus. (Likewise) 3 minæ; a silver phial weighing 165 drachms; a boat-(like vessel⁴) weighing 45 (drachms); a gold finger-ring, a gold ear-ring, both together weighing 4 drachms and 3 oboli. Euclides the stone-cutter owes me 3 minæ. I give Artemis⁵ her freedom. I leave behind me as domestics, Tycon, Bictas,⁶ Apolloniades, Dionysius; [43.] the utensils written down, of which Demetrius has the counterpart writings;⁷ and I am in debt to nobody. The executors are ¹ The same formula, to which Casaubon once objected, is found, he says, in the will of Epicurus, and answers to the Latin "quacunq; ratione" in Digest. de Legatis iii.

² I have adopted Ἐροιάδων and Ζυρτιάων, in lieu of Ἐροιάδων and Ζυρτιάων, as suggested by Casaubon: who refers to Steph. Byz. in Ἐροιάδων and Ζυρτίαν.

⁴ This seems a strange name for a female slave; and so is Dionysius for a male one.

⁵ In lieu of Βίτραν, Menage would read Βίτιαν, referring to Suidas, Βίτιας ὄνομα κύριον: or rather Βίριαν, remembering in Virgil, Æn. i. 742, "Tum Bitis dedit increpitans;" where Servius says that Bitias was a Carthaginian name, as shown by Livy, who mentions a Bitias as a commander of the Punic fleet. It was likewise a Trojan name, says Menage, as shown by Æn. ix. 672, "Pandarus et Bitias Idæo Alcanore creti." But Βίτρας, I suspect, is the Latin "Vict-as." For B in Greek supplies the place of V in Latin, as shown by Φαβρωπίτης and "Phavorinus." And if this be a correct notion, the will would be a forgery, as Stanley seems to have suspected. For he remarks that "if this will be not forged," the assertion of Apuleius is false; who states in his treatise De Dogmat. Platon., "that the patrimony Plato left was a little orchard, adjoining the Academy, two servants, and a cup, wherein he supplicated to the gods, of gold no more than he wore, as an ear-ring, when he was a boy, the emblem of his nativity." The word in the early Latin translation by Ambrosius is "hycam." From which it is evident that he found in his MS. visrav—where v is an error for u (i. e. β). See my note on Æsch. Eum. 115, in Addend.

⁷ By ἀντιγραφα, Stanley understands "inventory." The word means rather "the counterpart copies" of a will, as shown by Casaubon and Salmasius, quoted by Menage on Diogen. L. v. 57.

Sosthenes, Speusippus, Demetrius, Hegias, Eurymedon, Calimachus, Thrasippus." In this manner did he dispose of his property. And upon him these epigrams were written. The first is—

In temperance and morals just who shone
All men beyond, Aristocles here lies.
If Wisdom ever praise from all has won,
He has won most; and from him Envy flies.

[44.] And another—

Earth in her bosom Plato's body hides;
His soul to the ranks of blest immortals strays:
To Ariston's son the good man, who abides
Far off, for a godlike life¹ due honour pays.

And another of a more recent date—

Why, eagle, hast thou come over a tomb? and of whom is it, say?
And (why) art thou looking to the starry dwelling of the gods?
Of the soul of Plato, that has flown to Olympus,
I am the image; but his earth-born body the land² of Attica holds.³

[45.] And there is my own to this effect—

'Had not Apollo, to the Grecians kind,
To Plato's wit his godlike art resign'd,
Where had we found a cure for human souls?
For as Asclepius by his skill controls

² Instead of δὲ τοῦ, Jacobs suggests δὲ γῆ— to which δὲ γῆ in MS. Cant. evidently leads.

³ Of this epigram there is a metrical translation by T. P. R. in the "Greek Anthology, Prose and Verse," p. 27, to which may be added my own—

A. Why, eagle, comest thou o'er this spot? Declare Whose tomb is here? Why on the starry throne
Of the gods look'st thou? B. To the upper air
The soul of Plato, like a bird, has flown,
Of which I am the image; the remains
Of earth-born body Attic soil retains.

It has also been translated by Shelley—

Eagle! why soarest thou above that tomb?
To what sublime and starry-paved home Floatest thou?
I am the image of swift Plato's spirit,
Ascending heaven—Athena doth inherit

⁴— This translation has been slightly altered from the one by Smith in "The Lives and Opinions of the Ancient Philosophers, from Diogenes Laërtius."

The various pains the body's forced to feel,
So Plato's words the pains of mind can heal.⁴

And another, as to how he died—

Asclepius and Plato Phœbus gave
To man; that one the body's health might save,
The soul's the other. But when down, to grace
A marriage, came the god, and deign'd to trace
The city, that for him had Plato made,

Such are the epigrams.

[46.] His disciples were, Speusippus of Athens, Xenocrates of Chalcedon, Aristotle of Stageira, Philip of Opuntium, Hestæus of Perinthus, Dion of Syracuse, Amyclus² of Heraclea, Erastus and Coriscus of Scepsus, ³Timolaus of Cyzicum, Euæon³ of Lampsacus, Bithon⁴ and Heracleides of Ænus, Hippothales and Callippus of Athens, Demetrius of Amphipolis, Heracleides of Pontus, and many others; together with whom were two women, Lasthenéa of Mantinéa and Axiothea the Phliasian, who, as Dicæarchus says, put on male attire.⁵ And some say that Theophrastus was one of his auditors, and Hyperides, the orator; and Lycurgus, too, says Chamæleon; and Demosthenes in like manner, as Polemon has handed down; ⁶what Sabinus too asserts, bringing forward as his authority⁶ Mnesistratus of Thasus, in the fourth book of his "Wood of Meditations;" and the thing is likely.

[47.] Now for thee,⁷ who art justly fond of Plato, and

² Ælian, in Var. Hist. iii. 19, has Ἀμύκλας, which Menage says is more correct. For -ας is the Doric termination, which would be adopted in Heraclea, a city said to have been colonized by the people of Megara and Tanagra.

³—³ Instead of Τιμόλαος, Athenæus has Τίμαιος, in xii. p. 509, A.; and in p. 508, F., Εὐάγων instead of Εὐαίων, as remarked by the critics here.

⁴ The name, says Casaubon, is Πύθων in Demosthenes, Aristocrat p. 659, 27, R., and Plutarch ii. p. 1126, C., to whom Menage adds, Philostatus, V. A. vii. 1; but in Aristot. Polit. v. 10, Πάρων, where Victorius would read Πύθων. The two brothers were crowned with golden crowns for the good service they had done Athens by destroying Cotys, the tyrant of Thrace.

⁵ Axiothea was therefore the strong-minded Bloomer of her day.

⁶—⁶ I have adopted Casaubon's correction, ὁ Σαβίνος λίγου κατὰ— in lieu of Σαβίνος λίγου καί—

⁷ Reinesius, in Var. Lect. ii. 12, with whom Menage agrees, conceives seekest at the hands of any one soever very zealously the settled opinions of the philosopher, I deem it necessary to delineate both the nature of his reasonings and the order of his dialogues, and the road of his instruction,¹ in a manner, as far as is possible, elementary and reduced to heads, in order that the account of his life may not be without a share of that relating to his settled opinions; for it would be, as they say, ²bringing an owl to Athens,³ should it be required to narrate them to thee according to each species.

[48.] They say then that Zeno of Elea first wrote dialogues. But Aristotle, in the first book "About Poets," says it was Alexamenus a Styrian, or Teian, as Phavorinus asserts in his "Memoirs." But it appears to me that Plato would, by having bestowed great care on that kind of writing, justly carry off the first prize, as well for beauty as invention likewise.

Now a dialogue is a conversation, composed of question and answer, upon some of the subjects relating to philosophy or polity, with a becoming representation of the manners of the persons introduced, and ³the dressing of their diction.³ But the dialogue-art is that of a conversation, by which 'we arrange or re-arrange'⁴ a subject, according to the questions and answers of the parties conversing. [49.] Now of the Platonic dialogues⁵ there are two kinds marked of old;⁶ the expositive and the inquisitive: and these are divided, the expositive into two other marked kinds, the theoretical and practical; of which the theoretical belongs to the physical and logical; that the female here alluded to was the Arria mentioned by Pseudo-Galen de Theriac. ad Pison, § 2.

¹ Casaubon, unable to understand επαγωγῆς, proposed to read ἀγωγῆς. I have translated, as if the Greek were παυδαγωγίας—

² As owls seem to have been plentiful at Athens, being sacred to the tutelary deity, the proverb may be compared with the corresponding one in English, "To carry coals to Newcastle."

³ This is perhaps the best translation of τῆς κατὰ λῆξιν κατασκευῆς: for the words σκευῆ and κατασκευῆ were technically used to express, what we mean by dressing a character for the stage.

⁴ The Greek is ἀνασκευάζομιν τι ἢ κατασκευάζομεν, with an ὑπερ-ρον πρότερον, which I have avoided in the version.

⁵ Since two MSS. read τοῦ δὲ λόγου in lieu of τοῦ δὲ λόγου, Huebner correctly suggested τοῦ δὲ διαλόγου— what I have adopted.

⁶ As οὐ is found before πρῶτοι just afterwards, so it should be here before ἀνωτάτοι— to preserve at once the syntax and sense.

but the practical to the ethical and political. And of the inquisitive there are likewise two principal marked kinds; one is 'after the manner of a fight (with gloves), and the other after that (with fists);¹ and to the former belongs that which is maieutic² and tentative; but to the latter that which is detective³ and eversive.

[50.] It does not however lie hid from us, that some assert that dialogues differ in another manner. For they say that some are dramatic, and some of a narrative, and others of a mixed kind. But such persons have designated the difference in dialogues by a name rather after the manner of tragic writers, than of philosophers.

Now of the physical kind there is the Timæus; of the logical, the Statesman, and Cratylus, and Parmenides, and the Sophist. But of the moral, the Apology, and Crito, and Phædo, and Phædrus, and the Banquet, and Menexenus, and Clitophon, and the Letters,⁴ and Philebus, Hipparchus, (and) the Rivals. But of the political, the Republic and Laws, and Minos and the Epinomis, and the Atlantic.⁵ [51.] Of the maieutic, the two Alcibiades, Theages, Lysis, (and) Laches; of the tentative, Euthyphron, Meno, Ion, Charmides, (and) Theætetus; of the detective one,⁶ the Protagoras; and of the eversive, the Euthydemus, the two Hippias, (and) Gorgias. Thus much then suffice it to say on the subject of the dialogue, as to what it is, and what are its different kinds.

But since there is much of factious contention, some asserting that Plato dogmatizes, and others not, come, let us take a part in these matters likewise. Now to dogmatize is to lay ¹—¹ By this version an English reader will have the best idea of what is meant in Greek by γυμναστικός and ἀγωνιστικός: the latter of which is applied to a real contest, the former to a sham one.

² The word μαϊευτικός is literally, "that which belongs to a midwife;" an expression introduced by Socrates, who, being the son of a midwife, said he treated the minds of men, as his mother did the bodies of women, by delivering them respectively of their thoughts and children.

³ By ἐνδεδαιτικός Casaubon understands "the accusatory." But as Plato never, if I rightly remember, brings an accusation against any of his opponents, but merely lays bare their fallacies, I have translated "detective."

⁴ It seems rather strange to rank the Letters amongst the moral dialogues. See § 61, and 62.

⁵ This is now called more commonly the Critias.

⁶ Instead of εἰς, I have translated as if the Greek were εἰς— down an opinion, just as to legislate is to lay down laws: and the word dogma is applied in both ways, to the thing about which there is an opinion, and to the opinion itself. [52.] Now of these, the thing about which there is an opinion, is a proposition, but the opinion itself is a supposition. Plato then, on subjects which he comprehends, exhibits his opinions; but what is false, he refutes; while on such as are not clear, he holds back. Now on points, that seem to him (to be true), he shows himself through four characters, Socrates, Timæus, the stranger from Athens,¹ and the Eleatic stranger.² These strangers are not, however, as some imagine, Plato and Parmenides, but fictitious characters without a name; since, while Plato is detailing what is said by Socrates and Timæus, he is putting forth his own opinions. But he introduces by name,³ when convicted of false notions, Thrasymachus, and Callicles, and Polus and Gorgias, and Protagoras, and Hippias too, and Euthydemus, and those who are like them. [53.] And while he is putting together his proofs, he makes use of induction for the most part; not however in one form, but two-fold. Now induction is a reasoning that from certain truths (really existing)⁴ infers a truth peculiarly⁵ similar to itself. Of this induction there are two kinds; one, according to a contrariety, and the other from consequence. That according to contrariety is, when about⁶ the whole answer the contrary to what has been asked shall follow; for example—My father is either different from, or the same as, your father. If then your father is different from my father, he would not, as being different from a father, be a father. But if he is the same as my father, he would, as being the same as my father, be my father. [54.] And again—If man is not an animal, he would be stone or wood. Now he is not stone or wood. For he is a thing with life, and is moved by himself. He is ¹ This person is introduced in the Laws.

² This character is introduced in the Sophist.

³ I have translated, as if the Greek were ονόματι, not οἶον—For thus the persons without a name in some dialogues are opposed to those with a name in others.

⁴ The sense evidently requires τινὸν ὄντως ἀληθῶν in the Greek, not τινὸν ἀληθῶν—and so I have translated.

⁵ I confess I cannot understand οἰκείως—Perhaps the author wrote αἰσῶς, “reasonably—”

⁶ Instead of περί, “about,” one would have expected παρὰ, “along—” then an animal. But if he is an animal, so also is a dog and a bull an animal. ¹A man then, as being an animal, would be a dog or bull.¹ Now this is the kind of induction according to a contrariety ²and a contest,² of which Plato makes use, not to dogmatize, but to confute. But the kind according to a consequence is likewise two-fold; one demonstrating what is sought for in part by means of that which exists in part; the other, rendered credible as a whole by means of that which is taken as a part. The former is suited for oratory; the latter, for logic. For example, in the former it is inquired, whether this man ³has murdered somebody, a proof being,³ that he was found at that very time, with blood upon him. [55.] Now this is the oratorical kind of induction, since the orator's art is occupied about particulars, not universals. For it does not make an inquiry about abstract justice, but about things that are just in a particular point of view; but the other is dialectical, through the universal being proved⁴ by the particulars. For example, it sought whether the soul is immortal, and whether the living proceed from the dead; which is shown in the dialogue "On the Soul," through something universal, (namely,) that opposites proceed from opposites; and that the Universal is itself composed of particulars; for example, that sleeping proceeds from being awake, and conversely; and that the greater proceeds from the less, and conversely. Now of this kind has Plato made use for building up his own notions.

[56.] And as of old in a tragedy at first the Chorus alone went through the drama, but afterwards Thespis invented one actor to enable the Chorus to be at rest, and Æschylus a second actor, and Sophocles a third, and they thus filled up the tragedy; so in the case of a philosophical discourse, it was formerly of one kind, relating to physics; but Socrates

¹ The Greek is εἴη ἂν καὶ ὁ ἄνθρωπος ζῶν καὶ κύων καὶ ὁ βοῦς: where C. F. Hermann was the first to read εἴη ἂν ἄνθρωπος, ζῶν ὄν— but he failed to read likewise ἡ κύων ἡ βοῦς— similar to λιθος ἡ ξύλον just before. And so I have translated. Compare Euthydem. § 62, 63.

² The words καὶ μάχην are quite unnecessary here.

³ I have translated, as if the Greek were ἀπίκτεινν τινα, ἀπόδειξις οὐσα— not ἀπίκτεινν ἀπόδειξις—

added ethica, and Plato dialectica, and he thus worked out philosophy to an end. But Thrasyllus says that Plato put forth his dialogues after the manner of the tragic tetralogy; just as they¹ (the tragedians) contended with four dramas,² at the Dionysia, the Lenæa, the Panathenæa, and the Chytiri;³ of which the fourth was a satyric drama; and the four were called a tetralogy. [57.] Now there are, says he, in all fifty-six genuine dialogues of Plato—the Republic,⁴ nearly the whole of which, says Phavorinus in the 2nd book of his “Various History,” is found in the “Opposite Reasonings” of Protagoras,⁵ being divided into ten, and the Laws into twelve, forming nine tetralogies, the Republic occupying the place of one book,⁶ and of one book⁷ likewise the Laws. And he lays down as the first tetralogy, that which embraces a common argument. For he is desirous of showing of what kind would be the life of a philosopher. And he adopts for each book a double title; one derived from a name, and another from the matter. [58.] In the tetralogy, which is the first, the Euthyphron, or On Holiness, takes the lead; and the dialogue is tentative; the second is The Apology of Socrates, moral; the third, Crito, or About what is to be done, moral; the fourth, Phædon, or About the Soul, moral. The second tetralogy, in which the Cratylus, or On the Rectitude of Names, takes the lead, is logical; the Theætetus, or On Knowledge, tentative; the Sophist, or On the Being, logical; the Statesman, or On Kingly Power, logical. In the third (tetralogy), the Parmenides, or About Ideas, is logical; the Philebus, or On Pleasure, moral; the Banquet, or About Good,⁸ moral; the Phædrus, or About Love, moral. [59.] In the fourth (tetralogy), the (first) Alcibiades, or About the ¹ ἄνθρωποι is to be referred to τραγῳδοί, to be got out of τραγικὴν. See Porson on Hec. 22.

²⁻³ The words between the numerals are rejected by Wyttenbach in Biblioth. Crit. ii. 3, p. 56, for he knew that tragedies were not performed at the two Panathenæic festivals, nor at the Χέρποι, which was the last day of the Ἀθροιστήρια. Perhaps, however, in the time of Thrasyllus, or even earlier, when Athens ceased to be an independent state, plays were not confined, as formerly, to the Dionysia and Lenæa.

³⁻⁵ The same story told in § 37.

⁴⁻⁶ In lieu of βιβλίον one would have expected διαλόγον, to show that the thirty-six dialogues made nine tetralogies.

⁷ This title seems strangely mentioned, instead of “About Love—” for such is the subject of the Banquet.

Nature of Man, takes the lead, maieutic; the Second Alcibiades, or About Prayer, maieutic; the Hipparchus, or About the Love of Gain,¹ moral; the Rivals, or About Philosophy, moral. In the fifth (tetralogy), the Theages, or About Philosophy, takes the lead, maieutic; the Charmides, or About Temperance, tentative; the Laches, or About Fortitude, maieutic; the Lysis, or About Friendship, maieutic. In the sixth (tetralogy), the Euthydemus, or the Disputations, takes the lead, eversive; the Protagoras, or the Sophist, detective; the Gorgias, or On the Orator's Art, eversive; the Meno, or On Virtue, tentative. [60.] In the seventh (tetralogy), the two Hippias take the lead; the first, or About the Beautiful; the second, or About Falsehood, (both) eversive; the Ion, or About the Iliad,² tentative; the Menexenus, or The Funeral (Oration), moral. In the eighth (tetralogy), the Cleitophon, or the Exhortative, moral; the Republic, or About Justice, political; the Timæus, or About Nature, physical; the Critias, or the Atlantic, moral. In the ninth (tetralogy), the Minos, or About Law, political, takes the lead; the Laws, or About Legislation, political; the Epinomis, or the Night-meeting,³ or Philosopher, political. [61.] There are thirteen Epistles of a moral kind, on which he inscribed Εὖ πράττειν,⁴ but Epicurus Εὖ διαίγειν,⁵ and Cleon *Χαίρειν*⁶—one to Aristodemus; two to Archytas; four to Dionysius; one to Hermeias, (and) Erastus, and Coriscus; one to Leodamas; one to Perdiccas; and two to the family-friends of Dion. Such is the division that Thrasyllus makes, and some others. But some, amongst whom is Aristophanes the grammarian, distributed the dialogues into trilogies; and they put down as the first, the one in which the Republic, Timæus, (and) Critias take the lead; as the second, (where) the ¹ I have adopted Περὶ φιλοκέρδους, or, as it should be written, Περὶ φιλοκέρδειας, in lieu of ἡ φιλοκέρδης, to which Boeckh on Pseudo-Platon. Min. p. 36, objected, not aware that Περὶ φιλοκέρδους was found in ed. Steph. and MS. Vindob.

² The correct title would be, "About the Rhapsodist's Art."

³ The "night-meeting" alluded to is mentioned in Epinom. p. 992, D. § 13, but more fully in the Laws, x. p. 909, A. § 15; xii. p. 968, A. § 14.

⁴ i. e. "Be prosperous."

⁵ i. e. "Pass life happily."

⁶ i. e. "Rejoice," or "hail." The latter is the usual version; but the other is better suited to the event, which Cleon's letter announced, when he told his countrymen of the surrender of the Spartans at Sphacteria.

Sophist, Statesman, (and) Critias (do so); [62.] as the third, (where) ¹the Laws, Minos,¹ (and) Epinomis; as the fourth, (where) the Theætetus, Euthyphron, (and) Apology; as the fifth, (where) the Criton, Phædon, (and) Epistles;² but the rest singly, and in no order. But some, as before stated, begin with the Republic; others from the greater³ Alcibiades; and others from the Theages; and some, too, from the Euthyphron; others from the Cleitophon; some from the Timæus; some from the Phædrus; and others from the Theætetus; and many make a beginning with the Apology. Of the dialogues, which are rejected as confessedly spurious, there are ⁴Midon, the horse-breeder;⁴ Eryxias, or Erasistratus; Alcyon;⁵ and, the headless,⁶ Sisyphus, Axiochus, Phæaces,⁷ Demodocus, ⁸Chelidon, Hebdomé,⁸ Epimenides;⁹ of which the Alcyon appears to be Leon's,¹⁰ as Phavorinus says in the fifth book of his "Memoirs."

[63.] He has made use of words with various meanings, so that the business, which he has in hand, might not be easily seen at one view by the uneducated. He considers wisdom to be peculiarly the knowledge of things, perceptible by the mind and existing in reality; which knowledge he says (is conversant) about god, and soul apart from body; but individually he calls ¹¹philosophy wisdom, as being a longing after the divine wisdom;¹¹ but commonly all skill is by him

² How the Epistles could be classed with the Criton and Phædon, it is difficult to understand. See § 50.

³ The "greater" is used here, it would seem, for the "longer," like the "greater" Hippias.

⁴ Of this dialogue I have spoken sufficiently in the Introduction to it.

⁵, ⁷, ⁹ Of the Alcyon, and Phæaces, and Epimenides nothing is known but the titles.

⁶ The "headless" were so called, from their not having a regular beginning.

¹⁰ Menage asks whether to this Leon is to be attributed the dialogue, called Ἀλεῶν, found amongst the works of Lucian?

¹¹ This remark seems to be founded on Definit. p. 414, B., φιλοσοφία τῆς τῶν ὄντων δι' ἐπιστήμης ὁραεῖς.

designated wisdom; as when he calls the Demiurgus¹ wise. And he makes use of the same word in different senses. For instance, the word φᾶλος is taken by him in the sense of "simple," as it is applied by Euripides in his Licymnius to Hercules, thus—

Simple, not over-fine, greatly good, cutting off
In acts all sophistry,²
In the talkings of idlers unpractised.

And sometimes Plato uses it in respect to what is good,³ and sometimes likewise to what is little. [64.]⁴ And frequently he applies different nouns to signify the same thing. For example, Idea is both Species, and Genus, and Pattern, and Principle, and Cause. He adopts likewise contrary words to express the same thing. For he calls what is perceptible by the mind, both⁵ Entity and Non-entity; Entity, on account of its being generated; Non-entity, on account of its constant change; and likewise Idea, as being neither moved nor at rest; and the Same, and One, and Many.⁶ And he is accustomed to do the same in the case of more words.

[65.] The exposition of his reasoning is three-fold. First, it is requisite to show clearly what is each of the points spoken of; next, on what account they are spoken of, whether according to the leading notion, or in the portion of a similitude, and for the building up of the fixed opinion; and thirdly, whether they are spoken of correctly.

But, since some marks are placed in his books, come let us say something about them.

The X is adopted for (peculiar) words and figures of speech, and universally for what is the custom of Plato.

² Here σοφίαν is taken, like σοφιστής, in a bad sense. These verses, descriptive of the character of Hercules, might be applied with equal truth to England's great captain, recently departed; and not less so the language of an unknown author quoted by Suidas in Εὔδεια, to this effect—"The glory, which he had acquired by his victories over enemies, and by his strict justice in times of peace, made him a still more worthy object for all to look upon."

⁵ See Sophist, § 63 and 91.

The double (line) > is used for the fixed opinions and favourite views of Plato.

The X with dots around, ✕, for extracts and 'pretty pieces of writing.'¹

The doubled (line) with dots around, ≡, for corrections of some kind.

The spit with dots around, ÷, ² for the rejections of what is silly.³

The antisigma⁴ with dots around, ∷, 'for the two uses and change in the position of the writings.'⁴

The thunderbolt ↓ for the leading to philosophy.

The asterisk * for the agreement in fixed opinions.

The spit — for the rejection (of matter).

Such are the marks, and so many the books, which, says Antigonos in his work "On Zeno," when recently published, if a person wished ⁵ to read and know thoroughly,⁵ he paid to their owners for the hire of them.

[67.] His favourite notions were these. He said that the soul was immortal, and invested itself with many bodies,⁶ and that its principle was in ⁷ arithmetic, but that of the body in geometry;⁷ and he defined it as the form of a spirit standing ⁸ altogether apart;⁸ and that it is self-moved;⁹ and is tripartite;¹⁰ for that its rational portion is seated about the head; its irascible about the heart; and its concupiscible about the

¹ Such, I presume, is the sense here of καλλιγραφίας: which elsewhere means the mechanical act of writing beautifully.

² Unable to understand πρὸς τὰς εἰκαιὺς ἀθερήσεις, I have translated, as if the Greek were πρὸς τὰς τοῦ εἰκαίου ἀθερήσεις.

³ The mark) is called anti-sigma, because it is the contrary to (; for so that letter was sometimes written of old.

⁴ Such is the literal version of the Greek πρὸς τὰς διττὰς χρήσεις καὶ μεταβάσεις τῶν γραφῶν— which I must leave for others to understand, or correct, if they can.

⁵ Instead of διαγνῶναι, Casaubon proposed to read ἀναγνῶναι, found subsequently in a Paris MS., as Menage testifies. I have translated, as if the author had written ἀναγνῶναι καὶ διαγνῶναι.

⁶ This is stated in Phædon, p. 87, B.

⁷ I do not remember where Plato thus describes the soul and body.

⁸ In the words τοῦ πάντῃ διωστώτος— there is probably a lacuna to be thus supplied— τοῦ ἀπὸ παντὸς πάντῃ διωστώτος, i. e. "standing apart from every thing on every side."

⁹ This is the leading doctrine, on which the immortality of the soul is based in the Phædon.

¹⁰ See Rep. p. 580, D., which Cicero in Tuscul. i. had in mind.

navel and liver;¹⁰ [68.] and that (proceeding)¹ from the middle² it embraces entirely (as) in a circle the body; and that it is composed of the elements; and that, divided according to harmonic intervals, it forms two circles united together; of which the inner circle, being divided into six parts, makes seven circles in all; and that this lies along a diameter towards the left from within; but the outer along a side towards the right; on which account it rules, as being one; for the other is divided from within;³ and that one circle belongs to the same, and the others to the different; (and he asserts) that this⁴ movement is of the soul, but that of the Universe, and the carrying round of the planets; [69.] and that (the soul),⁴ after the division had thus taken place from the middle and was fitted to it at the extremes, knows the things that exist, and adjusts them, through its possessing in itself the elements according to harmony: and that opinion is produced, according to the circle of the different proceeding correctly,⁵ but knowledge, according to that of the same. And he showed that of all existing things there are two principles, god, which he calls likewise mind and cause, and matter;⁶ but that matter is without form and boundless,⁷ from which are produced coalitions; and that, being formerly moved in no order, it

¹ I have translated, as if ἰούσαν had dropt out after μίσου—

² Aldobrandinus has shown that all this is to be referred to the soul of the world, as delineated in the Timæus; and he might have added, that much of this abridgment, taken by itself, is a mass of unmeaning words; for the writer had evidently only a vague idea of what Plato himself has not expressed in the most intelligible manner.

³ I have translated, as if the Greek were τὴν, not τὸν, which has nothing to which it can be referred; while τὴν belongs to κίνησιν—

⁴ I have introduced "the soul," conceiving that the author wrote τὴν δὲ ψυχὴν. οὕτως ἰχθύσεως—not οὕτω δ' ἰχθύσεως—for otherwise the subsequent αὐτῇ would want its substantive.

⁷ In lieu of ἀπειρον, Menage would read ἀποιον—referring to Cicero in Academ., "Sed subjectam putant omnibus sine ulla specie, atque carentem omni illa qualitate materiam—" and to Origen in Philosophics—τὴν δὲ ἔλην δυνάμει μὲν σῶμα, ἐνεργείᾳ δὲ οὐδὲ πω ἀσχημάτιστον γὰρ αὐτὴν οὖσαν καὶ ἀποιον, προσλαβούσαν σχήματα καὶ ποιότητας, γινίσθαι σῶμα—a work, which Menage describes as being then unedited, but which has been given to the world by Miller at Oxford in 1851.

was brought to one spot by the deity, who considered order to be better than disorder.¹ [70.] And (he said) that this existence (of matter) is to be resolved into four elements, fire, water, air, earth; from which both the world and what is in it are generated; but that the earth alone is unchangeable, assigning as a reason, the difference in the forms, of which it is composed; for of all the others he says the forms are homogenous; for they are all composed from one ²triangle, whose sides are longer one than the other;³ but the form of the earth is peculiar to itself. For the element of fire is pyramidal; that of air, octohedral;⁴ and that of water, eikosi-hedral;⁵ but that of earth, cubical; from whence the earth neither changes into them, nor they into the earth. [71.] ⁶And that each is not separated into its own place; because the circular movement, by compressing and bringing things to the centre, causes the small particles to coalesce; but separates the large; from whence the species, as they change themselves, change likewise their places.⁷ And that the world is one, (and) generated; since it has been made by the deity, perceptible by mind; and that it is animated,⁸ in consequence of that, which is animated, being superior to that, which is not animated; and that this is laid down as the workmanship of the best cause; and that it was made one and not boundless; because one likewise was the model, by which he fabricated it. [72.] ⁹And that it is spherical; because he, who produced it, has that form; for that (the world) contains the rest of living beings;⁷ but this (the deity) the forms of all things; and that it (the world) is smooth,⁸ in a circle, and possesses no organs,⁹ on account of there being no use for them; moreover that the world will continue⁹ undestroyed, on account of its being not resolved ¹into the deity.¹ Moreover that the deity is the cause of the whole of generation; because the good is naturally the doer of good; and that the best is the cause of the generation of heaven; for that the best of things perceived by the mind is the cause of the most beautiful of things generated; so that, since such is the deity, heaven is like the best, as being the most beautiful; and it would be like not one of things generated, but the deity (alone).² [73.] And that the world is composed of fire, water, air, (and) earth; of fire, that it might be visible; and of earth, that it might be solid; of water and air, that it might be according to a proportion—³for the powers of solid substances have a proportion by two middle terms—so that the whole might become one⁴—and that from all together it might be perfect and undestroyed. And that time is the image of eternity;⁴ and that this remains for ever; but that time is the movement of the heaven; for that night, and day, and month, and all such things, are parts of time; and hence ⁵time would not be without the natural movement of the world;⁵ for that as soon as ⁶a movement took place in it,⁶ time was; and that for the generation of time, the sun and moon and planets were generated. [74.]⁷ And that the number of the seasons might be very plain, and living things have a share in number, (he says) that the deity lit up the light of the sun;⁸ and that the moon is above the circle of the earth, and the sun in that, which is near to it; and the

² I have translated, as if the Greek were ἀλλὰ μόνῃ τῇ θεῷ—not ἀλλ' ἢ τῇ θεῷ.

³—³ See Timæus, p. 32, B.

⁴ In lieu of τοῦ διδίου, the syntax and sense require τοῦ αἰῶνος—the former, because the following κἀκείνων ought to be κἀκεῖνο, the latter, because Plato's expression in Timæus, p. 36, D. is εἰκὼν-αἰῶνος-δὲν δὴ χρόνον ὀνομάκαμεν.

⁵—⁵ I have translated, as if the Greek were ἀνευ τῆς τοῦ κόσμου φύσεως κινήσεως οὐκ ἂν εἶναι χρόνον—not ἀνευ τῆς τοῦ κόσμου φύσεως οὐκ εἶναι χρόνον: for time is the measure of matter in motion, and has nothing to do with the nature of the world in a state of rest. Hence too in ⁶—⁶ I suspect that κίνησιν has been lost before καί—and if so, we need not alter αὐτῷ into αὐτόν, as suggested by Casaubon.

⁷ This section begins in Menage's ed. with πρὸς δε— planets in the circles above; and that it (the world) is altogether animated, through its being bound to an animated motion; and, in order that the world might be rendered perfect, after being generated similar¹ to the living being perceptible by the mind, that the nature of the rest of living beings was generated;² and that since it possessed,³ it was requisite for heaven likewise to possess; and that it possessed therefore gods for the most part of fire;³ and that the other races are three, on wing, in the water, and on land. And that the earth is the oldest of the gods⁴ in heaven; and that it is a piece of workmanship for⁵ producing night and day; and that being at the centre it is moved about the centre. [75.]⁶ And since there are two causes, we must say, he asserts, that some things exist through mind,⁷ and some from a necessitous cause; and that these are air, fire, earth, water; and that they are not exactly elements, but recipients; and that these exist from triangles put together, and are resolved

¹ The Greek is at present ὁμοίως— It was originally, I suspect, ἰσχυρῶς—what I have translated.

²—³ Since there is nothing to serve as the object of εἶχε, we must probably read εἶναι δὲ νοῦν ἰσχυρὸς εἶχε— instead of εἶναι οὖν ἰσχυρὸς εἶχε— Opportunely then has the Latin version—"Quoniam igitur ille mentem habebat—"

⁴ This can be understood only by finding in the Timæus, p. 40, A. § 15, τοῦ μὲν οὖν θείου τὴν πλείστην ἰδίαν ἐκ τοῦδ' ἀκωργάτερο: while, instead of ἔχων, Ambrosius seems to have found εἶναι, as remarked by Casanbon.

⁵ From Cicero's version of the Timæus, p. 40, C. § 15, γῆν δὲ—αἰθερμίνην καὶ τὸν διὰ παντὸς πόλον τεταμένον φάλακα καὶ δημιουργὸν νεκρὸς τε καὶ ἡμέρας ἐμχανήσατο πρώτην καὶ πρεσβυτάτην θεῶν, ὅσαι ἐντὸς οὐρανοῦ γέγοναι.—"Terram—quam tracto axe sustinetur, diei noctisque electricam eandemque custodem antiquissimam corporum voluit esse eorum, quæ intra cælum gignerentur," it is evident that he found in his MS. δημιουργὸν νεκρὸς τε καὶ ἡμέρας ἐμχανήσατο καὶ φάλακα πρεσβυτάτην σωμάτων—and so did the author of Tim. Loc. p. 97, D., πρεσβύτα δὲ ἐντὶ τῶν ἐντὸς ὠρανῶ σωμάτων—Hence one would elicit θεῶν σωμάτων from the two readings, θεῶν and σωμάτων— into them; and that their elements are ¹the triangle, whose sides are longer, one than the other, and that, whose two sides are equal¹ [76.] (He says) then that the principles and causes are the two mentioned, of which the pattern is god and matter; which (last) is of necessity without form, as is the case with the rest of recipients; and that the cause of this proceeds from necessity; for² (the mind) by receiving somehow ideas produces existences; and through an inequality of power it is moved; and being moved it moves in return the things moved by that power; and (he says) that these were moved formerly without reason and order; but, when they began to constitute the world out of what they received from the deity, they were moved³ symmetrically and orderly. [77.] For (he says) there were two causes even before the creation of heaven, and a third, generation; but not clear, and only vestiges,⁴ and without order; but, when the world had been created, they too received order; and that heaven was created out of all existing bodies. And it seems to him that the deity, like the soul, is incorporeal;⁵ for thus he is especially non-receptive of corruption and suffering. And he lays down, as before stated, ideas, as the causes and principles of things being constituted by nature such as they are.

⁸ In lieu of διαμνην, Menage would read, what I have adopted, δαὶ νοῦν—confirmed by διὰ νοῦ in one MS. subsequently collated, and by Pseudo-Tim. Loc. § 1, δύο αἰρίας εἶπεν τῶν συμπάντων. νόον μὲν, τῶν κατὰ λόγον γενομένων ἀνάγκαν δὲ, τῶν βίᾳ, quoted by Menage; to which may be added, Tim. p. 48, A., ἔξ ἀνάγκης τε καὶ νοῦ συστάσεως γεννήθη: from whence one would substitute ἀναγκαίαις συστάσεως in the place of ἀναγκαίαις αἰρίας.

[78.] On the subject of good and evil he said thus—that the aim should be⁶ to become like the deity; that virtue is self-sufficient for happiness; but that it wants, as instruments, the superfluities connected with the body, namely, strength, health, a good state of the senses, and the like; and of ex-

² The Greek is δεχόμενον γὰρ πως τὰς ἰδίας γεννᾶν τὰς οὐσίας, where, since there is nothing to which δεχόμενον can be referred, I have translated as if νοῦν had dropt out after γεννᾶν— In Tim. p. 52, D., the expression is, τὴν γεννήσεως τιθήνην—διὰ τὸ μήθ' ὁμοίως δυνάμειν μή' ἰσορροπῶν ἐμπέμπασθαι—σιεῖσθαι μὲν ὑπ' ἱερίων αὐτῇν, κινουμένην δὲ αὐτῷ πάλιν ἱερίῳ σιεῖν.

⁵ Although Cicero, de Nat. Deor. i. 12, says, "sine corpore ullo Deum (Plato) vult esse, ut Græci dicunt ἀσώματον," yet I do not remember where the philosopher has so expressed himself.

⁶ I have translated, as if the Greek were τίλος μὲν δεῖν εἶναι, not τίλος μὲν εἶναι— With regard to the sentiment, compare Theætet. p. 247, A. § 84, where Heindorf quotes from Themist. Or. xiv. p. 330, D., μηδὲν ἄλλο φιλοσοφία ἢ ὁμοίωσις κατὰ τὸ δυνατόν θεῷ.

ternals, such as wealth, good birth, and reputation; but that the wise would be, nevertheless, happy, even if those things were not present. And (he says) that a person should be a public man,¹ and marry,² and not transgress the laws laid down; and should legislate from events, as they arise, for his country, unless he sees that affairs are in the exceeding corruption³ of the people perfectly⁴ invincible to a person in a state of doubt.⁴

[79.] He thinks too that the gods look upon the affairs of men;⁵ and that there are demons.⁶

And he first showed that the⁷ idea of what is beautiful is close upon what is laudable, and rational, and useful, and becoming, and fitting;⁷ all of which are close upon what follows nature, and is confessed (to do so).

He has conversed likewise on the correct imposition of names,⁸ so that (he seems)⁹ to have been the first to put together the science of correctly¹⁰ answering and questioning¹⁰ by using it in an opportune¹¹ manner in his dialogues.¹²

He considered, moreover, justice to be a law of god,¹³ as being more powerful to turn persons¹⁴ to acting justly, lest, like¹⁵ evil-doers, they suffer punishments, even after death;¹⁶

² This is laid down in the Laws, vi. p. 768, B.

³ I have adopted Casaubon's correction, διαφθορά, in lieu of διαφορά.

⁴ Casaubon was the first to see an error in ἐν παραίτητα, but failed to correct it by reading ἀνταίτητα. I have translated, as if the Greek were ἀνέκω ἀήτητα—

⁶ This is the whole subject matter of the Hipp. Maj.

⁷ See the Cratylus.

⁸ I have translated, as if the Greek were ὥστε δοκίμ, not ὥστε καί—Casaubon would elicit δοκίμ σοφήσαι from διασοφήσαι—

¹⁰ Instead of this absurd ὅτι τὸν πρότερον, the sense evidently requires ἰσχυρὴν καὶ ἀσχεπνισθαι—

¹¹ In lieu of κατακρίτως, which I cannot understand, I suspect the author wrote κατακαρίως, what I have translated.

¹² The words ἐν δὲ (or γὰρ) τοῖς διαλόγοις evidently belong, as I have translated, to the preceding, not the following, period.

¹³ This doctrine is not, as far as I remember, laid down distinctly in Plato; although it may be inferred from the first book of the Laws.

¹⁴ In lieu of ἐπάρται ἵνα μὴ, C. F. Hermann has suggested ἐπάρται τυχεῖ, μὴ—which has led myself to τυχεῖς, μὴ— from whence he was considered by some to be rather inclined to fables, by his mixing up accounts of this kind with his writings, in order that, through the uncertainty of the manner, in which matters stand after death, persons may thus be restrained from acts of injustice. These then were his favourite notions.

[80.]¹ And he divided, says Aristotle,² things in this manner. Of the good some relate to the soul, some to the body, and some are externals. For example, justice, prudence, fortitude, and temperance, and things of this kind relate to the soul; but beauty, and a good habit, and health, to the body; but friends, and the happiness of one's country, and wealth, are amongst externals. [81.]³ Of good things then there are three kinds; some relating to the soul, some to the body, and some (are) external.³ Of friendship there are three kinds; one natural, another social, and another hospitable. Now by natural we mean that, which parents feel towards their offspring, and relations towards each other; and in this other animals likewise have a share; by social that, which is produced from habitual intercourse, and not at all connected by family-ties, such as that between Pylades and Orestes; but the friendship from hospitality is that from a meeting together, and carried on by means of writings⁴ to strangers. Of friendship then there is the natural, the social, and hospitable. But some add a fourth, the amorous.

[82.] Of a political state there are five kinds;⁵ one is democratical; another, aristocratical; a third, oligarchical; a fourth, regal; (and) a fifth, tyrannical. The democratical exists in states, when the people rule, and choose through

² This analysis of the doctrines of Plato is not, says Aldobrandinus, to be found in the extant writings of Aristotle; nor do I think it ever was. The author was, perhaps, the Plato mentioned in § 109, as μαθητης Ἀριστοτέλους, or some other Peripatetic. And hence I would read here φῆσιν δὲ Ἀριστοτέλους—or simply φῆσιν ὁ Ἀριστοτέλης— itself magistracies and laws. ¹The aristocratical is, when neither the rich, nor the poor, nor persons in repute, rule, but when the best possess power in the state.¹ Oligarchy is, when magistracies are elected from persons of property; for the rich are fewer than the poor. Of regal power there is one kind according to law, and another according to family; as at Carthage it is according to law; for that is a citizen-state; but at Lacedæmon and Macedonia² it is according to family; for they make a kingly power from a certain family. But a tyranny is, when persons, ³after being cheated or forced,³ are ruled over by some one. Of a political state then there is the form of a democracy, an aristocracy, an oligarchy, a kingly rule, and a tyranny.

³ A similar summary of the preceding account is found through the whole of the subsequent analysis; and as it generally follows the order of the subjects, wherever that order is not preserved, there is reason to believe that some error has crept into the text, as will be duly pointed out in the Notes.

⁴ By writings are meant such as were put upon the so-called σύμβολον, on which see my note on Philoct. 404.

[83.]⁴ Of justice there are three kinds; ⁵one relating to the gods, another to men, and another to the departed. For they, who sacrifice according to the laws, and have a regard for holy things, it is plain, act piously towards the gods; and they, who pay debts and restore deposits, act justly towards men; while they, who have a regard for monuments,⁵ it is plain, (act justly)⁶ towards the departed. Of justice then there is a kind relating to the gods, another to men, and another to the departed.

[84.] Of sciences there are three kinds; ⁷one relating to the power to do something, another to make something, and another to speculate on something.⁷ For house-building and ship-building are sciences that make something; for one can see the work done; but the sciences of statesmanship, and of playing on the pipe or harp, and such like, are those that do something; ⁸for it is not possible to see any thing that has been

³— Of a people being cheated or forced into the acceptance of regal power recent events in a neighbouring country afford a curious proof.

⁴ This section begins in Menæx's ed. a little before, at ἡ δὲ ἐν Ἀναξάμαν.

⁵— Of these three kinds the two first are mentioned in Euthyph. p. 12, E., and the last alluded to in the Laws, xii. p. 958, D., as remarked by Aldobrandinus.

⁶ I have supplied the ellipsis in the Greek.

⁷— Of these three kinds the first and third are mentioned in the Statesman, p. 259, C., and the second in Soph. p. 219, B., not in Themist., as stated by Aldobrandinus.

⁸— I have translated, as if θεαρόν, which is superfluous after ἰδόν, done by them; but when they are doing something, it is to be seen.⁸ For one is playing the pipe, another the harp, and another the part of a statesman. But the sciences of geometry, harmony, and astrology¹ are speculative; for they neither do any thing, nor make any thing; but one speculates, as a geometrician, how lines are with respect to each other; another, as a harmonist, (speculates) on sounds; and the other, as an astrologer, on the stars and the world.² Of sciences then some are speculative, others relating to doing, and others to making.³

[85.] Of medical science there are five kinds;³ the pharmaceutic, the chirurgic,⁴ the dietetic, the nosognomic, and the boethetic. The pharmaceutic cures illness by drugs; the chirurgic restores health by cutting and burning; the dietetic produces a change in disorders by a change of diet; the nosognomic by knowing the characters of the disease; and the boethetic, by assisting on the instant, gives a relief from pain. Of the medical science then there is the pharmaceutic, the chirurgic, the dietetic, ⁵the boethetic, and the nosognomic.⁵

[86.] Of law there are two divisions; one written, the other unwritten. That, by which we act the statesman in cities, is the written; but that, which exists according to custom, is called the unwritten. For instance, there is no law to prevent our going naked to the public place of meeting, or putting on female attire; and yet we do not do such acts, through being prevented by an unwritten law. Of law then there is the written and the unwritten.

[87.]⁶ Speech is divided into five⁷ kinds; of which one is were placed after ἀλλ', ὅτε πᾶρρουσι τι, for so we must read in lieu of ἀλλὰ πᾶρρουσι τι—

¹ By astrology is meant what is now called astronomy.

²⁻³ In this summary the order is inverted by the speculative being placed first instead of last.

³ Of these five kinds only the first four are alluded to in Rep. iii. p. 406, D., as remarked by Aldobrandinus.

⁴ The English "surgeon" is a corruption of the Greek χειρουργός.

⁵⁻⁶ Here again the order in the summary is neglected by placing the boethetic before the nosognomic.

⁶ This section begins in Menage's ed. with ἵρπα δὲ, just afterwards.

⁷ Of these five kinds three are spoken of in Phædr. p. 258, D., and p. 272, F., and the dialectic in Rep. vii. p. 533—537, as remarked by Aldobrandinus.

what statesmen speak in public assemblies, and is called political; and there is another division of speeches, such as orators write and bring forward as a display, for the purpose of praise, or blame, or accusation. Now this kind is the oratorical. And there is a third division, when private persons converse with each other. Now this is called the private kind. And there is another division, when persons, by putting questions and giving answers to the questioners, converse in a brief manner. Now this is called the dialectical. The fifth division is, when artists converse with each other about their own art. Now this is called artistical. Of speeches then there is the political, the oratorical, the private, the dialectical, and the artistical.

[88.] Musical science is divided into three kinds: one is by the mouth alone, such as singing; the second by means of the mouth and hands, such as playing on, and singing to, the harp; the third is by means of the hands alone, such as harp-playing. Of musical science then there is one kind by the mouth alone; another, by the mouth and hands; and another, by the hands.

[89.]¹ Nobility² of birth is divided into four kinds: one is, when the ancestors were ³persons of a beautiful (body) and of a fine (mind),³ ⁴and just⁴ persons say that their descendants are nobly born; another is, when the ancestors possessed power and were rulers, the descendants of these likewise persons call nobly born; and another, when the ancestors obtained a name, for instance, from generalship, (or)⁵ contests, ⁶crowned with garlands,⁶ the descendants of these likewise we call nobly born; and there is another kind, when a man is himself of a noble soul ⁷[and of a great soul].⁷ And this man persons say is nobly born; and indeed of nobility of

² Plato no where, says Aldobrandinus, touches upon these different kinds of noble birth.

³ Such is the proper translation of καλοὶ καὶ ἀγαθοὶ.

⁴ As there is no allusion to the καὶ δίκαιοι in the subsequent summary, those words ought to be omitted, unless it be said that they are included in the ἐλευθεροί.

⁵ I have introduced ἢ, required by the sense.

⁶ By these were meant the conquerors at any of the four public games in Greece.

⁷ The words καὶ (or ἢ) μεγάλου ψυχῆς are evidently an explanation of γεννάδας.

birth this is the best.¹ Of nobility of birth then there is one kind derived from ancestors of probity; another from those in power; another from those in great repute; and another from a person's own greatness of soul.²

[89.]³ Beauty is divided into three⁴ kinds; one is that, which is a subject of praise, as the beauty of form, (perceived) by the sight; another, as an object of utility, as any instrument or dwelling, and such like things, beautiful in respect to their use; and things, which, as regards laws and pursuits, and such like, are beautiful on the ground of a benefit. Of beauty then there is one kind on the score of praise; another, on that of utility; and another, on that of benefit.

[90.] The soul is divided into three⁵ parts; for one part is rational; another, concupiscible; and another, irascible. Of these the rational is the cause of consulting, and calculating, and reflecting, and of all such like acts; the concupiscible part of the soul is the cause of desiring to eat, and of having sexual intercourse, and of such like acts; and the irascible part is the cause of feeling boldness, and joy, and sorrow, and anger. Of the soul then there is one part, rational; another, concupiscible; and another, irascible.

[91.]⁶ Of perfect virtue there are four⁷ kinds; one, prudence; another, justice; the third, fortitude; the fourth, temperance. Of these, prudence is the cause of doing things correctly; justice, of acting justly in our intercourse and dealings with (each other); fortitude, of not being out of our wits⁸ in dangers and things of dread, but remaining (in them); and temperance, of mastering our desires, and of not being

² As the καλοκαγαθία belongs to the first kind of nobly-born, while the last is described as γεννάδας τὴν ψυχὴν, it is evident the author wrote μεγαλοψυχίας— what I have translated: while τῆς καλοκαγαθίας should be inserted before προγόνων ἐπιτεκῶν—

³ This section is united in Menage's ed. to the preceding.

⁴ See § 79, n. 1—.

⁵ On these three parts see Rep. ix. p. 571, D., and 580, E.

⁶ This section begins in Menage's ed. with τούτων ἡ φρόνησις, a little below.

⁷ These four kinds are called the cardinal virtues. See at Menex. § 20, n. 31.

⁸ The Greek is ἐξίστασθαι κοῦιν: where Emper would omit κοῦιν. He should have suggested rather ἀπογνοῖα— "through despondency."

the slave of any pleasure, and of living orderly. Of virtue then there is one kind, prudence; another, justice; a third, fortitude; a fourth, temperance.

[92.]¹ Ruling power is divided into five kinds; one, according to law; one, according to nature; and one, according to custom; a fourth, according to family; and a fifth, according to violence. The rulers then in states, when they have been chosen by the citizens, rule according to law. They, who rule according to nature, not only amongst men, but animals likewise, are the males; for the males for the most part rule every where the females. The rule according to custom is of such a kind, as boy-leaders have over children, and teachers over their disciples.² The rule according to family is of such a kind, as the kings at Lacedæmon³ possess; 'for the kingly power comes from a certain family';⁴ and after the same manner persons bear sway in Macedonia; for there the kingly power is appointed from a family. But if persons rule over unwilling⁵ citizens by violence, or over willing by fraud,⁶ a rule of this kind is said to be according to violence. Of rule then there is one kind according to law; another, according to nature; another, according to family; and another, according to violence.

[93.] Of oratory there are six kinds. For when (speakers) bid (a state)⁶ to make war against, or alliance with, any one, such a kind is called a drawing-on; but when they require it not to make war or an alliance, but to keep quiet, such a kind is a drawing-off. The third kind of oratory is, when a person says he has been injured by some one, and shows such a one to have been the cause of many evils. Now this kind is called an accusation. The fourth kind of oratory is called a defence, when a person shows he has injured no one,⁷ nor

² In Greek τῶν ποιῶντων, literally, "those who go them." But Hesych. has ποιητῆς μαθητής.

³ See at § 82, n. ².

⁴ The words between the numerals are perfectly unnecessary.

⁵ Such is evidently what the balance of the sentence requires. Hence I have translated, as if ἡ ἐκόντων had dropt out after ἀκόντων. For thus ἀκόντων would refer to βαστάμενοι, and ἐκόντων to παρὰ-προσάμενοι.

⁶ I have introduced "a state," required by the sense and syntax, especially as πόλιν might easily have been lost before πολεμῶν.

⁷ I have translated, as if the Greek were μηδὲν—not μηδὲν— done any thing out of the way. Now this kind persons call a defence. The fifth kind of oratory is, when one shows a person to be of a beautiful (body) and of fine (mind). Now this kind is called a praising. The sixth kind, is when one shows a person to be ill-favoured (in body and mind). Now this is called a blaming. There are then of oratory one kind, ¹a praising; another, a blaming; another, a drawing-on; another, a drawing-off; another, an accusation; and another, a defence.¹

[94.]² To speak correctly is divided into four kinds; one is, to speak what is requisite; and one, to speak how much is requisite; the third, to speak to whom it is requisite; and the fourth, to speak when it is requisite. ³As to what is requisite, it is meet³ to speak, what is about to benefit the speaker and hearer. As to how much is requisite, to speak neither more nor less than what is sufficient. As to whom it is requisite to speak, if (a person) addresses his elders in error,⁴ it is meet to address fitting language (to them) as (being) older; but if younger persons, it is meet to address fitting (language to them) as being younger. ⁵As to when it is requisite, it is meet⁵ to speak neither before nor after⁶ (it is fitting);⁶ or else ⁷that he will be in error and speak ill.⁷

[95.]⁸ Kindness is divided into four (forms). For (it is shown) either in purse, or person, or by science, or words. In purse, when a person, ⁹being in easy circumstances,⁹ assists

³— I have translated, as if the Greek were ἂ μὲν οὖν δεῖ, δεῖ λέγειν— not ἂ μὲν οὖν δεῖ λέγειν—

⁴ Meric Casaubon, with whom Menage agrees, would expunge ἀμαρτάνοντα. But Menage says it is defended by Bochart, who refers to Chrysostom's Homily on Timotheus—Πρεσβυτέρω μὴ ἐπιπλήξῃς— ἀλλ' ὥσπερ πρὸς πατέρα προσειχθείης ἀμαρτόντα, οὕτω καὶ πρὸς ἐκείνον διαλέγῃς. At all events τις has been lost after ἀμαρτάνοντα—

⁵— The Greek is at present πηνικά δὲ λέγειν ἴσθι— It was originally πηνικά δὲ δεῖ, λέγειν ἴσθι— what I have translated.

⁶— I have translated, as if οὐ δεῖ had dropt out before εἰ δεῖ—

⁷— Such is the literal version of the Greek. But as Stephens makes mention of a various reading, οὐκ ὁρθῶς ἰπεῖν in lieu of καὶ κακῶς ἰπεῖν, perhaps the author wrote διαμαρτήσασθαι ἵκων ὁρθῶς ἰπεῖς—i. e. "you will correctly say that he will be in error."

⁸ This section begins in Menage's ed. with τὸ δὲ πρὸς οὗς, a little below.

⁹— I have adopted Casaubon's εὐπορήσας in lieu of εὐπορήσαι.

a party begging money; in person parties act kindly towards each other, when, being present, they assist those, who are being beaten; while they, who give instruction, and medicine, and teach any good thing, benefit by their science; but when one goes to a court of justice, and assists another, and makes a proper speech in his behalf, he does a kind act by words. Of kindness then there is one form in purse; another in person; another by science; and another by words.

[96.]¹ The end of things is divided (by him) into four kinds. Things have an end according to law, when a decree is proposed and a law ratifies it. Things have an end according to nature, (such as) a day, and a year, and the seasons. Things have an end according to art, as house-building; for a person puts the finish to a dwelling; and as ship-building, for ²(a person puts the finish to)³ vessels. There is an end to things according to accident; when they turn out in a different manner, and not as one fancies. There is then an end of things according to law, and nature, and art, and accident.

[97.]³ Power is divided into three kinds; one, when⁴ we are able, by the thinking faculty, to calculate and reflect; another, (when) by the body, for instance, to walk, and to give, and receive, and (to do) such like acts; a third, when⁵ we are able by the multitude of soldiers and wealth (to rule);⁶ from whence he, who has much power, is called a king; but the fourth is a division of power, ⁷in suffering and doing well and ill;⁷ for instance, we are able to be in bad health,⁸ and to be instructed, and to be in good health, and all such like things.⁸ Of power then there is one kind, in the thinking

² I have supplied the words requisite for the sense.

⁴ I have translated, as if the Greek were δυνάμει, not δυνάμει.

⁵ Here again I have substituted δυνάμει for δυνάμει.

⁶ The train of ideas evidently shows that βασιλεύειν, or something similar, has dropt out after χρημάτων—

⁷ I have adopted the correction of Menage, πάσχειν καὶ ποιεῖν εὖ καὶ κακῶς.

⁸ The words between the numerals ought to be thus arranged and read in the Greek—καὶ ὑγιαίνειν καὶ παιδεύεσθαι εὖ καὶ κάκιστα, καὶ τὰ τοιαῦτα, instead of καὶ παιδεύεσθαι καὶ ὑγιαίνειν καὶ πάντα τὰ τοιαῦτα.

faculty ; another, in the body ; another, in an encampment¹ and wealth ; and another, in doing and suffering.

[98.] Of philanthropy there are three kinds ; one exists by being of an easy address,² as when some persons accost all they happen to meet,³ and, throwing out the right hand, give them a greeting ;³ another kind is, when a person affords assistance to every one in misfortune ; another kind⁴ [of philanthropy]⁴ is, when persons are liberal in feastings. Of philanthropy then there is one kind, in addressing ; another, in acting kindly ; and another, in feasting and being fond of society.

[99.]⁵ Felicity is divided into five parts. One is in well planning ; another, in a sound state of the senses, and in bodily health ; the third is in good fortune in one's doings ; the fourth in a good repute amongst men ; and the fifth in an abundance of means, and of things useful for life. (Of these) well-planning comes from instruction and from being skilled in many matters ; a sound state of the senses from the members of the body, as when a person sees with his eyes, and hears with his ears, and perceives with his nose and mouth, what he should perceive. Now a thing of this kind is a sound state of the senses. And good fortune is,⁶ when a person proceeds in the right road to what he is aiming at, and accomplishes,⁶ what it is meet for a man, who is in earnest, to do. And good repute is, when a person hears himself well spoken of. And abundance of means is, when a person is so situated with respect to the use of things in life, that he can benefit friends and indulge in expense on a large scale and in an easy manner. Now he, in whom all these circumstances meet, is completely happy. Of felicity then, well-planning is

¹ Such is the literal meaning of στρατόπεδον. But it is sometimes taken in the sense of στράτευμα, "an army."

² I have adopted Casaubon's correction, εὐπροσηγορίας in lieu of προσηγορίας—

³ Menage quotes from Plautus—"me benignius Omnes salutant—copulantur dexterās—" He might have added Aristoph. Plut. 784, ἡσπάζοντο καὶ ἑδέξινοντο.

⁴ The words between the brackets are quite superfluous.

⁵ This section in Menage's edition begins with ἡ μὲν εὐβουλία, a little lower.

one part; a sound state of the senses and bodily health another; and another, good fortune; another, good repute; and another, an abundance of means.

[100.] Arts are divided into three (kinds), first, second, and third. The first is, that of mining for minerals, and of felling wood; for they are preparative: (the second)¹ is that of the smith and carpenter; for they are shape-giving; since from iron the smith forms arms, and from wood the carpenter pipes and lyres: and (the third)² is that of the party using materials, as the horseman makes use of reins; the warrior of arms; and the musician of pipes and a lyre. Of art then there are three kinds; that, which is the first; that, which is the second; and that, which is the third.

[101.] The good is divided into four kinds. One of which we say is in a person possessing virtue, peculiarly a good; another we speak of, as being a good in itself, namely, virtue and justice; (we speak) of the third, as, for example, food, and suitable exercise, and drugs; the fourth good we say is such a thing, as the art of the piper, and of the actor, and such like. Of the good then there are four kinds; one, to possess virtue; another is, virtue itself; a third is, food, and useful exercise; and a fourth good we say is, the art of the piper, and actor, and poet.³

[102.] Of existing things some are bad, some good, and some neither one or the other. Of these we say those are bad, which are able to do ever a mischief, such as intemperance, and thoughtlessness, and injustice, and such like things. But the opposites to these are good. ⁴But some things are able at one time to benefit, and at another to do a mischief, as to walk, and to sit down, and to eat; or wholly unable to either benefit or hurt; and these are neither good nor bad.⁴ Of existing things then, some are good, some bad, and some neither the one or the other.

[103.] A good state of law is divided into three kinds; one, when the laws are ⁵carefully made,⁵ we say is a good state of

¹ I have supplied here and in ² the words that seem necessary for the sense.

² Since the poet is not mentioned by name before, he must be considered as included in the general expression kai ra poiata.

³ Compare Gorgias, p. 467, D. § 52.

⁴ Such seems to be the meaning of συνδαίον, which is not elsewhere, if I rightly remember, applied to νόμοι.

law ; another, when the citizens abide by the laws laid down ; and this we say is a good state of law ; the third, when, although there are not laws, yet persons conduct themselves correctly as citizens, according to custom and (proper) pursuits ; and this we call a good state of law. Of a good state of law then, one kind is, that laws be carefully made ; another, that persons abide by existing laws ; and a third, when they conduct themselves as citizens according to custom and proper pursuits.

A bad state of law is divided into three kinds ; one of which is, when the laws are bad, as regards ¹strangers and citizens ; ¹another, when persons do not obey the existing (laws) ; and another, when there is no law at all. Of a bad state of law then, one kind is in there being bad laws ; another, in persons not obeying those that exist ; and a third, in there being no law.

[104.]² Opposites are divided into three kinds—as we say that good things are opposite to bad ; and ³justice to injustice, and prudence to imprudence, and such like ; and that bad things likewise are opposite to bad, (such as) prodigality to illiberality,⁴ and the being unjustly put on the rack to being treated so justly ; and such like ⁵[bad things are the opposite to bad] ; ⁵ ⁶and some, as being neither the one nor the other, are opposite to those, that are neither the one nor the other, as for instance, the being poor to the being rich ; for each by itself is neither good nor bad ; and similarly opposite is light to heavy, and quick to slow.⁶ Of opposites then, some things,

³ In lieu of ὥς, the sense requires καὶ— On the confusion in those words, see Markland on Iph. A. 173.

⁴ The flow of ideas evidently leads to τῇ ἀνελευθερίᾳ, instead of καὶ τὴν ἀνελευθερίαν—

⁵— The words between the numerals, κατὰ κακοῖς ἰαντία ἴσσι, are clearly superfluous after the preceding κατὰ δὲ κακοῖς ἰαντία εἶναι.

⁶— The words between the numerals are made out of two readings ; one found in ed. Steph., τὰ δὲ, ὥς οὐδετέρως οὐδέτερα, οἷον τὸ πίνεσθαι τῇ πλουτεῖν· ἐκάτερον γὰρ κατ' αὐτὸ οὐτ' ἀγαθὸν οὐτε κακόν· ἰαντία δὲ ὅμως· τὸ δὲ βαρὺ— and the other in ed. Menag., where all those words are omitted, while the following period is closed with ὥς οὐδέτερα οὐδετέρως ἰαντία ἴσσι— and hence it is easy to see that the author wrote τὰ as being good, are opposite to bad; and some, as being bad, (are opposite) to bad; and some, as being neither one nor the other, (are opposite) to those that are neither one nor the other.

[105.]¹ Of good things there are three kinds; some are to be had, some to be shared in, some (meet) to be in existence. Those to be had are, as many as it is possible to have, such as justice and health; those to be shared are, as many as it is not possible to have, but of which it is possible to have a share; for instance, it is not possible to have the good itself, but it is possible to have a share of it; and those (meet) to be in existence are as many as it is not possible either to have a share of them or to have, but as many as are meet to be in existence; for example, to be earnest in a matter and just: now these things it is possible neither to have nor to share in them, but they are meet to be in existence.² [to be earnest in a matter and just.]³ Of good things then some are to be had, some to be shared in, and some (meet) to be in existence.

[106.]³ Counselling is divided into three (kinds). One is taken from the past, one from the future, and one from the present. Things (taken) from the past are examples, as—“What did the Lacedæmonians suffer by trusting?”⁴ Things ὅτι ὡς οὐδέντετρα οὐδέντετρος ἰσχυρία ἴσχυι, οἷον τὸ κίνεσθαι τῷ κλυεῖν οὐδέντετρον γὰρ κατ' αὐτὸ οὐτ' ἀγαθὸν οὐτ' κακὸν ἰσχυρία δ' ὁμοίως τὸ τε βαρὺ—The reading of ed. Steph. has been followed by E. Smith in his version—“Thirdly, where there is a contrariety between things neither good nor bad, as poverty and riches; for neither are good in themselves, yet contrary one to another. In like manner ponderosity and levity, swift and slow,” &c., p. 59.

² The words between the numerals are evidently superfluous.

³ This section begins in Menage's ed. with τῶν ἀγαθῶν ἀπα—in the preceding period.

⁴ I confess I do not know to what circumstance the author is alluding, unless it be the one mentioned by Thucydides in v. 45, relating to the trick played upon the Spartan ambassadors by Alcibiades, in whose words they placed too implicit confidence. Still less do I know how the following words crept into the Latin translation—before τὴν ἔραστον—“quid pruden-ter egerit (gens) ut caveamus;” from which came the version of E. Smith, “The time past affords us examples, when we consider what the Lacedæmonians suffered through their over-confidence; what they bravely acted for our imitation.”

from the present; as for instance, ¹"to show that the walls are weak, the people cowards, (and) bread-corn¹ scarce." Things from the future, ²"Not to do wrong through suspicion to an embassy, lest Greece should be in bad repute."² In counselling then there are matters (taken) from the past, the present, and the future.

[107.] Voice is divided into two (kinds); one is with life, and one without life; that with life is of living beings, that without life is sounds and noises. Of voice with life one kind is expressed by letters, and one not expressed by letters. That expressed by letters is of men; that not expressed by letters is of animals. ³Of voice then there is one with life, and one without life.³

[108.]⁴ Of existing things, some are divisible and some indivisible. And of the divisible, some are with similar parts, some with dissimilar parts. Now the indivisible are as many as have no division, or are not composed of something; as for instance, unity, a point, and a sound; but the divisible are as many as are composed of something; as for instance, syllables, and concords, and animals, and water,⁵ and gold. Now those with similar parts are as many as are composed of similar things, and where the whole differs in nothing from the part, except in multitude; as for instance, water, and gold, and every thing that is fusible,⁶ and such like; but those with dissimilar parts are as many as are composed of dissimilar parts; as for instance, a dwelling and such like things. Of existing things then some are divisible and some indivisible;⁷ and of the divisible some are with similar parts and some with dissimilar parts.

¹ Here I am quite at a loss as to the event alluded to.

² Here again I must leave for others to discover what the author is alluding to.

³ To complete the summary one would have expected to find ὑγρὰ μῆκος after ἐμψυχος, and ἀγρὰ μῆκος after ἀψυχος.

⁴ This section begins in Menage's ed. with καὶ ὁμοιομερῆ—somewhat further on.

⁵ This introduction of water seems very strange here amongst the things that are composed of something. One would have expected rather δένδρα in lieu of ὕδωρ—

⁶ I have adopted Huebner's correction, χυρὸν for ρυχόν—

⁷ Instead of ἀμερῆ one would have preferred ἀμίεστα, given as a var. lect. by Stephens, as better opposed to μερίστα.

[109.]¹ Of things existing some are spoken of² with reference to themselves, and some with reference to another thing. Those that are spoken of with reference to themselves, are as many as do not need any thing in the way of explanation. Now these would be a man, a horse, and the rest of animals; for of these not one is currently understood by means of an interpretation; but of those that are spoken of with reference to another³ thing (there are) as many as need some explanation; as for instance, that which is greater than something, and that which is quicker than something, and that which is more beautiful (than something),⁴ and the like. For the greater is greater than the less, and the quicker (than the slower).⁵ Of things then existing some are spoken of with reference to themselves, and some with reference to another⁶ thing. And so too the first is divided according to Aristotle.⁷

There was likewise another Plato,⁸ a philosopher of Rhodes, a disciple of Panætius, as Seleucus the grammarian says in the first book "On Philosophy;" and another, a Peripatetic, a disciple of Aristotle; ⁹and another, (a son) of Praxiphanes, and a writer of the old comedy.⁹

² I have translated, as if the Greek were ἄλλο λεγόμενα, not λίσσεται.

³ Here, as in (²), ἄλλο seems to have dropt out.

⁴ After εἰλλιον I have inserted, what the balance of the sentence evidently requires.

⁵ Here too the train of ideas demands, not τινος, but βραδύτερος—what I have translated.

⁶ See at ² and ³.

⁷ In lieu of Ἀριστοτέλην, one would prefer Ἀριστοτέλειον— See at § 82, note.

⁸ Perhaps to this Plato is to be attributed some of the spurious dialogues.

⁹ The words between the numerals are thus rendered by E. Smith, "And one more, the son of Praxiphanes, a comic poet, that wrote after the ancient manner of freedom, without respect of persons, in imitation of Aristophanes." With regard to the comic writer being the son of Praxiphanes, Meineke appears to doubt it; at least he has not mentioned it in his Histor. Critic. Comic. Græcor., nor has Fabricius in Biblioth. Græc., nor Cobet in his Observat. Crit. in Platonis Comici Reliquias.

THE LIFE OF PLATO,
BY HESYCHIUS OF MILETUS.

PLATO the philosopher is said to have never undergone even once the marriage-state or sexual intercourse. And they say that his mother became pregnant from a divine vision when Apollo appeared to her; but when she had brought forth Plato, that then her husband cohabited with her, and that being with ¹broad shoulders or face he was called Plato;¹ but some assert that he was so called from being ²broad in his discourses.³ Hence Timon, while ridiculing him, says in his Farical verses—

The broadest man led all, but with sweet voice
He talk'd, the picture of the Tettix kind,
That settling on the trees of Hecademus,
Their pleasant note pour forth—

For the spot, which (is now) Academia, was formerly called Hecademia. He made for himself a mingling of the doctrines of Heracleitus, Pythagoras, and Socrates. For on things, perceptible by the senses, he philosophized according to Heracleitus; on those, perceptible by mind, according to Pythagoras; but on those, relating to politics, according to Socrates. He was likewise much indebted to Epicharmus. For Epicharmus³ says—"The wise assert that the soul perceives some things through the body; as, for example, by hearing and seeing; but on other things it reflects itself by itself, without making any use of the body: and hence, of the things that exist, some are perceptible by the senses, and some by the mind." On which account Plato has said that it is requisite for those, who desire to look into the principles of the Universe, to separate, in the first place, ideas, themselves by themselves, such as similitude, and unity, and number, and magnitude, and rest, and motion: secondly, to lay down itself by itself, beauty, and goodness, and justice, and such kind of things: and, thirdly, to look into such of the ideas as have a relation to each other, to wit, science, or magnitude, or arbitrary power, and to consider that what are with us have the same name as those, through their participating in them—I mean, that things are just, such as (participate in) the abstractedly just; and are beautiful, such as (participate in) the abstractedly beautiful; and that each of the species is eternal, and a notion,¹ and, moreover, not subject to circumstances. Hence he says likewise that ideas exist² in nature, as if they were patterns; and that the rest of things are like to them, as being their resemblances. Epicharmus too thus expresses himself touching the abstractedly good, and ideas—

¹ To understand this remark the reader should bear in mind that the Greek for "broad" is πλατ-υς, a word very similar to πλατ-ων.

²—³ If my emendation of ειρωνειας for ειρωνειας, in Diogen. L. § 4, be correct, we must read here γίλῳσι in lieu of λόγους.

³ In Diogen. L. § 12, this saying is attributed to Alcimus.

Seems not the case then to be thus about
The good? that of itself it is a thing;
And he, who learning knows it, good becomes;
Just as a piper, who has learnt to pipe,
Or to dance has a dancer learnt, or some
Weaver to weave, or what you will of trades
Like these, himself's the artist, not the art.

Plato accompanied Chabrias, the general, on trial for a capital charge, when not one of the citizens was willing to do so; and when Crobylus the informer met him as he was going up, together with Chabrias, to the Acropolis, and said—"Art thou come to plead on the side of another, not knowing that the hemlock of Socrates awaits thee?" he replied—"When too I served in the army for the sake of fatherland, I endured dangers; and now for the sake of duty on account of a friend I will endure them." But though he was such a kind of person, he was nevertheless scoffed at by the writers of comedy. At least Theopompus says—

For one is none,
And two, as Plato holds, is scarcely one;

and Anaxandrides too in his "Theseus"—

When olives he devoured, that Plato loves;

and Timon likewise, while thus playing on the letters (of his name)—

As Plato plaits, in plaited wonders skill'd.

Thou'rt come in time; since I, in doubtings tost,
Am walking up and down, and, Plato-like,
Find nought that's wise, but merely tire my feet;

and in "Ancylicon"—

A. Thou speak'st of what thou knowest not one jot.

B. Mind has with Plato been a-running.

A. Know'st thou,

What is a pound, and onions what?

B. Not I.

Amphis in "Amphicrates"—

A. What is the good, which you are about to have Through her, I know still less than does my master
Of the good in Plato.

On questions which he comprehended, Plato exhibits his opinions; and falsehoods he confutes; but on points that are uncertain he holds back. And what he has made up his mind upon, he exhibits by means of four characters, Socrates, Timæus ¹ the Athenian Guest, and the one from Elea; ¹ but amongst those confuted for falsehoods he introduces Thrasymachus, Callicles, Polus, (and) Gorgias. He asserted that the principle of the soul was arithmetical, but of the body, geometrical; and he defined it to be an idea of a breath standing apart on every side, and that it is self-moved ² and tripartite. ²

¹—¹ The words between the numerals have been properly supplied by Fischer, from Diogen. L. § 52, and so have those between (²—²) from § 67.

THE LIFE OF PLATO,
BY OLYMPIODORUS.

COME then, let us speak of the family of the philosopher, not for the sake of prolixity,¹ but of benefit rather and instruction to those, who betake themselves to him. For he was not "a Nobody,"² but rather—

¹ To many of mankind he was a care.³

For Plato is said to have been a son of his father Ariston, the son of Aristocles, from whom he carried up his family to Solon, the law-giver; and hence he wrote, in imitation of his ancestor, the Laws in twelve books, and a Political Constitution in eleven.⁴ He came into the world by his mother Perictioné, who was descended from Neleus, the son of Codrus.⁵ For they say that Apollo in a vision had an intercourse with his mother Perictioné, and, appearing in the night to Ariston, ordered him to have no connexion with Perictioné until the time of her bringing forth.⁶ And so he acted. And his pa-

¹ I have adopted πολυηχοίας, suggested by Windet, instead of πολυροίας.

² Here is an allusion to the name Οὐτις, assumed by Ulysses to enable him to deceive the Cyclops. It has been twice restored to Plato by myself; once in Hipp. Maj. § 24, and again in Alcibiad. II. § 23.

³ Here too is an allusion to Od. A. 177.

⁴ How this number is to be made up, it is difficult to state distinctly. Perhaps Olympiodorus meant to unite the Critias with the 10 books of the Republic.

⁵ According to Diogen. L. iii. 1, and Apuleius, the father, not the mother, was a descendant of Codrus.

⁶ I have adopted ἀπορήσεις; similar to ἀπονήσεις in Diogen. § 2, as suggested by Windet, for ἀποράσεις.

rents taking him after his birth, and when he was still an infant, placed him on Mount Hymettus, intending to make a sacrifice to the deities there, namely, Pan, and the Nymphs, and Apollo, who presides over shepherds. But while he was lying there, bees came and filled his mouth with honey from the comb, in order that it might be said¹ truly of him—

‘From his mouth flow’d a voice than honey far More sweet.’²

And he calls himself³ on every side and⁴ a fellow-slave with the swans, as if he had proceeded⁴ from Apollo; for the bird belongs to Apollo. In early life he first went as a pupil to Dionysius the grammar-master, to learn the common course of instruction, of whom he has made mention in the Rivals, in order that Dionysius might not be without a share of remembrance on the part of Plato. After him he made use of Ariston the Argive, as his master in gymnastics, by whom, as they say, his name was changed into Plato, having been previously called Aristocles, after his grandfather; and he was called Plato, from his having two parts of his body very wide, namely, his breast and forehead, as his likeness proves, put up every where with such a representation. But others assert that it was not for this reason his name was changed, but on account of the breadth, and diffuseness, and openness of the style adopted⁵ by him; just as they say that Theophrastus, who was previously called Tyrtamus, had his name changed to⁶ Theophrastus on account of the divine nature of ¹ In lieu of γίνηται, the sense evidently requires λέγεται— what I have translated.

² This description is applied to Nestor in Il. A. 249.

³ Since Plato, in the person of Socrates, calls himself only once in Phædon, p. 85, B. § 78, ὁμόδουλος—τῶν κύκνων, there is probably some error in παντόθεν— from which it would be easy to elicit θεράποντα θεοῦ— and to confirm the correction by Phædon, § 77, οἱ κύκνοι—τοῦ Ἀπόλλωνος θεράποντες μαντικοί τ' εἰσὶ— for so we must read in lieu of the unintelligible ὄντες, for Plato had a little before spoken of τῶν κύκνων—οἱ γεγηθότες, ὅτι μίλλουσι παρὰ τὸν θεὸν ἀτίναί, οὐπὲρ εἰσι θεράποντες—

⁴ Instead of προσελθὼν, Windet has suggested, what I have adopted, προελθὼν—

⁵ So I have translated ἀνακτιμένον— although I know of no other passage where that verb has such a meaning.

⁶ To understand this, the reader should know that Θεόφραστος is compounded of Θεός, “god,” and φραστός, “spoken.”

his language.⁶ For his music-master he had Dracon, the pupil of Damon,¹ of whom he has made mention in the Republic. These were the three things the boys at Athens were taught, [I mean]² grammar, music, and wrestling, not simply for themselves; but grammar, to embellish the language, natural to them; music, to tame violent passions;³ and wrestling and gymnastics, to strengthen the relaxed state of desire.⁴ In these three points Alcibiades appears to have been instructed by him;⁵ and hence Socrates says to him, "But to play on the pipe you were not willing," and what follows.⁶ (Plato) went likewise to painters,⁷ from whom he derived some benefit in the mixing of colours, of which he has made mention in the Timæus. Subsequently he received instructions from the writers of tragedy likewise, who were considered⁸ to be the instructors of Greece; and he went to them for the sake of the moral and solemn style of tragedy, and the heroical nature of their subjects (selected by them); and he made an acquaintance with the dithyrambic poets, for the honour of Dionysus, who was said to be the superintendent of generation;⁹ for to that deity the Dithyramb is sacred, from whom likewise it had its name; for Dionysus is Dithy-

¹ Windet was the first to correct Δάμνος into Δάμωνος: of whom, as Fischer observes, Plato has made frequent mention.

² The words φημι δὲ appear to be interpolated. For after τρία—ταῦτα, the three things alluded to are elsewhere mentioned at once, without the intervention of φημι δὲ—answering to "scilicet" in Latin, and "to wit" in English.

³ Of the power of music to allay violent feelings the most facetious proof is given in the Epigram—

Music hath charms to soothe the savage beast;
And therefore fitted for a city feast.

⁴ In lieu of ἐπιθυμίας one would prefer ἀποθυμίας, "despondency," as better suited to χαλαρόν.

⁵ This κατ' αὐτῷ has nothing to which it can be referred. Olympiodorus wrote, I suspect, παρ' αὐτῷ, "straightway"—

⁶—The passage alluded to is in Alcib. I. § 7.

⁷ The same fact is told by Apuleius.

⁸ I have translated, as if the Greek were νομιομένους in lieu of δοξαζομένους—Compare Xenoph. K. II. i. 6, 12, τοῖς στρατηγικοῖς ἀνδράσι νομιζομένοις εἶναι.

⁹ How Dionysus could be said to be ἐφορος τῆς γενέσεως, I cannot understand, except with reference to the proverb—"Sine Baccho et Cerere friget Venus." Perhaps the author wrote γυνέσεως—so Virgil—"Lætitias Bacchus dator."

rambus, as having proceeded from ¹two doors, namely, Semele and the thigh of Jupiter.¹ For the ancients were wont to call things caused by the names of the causing; as they call Dionysus² likewise: and hence Proclus says on this subject—

Parents,³ from what they see (and know),⁴
Upon their children names bestow.

Now that Plato exercised himself in Dithyrambics is evident from the Phædrus, a dialogue that breathes very much⁵ of a dithyrambic style; inasmuch as Plato wrote, as reported, that dialogue the first. He took likewise great delight in Aristophanes, the comic writer, and in Sophron; from whom he benefited in his imitation of the characters in his dialogues. And he is reported to have been so delighted, that, when he was dead, (copies of) Aristophanes and Sophron were found on his couch; and he made himself this epigram upon Aristophanes—

'The Graces, when they wish'd to find
A shrine, that should for ever live,
Said, what they sought, alone the mind
Of Aristophanes could give.'

And he made fun of Aristophanes in his dialogue (called) the Banquet, as having derived some benefit in the style of comedy. For after making him hymn the god of Love, he introduces him as seized ⁷during (the conversation)⁷ with hiccups, and unable to finish the hymn. He composed likewise Tragic and Dithyrambic poetry, and some other things;

¹—¹ So the Etymol. M. in Διθύραμβος—ἀπὸ τοῦ (διὰ) δύο θύρας βαίνων, τὴν τε κοιλίαν τῆς μητρὸς Σεμέλης καὶ τὸν μηρὸν τοῦ Διὸς.

² This I confess I cannot understand. The sense seems to require καθάπερ τὸν οἶνον Διόνυσον καλοῦσι—"as they call wine Dionysus"—where wine would be the thing caused, and Dionysus the causer; as shown by Euripides, who says in Bacch. 278, ὁ Σεμέλης γόνος Βότρυος ὑγρὸν πᾶσι εὔρε—

³ I have adopted Windet's τοκῆς, required by the sense and syntax, in lieu of τοκῶν—

⁴ The words "and know" have been added for the rhyme.

⁵ As πνέειν requires an accusative, it is evident that τι has dropt out before πνέειν—

⁶—⁶ The literal translation of the original and another metrical version may be seen in the "Greek Anthology, Prose and Verse," p. 179.

⁷—⁷ I have translated, as if τοῦ λόγου had dropt out between μεταξὺ and λυγγί— See the Banquet, § 13.

all of which he burnt, after he had made a trial of an intercourse with Socrates, and pronouncing a verse of this kind—

And a certain Anatolius, a grammarian, on speaking (again)² the verse, was in some repute with Hephaestus, who had been appointed governor of the city;³ for he said to him⁴—

Come here, Hephaestus, Pharus needs thy aid.

They say, moreover, that when Socrates was about to receive him (as a disciple), he saw, as a vision in a dream, that a swan without wings had settled on his knees; and, becoming fledged on the instant, flew up to the sky, and sung something so sweet, that he enchanted all who heard it; and this indicated the future fame of the man. But after the death of Socrates, he again⁵ made use of Cratylus, one of the sect of Heracleitus, as his teacher; on whom he composed the dialogue of that name, inscribing it "Cratylus, or On the Correctness of Names." Afterwards⁶ he sailed to Italy; and finding that Archytas had established there a school of Pythagoreans, he again⁷ had as a teacher the Pythagorean of the same name;⁸ there⁹ he has made mention of Archytas.

But since it is requisite for a philosopher to be fond of seeing the works of Nature, he sailed to Sicily likewise, to view the craters of fire that are in Ætna, and not for the sake of a Sicilian table,¹⁰ as thou, noble¹¹ Aristides,¹² sayest. And,

² In lieu of ἐνταῦθα, the sense requires either ἐνταῦθις—what I have translated, or ἐντεῦθεν—"in consequence of this"—which would perhaps be preferable.

³ The city was Pharus, as shown by the quoted verse.

⁴ I have adopted Etwall's correction, ὁ ἱς αὐτὸν, in lieu of ὁ αὐτὸν—

⁵ For Plato, according to Apuleius, had been a disciple of Cratylus, previous to his attendance upon Socrates.

⁶ I have translated, as if the Greek were ταῦτα, not τούτων—

^{7, 8, 9} I cannot understand either πάλιν, or διέκρινον, or ἐνθα—There is, no doubt, something wanting here, which may perhaps be supplied by the MSS. of this treatise hitherto uncollated; just as the Vienna MS. has filled up two gaps, as will be noticed in their proper places.

¹⁰ By "a Sicilian table" is meant a "luxurious one," as understood by Horace in his "Sicula dapes."

¹¹ This is a strange epithet applied to a person whose statement is called in question. Hence in lieu of γενναῖς, one would have expected γελοία, "ridiculous"—

when he was at Syracuse with Dionysius the Great, he endeavoured to change the tyranny there into an aristocracy; for which purpose he had gone to him (Dionysius); and on the latter inquiring of him—Whom do you think amongst men is happy? fancying forsooth that the philosopher would, out of flattery, say that he was, Plato answered that (he thought) Socrates was. (And when) Dionysius asked him again—What do you consider as the business of a statesman? Plato replied—To make the citizens better. (And when) he asked a third time—What then? Does it seem to you a little thing to act the judge correctly?—for Dionysius had a reputation for acting the judge correctly—Plato replied, ¹not lowering his sail ¹a jot—It is indeed a little thing, and of a statesman ²the farthest portion; for they, who act the judge correctly, are like the menders of cloth, who weave up again torn garments. (And when) he asked a fourth time—What is it, think you, ³to be a tyrant? Is it not a brave thing? Plato replied—Of all the most cowardly; since ⁴he fears even the razor ⁴of the barber, lest he should lose his life by it. Whereupon Dionysius, being greatly annoyed, ordered him, while the sun was still above the earth, ⁵to take himself off from Syracuse; and thus was Plato with dishonour ⁵driven out of Syracuse.

Of his second journey to Sicily the reason was this. After the death of Dionysius the Great, Dionysius, the son of Dionysius, succeeded to the kingdom, having Dion for his uncle, who had been a familiar acquaintance of Plato during his first journey. Dion therefore writes to him (saying) that —“If you were now present, there would be ⁶a hope of changing the tyranny into an aristocracy.” For this purpose then, when he had made a second journey, he was falsely accused by the spear-bearing attendants upon Dionysius, how that he was plotting to make over the government to Dion,

² I have followed the suggestion of Hemsterhuis on Thom. Mag. p. 27, who would insert here πολιτικοῦ, preserved by Eusebius in Chronic. i. p. 56, ed. Scaliger.

³ I have translated, as if οἷα had dropt out before εἶναι—

⁴ From μαχαίρια διαδίδου Casaubon happily elicited μαχαίριδια δίδου. See Pierson on Mærid. p. 259.

⁵ The Vienna MS. has supplied all the words between the numerals.

⁶ I have translated, as if the Greek were ἐσται, not ἔσσι— and to depose Dionysius; when being overpowered, he was by Dionysius delivered over to Pollis of Ægina, who was then trading with Sicily, to be sold. And he carrying Plato to Ægina, found there Anniceris, the Libyan, who was about to sail to Elis for the purpose of entering the contest with a four-horsed car; and meeting with Pollis, he purchased Plato from him, having bought¹ this glory, superior to all the victory of a four-horsed car; respecting whom Aristides² says that no one would have known³ Anniceris, if he had not purchased Plato.

Of his third journey to Sicily this was the motive. Dion, after being proscribed by Dionysius and deprived of his property, was thrown into prison. He writes therefore to Plato, that Dionysius had promised to release him, if Plato would come to him again; when he readily undertook this third journey to assist his friend. And thus much on the travels of the philosopher to Sicily.

It should be known likewise that he went to Egypt to the men of the priesthood there, and learnt from them the science of a priest. Hence he says in the Gorgias—⁴“No, by the dog,”—which was a god in Egypt.⁴ For that, which statues mean amongst the Greek, animals do amongst the Egyptians, through being the symbols of each of the gods to whom they are dedicated. Being desirous, moreover, to meet with the Magi, but unable to reach them in consequence of a war raging at that time⁵ in Persia, he departed for Phœnicia; and meeting there with the Magi, he obtained the science of the Magi; and hence he appears in the Timæus to be skilled in the art of sacrificing, while speaking of the signs of the liver and entrails, and such like matters. But this ought to have been told⁶ previous to the statement of the causes of his journeys⁷ to Sicily.⁶

² In Orat. Platon. 2, t. iii. p. 385, Cant.

³ I have adopted ἐγίγνωσκον δὲ, as suggested by Etwell.

⁴—⁴ On this Socratic oath see my note on Hipp. Maj. § 18.

⁵ In lieu of Θέου, Casaubon would read καὶ πόλεως— He should have suggested χρόνου, what I have translated.

⁶—⁶ From this it would seem as if Plato travelled to Egypt and neighbouring countries before he went to Sicily.

⁷ Meric Casaubon would read τῶν γῆναι instead of τῶν simply.

On his return to Athens he established a school in the Academia, by separating a portion of the Gymnasium for a grove sacred to the Muses; and there Timon, the man-hater, associated with Plato alone. Very many persons did he attract to learning, both men and women in male attire, by preparing them to hear him, and showing them that his philosophy was superior to all love of business. For he freed himself from the irony¹ of Socrates, and from passing his time² in the place of public meeting, and at work-shops,³ and from composing discourses to catch young persons.⁴ He freed himself likewise from the Pythagorean oath,⁵ about keeping their doors closed, and the—"He said it,"⁶ and exhibited himself more like a citizen to all. ⁶After making many his admirers, and benefiting the most of them,⁶ when he was about to die, he had a dream, how that having become a swan,⁷ he went from tree to tree, and caused the greatest trouble to bird-limers. This Simmias, the Socratic philosopher, expounded (by saying) that he would be not caught by those, who after him wished to interpret him; for the interpreters who wanted to catch⁸ the meaning of the ancients were like bird-limers; and not caught he is; since one may take his words, like those of Homer, in a sense physical, moral, ethical, theological, and, (to speak) simply, in a variety of senses. For these two souls are said to be alto-

¹ This seems rather a strange assertion; for the Socratic irony is to be found in all the genuine dialogues, with the exception of the Laws.

²⁻³ This I suspect Plato never did at any time; although it was a frequent practice with Socrates, as we learn from Xenophon.

³ This was the practice of a sophist rather; and hence such a person is ridiculed on this very ground in the dialogue of that name.

⁵ This was the formula adopted by the disciples of Pythagoras, when they alluded to any of the doctrines of their teacher.

⁶⁻⁶ Of all the words between the numerals the original has been hitherto furnished by the Vienna MS. alone, with the exception of the letters λήσας, the termination of ώφελήσας.

⁸ In lieu of πυρᾶσθαι, the sense evidently requires θηρᾶσθαι, what I have translated. The two verbs are confounded elsewhere, as I have shown at Eurip. Tro. 982.

gether in harmony; and hence 'one may take them both in various senses.'¹

After his decease the Athenians buried him in an expensive manner, and they inscribed upon his tomb—

² These two, Æsculapius and Plato, did Apollo beget;
One, that he might save the soul; the other, the body.³

And thus much respecting the family of the philosopher.

¹ Such is the literal version of the original. But, unless I am mistaken, δ αἰσῶν have dropt out after πατρόθεν: which could hardly be applied to writers, although it might to what they wrote.

² Of this distich there is a metrical version in p. 199

THE INTRODUCTION OF ALCINOUS,

TO THE DOCTRINES OF PLATO.

[1.] What Philosophy is, and what the person ought to be naturally, who is about to be a Philosopher.

The teaching of the peculiar opinions of Plato would be something of this kind.

Philosophy is a longing after wisdom, or a release or withdrawal of the soul from the body, while we are turning ourselves to what is perceived by mind, and to things that exist truly. Now Wisdom is the knowledge of things divine and human; and the person called a philosopher is so named from it,¹ as a musician is from music. Now it is necessary for such a person to be naturally disposed, in the first place, towards those kinds of learning, that possess the power to fit him for, and lead him to, the knowledge of the existence, perceived by mind, and not of that, ²which wanders about, and is in a state of flowing.³ Next, he must have a love for truth, and by no means admit a falsehood. Moreover, he must be naturally temperate, and, as regards the portion of the soul, ³subject to being affected by circumstances,³ naturally sub-

²⁻³ The Heracleitean doctrine, that all things are in a perpetual state of flowing, is here applied to knowledge, according to the sentiment of Solon—

Ever as I grow old, still much I learn.

³⁻³ Such is the periphrase required to understand the full meaning of τὸ παθητικόν in Greek.

duced. For he, who is 'eager after instruction' relating to things existing, and who turns to these his longing, will look upon pleasures² with little admiration. It is requisite too for him, who is about to be a philosopher, to be mentally free. For all little considerations are opposed to the soul, that is about to contemplate³ subjects pertaining to god and man.³ And towards justice likewise it is requisite for him to be naturally disposed, as it is⁴ towards truth and freedom (in thought)⁵ and temperance; and there ought to be in addition an aptitude to learn, and a (good) memory. For these things form the species of a philosopher. Since these naturally good qualities, when they meet with a proper education and fitting aliment, render a person perfect for virtue; but when they are neglected, they become the cause of great mischief. And these Plato was accustomed to call by names similar⁶ to the virtues, temperance, and fortitude, and justice.

[2.] That as Contemplation takes the lead, Action is necessary and follows.

Since life is twofold, Contemplative and Active, of the former the chief point lies in the knowledge of truth; but of the latter, in doing what is suggested by reason. The Contemplative life then is the one held in honour, but the Active that which follows and is necessary.⁷ That such is the case will be clear from hence. Contemplation is an operation of the mind, while it is thinking upon⁸ what is perceptible by mind;⁸ but Action is an operation of the rational soul, perfected by means of the body. The soul then, when contemplating the deity and the thoughts of the deity, is said to be in a good state;

² Ficinus has "voluptates corporis," what the sense requires; and hence perhaps he found in his MS. οὐ θαυμάζου διὰ σωματικὰς τὰς ἡδονάς.

³—³ Ficinus has "veritatem rerum—"

⁴ I have translated, as if the Greek were ὡς γὰρ, not εἰς γὰρ, which I cannot understand.

⁵ The words, "in thought," are added, to answer to the preceding ἀνυπόθετον—τῇ γνώμῃ.

⁶ Ficinus has "communiori quodam nomine," as if his MS. read κοινωτέρῳ ὀνόματι in lieu of ὁμωνύμως—

⁷ Ficinus has, in lieu of ἀναγκαῖος, the Supplement, "necessariorum—que rerum ministra."

⁸—⁸ Instead of τὰ νοητά, the MS. of Ficinus seems to have read τὰ θεῖα— for his version is "divina—" and this state goes by the name of intelligence; which a person would say is nothing else than an assimilation with the deity; and hence such would take the lead, and be held in honour, and be prayed for the most,¹ and be the most appropriate (for man);¹ nor is it to be hindered, and is placed in our power;² and it is the cause of the end laid down for us. But Action and the Active, performed through the body, can be hindered³ or may be carried on,³ when the things, which are seen during a contemplative life, require a person to apply them to the moral conduct of man. For he, who is intent upon his duty,⁴ will come to public affairs, when he sees them improperly administered by some persons, through his considering that to act as a general, and a judge, and an ambassador, are⁵ things of circumstances,⁵ but that the best in action, and as taking the lead in it, is that relating to legislation, and statesmanship, and⁶ the regulation and instruction of young persons. It is proper then, from what has been said, for the philosopher to be never deficient in Contemplation,⁷ but to feed it ever and to increase⁸ it,⁹ as being near to his proceeding on⁹ to a life of Action.

[3.] That the study of the philosopher rests, according to Plato, on three points; on viewing things that exist; on doing what is correct; and on the art of reasoning.

²—² Such is the literal and unintelligible version of ἀκώλυτόν τε καὶ ἐφ' ἡμῖν κείμενον—Ficinus has—"cui nulla obsistunt impedimenta, quominus in nostra potestate consistat—" adopted by Stanley.

³—³ The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus.

⁴ Such seems to be the meaning of σπουδαῖος, which embraces the two ideas of haste and earnestness in the Greek word σπουδή. Ficinus has "studiosus disciplinae—"

⁵—⁵ So I have translated περιστατικά— but Ficinus has "admicula quædam quasi externa existimans—" Stanley—"things necessary—"

⁶ I have translated, as if καὶ had dropt out before κατὰστασιν—Ficinus—"præscribere ordinem—" Stanley—"the compression of sedition," thus following in part the reading of ed. pr., κατὰ στάσιν—

⁷ Ficinus has "veritatis indagacionem," which would be in Greek τῆς ἀληθείας ἐρευνήσεως in lieu of τῆς θεωρίας—

⁸ Ficinus has "agere," evidently a typographical error for "augere—"

⁹—⁹ I have translated, as if the Greek were ὡς ἐχόμενον γε τοῦ—χωρεῖν—not ὡς ἐπόμενον δὲ καὶ—χωρεῖν—which I cannot understand; nor could, I think, Ficinus; whose version is—"humanas autem actiones tanquam inferiora quædam non nunquam attingere—" in which there is not a single word like the original. On the confusion between ἐπόμενον and ἐχόμενον, see the Statesman, p. 213, n. 63.

The study of the philosopher seems to rest, according to Plato, on three points; on the view and perception of things that exist; on doing what is correct; and on the theory¹ itself of reasoning.

The perception of things that exist is Contemplative; but Practical (science) is concerned about things to be done; and Dialectical about reasoning. Now this last is subdivided into the Distributive, and the Definitive, and the Inductive, and the Syllogistic; and this last into the Demonstrative, which is concerned about the syllogism, which exists of necessity;² and into the Tentative, which is seen in the case of a syllogism, resting on opinion;³ and into the third, Rhetorical, which is concerned about the enthymeme,³ which is called an imperfect syllogism; and still further into Sophisms; ⁴ which would not be that, which takes the lead in the eye of the philosopher, but what is necessary.⁴

Of Practical science one part is seen to be concerned about the care of morals, and another about the regulation of a household, and another relating to the state, and its safety. Of these, the first is called Moral; the second, Economical; the third, Political. Of the Contemplative one portion, relating to what is unmoved and the first cause, and such things as are divine, is called Theological; another portion, relating to the movement of the stars, and their periodical revolutions, and their return to the spot from whence they started, and to the constitution of this world, is Physical; but another portion, viewed by means of geometry and the rest of learning,⁵ is Mathematical.

¹ The Greek word θεωρία, which elsewhere means "contemplation," is taken here in the sense of the English "theory" derived from it. Ficinus, however, has "in sermonis considerations"—understanding by λόγους not "reason," but "discourse."

² In lieu of the words between the numerals, Ficinus has "et in ostensionem, quæ ratiocinatio probabilis appellatur."

³ After ἐνθύμημα Ficinus inserts "id est, sententiam cautam—"

⁵ Ficinus has, what is more explicit, "Sequitur Mathematica, quæ Geometricam et Arithmeticam continet."

Such then being the subdivision and portioning out of the kinds of philosophy, we must first speak of the Dialectical, as it is agreeable to the doctrines of Plato; and first of all about the Judicatory.

[4.] Respecting the faculty of Judging, and the Judicatory powers of the soul.

Since there is that, which judges, and likewise that, which is judged, there will be also that, which is effected by them, what a person would call judging. Properly one would call the act of judging the judging faculty, but more commonly that which judges. Now this is twofold; one, by which a thing is judged; the other, through which it is. Of which the former would be the intellect that is in us; ¹ the latter, the organ,¹ that is naturally judicatory, ² acting like a leader to what is true; but like a follower after what is false.² Now this organ is nothing else than natural reason. And, as regards things that exist, the philosopher would be called more clearly a judge, by whom things are judged. But reason likewise is a judge, through which the truth is judged, and which we have said is an organ. Now reason is twofold. One is altogether ³ to be not made captive³ and is accurate; the other is not⁴ to be deceived by falsehoods as regards the knowledge of things. The former of these can be attained by god, but not by man; but the latter can be attained by man likewise. Now this is also twofold; one is conversant about things perceptible by mind; the other about things perceptible by a sense; ⁴ of which the one, conversant about things perceptible by mind, is Science and Scientific Reason; but the other, conversant about things perceptible by a sense, is Opinionative and Opinion.⁴ From whence the Scientific possesses ⁵ a firmness and stability, as being conversant with

²—² Such is the literal translation of the Greek. Ficinus has “idque primo vera, secundo loco falsa dijudicat.”

³—³ Such is the well-defined meaning of ἀληπτος. Ficinus has “incomprehensibilis”—which is ambiguous; and the same remark is applicable to “infallibilis,” his version of ἀδιάψευστος.

⁴—⁴ Ficinus has thus abridged all between the numerals—“prima quidem, scientia est; secunda vero, opinio.”

⁵—⁵ Here again Ficinus has more briefly—“illa stabilitatem habet, quippe cum circa stabilia versetur.” principles firm and stable;⁵ but ¹the Credible and Opinionative (possess) probability, as being conversant about things not stable.¹

Now of Science, conversant about things perceptible by mind, and of Opinion, conversant about things perceptible by a sense, the principles are Intelligence and Perception. Now Perception is an affection of the soul, that gives, like a leader, by means of the body a previous intimation of a power that has been affected. But when there has been produced in the soul by means of the organs of sense an impression according to its sensation,²[which is a sensation,]² then, in order that (the impression) may not be evanescent, but permanent,³[and preserved]³ the preservation of it is called Memory.⁴ But Opinion is the complication of memory and sensation. For when we meet for the first time with a thing perceptible by a sense, and a sensation is produced in us by it, and from this sensation Memory, and we subsequently meet again with the same thing perceived by a sense, we combine the memory previously brought into action with the sensation produced a second time; and we say within ourselves,⁵⁶ as, for instance, say,⁶ Socrates, (or) a horse, (or) fire, or whatever thing there may be of such a kind. Now this is called Opinion through our combining the recollection brought previously into action with the sensation recently produced. And when these, placed⁷ along each other, agree, a true opinion is produced; but when they ⁸swerve from each other,⁸ a false one. For if a person, having a recollection of Socrates, and meeting with Plato, imagines, through some similarity, that

²— The words between the brackets are evidently an interpolation, and properly omitted by Ficinus.

³— Here again is an interpolation. Ficinus has "ut firma indelebilibus permaneat—" adopted by Stanley. This, however, is an abridgment rather of μή—διὰ χρόνου πλῆθος ἐξίτηλος γίνηται, ἀλλ' ἱμνοῦς καὶ σωζόμενος—

⁴ Compare Plato, Phileb. p. 34, A., σωτηρίαν—αἰσθήσεως τὴν μνήμην λέγων ὁρθῶς ἀν' τὰς λέγους.

⁵ Ficinus has "in iis dicimus"—for his MS. read αὐτοῖς, not ἑαυτοῖς—

⁶— I have translated, as if οἶον had dropped out between λέγομαι and φίρε— Compare p. 253, lin. 2, οἶον Εὐθύδημον φέρε—

⁷ Ficinus has "colligantur," by an error of the press for "collocantur," which leads to ρωθίμενα in lieu of γενόμενα—

⁸— Such seems to be the proper version of παρὰλλάξ.

he is meeting again with Socrates, and afterwards combines the sensation, which he has received from Plato, as if he had received it from Socrates, with the recollection, which he has of Socrates, the opinion would be a false one. Now that, in which memory and sensation are produced (conjointly),¹ Plato² likens to an impression on wax; but when the soul, after remoulding by an exercise of thought the things, which have been imagined out of sensation and memory, looks upon them, as upon those, out of which they have been produced, Plato calls this a painting to the life;³ and sometimes too a phantasy. But he calls the exercise of thought a talking⁴ of the soul to itself;⁵ and talking (he says) is a flowing⁶ from it, proceeding with a vocal sound through the mouth. Now Cogitation is an operation of the mind, while contemplating the first things perceptible by mind. And this seems to be twofold; one, while it was contemplating things perceptible by mind, previous to the soul⁷ existing in the body;⁷ another, after⁸ it had been compelled to come⁸ into this body. Of these, one⁹ [that contemplated previous to the soul existing in the body]⁹ was called Cogitation;¹⁰ but¹¹ after it existed in the body,¹¹ that, which was then called Cogitation, was now called Physical Thinking, as being a cogitation in a subjective soul. When therefore we say that Cogitation is the beginning of Scientific Reasoning, we do not mean that, which is so called now, but that, which, as we have said, was then,

¹ I have translated, as if ψυχή had dropt out after γίνηται—

² In Theætet. p. 191, C.

³ The word in Plato is ζωγράφημα, not ἀναζωγράφησιν, as shown by Ast's Index.

⁴ Ficinus has—"discursum ac ratiocinium"—

⁵ Compare Phileb. § 81, where I should have remarked that the connexion between speaking to another and speaking to oneself, that is, thinking, is shown by the difference between φράζειν in the active voice and φράζεσθαι in the middle.

⁶ Hence we can perceive the connexion between ῥέω and ῥίω.

⁷ Ficinus has "descendat in corpus"—

⁸ Ficinus has "in corpus hoc mersa est," as if his MS. read ἔμβεβύσθαι in lieu of ἔμβυβασθῆναι—

⁹ The words between the brackets are an interpolation, and properly omitted by Ficinus.

¹⁰ Although αὐτὸ τοῦτο νόησις ἐκαλεῖτο might perhaps stand by supplying ὄνομα after αὐτὸ τοῦτο, yet one would prefer to omit αὐτὸ τοῦτο, or to read αὕτη νόησις, answering to "ipsa intellectio" in Ficinus.

¹¹ The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus.

when the soul existed apart from the body, called Cogitation, but is now Physical Thinking. Now Physical Thinking is called by him (Plato) both a simple science, and a fledging¹ of the soul; and sometimes, recollection. From these sciences that are simple, Physical and Scientific Reason, which exists in Nature, is composed. Since then there is Reason existing, both Scientific and Opinionative, and there is a Cogitation existing and Sensation, there are also things, that are subjective to them; as for instance, those, that are perceptible by mind, and those likewise, by a sense.

Now, since of things perceptible by mind some are primary, as ideas, and some secondary, as species, which, being (impressed) on Matter, are inseparable from it, Cogitation is twofold, one of the primary, and another of the secondary. And again, since of things perceptible by a sense, some are primary, as qualities—for instance, colour, whiteness,—but some according to accident—as white mixed with another colour,—and, moreover, ²a congregated mass,³ as fire, honey,—so there is sensation, one part of which is of primaries, and called itself primary; and another of secondaries, (and called) secondary. Of the primaries, perceptible by mind, Cogitation judges, not without Scientific Reason, ³by means of a certain apprehension, and not by a discourse in detail;³ but of the secondary, a sense judges not without Opinionative Reason; but of the congregated mass, Opinionative Reason (judges) not without a sense. Now since the world, perceptible by mind, is a primary perceptible, but that, perceptible by a sense, is a congregated mass, of the world, perceptible by mind, Cogitation judges, ⁴together with Reason that is not without reason;⁴ but of that perceptible by a sense Opinionative Reason (judges) not without a sense.

Since then there is Contemplation and Action, right reason does not judge in a similar manner of things, which fall under Contemplation, and of what are to be done; but in the case of Contemplation it looks to the truth, and to what is not in that

² ³ This in modern metaphysics would be called "a concrete substance."

³ Ficinus has "per comprehensionem quandam atque discursum—"

⁴ Since παρά λόγον differs not an atom from ὅτι ἀνε λόγον, it is probable that παρά λόγον is from an interpretation, especially as ὅτι ἀνε λόγον is properly balanced by ὅτι ἀνε αἰσθήσεως.

condition; but in the case of things to be done, to what is appropriate, and what is strange, and ¹ what is being done.¹ For by having a natural notion of what is beautiful and good we make use of reason; and referring to these natural notions, as to some determinate standards, we decide, ² whether any of these things are in this state or in a different one.²

[5.] About the Dialectic element and its aim.

The most elementary part of Dialectic Science he deems to be, first, the looking upon the essence of every thing whatsoever, and then, upon what relates to its accidents. It looks upon each thing, as it is in itself, either from above, in the way of Division or Definition, or from below,³ in that of Analysis; but on the accidents of, and that which exist in, essences, (it looks) either from the things contained, through Induction, or from the things containing, through a Syllogism; so that, according to this account, in Dialectical Science there is a dividing, and a defining, and an analyzing, and, moreover, that which is inductive and syllogistic. Now the dividing is the separating a genus into its species, or a whole into its parts; as when we separate the soul into the rational, and ⁴ that affected by circumstances;⁴ and again the (so) affected into the irascible and the concupiscible. The division too of the voice (is) into the things signified; as⁵ when one and the same word is referred to many things; and the division of accidents into things subjective; as when we say of good things, that some are so, as regards the soul, some, as regards the body, and some are external; and that of things subjective into accidents; as when we say of men, that some are good, some bad, and some between (both).⁶ It is necessary then to make use of the separation of the genus into its species for the purpose of knowing thoroughly each thing by itself, and what it is according to its essence. But this cannot take place without ¹—¹ Ficinus has, what the sense requires, "quid agendum, quid non," which plainly leads to τὶ πρακτικόν καὶ μὴ, in lieu of τὶ τὸ πραττόμενον.

²—² Ficinus has more briefly, "bonane an mala sint singula, dijudicamus."

³ Ficinus has "vel ordine converso," as if his MS. read ἢ ἀνὰ πάλιν instead of ἐκ τῶθεν.

⁴—⁴ Ficinus has "irrationalem—"

⁵ I have adopted ὥς from ed. pr. in lieu of καὶ— The two words are constantly confounded, as shown by Markland on Iph. A. 153.

⁶ Compare Martial's "Carmina sunt bona, sunt mediocritia, sunt mala plura."

a Definition. Now a Definition is produced from a division after this manner. Of the thing, that is about to fall under a Definition, it is requisite to take (in the first place)¹ the genus; ²as in the case of man (the genus) is an animal; ³and then to separate it, according to its proximate differences, descending to the species; as, for instance, to rational and irrational, mortal and immortal; so that if the proximate differences are combined³ with the genus, ⁴that proceeds from them,⁴ there exists a definition of man.

But of Analysis there are three kinds; one is an ascent from things perceptible by a sense to the primary perceptible by mind; another is an ascent through things (fully) shown⁵ and obscurely shown to propositions not to be demonstrated and without a middle;⁶ and another is that, which ascends from an hypothesis to principles not hypothetical. Now the first is something of this kind; as if we should proceed from the beauty relating to the body to the beauty relating to the soul; and from this to that in pursuits; and from this to that in laws; and then to the wide sea⁷ of beauty; and then, after having proceeded thus,⁸ we should discover ⁹what remains, namely, beauty itself.⁹ The second kind of Analysis is something like this. It is requisite to suppose what is to be sought, and to see what things are before it, and to show these from what

² Here again I have followed in part the version of Ficinus, "genus hominis animal;" for the Greek ὡς ἀνθρώπου τὸ ζῶον I cannot understand.

³ Ficinus has "adjiciantur," as if his MS. read προστίθεται, not συντίθεται—

⁴ I cannot understand τῷ ἐξ αὐτῶν, nor could, I think, Ficinus, who has omitted those words. I could have understood τὸν ἐξ αὐτῶν ὅρον—"the definition arising from them"—

⁵ The antithesis evidently demands ἢ δὲ διὰ τῶν διαδευκνυμένων, not δεικνυμένων simply.

⁶ On the word ἀμεσος, applied to a proposition, see H. Stephens in Index to Thea. Græc. Ling., who remarks at the same time that the interpretation put upon that word by A. Gellius is at variance with its derivation,—a proposition without a middle.

⁷ Ficinus has a different metaphor, "ad ipsum—fontem." See p. 268, n. 2.

⁸ Ficinus has "per hunc modum—gradatim," as if his MS. read ὁὕτως κατὰ πόδα—

come after, by ascending up to those before, until we arrive at the first and what is acknowledged; and beginning (again),¹ from this we shall descend to what is sought by the Synthetical manner. For instance,² I am seeking, whether the soul is immortal; and after supposing this very thing, I inquire whether it is always moved; and after showing this, whether what is always moved is self-moved; and again, after showing this, I consider whether what is self-moved is a beginning of motion; and then, whether a beginning is unbegotten; ³ which is laid down as being acknowledged,³ inasmuch as the unbegotten is likewise the indestructible; from which, as from a thing quite clear, making a beginning I will put together a demonstration of this kind—If a beginning be a thing unbegotten and indestructible, that, which is self-moved, is a beginning of motion. Now the soul is a thing self-moved; it is therefore indestructible, and unbegotten, and immortal. But the Analysis from an hypothesis is of this kind—A person, inquiring into a matter, lays down that very thing hypothetically; and he then considers what will follow upon the assertion so laid down; and after this, whether it is requisite to give a reason for the hypothesis; and, laying down another hypothesis, he inquires whether what had been previously laid down, follows again⁴ the other hypothesis; and so he continues to do, until he arrives at some principle not hypothetical.

Induction is wholly a method by reasoning, which proceeds from the like to the like, or from particulars to generals. Induction is particularly useful for exciting notions connected with physics.

[6.] On the kinds of the (so-called) Propositions, and on Syllogism.

Of that portion of reasoning, which we call a Proposition, there are two kinds; one is Affirmation, the other Negation. Affirmation is a thing of this kind—Socrates is walking about;

¹ Since Ficinus has "rursus incipientes," he, doubtless, found in his MS. δ' αὖ ἀρχόμενοι, not δι' ἀρχόμενοι—

² This example contains the leading arguments put forth in the Phædo, to prove the immortality of the soul on philosophical principles.

³ Ficinus has, what is more intelligible, "quod quidem, ut perspicuum, a cunctis admittitur."

⁴ This "again" seems very strange, where the sense requires rather "still," in Greek ἔτι, not πάλιν—but Negation is a thing of this kind—Socrates is not walking about. Of Affirmation and Negation, there is one kind relating to what is Universal, another to what is Particular. An Affirmation relating to what is Particular is of this kind—“A certain¹ pleasure is a good:” a Negation is of this kind—“A certain² pleasure is not a good.” But an Affirmation relating to what is Universal is of this kind—“Every disgraceful thing is an evil:” a Negation is of this kind—“Not one of disgraceful things is a good.”

Of Propositions some are Categorical, some Hypothetical. The Categorical are simple; as “Every just thing is beautiful;” but the Hypothetical point out a Consequence or Repugnance.

Plato makes use likewise of the operation of Syllogisms, when he is disproving or proving; when disproving falsehoods by a searching inquiry; and when proving truths by a certain kind of teaching. Now a Syllogism is a reasoning, in which, on some things being laid down, something necessarily turns out different from what has been laid down. Of Syllogisms there are some Categorical; others Hypothetical; and others Mixed. Of these the Categorical are those, of which the assumptions and conclusions are simple propositions; the Hypothetical are those, that proceed from hypothetical propositions; and the Mixed are those, that combine the (other) two.

The man³ makes use likewise of Demonstrative (reasoning),⁴ in the dialogues⁵ that covertly lead (to truth),⁶ and of Detective,⁶ in those against the Sophists and young persons;

¹ ² Here τις is found in an indefinite sense at the commencement of a sentence, contrary to the genius of the older Greek language; and although that position has been defended by Hermann and others, yet no unexceptionable instance can be produced before the time of Demosthenes, when, as remarked by Elmsley, the language of Athens had already begun to lose something of its pristine purity.

³ Ficinus has “Plato—”

⁴ Ficinus inserts here “argumentationibus,” which I have adopted.

⁵ Such, I conceive, is the meaning of ὑποκρινόμενοι—Ficinus has “quid ad expositionem pertinent—” But that would be in Greek ὑποκρινόμενοι.

but the Litigious, against those called peculiarly Litigious, as, say,¹ for instance, Euthydemus and Hippias. Of the Categorical, whose forms are three, the first is that, ²in which the common extreme is first the predicate, and then the subject; the second is, in which the common extreme is the predicate in both; the third is, in which the common extreme is the subject in both.³ Now the Extremes I call the parts of Propositions; as in the Proposition, "Man is an animal," we call "Man" an extreme, and so too "Animal." According to the first, second, and third forms, Plato frequently asks reasons.⁴ According to the first (he argues)⁵ thus in the Alcibiades⁶—"Just things are honourable. But honourable things are good. Therefore just things are good." According to the second, in the Parmenides,⁶ thus—"That which has no parts, is neither straight nor round. But that which partakes of figure, is either straight or round. Hence that, which has no parts, does not partake even of figure." According to the third in the same book thus—⁷"That, which partakes of figure, has some quality; and that, which partakes of figure, is bounded; therefore that, which has some quality, ¹ So I have translated φίρε after Εὐθύδημον: for φίρε is frequently used for αἰτί, especially in the Meno. See p. 246, n. *.

^{2,3} I have adopted the phraseology of Ficinus, when translating the Greek, ἐν ᾧ ὁ κοινὸς ὅρος τοῦ μὲν κατηγορεῖται, τῷ δὲ ὑποκείται τοῦ δὲ δευτέρου, ἐν ᾧ ὁ κοινὸς ὅρος ἀμφοτέρων κατηγορεῖται τοῦ δὲ τρίτου, ἐν ᾧ ὁ κοινὸς ὅρος ἀμφοτέρων ὑποκείται. And hence, perhaps, is to be understood what is meant by Olympiodorus on Platon. Alcibiad. p. 126, ed. Creuzer, where the words ὑποκείμενον and κατηγορηται are found in two antithetical sentences.

³ Such is the literal version of ἰρωτᾷ λόγους. But as Ficinus has "disputat," one would fancy he found something else in his MS., were it not that we meet with τοὺς ὑποθετικοὺς—ἰρωτωμένους shortly afterwards. Since, however, no Proposition could be said to ask a question, it will be asserted perhaps that ἰρωτᾷ λόγους means, "he proposes reasons by means of questions;" a meaning, which Stephens, in Theas. Gr. i. p. 1903, D., says he was the first to point out; while τοὺς ὑποθετικοὺς—ἰρωτωμένους would signify "hypothetical reasons given by means of questions."

⁴ After "sic," answering to οὕτως, Ficinus adds "argumentatur," what I have adopted.

⁵ In Alcibiad. I. § 23.

⁶ In Parmenid. § 23.

is bounded."¹ And in many books we shall find hypothetical reasons asked by him; and especially in the Parmenides we shall find them such as these¹—"If the one has no parts, it has neither a beginning, a middle, nor an end,² nor has it a limit;³ and if it has not a limit, neither does it partake of figure. If then the one has no parts, neither does it partake of figure." According to the second hypothetical form, which the majority say is the third, according to which the common extreme follows both the ends, he asks³ in this manner—"If the one has no parts, it is neither straight nor round. (But) if it partakes of figure, it is either straight or round. If then it has no parts, it does not partake of figure." And yet according to the third form, but the second with some persons, according to which the common extreme leads both, he asks⁴ thus in the Phædo—"If, after we have received the knowledge of what is equal, we have not forgotten it, we know it; but, if we have forgotten it, we recall it to mind.⁵ And of the Mixed he makes mention, which thus build up (a reasoning) from a consequence—"If the one is a whole and limited, it has a beginning, a middle, and an end, and partakes of figure. ⁶Now, since the leading is so, so is the ending."⁶ Of those too, that pull down from a consequence, ⁷(it is most easy) to contemplate the differences in a similar manner.⁷

When therefore a person looks carefully into the powers of the soul, and into the difference of men, and the kinds of rea-

² The words between the numerals are evidently superfluous, unless we read ἔστι, in lieu of ἔχει, answering to "habebit" in Ficinus.

³ Ficinus, "ratiocinatur," and in ⁴, "argumentatur." See at p. 253, n. ⁴.

⁵ The reasoning alluded to is in p. 75, C. D.

⁷ I have translated, as if ωσαύτως had been corrupted into ὅτε πῶς and κατὰ πάντα into κατὰ τοῦτο, and ἀγνοῶν had dropt out after διαφορὰς—Ficinus has "sic quodammodo differentie considerantur—" as if he had found in his MS., or wished to read, αὶ διαφοραὶ θεωρεῖσθαι, instead of τὰς διαφορὰς κατὰ τοῦτο θεωρεῖσθαι—for he doubtless saw that κατὰ τοῦτο was at variance with the sense, and θεωρεῖσθαι with the syntax. Stanley, more briefly, "Of those also, which overthrow by Consequence, the differences may be gathered out of Plato."

soning,¹ and acutely perceives which of them are suited to the soul in this way or that, and being what himself by what and what kind of reasonings he can be persuaded, such a person, if he lays hold of a fitting opportunity for the use (of his faculties),¹ will become a perfect orator; and his oratorical skill would be justly called the science of speaking well.

And of Sophisms too we shall find the method² delineated³ by Plato in the Euthydemus, if we carefully read⁴ the book; so that⁵ it is indicated covertly, what Sophisms are in words, and what in things, and what are the solutions of them.

Moreover he has pointed out secretly the ten⁶ Categories in the Parmenides and the other dialogues; and he goes through the whole question of etymology in the Cratylus; and, to speak simply, the man is the most sufficient and wonderful in the business relating to Definitions and Divisions; all of which⁷ show forth especially the power of the Dialectic art.

The matter of the Cratylus has a meaning of this kind. Plato inquires there whether names are from nature or imposition; and he is satisfied that the correctness of names is referable to imposition; not however simply⁸ so, nor accidentally, but so that the imposition follows upon the nature of the thing; for the correctness of the name is nothing else than the imposition, which agrees with the nature of the thing; nor is yet the imposition, whatever it may be, of the name, sufficient by itself⁹ for correctness; nor is nature, nor the first

² In lieu of μέθοδον, Ficinus found something different in his MS., as shown by his "captionumque laqueos—"

³ Ficinus has "subinsinuatos—"

⁴ The oldest example of this sense of ἐντυγχάνειν is to be found, I believe, in Plutarch.

⁵ This ὥστε seems very strange here; and so, doubtless, thought Ficinus, whose version is "Illic enim—reperiuntur." Perhaps the author wrote ὥστε γὰρ—not ὥστε καί—

⁶ On the ten Categories, see Aristotle's treatise under that title.

⁷ Ficinus, "quæ duo," in Greek αἱ δύο, which is preferable to αἱ πᾶσαι—

⁸ Ficinus, "non temere—" as if his MS. read ἄλλως, not ἀπλῶς—

⁹ I have omitted, with Ficinus, καὶ ἀποκρῶσαν after αὐταρεπή—utterance of the voice; but that which is (compounded)¹ of both, so that the peculiarity² of every name is laid down according to its affinity with the nature of the thing; for assuredly, should what is accidental be imposed upon an accidental thing, it would not signify what is correct; as if, for instance, we should give to a man the name of a horse; since to speak is some one of actions; so that a person would not speak correctly by speaking in any manner soever, but if he should speak in such a way, as things exist naturally. Now since to give a name to a thing is a part of speaking, so is a name a part of speech; (and) to name a thing correctly or not would take place, not according to any imposition whatsoever, but according to a natural affinity with the thing. Hence he would be the best name-imposer, who should mark out by the name the nature of the thing. For the name is an instrument of a thing, not such as occurs accidentally, but³ has a mutual relation by nature;³ and through it we teach each other the things, and we judge of them;⁴ so that⁵ the name is something with a teaching, and the instrument, that judges of the existence of each thing,⁵ as the shuttle is of weaving.

With regard to the Dialectic art, this too will take place, (to wit,) to make use of names correctly. For as a man skilled in weaving would make use of a shuttle, through knowing its work, after a workman had manufactured it, so the Dialectician would, after the name-imposer had imposed the name, make use of it in a proper and advantageous manner. For it is the part of an artificer to make a rudder, but of the steersman to make use of it properly. So too the name-imposer himself would make a proper use of the imposition, if he were to make the imposition in the presence of the Dialectician, who knows

¹ I have adopted the Supplement in Ficinus of "compositum," answering to συναφθῆναι, which has dropt out, I suspect, after ἀμφοῖν—

² I have translated, as if τὸ had been lost before παντὸς— Ficinus has "omnis nominis rectitudo—"

³ Ficinus has, more intelligibly, "quod naturæ congruum—" as if his MS. read something else than κατάλληλον.

⁴ Ficinus has "naturamque discernimus—" as if his MS. read αὐτῶν τὴν φύσιν, not αὐτὰ simply. Compare, however, Cratyl. § 12, διδάσκομεν τι ἄλλῃλους καὶ τὰ πράγματα διακρίνομεν, ἃ ἔχει.

⁵ So in Cratyl. l. c., "Ὄνομα διδασκαλικόν τι ἴσθιν ὄργανον καὶ διακριτικὸν τῆς οὐσίας." Hence Ficinus has improperly, "atque distribuens uniuscujusque substantiam."

the nature of the things that are the subject (of the names.)¹ And let so much be written down on the Dialectical question.

[7.] On the Contemplative kind and its division.

Now let us speak in order of the Contemplative kind.

Of this we have said that one portion is Theological; another Physical; and another Mathematical: and that of the Theological the end is ²the knowledge relating to the first causes, and to what is the most above, and to principles; ³but of the Physical to learn what is the nature of the Universe; and what kind of animal is man; and what place he occupies in the world; and whether god has any forethought respecting the Universe; and whether there are other gods ⁴under his orders; and what is the condition of man with respect to the gods; but of the Mathematical, to consider ⁵the superficial and triply-separated nature, relating both to motion and an onward carrying on,⁶ and how it exists.

Let then the Contemplation of the Mathematical portion be laid down summarily. Now this was received by Plato for the acuteness of thought, as sharpening⁷ the intellect, and as furnishing an accuracy towards the consideration of things existing.⁸ That too, which relates to Numbers, being a portion of the Mathematical, ⁹introduces an affinity, not such as is accidental, to an upward approach to things existing; ⁷and it almost relieves us from the error and ignorance relating to things perceptible by a sense; and it co-operates towards the knowledge of existence, and ⁸becomes well-constituted, as

^{2,3} Ficinus, followed by Stanley, has, more briefly, "supernarum causarum cognitio—"

³ Ficinus has "ministri—"

⁵ Ficinus has "attingens"—for his MS. probably read θίγουσα, by a literal error, for θήγουσα.

⁶ Ficinus, followed by Stanley, has "rerum divinarum."

⁷ Such is the literal version of the words between the numerals. Ficinus has "non mediocrem ad divina percipienda vim præstat—" Stanley,—"conferreth not a little to the understanding of things that are."

⁸ Such is the literal version of the Greek. Ficinus has "prompso that,¹ unless we pursue in this way these subjects of learning, our contemplation on these matters will be incomplete, and unprofitable, and nothing worth. For it is meet to turn quickly from things to be seen and heard to those, which it is possible to see² by the reasoning faculty alone of the soul. For the looking into Mathematical learning is a kind of prelude to the contemplation of things existing. For Geometry, and Arithmetic, and the sciences that follow upon them, although desirous to lay hold of the Being, yet are they in a dream³ respecting the Being, and unable to see it, as a day-dream,⁴ through being ignorant both of the principles (of things) and of what are formed from those principles. They happen, nevertheless, to be very useful, according to what has been stated. From whence Plato said that such subjects of learning were not sciences at all. The Dialectic art is then a progression, that naturally ascends from Geometrical Hypotheses to the first principles of things and non-hypothetical. From whence he called the Dialectic art a science. But the subjects of (such) learning (he said) were neither opinion, through their being more clear than things perceptible by a sense; nor a science, through their being more obscure than the primaries perceptible by mind; but of bodies he says (there is)⁴ an opinion; of the primaries a science; but of (such) subjects of learning a mental notion. He lays down too, that Faith and Fancy are something; and that of these Faith is of things perceptible by a sense; but Fancy of resemblances and kinds.

eye of mind, so we are led from things audible by the ear of sense to try things of rhythm inaudible except by the ear of mind;" where the concluding words would be expressed in Greek,—ἀπὸ τῶν ἀκουστῶν ἐπὶ τὰ ἀνῆκτα εἰ μὴ ὡς τοῦ νοῦ, ρυθμούμενα, instead of ἀπὸ τῶν ἀκουστῶν ἐπὶ τὰ αὐτῷ θεωρούμενα. For thus an ear would be attributed to the mind, as the eye is to it, in the verse of Epicharmus—Νοῦς ὅρη καὶ νοῦς ἀκούει· τὰλλα κωφὰ καὶ τυφλά—while in ρυθμούμενα there would be an allusion to the well-regulated harmony of the spheres.

¹ I have translated, as if the Greek were ὥσ' , not ὡς—

² Here again the balance of the sentences requires the mention of hearing as well as seeing. Hence, as Plato has λογισμοῦ-μετρίχουσα καὶ ἀρμονίας, one would prefer here, ἰδεῖν καὶ ἀκούειν μόνοις τῷ τῆς ψυχῆς λογισμῷ καὶ ἀρμονίᾳ.

³ On the difference between ἔναρ and ἔπαρ see Blomf. on Prom. 495.

⁴ I have translated, as if εἶναι had dropt out after φῆσιν—

Since then the Dialectic art ¹ is the most powerful of the subjects of learning,¹ inasmuch as it is conversant about things divine, and stable, on this account it is ranked ² above the other subjects of learning,² and is, as it were, the coping-stone and guard.

[c.] Respecting the Primary Matter.

After this let us speak consecutively about Principles and Theological Contemplations, commencing from on high from the primaries, and descending from them, and looking into the creation of the world, and ending with the creation and nature of man.

And let us speak first of Matter.

This then he calls a mould, that receives ³ every impression, and a nurse, and a mother, and a space, and a thing subjective and tangible, (and) without sensation, and to be apprehended by spurious reasoning; and that it possesses a peculiarity of such a kind, that it receives all creations, and has the reputation of a nurse by nourishing ⁴ them, and admits all forms, being itself without Figure, and Quality, and Species, but moulded into such, and fashioned, as if it were a mould, and put into a form by them, possessing no peculiar figure or quality. For there would not be any thing properly prepared for various configurations and forms, unless it were itself without Quality, and not partaking of these species, which it must receive. For ⁵ we see that those, who prepare sweet-smelling ointments from oil, make use of the most sweet-scented; ⁶ and those, who are desirous of fabricating figures from wax or clay, smooth down those substances, and render

² Ficinus has "mathematicis universalis," as if his MS. read τῶν μαθηματικῶν—τῶν ὅλων instead of τῶν μαθημάτων—τῶν λοιπῶν. Stanley, "it is put before all Mathematics, as a wall and fortification of the rest."

³ I have, with Ficinus, omitted καὶ before πανόχρηστος—

⁴ In lieu of τρέφειν I have been led to τρέφουσιν, from "fovere" in Ficinus, followed by Stanley.

⁵ I have adopted γὰρ for ὅτι, answering to "enim" in Ficinus.

them shapeless in order that they may receive (new shapes).¹ It is fitting then for Matter which receives every thing, if it is about to receive forms universally, to be subject to the possessing not one of their natures, but to be without Quality, and without form for the purpose of receiving forms; and being such, it would be neither a body nor without a body, but a body in posse,² as we understand of copper, that it is a statue in posse,³ because, after having received the form, it will become a statue.

[9.] Respecting Ideas and the Efficient Cause.

While matter retains the character of a Principle, (Plato) admits still other principles likewise, both the pattern-like, that is, relating to Ideas, and that of god, the father and the cause of all things. Now Idea is, as regards god, a mental operation by him; as regards us, the first thing perceptible by mind; as regards Matter, a standard; but as regards the world, perceptible by a sense, a pattern; but as considered⁴ with reference to itself, an existence. For universally all that is generated according to a design ought to be generated for something. For⁵ if any thing be produced from any thing, as my own resemblance is from myself, there must be a pattern previously laid down; ⁶and whether the pattern be within or without, each of the artificers, having the pattern in himself, on every side and in every manner, invests its form with Matter.⁶

Now persons define Idea as the eternal pattern of things existing according to Nature. For it does not please the majority of Platonists (to admit) that there are Ideas of works of art, such as of a shield, or lyre; nor yet of things, that are contrary to Nature, such as of fever, and cholera; nor of what exists according to a part,⁷ as of Socrates and Plato; nor of

¹ I have translated, as if the Greek were ὡς νέα διχῆται σχήματα, ἀσχημάτιστα παρίχοντα, not ὡς ἰνδιχῆται, ἀσχημάτιστα παρίχοντα: which I cannot understand; nor could, I think, Ficinus, whose version is, "donec figuræ pristinae deleantur."

^{2, 3} So I have translated δυνάμει, as being more intelligible than "potential," the word adopted by Stanley. See p. 263, n. ⁴

⁵ Ficinus omits ἰσχυρομένην, probably as being superfluous.

⁶ I have adopted γὰρ found in ed. pr.

⁷ Ficinus has, more briefly, "Et, si exemplar haud omnino sit ab agente seorsum, ut quisque artifex in se ipso artificiorum exempla concipiens—horum deinde formas in materiam explicat."

⁸ Ficinus renders κατὰ μέρος by "particularium—" things of no value, such as of filth and rotten thatch; nor of that, which exists with reference to something, as of a greater and superior; for Ideas are the notions of god eternal and perfect in themselves.

Now that there are Ideas, ¹in this way too they exhort (us).¹ For whether the deity be mind or something mental, it has thoughts, and these too both eternal and not to be turned aside. And if this be so, there are Ideas. For if Matter is on its own account without (a standard of) measure,² it must meet with a standard from something else, that is superior and without matter; hence ³if the antecedent (is true), so is the consequent;³ and if this be so, Ideas are certain (standards of) measures without Matter. Moreover, if the world is not such, as it is, from chance, not only has it been produced out of something, but by something; and not only so, but for something likewise. Now what could that, for which it has been produced, have been else than Idea? so that thus there would have been Ideas. Moreover, if mind differs from true⁴ opinion, what is perceived by mind differs also from what is held as an opinion; and if this be so, ⁵[things perceived by the mind are different from those held as opinions; so that]⁵ there will have been the primaries perceived by mind, and the primaries perceived by a sense; and if this be so, there are Ideas. Now mind does differ from a true opinion; so that there will have been Ideas.

[10.] How it is meet to delineate the deity, and respecting his mental operation.

We must now render an account, next in order, of the third principle, which Plato considers to be almost impossible to be told. We may however be led to it after this manner. If things are perceptible by mind, and these too not perceptible by a sense, nor with a participation in the things perceptible

¹ Ficinus renders παραινέουσιν by "probat—" Perhaps the author wrote πέποινα ρίθυνα, "make it passible," as we should say.

² Such, I presume, is the meaning of ἀμετρος.

³ See p. 254, n. ².

⁴ The chain of reasoning evidently requires the omission of ἀληθεύς, both here and shortly afterwards, where it is omitted by Ficinus. Perhaps the author wrote in both places ἀσταθεύς, "unsteady," for such is the character of opinion.

⁵ The words between the numerals, with the exception of ὅτι, are evidently an interpretation of εἰς— by a sense, but belonging to some primaries perceptible by mind, there are simple primaries perceptible by mind, as there are primaries likewise perceptible by a sense. ¹If then the antecedent (is true), so is the consequent.¹ Now men—as being infected² with the suffering from sensation, so that, when they determine to think upon something perceptible by mind, they keep in their fancy that, which is perceptible by a sense, so as to think at the same time of magnitude, and form, and colour—do frequently think not clearly upon things perceptible by mind; whereas the gods, being freed from things perceptible by a sense, (do think) clearly and without a mixture (of fancies).³ Now since Mind is superior to the living principle,⁴ and as the Mind, which is, according to its working,⁵ thinking upon all things simultaneously and for ever, is superior to a mind in posse;⁶ and as ⁷the cause of that is better than this,⁷ ⁸and what exists is still above these,⁸ this would be the primary god, as being the cause⁹ of perpetually operating for the mind of the whole heaven.⁹ Now he is operating, although unmoved himself, for that (mind), ¹⁰as the sun does for vision, when it looks for him,¹⁰ and as that, ¹¹which has the faculty of desire, excites desire,¹¹ itself being

³ I have added “of fancies,” for the sake of perspicuity.

⁴ Such is frequently the meaning of ψυχή, not “soul.”

⁵ Ficinus renders κατ’ ἐνέργειαν by “actu—”

⁶ See at p. 261, n. ².

⁷—⁷ In τούτου καλλίων ὁ αἰτίος τούτου there is an ambiguity arising from the repetition of τούτου. To avoid it, Stanley follows the version of Ficinus, “intellectus ille hoc denique pulchrius, quod ejus est causa—”

⁸—⁸ Here too is another ambiguity, proceeding from the union of ἀντίρω and ὑφίστηκεν. Ficinus has “quodque omnibus superextat—” as if his MS. read καὶ ὑπὲρ ἀντίρω πάντων ὑφίστηκεν— without ἐν—

⁹—⁹ Such is the literal version of the Greek. Ficinus has “isque causa est ut mundi mens semper agat—” as if he had found in his MS. αἰτίος ἀπάρχων τοῦ αἰὲ ἐνεργεῖν τὸν νοῦν— without τοῦ σύμπαντος οὐρανοῦ.

¹⁰—¹⁰ I cannot understand ὅταν αὐτῷ προσβλέπῃ, nor could, I think, Ficinus, who has omitted those words in his version, “haud secus quam in oculum subjectum sol agit.” Stanley, “as the sun upon the eye, when it turneth towards him.”

¹¹—¹¹ Ficinus has “quod appetitur, immobile ipsum, appetentem agi- unmoved. At least in this way will this Mind likewise excite the mind of the whole heaven. Now, since the primary Mind is the most beautiful, there must needs be the most beautiful thing placed under it. But nothing is more beautiful than itself. It would therefore be thinking for ever upon itself and its own cogitations; and this its mental energy is Idea. Moreover the primary god is eternal, ineffable, perfect in itself, ¹that is, not wanting in any thing, ²ever-perfect, that is, for ever perfect, all-perfect, that is, perfect in every way, ³a divinity, holiness, truth, symmetry, good. ⁴And I say not this, as if giving a definition, but ⁵as of one had in mind according to all. ⁶He is a good, ⁷because, being the cause of all good, ⁸he bestows kindness on all things according to his power; ⁹and a beautiful thing, ¹⁰because he is (so) by himself more than that by nature and symmetrical; ¹¹and truth, because he is the beginning of all truth, as the Sun is of all light; and he is the father, by being the cause of all things, and by putting into order the heavenly mind, and the soul of the world, with reference to himself and his own cogitations. For according to his own will he has filled all things with himself, after ta—" where "appetentem" is probably a press error for "appetitum," answering to τὴν ὁρεῖν.

¹ As one can hardly believe that the author himself explained αὐτο-τελής by τούτοις ἀπροσδεής, it is probable that those two words, or at any rate one, τούτοις, is an interpolation, as shown by its omission in Ficinus.

² The Greek is αὐτελής, τούτοις δὲ τέλειος, παντελής, τούτοις πάντῃ τέλειος. But the version of Ficinus more correctly "semperque et undique absolute perfectus." For he, doubtless, found in his MS. αὐτελής καὶ πάντῃ τέλειος.

³ We must read either τὸ ἀγαθόν, or, what would be preferable, ἀγαθότης, "goodness."

⁴ Such is the literal and unintelligible version of ὥς κατὰ πάντα ἐνὸς νοουμένων. Ficinus has "ut unum potius cuncta contemplet."

⁵ Here ἀγαθόν is to be referred to ἀγαθότης, as καλὸν in the next clause is to συμμετρία.

having raised up the soul of the world and turned it to himself, being the cause of that¹ mind, which, being put into order by the father, puts into order the whole of nature in this world. He is moreover ineffable, and to be comprehended by mind alone, as has been stated; since he is neither genus nor species,² nor difference;³ nor has there happened to him any thing either evil—for it is not lawful to state this; or good—for he would be such³ according to the participation of something, especially goodness; nor difference—for this (cannot be)⁴ according to the notion of him; nor being with equality—for he has not been made a quality, nor perfected by quality; nor without quality⁵—for he has not been deprived of any quality, coming upon him; nor a part of any thing; nor as a whole, possessing any parts;⁶ nor so as to be any thing the same⁶ or different—for nothing has happened to him, according to which he is able to be separated from the rest of things; nor does he move, nor is he moved.

Now (the) first notion of him will be that, which is according to the abstraction from (all)⁷ these things; as we have had a notion of a point⁸ according to an abstraction⁹ from what is perceptible by a sense,⁹ by thinking upon a superficies, then a line, and lastly a point.¹⁰ The second notion will be that, which is according to analogy somehow in this way. For the

² The introduction of this clause seems out of place here: for the same point is touched upon just afterwards. One would have expected rather reasons to be given why god is neither genus nor species.

³ Ficinus has "talis—" He therefore found in his MS. τοιούτος in lieu of οὗτος—

⁵ Ficinus has "informis," through mistaking the meaning of ἄκρου.

⁷ Ficinus has "horum omnium—" as if his MS. read τούτων πάντων— what I have adopted.

⁸ Ficinus translates, here and in ¹⁰, σημεῖον by "punctum," which is in good Greek σημεῖον.

⁹ The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus.

¹ analogy which the sun has to the seeing faculty and to things seen, without being himself vision, but enabling it to see and them to be seen, this analogy¹ has the primary mind to the thinking faculty, and to the things thought of. For not being what the thinking faculty is, it enables it to think, and for things perceptible by mind² to be thought of, by throwing around them the light of truth. But the third notion would be something of this kind. A person, after contemplating the beauty in bodies, will then proceed to the beauty of the soul; and afterwards to that, which is in pursuits and laws; and then to the wide sea³ of the beautiful; after which he will think of the good itself, and the lovely, and desirable, ⁴as it were a light that has appeared, and is shining out upon the thus ascending soul.⁴ ⁵In this way he thinks too upon god, on account of his excellence in a state of honour,⁵ and that he is without parts, through there being nothing prior to him; for a part, and that, from which ⁶(any thing is composed),⁶ is prior to that, of which it is a part; for the plane is prior to the bulk in a body, and the line is prior to a plane. By not having parts then he would be unmoved, as regards space and change. For if he were changed, it would be either by himself or by another. Now if it were by another, that other would be more powerful than he; but if by himself, he would be changed either for the worse or the better. Now both of these (suppositions) are absurd. From all which it appears that he⁷ is without body; which may be shown from these

² I have translated, as if the Greek were δι, not γὰρ—

³ Here, as in p. 250, n. ¹, Ficinus substitutes “fontem” for “mare,” the proper version of πλάγος.

⁴—⁴ Such is the literal version of the Greek. Ficinus has “velut splendorem in animam, quæ illuc evolavit, subito refulgentem—” whose MS., if faithfully represented, must have offered a remarkable variation.

⁵—⁵ Here too the version of Ficinus differs not a little, “Hujusmodi vero lumen deum ipsum esse ob excellentiam recognoscit; eumque in primis sine magnitudine quantitatis agnoscit—” where the last clause is required to fill up the chain of reasoning. Not less at variance with the Greek is the version of Stanley, “By this he comprehendeth god himself through reason of that excellence, which consisteth in adoration of him.”

⁶—⁶ The Supplement between the numerals has been adopted from “aliquid constituitur—” in Ficinus.

⁷ I have translated, as if the Greek were αὐτός, not αὐτό— proofs likewise. For if god were body, he would be Material and with a Form, through every body being a dual substance, composed of Matter and of Form united to it; which are assimilated to Ideas and partake of them in some kind of manner hard to be explained. Now it is absurd for god to be composed of Matter and Form. For he will not be simple, nor capable of being a beginning; so that the deity would be a thing without body; and from another point,¹ if he is body, he would be Material, and would be either fire or water, or earth or air, or something (produced) from them. Now each of these at least is not capable of being a beginning; and he would be really² produced posterior to Matter, if he were Material; which suppositions being absurd, we must understand him to be without body. For if he were body, he would be³ destroyed, and produced, and changed.³ But each of these events is absurd in his case.

[11.] That Qualities are incorporeal.

Qualities moreover can be shown in this manner to be incorporeal. Every body is in a subjective state. But a Quality is not in a subjective state, but accidental. Body is therefore not a Quality. Every Quality is in a subjective state; but no body is in a subjective state. Quality therefore is not body. Further, one quality is the opposite to another quality. But one body is not so to another body; and body differs, as far as it is body, in nothing from body; but it does differ in Quality, ⁴and not, by Zeus, in bodies.⁴ Qualities are therefore not bodies. And it is most reasonable, that, as Matter is devoid of Quality, so Quality should be devoid of Matter; and if Quality be immaterial, Quality will be incorporeal. ⁵For if Qualities were bodies,⁵ two and three bodies would be in the same place—a thing the most absurd. But if Qualities are incorporeal, that which fabricates them (would be)⁶ incor-

¹ The Greek is at present αὐτόθεν, which is unintelligible. I have translated, as if it were originally ἀλλοθεν—Ficinus has "præterea—"

² Such is the meaning of ἄλλως here; unless we read αὐτῆς—τῆς ἑλῆς—similar to "materia ipsa—" in Ficinus.

³ The natural order of events would be rather—"produced, and changed, and destroyed."

⁴ The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus.

⁵ I have translated, as if the Greek were, not εἰ γε μὴν—but εἰ γὰρ ἦν—where γὰρ ἦν is due to "enimvero si—sunt—" in Ficinus.

⁶ I have translated, as if ἂν εἴη had dropt out after ἀσώματον—Compare ἀσώματος ἂν εἴη just before.

poreal. Now there can be no other things that fabricate but incorporeals. For bodies are subject to suffering and to flowing, and to being not always in the same state and similar, and not permanent ¹and firmly fixed;¹ and even in cases, where they seem to be active in something, they are found to be previously passive in much. As then there is something clearly passive, so there must be something truly active. Now we should not find any thing else to be this, but what is incorporeal.

The discourse then respecting the Principles of things would be of some such kind as this, when called Theological. Let us then proceed next in order to what is called Physical, beginning from some point here.

[12.] On the Causes of the World, and further on its Generation, Elements, and Arrangement.

²Since of the things, which are perceptible by a sense according to nature and individually,² there must be some patterns defined, (namely) Ideas, from which Sciences and Definitions are produced—for ³besides all men a certain man is thought of, and besides all horses a certain horse³—and generally, besides living beings a living being not generated and indestructible, in the same manner as from one seal there are many impressions, and of one man ten thousand likenesses upon ten thousand, the Idea (itself)⁴ being originally⁵ the cause of each being such as it is itself—it is a thing of necessity that the World should have been fabricated by the deity, as the most beautiful composition, while he was looking to some Idea of a World, as being the pattern of this World, made, as it were, after the resemblance of that Idea, according to which it was, after being assimilated, worked out; while the deity came by a most wonderful forethought and mode of life⁶ to fabricate the World, because he was good. He fabricated it therefore

³—³ Ficinus has, more intelligibly, "præter singulos homines, hominem ipsum intelligere decet; et præter equos singulos, ipsum equum—"

⁴ I have introduced "itself" from "ipse" in Ficinus, adopted by Stanley.

⁵ Ficinus omits ἀρχή—

⁶ I cannot understand διαίτασιν here, nor could, I think, Ficinus, whose version is "optima norma—" from the whole of matter ; which moved about in no order and superfluously, previous to the generation of heaven ; and taking it away from its disordered state he led it to the best¹ order, and he adorned its parts with becoming numbers and forms,² so as to discriminate³ how fire and earth exist at present with reference to air and water—things that exhibited previously merely³ foot-marks,⁴ and (were) the receptacle of the powers of the Elements, and were without reason and without measure shaking Matter and were shaken by it. ⁵ For from each of the four elements, as a whole, he generated the World ;⁵ and from all fire and earth and water and air leaving out neither any part or power, through having reflected,⁶ in the first place, that it was requisite to be a body and a production, and altogether tangible and visible ; since without fire and without earth it was not possible for any thing to be either visible or tangible. According then to a fair reason he formed it of earth and fire. But since it was requisite for some chain to be in the midst of both of these ; and since the divine chain is that of proportion, which has by nature the power to make itself and what are united with it one ; and since the World was not a plane—for one middle power would have been sufficient—but spherical—and required two middle powers for the fitting together—on this account, in the midst of fire and of earth, both air and water were arranged according to the manner of a proportion ; ⁷ so that, as fire is to air, so air should be to water, and this last to earth, and conversely ;⁷ and ⁸ by nothing being left from without, he

¹ Since Ficinus has “pulchrum ordinem—” perhaps his MS. read καλὴν—which would lead to ἀρίστην καὶ καλλίστην—“the best and most beautiful—”

² Ficinus has “ut ea mundus sit proportione contextus.”

³ I have supplied “merely” from “solum” in Ficinus.

⁴ On ἵχνη see at § 13, p. 271.

⁵ Ficinus has “ex integris enim quatuor elementis, eum compexit.”

⁶ Ficinus has “præcidebat,” by a press error for “prævidebat—”

⁷ Ficinus has, more fully, “ut quemadmodum se habet ignis ad aerem, sic aer ad aquam ; utque aer ad aquam, sic et aqua ad terram ; ac rursus, ut terra ad aquam, sic aqua ad aerem ; utque aqua ad aerem, sic aer ad ignem.” For he probably did not follow so much the MS. before him, as the passage in the Timæus, p. 32, A., to which there is an allusion. See too Tim. Loc. iii. § 6.

⁸ Ficinus has “ex eo insuper, quod nihil extra mundum reliquit, unicum illum fecit.”

made the World his only begotten,⁵ and assimilated it, according to number, to the Idea, that was one O.¹ He made it, moreover, without disease and without old age—inasmuch as nothing could come to it, naturally able to corrupt it—and self-sufficient, and in need of nothing from without; and he put round it a spherical form, the most regular kind of figure, and the most capacious, and the most easy to be moved. But, since it requires neither vision nor hearing, nor any thing else of that kind, he did not attach to it organs of such a kind for ministering (to the senses);² and after taking away the other kinds of motion, he gave it only the circularly-progressive, which has an affinity with that of Mind and Thought.

[13.] Respecting the Configuration of the World; and that each of its forms is analogous to the World and its Elements.

As the things, of which the World consists, are two, (namely,) body and soul, of which the former is visible and tangible,³ but the latter invisible and intangible, the power and constitution of each happens to be different. For its body⁴ is generated from fire and earth and water and air. These four substances did the fabricator of the World take together, while they were not, by Zeus,⁵ preserving the order of the elements; and he gave to them the form of a Pyramid, and a Cube, and an Octohedron, and Eikosihedron, but, above all, a Dodecahedron. And as far as Matter assumed the form of a Pyramid, it became Fire, ⁶that form being the most piercing,⁸ and made up of the fewest triangles, and in this manner the most attenuated; but as far as (it assumed the form) of an Octohedron, it took the quality of air; and as far as that of an Eikosihedron, it had the quality of water; and the form of a Cube he assigned to earth, as being the most solid ² I have supplied "to the senses" from "obsequium sentiendi" in Ficinus.

³ In lieu of δαρὸν, Ficinus found probably θαλαρὸν, answering to his "corruptioni obnoxium—" adopted by Stanley.

⁴ I have adopted, from ed. pr., σῶμα αὐτοῦ in lieu of αὐτοῦ simply. Ficinus too, "corpus—mundi."

⁵ Ficinus omits μὲν Δία here, as he frequently does in his version of Plato, through his dislike of the oath.

⁶ Ficinus has "ea quippe figura tenuis—" But there is nothing in the Greek answering to "tenuis."

and stable; but he made use of the form of the Dodecahedron for the Universe. But more than all these was the Plane of the nature of a Principle. For Planes are prior to Solids. And of the nature of a Plane there are, as it were, some two progenitors, ¹the most beautiful,¹ in the form of right-angled triangles; one, the Skalene; the other, the Isoskeles; the Skalene having one angle a right angle, and another two-thirds (of a right angle), and the remainder the third (of a right angle). Now the former,² [I mean the Skalene triangle,]² is the element of the Pyramid, and Octohedron, and Eikosi-hedron; the Pyramid consisting of four equilateral triangles, each of which is divided into six Skalene triangles, as described already; but the Octohedron in like manner of eight, each of which is divided into six Skalene; and the Eikosi-hedron (in like manner)³ of twenty. But the other,⁴ [I mean the Isoskeles,]⁴ becomes the constituent form of the Cube; for when four Isoskeles triangles come together, they make a Square; from six squares of which kind is formed a Cube. But for the Universe the deity made use of the Dodecahedron. Wherefore there are seen ⁵[in heaven]⁵ the forms of twelve animals in the circle of the Zodiac, and each of them is divided into thirty parts. And nearly so in the case of the Dodecahedron; which consists of twelve pentagons, (each)⁶ divided into five triangles, so that, as each consists of six triangles, there are found in the whole Dodecahedron three hundred and sixty triangles, being as many as there are parts in the Zodiac. Matter then, being fashioned into these forms by the deity, was moved at first with (indistinct)⁷ footsteps, and without order, but was subsequently reduced into order by the deity, while all things were fitted together according to a pro-

³ I have adopted the Supplement in Ficinus, "similiter," to which there is nothing answering in the Greek.

⁴—⁴ The words ἐν οὐρανῷ are omitted by Ficinus.

⁶ I have introduced, what Ficinus has supplied, "unusquisque," wanting in the Greek, where ἐκάστων might easily have dropt out before ὥστε ἑκάστων—portion with each other. These things, however, when separated, do not remain at rest, but have a ceaseless shaking and communicate it to Matter. Wherefore being bound to the circumference of the World, they are driven on with it; and, while so driven on, they are carried against each other, the thinner particles into the places of the grosser; and by this means there is left no vacuum, destitute of some body; and as this inequality continues, it gives rise to a shaking; for by these particles Matter is shaken and they by it.

⁷ This word seems absolutely requisite for the sense; although ἵχνη is found by itself in § 12, p. 268.

[14.] Respecting the Soul of the World, and the Spheres, and the Stars.

¹Bodies then has (Plato) introduced for the instruction of the Soul, touching the powers that are exhibited in it.¹ For since we judge of each of things existing by the Soul, he has fairly placed in it the Principles of all existing things, in order that, while contemplating each of the things that fall under it, according to their affinity and proximity, we should represent to ourselves its being in harmony with its acts. By saying then that there is a certain existence perceptible by the mind, which is indivisible, he has represented to himself another existence likewise, relating to bodies, which is divisible, by showing that he is able to lay hold by intellect of each of these existences; and by seeing that, as regards things perceptible by mind, there is an identity and a difference, and (so too) as regards things perceptible by a sense, from all these he has made the Soul a contribution.² For either the like is known by the like, which is the favourite doctrine of the Pythagorean, or the unlike by the unlike, which is that of Heracleitus, the Physical philosopher. But when (Plato) says that the World has been generated, we must not understand him, as if there were once a time, when the World was not; but because³ it is ever in generation,³ and shows forth something as a cause more ancient than its own constitution. And even the deity does not make the Soul ever existing of the World, but puts it in order. And

² On the word ἵστανος, taken in its natural or metaphorical sense, see Casaubon on Theophrasti Character., p. 281.

³ Instead of ἵστανος, Ficinus seems to have found in his MS. ἵστανος: for his version is "perdurat—" in this way he might be said to make it, by arousing up, as if from a drowsiness ¹ or heavy sleep,¹ and ² turning to himself both its mind and itself,² so that, by looking to what is perceptible by his mind, it may, while eagerly seeking his notions, assume species and forms. It is plain then that the World is a thing of life and intellectual. For the deity being desirous of making it the best (work),³ made it consequently both with life and intellect. For that, which is with life, is, ⁴ taken as a whole, a completed work superior to that, which, taken as a whole,⁴ is without life; and the intellectual than the non-intellectual; although perhaps by the mind not being able to subsist without a thing of life, but by the life being extended from the centre to the extremities, ⁵ it has happened, that it surrounds the body of the World in a circle and entirely conceals it, so that it stretches along the whole of the World, and in this manner binds and keeps it together;⁵ ⁶ and that the particles without have a power over those within.⁶ For that, which is without, remains uncut; but that, which is within, is cut into seven circles, divided from the commencement into double and triple intervals. Now that, which is comprehended by the (portion) of the sphere remaining uncut, is very like to the same; but the cut (like to) the different. For the movement of the heaven, which embraces all things, ⁷ is

¹— The words between the numerals are, perhaps, an interpolation. At least Ficinus has "ex profundo quodam somno," as if he did not find καρπον in his MS., or did not understand the word, explained by Suidas, "the aberration of mind arising from drinking wine."

²— Ficinus, more briefly, "ad se ipsum ejus mentem—convertit—"

³ Ficinus supplies, what is requisite for the sense, although wanting in the Greek, "opus—" as if ἔργον was found in his MS. between γὰρ and αὐτόν—

⁴— I have translated ὅλον ὅλον, "taken as a whole," words not found in the MS. of Ficinus, or omitted by him, as being obscure.

⁵— Ficinus more briefly, and with a change in the position of the words and sentences, "mundi corpus totum circulo complexa est, universum quippe circumtegens, singulis ejus communicata particulis eoque pacto insolubili connectit vinculo, incolumenque conservat." I have, however, been content to change διὰ παντός περιέχειν καὶ διὰ παντός into περιέχειν

⁶— Ficinus has "atque ea vis animæ, quæ extra restitit, partes ejus intimas antecedit."

⁷— Such is the literal version of the Greek. Stanley's is, "being not uncertain, is one and ordinate—" that of Ficinus, "cum minime pervagetur, unus est, ordinemque præcipuum servat." not-wandering,⁷ as being one and in order; but that, ¹which is within, is various, and changed by risings and settings; and hence it is called wandering.¹ But that, which is without, is carried along to the right, by being moved from east to west; but that, which is within, conversely to the left, from west to east, ²meeting the world.² The deity made, moreover, the constellations and stars; and of these some not wandering, the ornament of heaven and of night, being very many in number; and ³(the planets), being seven,³ for the generation of number and time, and the exhibition of things existing. For an interval in the movement of the World has produced Time, ⁴the image, as it were, of eternity,⁴ which is a measure of the staying⁵ of the eternal World. But the non-wandering stars are not similar in power. The Sun is the leader of all, showing and illuminating all things. But the Moon is seen in the second rank, on account of her power; and the other planets proportionally, each according to its own share. Now the Moon makes the measure of a month,⁶ after it has completely gone through its own revolution, and overtaken the Sun in such (a time);⁷ but the Sun in that of a year. For

³—³ Ficinus, followed by Stanley, has "Quæ vero vagantur numero septem," as if his MS. read ἐπὶ πλανῆται ὄντα, not ἐπὶ πλανῆται—

⁴—⁴ Compare Tim. p. 37, D. § 14.

⁵ In lieu of μονῆς, Ficinus perhaps found something else in his MS., for his version is "status mensura," adopted by Stanley in his "the measure of the state—"

⁶ So Horne Tooke said that "month" comes from "it mooneth."

⁷ Ficinus, unable to understand ἐν τοσούτῳ, has omitted those words.

after it has gone round the circle of the Zodiac, it completes the seasons of the year; while the rest make use singly of their own periodical revolutions, which are beheld, not by ordinary persons, but by the properly instructed. Now from all these revolutions the perfect number and time is completed,¹ when all the planets, after arriving at the same point,² obtain such an arrangement, that a straight line being conceived to be let fall³ from the non-wandering sphere³ to the earth in the manner of a perpendicular, the centres of all⁴ are seen upon that line. There being then seven spheres⁵ in the wandering sphere,⁵ the deity made seven visible bodies out of a substance, for the most part fire-like, and fitted them to the spheres, formed out of the circle of the different and the wandering. And he placed the Moon in the first circle⁶ after the Earth;⁶ and the Sun he arranged for the second circle, and Lucifer and the so-called sacred⁷ star of Hermes into the circle, which moves with a velocity equal to the Sun, but at a distance from it; and above the rest,⁸ (each) in its own sphere,⁹ ¹⁰the slowest of them lying under the sphere of the non-wandering, which some call by the name of the star of Saturn;¹⁰ and that, which is the next after it in slowness, by the name of Jupiter, under which is that of Mars. But in the eighth the power, which is above, is thrown around them and so too has Stanley; for they are wanting in Tim. p. 39, C. I have retained them, conceiving that χρόνῳ had dropt out, written $\chi\rho\acute{o}\nu\psi$ in MSS.

² So Ficinus renders σημεῖον. See at § 10, p. 265, n. ³.

³—Ficinus has "a supremo circulo—"

⁴ In lieu of αὐτῶν Ficinus found in his MS. πάντων, as shown by his version—"omnium," adopted by Stanley.

⁵—Ficinus has "in orbe circumvago—"

⁶—I cannot understand μετ' αὐτήν, nor could, I think, Ficinus; whose version is, "circulo supra terram—" or else his MS. read ὑπὲρ τὴν γῆν— Stanley has, "in that circle, which is next the Earth—"

⁷ I do not remember to have read elsewhere of the star of Mercury being called "sacred."

⁸ I have, with Stanley, introduced "each," requisite for the sense.

⁹ Ficinus has "gradatim disposita," as if his MS. read something answering to "gradatim—"

¹⁰—¹⁰ Ficinus, more briefly, "tardiorē sane omnibus Saturni stellam in proxima sub non errante circulo sede locavit," as if he found in his MS. πάντων, adopted by Stanley, in lieu of αὐτῶν— See above, n. ⁴.

all. And all these are living intellectual beings, and gods, and of a spherical form.

[15.] On Dæmons and the Elements, 'with which they are combined.'

There are other Dæmons likewise, which a person might call created gods, according to each of the Elements. Some are visible, others invisible, in Æther (hot air)² and Fire, and in Air (cold air)³ and Water; so that no part of the World is without a share of life, nor of a living being superior to the nature of man. To these are committed all under the Moon, and upon the Earth. For the deity is himself the maker of the Universe, and of the gods and dæmons. Now³ the Universe will not have,³ according to his will, a dissolution; but the rest his children lead according to his command, and 'doing what they do'⁴ in imitation of him; and from whom are rumours, and⁵ voices (from heaven),⁵ and dreams, and oracles, and whatever is made an art of by mortals in the way of prophecy. 'Now the Earth lies in the midst of the whole (circles),'⁷ and is twisted round the pole, which is stretched through all,⁸ the guardian of day and night, and⁹ is the oldest of the gods

¹ Ficinus omits συννόμων, probably as being scarcely intelligible.

² On the difference between αἰθήρ and ἀήρ, see my note on Prometh. 88.

⁴ Ficinus has merely "singula transigentes," not understanding perhaps the formula, πράττοντες, ὅσα πράττουσι, of which many examples are given by Abresch and Blomfield on Agam. 67. I have translated, as if κατὰ had dropt out between καὶ and μύμνησιν—

⁵ On ἐλπίδες and ὄρεται see Wytttenbach in Julian Orat. i. p. 62.

⁶ All between the numerals would more correctly close the preceding section.

⁷ The sense requires "circles," in Greek κύκλων, which might have dropt out easily after δλων—

⁸ Ficinus has "circa discordiam agitationemve, quæ per totum porrigitur coarctata," supplying the words "circa (where however there is a press-error, probably for 'extra') discordiam agitationemve," as if his MS. read ἀστασίαστος οὐσα, or something similar: and while from "porrigitur" it is evident that, in lieu of τραγμῖνον, it read τραμῖνον, what I have adopted, it is no less evident that his MS. omitted πόλον. At all events τραμῖνον is confirmed by Tim. p. 40, C., where three MSS. read τραγμῖνον—

in heaven,³ and, after the soul of the World, furnishing us abundant food; about whom the World revolves, she being herself a star, but who, through her being a thing equally balanced, remains lying in the middle, and similar to those surrounding her. But the Æther is separated towards the most outward parts, and to the sphere of the non-wandering, and to that of the wandering; and after those spheres is that of the Air; and in the middle is the Earth with its own moisture.⁶

[16.] About the gods, who are offsprings; and that the deity enjoined upon them the making of man.

When all had been put into order by him, he left three remaining kinds of living beings, the winged, the aquatic, and the foot-walking. These the deity enjoined upon his offsprings to make, in order that the things moulded by him might not be immortal.¹ They then, after they had borrowed from the primary matter certain portions for definite periods, as if they were to be paid back again, fabricated mortal things of life. But when there was respecting the race of Man, as being the nearest related to gods, again a care both to the father of all, and to the gods, his offspring, the artificer of the Universe sent down upon earth the souls of this race, equal in number to the stars; and after he had placed² each soul in a star, as in a vehicle connected with it,² he did, in order that he might be without blame, lay down laws, fixed by Fate, after the manner of a Law-giver; that from the body should arise mortal affections, first, sensations, then pleasure and pain, and fear and anger, and that the souls, which obtained a mastery over these (feelings), and were not controlled by them, should live justly, and arrive at the star, connected with them; while they, who were overcome by (their own) injustice, should come in their second birth to the life of a woman; and, if they did not cease then, at last to the nature of wild beasts; and that the end of their labour should be to overcome what had grown upon them, and to return to¹ their proper state.

¹ The sense evidently requires "mortal," or else we must read ὅπως μόνα τὰ ἐπ' αὐτοῦ πλασθῆναι, "in order that only the things moulded by him might be immortal." To avoid therefore the difficulty, Ficinus has altered the literal meaning of the words by translating "Nam si ipse hæc etiam genuisset, immortalia nata fuissent—" what Stanley has adopted.

² The Greek is ὡς εἰς ὄχημα ἄστρον τὸ σύννομον ἀπάσας: but the Latin of Ficinus, adopted by Stanley, "quamlibet antea cognato astro, tamquam vehiculo—" From both united it is easy to elicit εἰς ἄστρον, ὡς ὄχημα, τὸ σύννομον, ἐκάστας—

[17.] Respecting the body and the members of man, and the powers of his soul.

The gods then, in a leading manner,² moulded man from Earth and Fire and Air and Water, after borrowing certain portions with the view of repaying them. And, after putting them together with invisible bolts, they worked out some one body, and bound the master portion of the soul, sent down to the head, after placing as a substratum the brain in the manner of a ploughed field; and they put around the face the organs of the senses, to fulfil their fitting office. And they formed the marrow³ out of the smooth and straight triangles,⁴ of which the elements were composed, for it to be the generation of semen; but the bone from earth and marrow wetted,⁵ and frequently dipped in water and fire, and the nerves from bone and flesh; but the flesh itself was created out of a saline and acrid substance, like something fermented. And they placed around the marrow, bone; and around the bones, nerves; and through the means of the nerves were produced the bendings and bindings of the joints; and coverings for them by means of the flesh applied over them, here white, and there tawny,⁶ for the great utility itself of the body.⁶ From these were the internal viscera likewise put into folds, both the belly and the entrails rolled around⁷ it, and higher up from the mouth (came)⁸ the arteries and the opening of the larynx,⁸ ¹ In lieu of ἔξω λαθεῖν, I have translated, as if the Greek were ἔξω ἀναλαθεῖν—similar to "habitum jam redierint" in Ficinus.

² I scarcely understand προηγούμενος, nor could, I think, Ficinus; whose version is "in primis—" from whence came Stanley's "first—"

³ Compare Tim. p. 73, B. § 49.

⁴ Ficinus has "co-coegerunt," as if his MS. read συναχθῆναι in lieu of δευθῆναι.

⁵ Ficinus, "alba tum plurima," as if his MS. read πᾶσι in lieu of πᾶσι.

⁶ Ficinus, "ad decorem et usum viventis—" the original of "for beauty and use" in Stanley. He found, therefore, in his MS., something different from πρὸς αὐτὸ τὸ εὐχρηστον τὸ σῶμα.

⁷ One would have expected rather παρὰ ταύτην, "along it," in allusion to the folds of the colon.

⁸ I have adopted the version of Ficinus, "arteria et fistula faucium—" and so in part has Stanley, "the aspera Arteria and the Œsophagus—" The Greek is ἀρτήρια καὶ φάρυγξ— one of which goes to the stomach, and the other to the lungs. The food too is arranged along the gut, comminuted and macerated by the breath and heat, and thus passes on to the whole body, according to its peculiar changes; while the two veins, that proceed along the spine, from opposite sides, infold the head and meet each other, and divide themselves 'hither and thither' into many parts. The gods then having made man, and bound² to his body the soul to be its mistress, located that, which rules according to reason, about the head, where is the commencement of the marrow, and nerves, and mental aberrations, according as they are affected; while the senses likewise lie around the head, as if they were the leading power of spear-bearing guards. In this spot is also that, which reasons, and contemplates, and judges. But that portion of the soul, which is affected by circumstances, they placed lower down, namely, the irascible about the heart, and the concupiscible about the lower belly and the parts about the navel; of which mention will be made hereafter.

[18.] On the sense of Sight, and on light, and the formation of images in mirrors.

After placing in the face the light-enduring³ eyes, they enclosed⁴ in them the light-like portion of fire; which being smooth and dense, they conceived to be the brother⁵ of the light of day.⁶ Now this⁷ runs through the whole of the eye, and especially the middle of it, in the most easy manner, (as

¹—¹ The Greek σχιζονται τε γοῦν ἔνθεν—where, in lieu of the unintelligible γοῦν, I have translated, as if the Greek were, τ' ἔνθεν καὶ ἔνθεν, a formula found in Tim. p. 46, C., and restored by myself on Æsch. Eum. 95, to Eurip. Iph. T. 941; and to the passages there quoted I could add not a few more.

² Ficinus, "conjuxerunt—" as if his MS. had read συνδῶσαντες, not ἐνδύσαντες—A similar var. lect. in Tim. p. 45, B., where one MS. offers ἐνδύσαντες for ἐνδῶσαντες.

³ So I have translated φωσφόρα, literally "light-bringing;" for the eyes do not bring light, but bear it." Stanley, "the eyes, conduits of light—"

⁴ Ficinus, "accendere," as if his MS. read καθῆψαν, not καθιέρξαν—

⁵ On the metaphorical sense of ἀδελφός, found in Tim. p. 45, B., see Blomf. on Æsch. S. Th. 490.

⁶ Ficinus, "divini," probably a press error for "diurni—"

being) the most pure and clear;⁷ ¹ and having a sympathy with the light without, as like has with like,¹ it furnishes the sense of sight. Hence when light has departed at night or become obscured, that,² which flows from us,² adheres no longer to the air that is near; ³ but, being kept within, it smooths down and disperses³ the emotions within us, and becomes the bringer-on of sleep, by which the eyelids are closed; and when there is a great quietness,⁴ slumbers fall upon (us)⁴ with short dreams;⁵ but when some emotions are still left, frequent⁶ phantoms are produced around us; and in this way are formed visions, that become, according to a direct road,⁷ some, day-dreams, and some,⁸ night-dreams; and after these the image-makings, existing in mirrors, and other things, that are transparent and smooth, are perfected, not otherwise than by refraction, according as the mirrors have a convexity, concavity, or length; for the appearances will be different, through the lights being reflected to different parts, and slipping-off⁹ from the convexity, but coming together to the convexity. For thus in some cases ¹⁰ the left and the right are seen on opposite quar-

¹ I have translated, as if the Greek were ἄντι, not τὸ,—ἐλκεριστότατον— similar to ἀδελφὸν ὃν τοῦτου πῦρ ἐλκερινός in Tim. p. 45, B.

² Ficinus, "quod quidem externo fulgori simile contextum simili ac corroboratum—" which seems to have been obtained from Tim. p. 45, C., ἐκπίπτον, ὁμοιον πρὸς ὁμοιον, ἐμπκαγίς γενόμενον.

³ Ficinus, followed by Stanley, "Quo fit ut, sese ad interiora recipiens, demulceat atque resolvat—"

⁴ I have translated, as if ἡμῖν had dropt out after ἐκπίπτουσιν. For though the pronoun is omitted in Tim. p. 45, E., γενομένης δὲ πολλῆς μὲν ἡσυχίας βραχυόνευρος ὕπνος ἐκπίπτει— yet as μὲν is there perfectly useless, and omitted in one MS., the author probably wrote ἡμῖν—

⁵ Ficinus, "somnia ferme sine insomniis surrepit."

⁶ Ficinus, "frequentia confestim—" thus rendering συχνά by two words.

⁷ Although ἐνθουσιαν is found in Tim. p. 45, D., I confess I do not understand its meaning in either place.

⁸ I have translated, as if the Greek were τὰς μὲν ὕπας, τὰς δὲ κατ' ὕπας— not ὕπας τε καὶ ὕπας— Ficinus, "seu veræ seu falsæ." See at § 7, p. 259, n. ³.

ters; in others, according to equality;¹⁰ and in others, what is at the bottom is changed to what is at the top, and contrariwise.

[19.] Of the other senses, and for what purposes they are created.

Hearing has been created for distinguishing sound. It commences from a movement about the head and ends at the seat of the liver. And sound is that, which passes through the ears and brain and blood¹ in succession, until the soul is struck. An acute sound is that, which is moved quickly; a grave, slowly; a great one (is what is moved) with much (force); a small one (that which is moved) with little (force).

Following upon these there has been put together the power of the nostrils for the perception of smells. Now Smell is an affection, descending from the veins in the nostrils to the places² about the navel. But it does not happen that the kinds of it have received a name, except two,³ the most belonging to a genus,³ (namely) the sweet-smelling, and the bad-smelling, which have the appellation⁴ of painful and pleasant;⁴ but (it does happen) that all smell is denser than air, and thinner than water;⁵ and properly the things, in which the genus of Smell is reasonably said,⁵ that have not obtained a perfect change, but have a participation in air and water;⁶ and these are according to smoke and fog;⁶ for

² In lieu of τόπων, one would prefer πόρων, "pores—"

³ Such is, perhaps, the proper version of γενικωτάτοιον— which Ficinus, unable, I suspect, to understand, renders "præter duas communiores—" "Ficinus, "suavitatis et nauseæ—"

⁴ Such is the literal and unintelligible version of the Greek, where ed. pr. reads ἡμεῖς δὲ ἐν αἵς— instead of κυρίως δὲ ἐν οἷς— Ficinus, "proprie autem in iis odoribus genus accidit—" Stanley, "for odour is properly said to be of those things—" through these changing into each other the sense of smelling is completed.

⁵ Ficinus, more intelligibly, "cujusmodi sunt, quæ ex fumo et caligine conficiuntur." Plato, in Tim. p. 66, D., has μεταβάλλοντος γὰρ ὕδατος εἰς αἶρα, αἶρος τε εἰς ὕδωρ, ἐν τῷ μεταξύ τούτων γεγόνασιν ὀσμαι ἐμπασαι ἀνῆασι τε, κάπνος ὡς ἡ ὀμίχλη— for so that passage should be read, in lieu of γεγόνασιν εἰσι τε ὀσμαι ἐμπασαι κάπνος ἡ ὀμίχλη— for the sense is, "all scents are produced and rise up, like smoke and a fog." To meet, however, the difficulty in the Greek, that passage has been thus translated, "for odours are generated by the change of water into air, or of air into water; and all these are either smoke or vapour."

And Taste too have the gods made the judge of juices the most varied, by extending to the heart the veins from it,¹ that are to be the provers and judges of the juices; for these,² when brought together and separated,³ according as the juices fall upon them, define the change in them. Now there are seven varieties in juices; sweet, vinegar-like, rough, salt-like, sour, bitter. And of these it happens that the sweet is of an opposite nature to all the rest, diffusing familiarly³ its moisture about the tongue; ⁴but those, that stir about and tear its skin,⁴ are acrid; those, that inflame and ⁵run upwards,⁵ are pungent; those, that have a detersive power so great as to cause it to waste,⁶ are sour; those, that are quietly cleansing and detersive, are salt-like; but of those, that contract the pores and unite (their parts), the more rough, are harsh; while those, that produce a less effect, are bitter.

But the power of the Touch has been prepared by the gods to lay hold of things warm and cold, and soft and hard, and

² Ficinüs, followed by Stanley, has more intelligibly, "dum dilatantur varie atque contrahuntur—"

³ I cannot understand οἰκίσας, nor could, I think, Ficinüs; whose version, adopted by Stanley, is "etenim humorem linguae imbibitum perfundit atque delinit—"

⁶ The sense requires, not συνήκειν, but ῥήκειν, as translated. Ficinüs has merely "qui vehementer abstergit et liquefacit—" Stanley, "others being absterge, dissolve it."

light and heavy, and smooth and rough, so as to judge of the differences in them; and we call things, that receive a touch, yielding; but those, that do not yield, resisting. Now this happens according¹ to the bases of the bodies themselves. For those, that have a larger base, are ²stable, and fixed to their seat;² but those, that stand³ upon a small one, are yielding easily, and are soft and change their place easily. Now that, which is rough, would be with an unequal surface combined with hardness; but that, which is smooth, (would be) what is with an equal surface combined with thickness. Moreover as the properties of cold and heat are the most opposite, they are combined from opposite causes. For that, which by the sharpness and roughness of its particles cuts through (a thing),⁴ produces the property of heat; but the thicker particles⁵ (produce) cold; while by their ingress they drive out the lesser, and compel the small ones to enter on the other hand⁶ into their vacant place.⁶ For a shaking and trembling takes place then; and upon this occurring the property of cold arises in bodies.

[20.] On the Heavy and Light.

It is by no means proper to define the Heavy and Light by the up and down; for there is neither the up nor the down. For since the whole of heaven is like a sphere, and ⁷formed

¹ I have translated, as if the Greek were κατά, not παρά—

² Ficinus, "stabilia ac solida—" as if his MS. read στέρεα, not ἰσπατα—

⁴ I have translated, as if τι had dropt out before τὸ— for διατίμνον requires its object.

⁵ Unable to understand ἀδρομερίστερον—ἰξωθούτων—βιαζομένων δὲ— I have translated, as if the Greek were ἀδρομερίστερα—ἰξωθούντα—βιαζόμενα— remembering the words in Tim. p. 62, B., τὰ—μεγαλομερίστερα εἰσόντα, τὰ σμικρότερα ἰξωθούντα— Ficinus, "frigida vero, quod ingressu pigrius, dum tenuia quidem expelluntur, et in illorum sedes crassiora penetrare coguntur—" which is evidently a bold attempt to make something like sense out of words, which, taken literally, are unintelligible.

⁶ Although ἰκύνων seems to be defended by εἰς τὰς ἰκύνων—ἔδρας in Tim. p. 62, B., yet I have translated, as if the Greek were τὴν γε κινήν—

⁷ Ficinus, "in convexa superficie æqualiter lævigatum—" as if his MS. read εὐπρόσῳτος in lieu of ἱσῳτός— accurately even on its outward surface,⁷ some persons do not justly call one part up, and another down. For that is heavy, which is drawn with difficulty to a place contrary to nature; but (that which is drawn) easily, is light; and still further, heavy is that, which is composed of rather many particles; light, of very few.

[21.] On Respiration.

We respire in this manner. There is around us from without a great quantity of air. Now this passes to within through the mouth, and nostrils, and the rest of the pores of the body, ¹seen (only) by reason; ¹ and, after being warmed, ²it proceeds with haste to what is cognate in the external portions; ² and according to the road, by which it goes out, it drives back again the air to the parts within; and in this manner unceasingly, the circle being completed, are inspiration and expiration produced.³

[22.] Respecting the Causes of Diseases.

The causes of diseases (Plato says)⁴ are many. In the first place, the deficiency or the excess, in the elements, and their change into other places not their own; secondly, ⁵the inverse generation of homogeneous substances; ⁵ as if from flesh were produced blood, or bile, or phlegm; for all these things are nothing else than a wasting away.⁶ For phlegm is the wasting away of flesh; but sweat and a tear are, as it were, the serous portions of phlegm. Now phlegm, when left without,⁷ produces ⁸leprosy and scurvy; ⁸ but, when it is within and mingled with black bile, it induces what is called ⁹the

² Ficinus, "ad externum cognatumque aerem refluxere nititur—" Stanley, "it floweth back again to the external air—"

³ Ficinus, "sequitur—" as if his MS. read ἔπειτα in lieu of συνιστάνται.

⁴ I have adopted the words between the lunes from "Plato—docuit" in Ficinus; the origin of "Plato allegeth" in Stanley.

⁶ Ficinus, followed by Stanley, renders σύντηξιν by "colligationem et putrefactionem—" as if his MS. read σύντηξιν ἢ σήψιν—

⁷ Ficinus, "extra—missa—" as if his MS. read, not ἀπολεσθῆναι, but ἀπορροεσθῆναι— Stanley, "intercepted—"

⁸ Ficinus merely "albas infectiones—"

⁹ On the "holy disease," see the learned on Herodot. iii. 33.

holy disease.⁹ Now the phlegm, that is acrid and salt-like, is the cause of the affections, that exist ¹with a cold.¹ And ²all the parts, that are in a state of inflammation from bile, suffer this.³ For bile³ and phlegm work out very many and very various sufferings; the continued fever is produced from fire being in excess; the quotidian, from the excess of water being so; the tertian, from that of air; and the quartan, from that of earth.

Let us speak next in order of the Soul, taking up the discourse from some point here, even though we shall appear to repeat some things.

[23.] On the three principal powers of the Soul.

The gods, who formed the race of mortals, after they had received, as we have shown,⁴ the Soul of man, that is immortal, added to it two mortal portions. But that the divine and immortal portion of it might not be infected by the trifles⁵ of mortals, ⁶they placed over the body, as if they were appointing a ruler and a king over a citadel⁶ and assigning to him a residence, the head, which possesses a form, imitating that of the Universe; and they placed under it the rest of the body to minister to it; and attached that portion to it, as it were a vehicle, while they assigned to its mortal parts a dwelling-place, one to one part and another to another. For they placed that, which feels anger, in the heart; but that, which is affected by desire, in the intermediate place between the boundary on the side of the navel and that of the diaphragm, after binding it down, as if it were a mad⁷ and wild beast.

²—² Ficinus, “omnes enim, qui pituita simul et bili gravantur, id pati necesse est,” as if his MS. read πάντας δὲ τοὺς φλεγμαίνοντας—πιπονθῆναι δέ— (of which Stanley has adopted πιπονθῆναι δέ, as shown by his “must suffer—”) not πάντα δὲ τὰ φλεγμαίνοντα—πιπονθε.

³ In lieu of χολήν, ed. pr. χολή, and so Ficinus, “bilis cum pituita—” what I have adopted.

⁴ Instead of δείξομεν, Ficinus found in his MS. ἰδίξαμεν, as shown by his “diximus—” what I have adopted.

⁵ Ficinus, “deliramentis—” as if his MS. read ἀφροσύνας, not φλυαρίας.

⁶—⁶ Ficinus, “in ipsa corporis arce sedem ejus, utpote principis omnium, statuerunt—” as if his MS. read ἐπὶ τῆς τοῦ σώματος ἀκροπόλεως πάνταρχον ἀποφθάντες.

⁷ By the aid of this passage we may perhaps read in Tim. p. 70, E.,

But the lungs they planned, for the sake of the heart, to be soft and ¹without blood, and with cavities,¹ and sponge-like, in order that the heart, while leaping, according as anger was boiling, might have a softening down; but the liver for exciting the feeling of desire in the soul, and for rendering it gentle, ²by having a sweetness and bitterness;² and moreover for making manifest the prophetic power in dreams; for there is shown in it ³the power carried on from the mind through what is smooth and thick and brilliant;³ but the spleen for the sake of the liver, in order that the former may cleanse the latter, and render it brilliant, ⁴and at least receive to the same the differences, generated by certain diseases around the liver.⁴

[24.] On the division of the parts of the Soul.

That the Soul is tripartite according to its powers, and that its parts are distributed to their own place according to reason, we may learn from hence. In the first place, the things, separated by nature, are different. ⁵Now that, which has the property of suffering, is naturally separated from that, which has the property of reasoning;⁵ since the latter is conversant about things, perceived by the mind; but the former about things painful and pleasant, ⁶and still further what has the property of suffering, being about things with life.⁶ Secondly, καὶ κατέδρασαν δὴ αὐτὸ ἐν ταῦθα, ἅτε οἰστροῦν καὶ ἀγριῶν θρίμμα in lieu of —δὴ τὸ τοιοῦτον ἐν ταῦθα ὡς ἀγριῶν θρίμμα.

— In lieu of ἀναιμον, σπαραγγώδη, Ficinus seems to have found in his MS. ἀνεμόεντα σπαραγγώδη— for his version is “ventosae et instar fistulae cavae—” — and — To understand these two passages, the reader must turn to the Timæus, p. 71, B.—D. § 46.

— Ficinus, “utque putredines corroderentes, quæ quibusdam morbis circa jecur affluunt, in splenem continuo delabantur—” as if he had found in his MS. διαφθορὰς εἰς αὐτὸν— where διαφθορὰς would answer to ἀκαθάρσιαι in Tim. p. 72, C., ὅταν τινες ἀκαθάρσιαι γίγνωνται διὰ νόσους σώματος περὶ τὸ ἥπαρ— while, instead of ταῦτῶν, which I cannot understand, one would prefer ταυτὸν— For though ταῦτῶν seems to be defended by Tim. p. 72, D., ταπεινόμενος εἰς ταῦτῶν ἐννιζῶ, it only seems; since the antithesis in μέγας καὶ ὑπουλός ἀξάνεται plainly leads to ταπεινόμενος εἰς τὸ ὑγυινὸν ἐννιζῶ. Stanley’s version is—what is no version—“so that those corruptions, which by some diseases are contracted about the liver, retire thither.”

— Ficinus, “natura vero segregatur, quod rationem habet, et quod rationi subjicitur.” Stanley, “passionate and reasonable are separated by nature.”

— Such is the literal version of the Greek. Ficinus, more fully, since the part, that has the property of suffering, and that, which has the property of reasoning, are different by nature, it is meet for them to be in separate places. For they are found to be at war with each other. Now nothing is able to be at war with itself; nor can the things opposed to each other stand together ¹at the same time about the same object.¹ At least in the case of Medea, anger is seen to be at war with reason; for she says—²

I know how great the ills I'm about to do;
But rage has a pow'r greater than ³my counsels.³

And in the case of Laius, when carrying off Chrysippus, desire is at war with reason; for he says—

'Alas! this thing from god ⁴to man's an ill,
When, what is good, one knows, but uses not.

Still further ⁵is it presented to the mind,⁵ that the property of suffering is different from that of reasoning, from the care of the property of reasoning being one thing, but that of suffering another; for the former is effected by the discipline of teaching; the latter by the practice of morality.⁶

[25.] That the Soul is immortal.

That the soul is immortal (Plato) proves by proceeding in this manner. The soul brings life to whatsoever she is attached, as being a thing born with herself. Now that, which brings life to any thing, is itself non-recipient of death; and a thing of this kind is immortal. If then the soul is immortal, it would be indestructible likewise. For it is an incorporeal

"quinetiam ratio hominibus duntaxat, pars autem perturbationibus obsequens, cæteris quoque viventibus competit."

² In vs. 1075, 6.

³—Although τῶν ἰμῶν βουλευμάτων is found in the MSS. of Euripides, and in those of the different authors, who have quoted this passage, yet the very balance of the sentence requires something like θυμὸς δὲ κρείσσειν ἢ καλῶν βουλευμάτων— i. e. "But rage has greater power than good thoughts—" or τῶν γε νοῦ βουλευμάτων: which is nearer to the common reading, τῶν ἰμῶν βουλευμάτων.

⁴—Since Plutarch, ii. p. 33, E., offers τόδ' ἤδη θεῖον— perhaps Euripides wrote either τόδ' ἤλαθε θεῖον— or τόδ' ἤκει θεῖον—

⁵—Such is the proper version of παρίσταται. Ficinus renders "plane patebit—" what Stanley has adopted.

⁶ Ficinus, in lieu of ἡθους, seems to have found in his MS. ἔθους: for his version is "consuetudine et exercitatione—" adopted by Stanley.

existence, (and) not to be changed in its substance, and perceptible by mind, and invisible, and of one form; ¹(and) therefore not to be put together; ¹ not to be dissolved; ² not to be scattered about. ³ But the body is altogether the contrary; it is perceptible by sense; visible; to be scattered about; to be put together; of many forms. ³ The soul too, being by means of the body close upon what is perceived by a sense, ⁴ becomes giddy and is troubled, and, as it were, drunk; ⁴ but being close upon what is perceived by mind, she becomes itself of itself composed and tranquil; ⁵ nor is she like to that, by which, when she is close to it, she is troubled; so that she is rather like to what is perceived by mind. Now what is perceived by mind, is naturally ⁶ not to be scattered about, and indestructible. ⁶

Moreover the soul naturally ⁷ takes the lead. ⁷ Now that, which naturally takes the lead, is like to what is divine; ⁸ so that the soul, ⁸ by being like to what is divine, would be indestructible, and incorruptible. ⁹ (Again,) the contraries, that have no middle term, and exist, not according to themselves, but by some accident, ¹⁰ are constituted by nature to be pro-

² Ficinus omits ἀσπίδατος.

³ Ficinus has "Præterea animus, cum per corporis sensus ad illa, quæ sensibilia sunt, descendit—" while Stanley omits all between "The soul" and "drunk."

⁴ Ficinus renders ἀγγιγῆ by "angitus—" and omits ὅλον μεθύει, ὥσπερ μεθύουσα (ἢ ψυχῇ)—

⁵ All between the numerals is wanting in Ficinus; while Stanley renders, most strangely, "When the Soul adhereth to those things, which are perceptible by intellect, it acquiesceth."

⁶ Ficinus, "semper incorruptibile."

⁷ Ficinus, "corpori dominatur—" the origin of "doth naturally preside over the body" in Stanley; who adds, "not the body over the soul."

⁸ Ficinus has "Quod autem natura sua regit et imperat, divinitati cognatum—" translated by Stanley, "But that, which, by nature, ruleth and commandeth, is of kin to divinity."

⁹ Ficinus, "deo proxima immortalis erit—" Hence Stanley, "being next to god must be immortal."

¹⁰ Ficinus, "ut se invicem mutuo fieri valeant—" as if his MS. read ἡ ἀλλήλων γίνεσθαι δύνασθαι— not simply γίνεσθαι without δύνασθαι.

duced from each other; ¹⁰ for instance, ¹ that, which men call life, is the contrary to death. As then death is the separation of the soul from the body, so likewise is life the meeting of the soul, which existed, it is plain, previously, with the body. ² If then the soul will be after death, and was, before it fell in with the body, ² it is reasonable to believe that it is eternal. For it is not possible to conceive what will destroy ³ it.

Moreover if learning is (but) recollection, the soul would be immortal. Now that learning is (but) recollection, we may be led (to believe) ⁴ in this manner; for learning could not be based otherwise than on the recollection of what has been known of old. For if we have an idea of universals ⁵ from things taken in parts, how shall we find a way through things that are infinite, as regards their parts? ⁶ or how from a few: ⁶ for ⁷ we should have been deceived by a falsehood, ⁷ as say for example, by having decided that, what makes use of respiration, is alone a living being; ⁸ or how would thoughts have the property of a principle? ⁸ By an act of recollection then we have an idea from small cogitations, that secretly fall ⁹ from some things taken in parts, while we are remembering what was known of old, but of which we met with the oblivion, when we were invested with a body.

¹ I have translated, as if the Greek were ολον ιναντιον ιστι τουτο—not ιναντιον δι τουτο—

²⁻³ Ficinus, more correctly, "quod si et fuit ante, et post mortem erit—" although he omits πρὸ τοῦ περιπεσεῖν σώματι: and so Stanley after him. One would prefer merely ὡς ἦν, "as it was—" with the usual change of καὶ and ὡς. See on Tim. Loc. p. 156, n. 1.

³ I have adopted φθεροῦν from ed. pr. in lieu of φθίρον— Ficinus too, "quod perdat illum, excogitare—" and so Stanley.

⁴ Ficinus renders ἵαχθῆσιν by "adstruimus—" from whence Stanley, "we prove—"

⁵ I have adopted "universals" from "universalia" in Ficinus, as the version of κοινότηας—

⁶⁻⁸ Ficinus, more fully, "at quomodo ex paucis individuis communia ipsa percipimus?" Hence Stanley, "or how from a few perceive universals?"

⁷ Ficinus, as usual, when in doubt, renders one word, διεψέσθην, by two, "deciperemur atque mentiremur."

⁸⁻⁹ Such is the literal version of the Greek. Ficinus, "vel quomodo ipsae intelligentiae in nobis principales essent?" Stanley, "or how could the Notions themselves have the reason of Principles?"

⁹ Ficinus, "incidentibus—" as if his MS. read ἱκπιδόντων in lieu of ὑποκιστόντων—

Further, ¹the soul is not corrupted¹ by its own wickedness; neither will it be corrupted by that of another person, nor by any thing else at all. And being in this state, it would be a thing incorruptible. Moreover that, which is self-moved, is ever-moved in the manner of a principle. Now a thing of this kind is immortal. The soul too is self-moved. Now the self-moved is the principle of all motion and generation. But a principle is not generated, and is not to be destroyed; so that ²the soul of the Universe would be such, and that of man likewise;² since both have a share in the same mixture. Now he says that the soul is self-moved, because it possesses a life born with it, (and) ever in action by itself.

That rational souls then are immortal, a person might, according to this man, firmly assert; but whether the irrational are so likewise, is a doubtful point. For it is probable that irrational souls, driven about by a mere phantasy, and making no use of either reasoning or judgment, or contemplation³ and their combination, or 'intellectual apprehension,'⁴ but, being altogether without thought, belong neither to a nature perceptible by mind, nor to an existence the same as the rational, and are mortal and corruptible.

And it follows upon the reasoning that souls are immortal, that they are introduced into bodies by their being innate in the natures, that form the fœtus; and, by passing into many bodies, both human and not human, ⁵they ever remain the same in number,⁵ either by the will of the gods or through incontinence⁶ or a love for the body; for body and soul possess somehow an affinity with each other, like fire and brimstone.

⁵—⁵ Ficinus, "eundem semper servantes numerum;" who found perhaps in his MS., not ἡ ἀριθμὸς μενούσας, but αἱ κατὰ τὸν αὐτὸν ἀριθμὸν μενούσας— Stanley, "either according to certain numbers they expect—"

⁶ Ficinus adds "vitæ" after "incontinentia."

The soul of the gods too possesses the judging faculty, which may be called Gnostic, and the impelling, which a person would name the Parastatic,¹ and the appropriating;² which powers, existing in human souls likewise, after being invested with body, receive, as it were, a change, the appropriating into the feeling of desire, and the impelling into that of anger.

[26.]³ *On Fate and Self-power.*⁴

On the question of Fate something of this kind is the doctrine of this man. All things he says are in Fate, but all things are not however fated. For Fate, while holding the rank of a law, does not, as it were, say that one person shall do this, and another suffer that; for⁵ it would proceed to infinity;⁵ since the things produced are infinite, and infinite too the accidents around them; moreover⁶ that, which is in our power, would depart,⁶ and praise too and blame, and every thing (else)⁷ that borders on them; but (it says)⁷ that if a soul selects a life of this kind, and does some such⁸ acts,⁹ some

¹ By παραστατικόν, says Salmasius on Epictetus, p. 132, quoted by Fischer, is meant "the power by which a person moves himself from place to place." But how a derivative from ιστημι can convey the idea of motion, I confess I cannot understand. Equally unintelligible is the version of Ficinus, "præterea et aggrediendi naturam, quem assistendi vigorem possumus nuncupare;" for the idea of attacking is the opposite to that of assisting. Perhaps Alcinoüs wrote περιστατικόν—

² So I have translated τὸ οἰκειωτικόν—The version of Ficinus is "vim —qua conciliant et gubernant—" where two different words are given for one, of whose meaning he was uncertain. Stanley omits here τὸ οἰκειωτικόν, and translates just afterwards ἡ οἰκειωτική, "the assistant."

³ The order of the sections from here to 32 differs in the version of Ficinus from that in the Greek text. This in Ficinus is 29.

⁴ The word αὐτεξούσιον is elsewhere translated "free-will."

⁵ Ficinus, "in infinitum namque progressio foret—" who perhaps found in his MS., not εἰς ἄπειρον γὰρ τοῦτο—but εἰς ἄπειρον γὰρ πορεύοιρ' ἂν τοῦτο—what I have translated.

⁶ Ficinus, "libertas quoque nulla restaret—" as if his MS. read τὸ ἐφ' ἡμῖν αὐτεξούσιον οὐκ ἔσται—Hence Stanley, "besides this would take away our free-will—"

⁷ I have translated, as if ἄλλο had dropt out before ἄλλως. Ficinus, however, after omitting καὶ πᾶν τὸ τοῦτοις παραπλήσιον, adds "verum sic Fatum pronunciat—" as if his MS. read ἀλλὰ λέγει οὕτως—not ἀλλὰ ὅτι, nor ἀλλὰ διότι, found in ed. pr.

⁸ Since τάδε τινα is incorrect Greek, opportunely has Ficinus, "hujusmodi quædam—" which leads at once to τοιαῦτα τινα, both here and in the next sentence, where Ficinus has "talia—"

⁹ Ficinus, "consequenter—patietur," which leads to something else than αὐτῇ ἔσται.

such things will follow it.⁹ The soul then is without a master, and it rests with itself to do or not an act; nor is it forced to do this (or that).¹ But that, which follows upon the doing, will be accomplished according to Fate. For instance,² should a Paris carry off a Helen, it being in his power to do so,³ there will follow, that the Greeks will make war upon the Trojans³ for the sake of Helen. So too⁴ did Apollo foretell to Laius⁵—

If thou child gettest, thee that child shall kill.

Now in the oracle⁶ is comprehended both Laius and his child-getting; but the consequence is fixed by Fate.

Now the nature of a possibility falls somehow in the middle between the true and the false; but⁷ that, which rests on ourselves, is borne, as it were, on a vehicle, upon that (possibility) which is naturally indefinite.⁷ Now that, which happens with our own choice, will be either⁸ true or false;⁸ but it differs from what is in possibility, that is (to say), what exists according to a habit and an active operation.⁹ For

¹ In lieu of τοῦτο, the sense requires τὸ ἢ τό—as I have translated. The formula is found frequently in Thucydides and Demosthenes, and is still to be restored to numerous corrupt passages. Stanley, “without any compulsion or necessity.”

² I have translated, as if the Greek were ὅλον εἰ τις Πάρις ἀρπάσειεν τὴν Ἑλένην, ἐκ’ αὐτῇ δὲ τοῦτο—not ὅλον τῇ Πάρις ἀρπάσειεν τὴν Ἑλένην ἐκ’ αὐτῇ ὄντι—where it is impossible to discover a particle of syntax. What Ficinus found in his MS. it is difficult to discover from his version, “veluti ex eo, quod Paris Helenam rapiet, quod quidem in ejus erit arbitrio.” We might read ὅλον τῇ Πάριδι ἀρπάσαντι τὴν Ἑλένην, ἐκ’ αὐτῇ δὲ τοῦτο, ἡκολούθησεν ὅτι—in lieu of ἡκολούθησεν τό—for in this allusion to a past event there could be no place for the idea of a future; although there might be, if the historical fact were put hypothetically. Stanley, “As from Paris’s ravishing Helené, which it is within his power to do or not to do, it shall follow that the Grecians contend with the Trojans about Helené.”

³ Ficinus omits ἴσως.

⁴ Ficinus correctly omits γὰρ between οὐρ and καὶ—

⁵ In Eurip. Phœn. 19.

⁶ I have translated, as if the Greek were, not θεσμός, but χρησμός—

⁷ Such I conceive to be the meaning of the words ἀόριστον δὲ ὄντι αὐτῇ τῇ φύσει ὥσπερ ἐποχῆται τὸ ἐφ’ ἡμῖν. Ficinus was equally at a loss, as shown by his version, “eique suapte natura indefinito libera animæ rationalis potestas undique superfertur.” Hence Stanley, “and being so indefinite by Nature, that, which is in our power, is carried on, as it were, to it.”

⁸ Ficinus, “confestim aut verum est—” as if his MS. read τοῦτ’ αὐτίκ’ ἔσται—not τοῦτο ἔσται—Hence Stanley, “is presently either true—”

⁹ I have translated, as if the Greek were τοῦ δὲ, δ ἢ ἐν δυνάμει, τοῦτ’ that, which is in possibility, indicates a certain fitness, as regards some things, which have not, as yet, the habit;¹ as for example, a boy will be said to be in possibility a grammarian, or a flute-player, or a carpenter; but he will be such in the habit of some one or two of these (trades), when he shall have learned them, or possessed some of these habits: but as regards active operation, when he operates from the habits, which he possesses. But possibility is neither of these;² while that, which rests on ourselves, being indefinite, receives, according to the balance either way, the truth or not.³

[27.]³ On the Good, and on what is the most to be honoured in the things of the Good, and on Virtues.

We must next speak in order and summarily of what has been said by the man on points of Morality. The good to be most honoured and the greatest, he conceived it was not easy to discover, nor safe for those, who discovered it, to expose before all. To a very few then of his well-known friends, and those⁴ previously tried,⁴ did he give a share of his lectures on the good. If any one however takes up his writings carefully,⁵ (he will say that)⁵ he has laid down our good in the knowledge and contemplation of the primary good, which a person would call god and the primary mind. For all the things, that in any way are held by man to be good, he conceived to have obtained that appellation from their participating somehow in the primary and most honoured (good), in the manner that things sweet and hot obtain their appellations according to their participation in their primaries; but of the

³ This in Ficinus is § 30.

⁴ Ficinus, "probe electis—" Hence Stanley, "of whom his judgment made choice—"

⁵ Since Ficinus inserts "reperiet," adopted by Stanley, I have translated, as if the text were λίγοι δὲ ὄντι— words that might easily have fallen out between ἀναλάβοι and ἐπιθετο.

things, that are with us, only mind and reason reached to a similitude with the very (good).¹ Hence our good is a thing honourable and venerable and divine and lovely and symmetrical, and called somehow² happiness; but of the things, that are said by the many to be good, such as health, and beauty, and strength, and wealth, and³ what are near to these,³ there is not one altogether⁴ a good, unless⁵ it meets with⁵ the use of it arising from virtue; for when these are separated,⁶ they hold merely the rank of matter, existing as an evil to those, who use them evilly. And sometimes he has called even mortal things good. And happiness he conceived to exist not in human things, but in divine and blessed.⁷ From whence he said that the souls of philosophers in reality were filled with things great and wonderful, and, that after the dissolution of the body they became⁸ hearth-fellows⁸ with the gods, and go round with them, while surveying⁹ the level plane of truth;⁹ since even during the period of life they had a desire for his¹⁰ knowledge, and¹¹ honoured his pursuit above (all);¹¹ by which

² Ficinus, "apud illum," as if his MS. read ἐπ' αὐτοῦ (i. e. Plato) instead of πῶς— Stanley, "he calleth—"

³ The words between the numerals are omitted by Ficinus and Stanley.

⁴ Ficinus, "prorsus:" who found therefore in his MS. καθ' ἑαυτὸν, not καθ' ἑαυτὸν—

⁵ In lieu of νόχοι I should prefer τι ἔχοι—

⁶ Ficinus, "separata enim hæc ab ipsa virtute—" He therefore found in his MS. χωρισθῆντα γὰρ ταῦτ' ἀπ' ἀρετῆς αὐτῆς, to which χωρισθῆντα γὰρ ταύτης in ed. pr. seem to lead, not χωρισθῆντα γὰρ ταῦτα— Stanley, "For being separated from virtue—"

⁷ Ficinus, "sanctis," as if his MS. read ὁσίοις, not μακαρίους. Stanley, "immortal."

⁸ Ficinus, "divinis epulis vesci—" remembering perhaps Horace's "cœnas deorum—"

⁹ On the expression τὸ τῆς ἀληθείας πεδίον, see the learned on Phædr. p. 248, B.

¹⁰ The Greek is τῆς ἐπιστήμης αὐτοῦ— But as Ficinus has "scientiæ divini," he found, no doubt, in his MS. τοῦ θεοῦ. And if so, one would prefer θεῷ to θεοῖς just above.

¹¹ Ficinus, more fully, "eam præ cæteris omnibus veluti pretiosissimum quiddam coluerunt—" as if he found something to this effect in his MS., πρὸ πάντων ἄλλων ἄτε τιμωτάτον τι δὲ ἐτίμουντο.

after (they)¹ are purified and revived, ²as it were, some eye of the soul,³ that, having been previously³ lost and blinded, is ⁴better to be saved than ten thousand eyes,⁴ becomes able to reach the nature of all that is rational. ⁵But on the other hand,⁵ ⁶men without minds are likened to those, who live under the earth,⁶ and who have never seen the brilliant light (of the sun),⁷ but look upon some dim⁸ shadows⁹ of the substances, that are with us,⁹ and conceive that they are clearly laying hold of what (really)¹⁰ exist. For as these, when they meet with a return from darkness, and arrive at a clear light, reasonably condemn what appeared then, and themselves likewise, for having been greatly deceived before; so they, who pass from the darkness, in which they have lived, ¹¹to things

¹ I have inserted "they," i. e. philosophers; for otherwise the masculine ἰκαθαρμένους—ἀναζωπυρῆσαντας would be without regimen; for αὐτοῖς might easily have dropt out before ὥσπερ— as may be inferred from the version of Ficinus, adopted by Stanley, "Cujus munere mentis illorum expergefactus oculus atque reviviscens, antea obcæcatus—"

³ I have altered τὴ into τίως, to answer to "antea" in Ficinus, although the word is not found in the passage of the Republic just quoted.

⁴ On this expression see Wyttenbach on Plutarch de S. N. V. p. 91. Here Ficinus, followed by Stanley, supplies "corporeis" before "oculis"— and hence his MS. read, perhaps, μυρίων σαρκίων ὀμμάτων— what Iamblichus has in Vit. Pythagor. § 16, p. 58, quoted by Ast.

⁵ I have translated, as if the Greek were δ' αὐ, not γὰρ—

⁷ Ficinus, "fulgidum solis lumen—" adopted by Stanley; for his MS. read, I suspect, φῶς—λαμπρόν θ' ἰωρακόσιν— where θ (i. e. ἡλίου, as shown in the Banquet, p. 555, n. 72,) might easily have dropt out before ε—

⁸ Ficinus, "exiguas et inanes—" as if he did not quite understand ἀμυδράς— Hence Stanley, "empty, thin shadows—"

⁹ Ficinus, more explicitly, "corporum, quæ nos supra terram inspicimus—" Hence Stanley, "of such bodies, as are with us upon the earth—"

¹¹ Ficinus, more briefly, and with a change in the order of the sentences, "ad divina se conferunt, rationabile est, quæ quondam maximi that are truly divine and beautiful, will despise what was previously viewed by them with wonder, and they will have a more violent desire for the contemplation of the last mentioned.¹¹ And for them it is all in harmony to say that ¹the honourable is the (only) good; ¹ ²and that virtue is self-sufficient for happiness.² ³ But why the good consists in the knowledge of the first (being) and is honourable, has been made manifest through the whole of his compositions.³ But in what relates to (the good)⁴ by participation (he explains)⁵ somehow in this manner, in the first book of the Laws⁶—"Good things are two-fold; some relating to man, others to the gods," and so on. Now if there is any thing separated (from virtue),⁷ it is without a share in the existence of the First; and yet this is called by the senseless a good; and to him who has this, Plato says in the Euthydemus,⁸ there is a greater⁹ evil. And that he considered virtues to be chosen for their own sakes, we must take as a thing that follows, through his considering what is honourable as the only good. Now this very thing is shown in very many (dialogues),¹⁰ and especially in the whole of the Republic. For (he thinks)¹¹ that the person, who possesses ¹²the before-mentioned knowledge,¹² is the most fortunate and most happy; not on ac-

²—² The words between the numerals are wanting in Ficinus.

³—³ Ficinus, "in scientia primi, quod et pulchrum est, consistere, quod per omnes Platonis libros ostensum est—" thus moulding into one the imperfect sentences found in his MS.

⁴—⁴ I have inserted "the good" for the sake of perspicuity. Ficinus, "semper tamen secundum ipsam participationem, id assertum," from whence I have introduced "he explains." Stanley, "As concerning these, which are good by participation—" ⁵ Legg. i. p. 631, B. § 6.

⁶ Ficinus, more explicitly, "si quid autem absque virtute possidetur—" Hence I have inserted "from virtue—" Stanley, "If any thing be disjoined from the first good—"

⁷ Alcinoüs seems to allude to Euthyd. p. 280, E. § 24.

⁸ Ficinus, "ingens—"

⁹ Ficinus supplies "dialogia," what Stanley and myself have adopted.

¹⁰ Here too Stanley and myself have adopted, what Ficinus furnishes, "existimat—" count of the honours, which, by being such, he will receive, nor on account ¹of (other) rewards,¹ but that, even ²if he lives in obscurity² amongst all men, and there happen to him what are said to be evils, such as disfranchisement,³ and exile, and death, ⁴(he will nevertheless be happy);⁴ but on the other hand,⁵ that he, who possesses, with the exception of this knowledge, every thing considered a good, such as wealth, and great kingly power, and health, and strength, and beauty of body, will not be⁶ at all more happy. To all which he placed ⁷as an end, that was to follow,⁷ a similarity to god,⁸ as far as is possible.⁸ Now he takes this in hand in various ways. At one time he says, as in the Theætetus, that to be prudent, and just, and holy, is a similarity with god;⁹ and hence it is meet to endeavour to fly as quickly as possible thither from hence; for that flight is a similarity to god, as far as is possible; and that it is a similarity likewise to become just and holy with prudence. At another time he says, as in the last book of the Republic, that to be just alone (is so); ¹⁰for never is that person at least neglected by the gods, who shall be willing to be ready to become just, and, by making

² I have translated, as if the Greek were λανθάνη—*βίω*ς, remembering the Horatian, "vixit moriensque sefellit." For *βίω*ς might have been easily lost after ἀνθρώπων. At all events, something is required to show the cause or nature of the concealment.

³ Such is the meaning of ἀτιμία. Taylor, on Libanius' Argument to Demosth. F. L., would identify ἀτιμία with "outlawry" in England.

⁴ Ficinns supplies, what Stanley has adopted, "nihilominus beatum fore—" requisite to balance the antithesis. But whether the supplement came from a MS. or his own brain, time will perhaps discover.

⁵ I have translated, as if the Greek were τὸν δ' αὖ—not τὸν δὲ—

⁶ The sense and syntax require ἂν εἶναι, not εἶναι simply.

⁸ Ficinns, followed by Stanley, "quoad humanum genus assequi potest—" as if his MS. read κατὰ τὸ δυνατόν ἀνψ, i. e. ἀνθρώπων, as shortly afterwards.

¹⁰ In p. 613, A., from whence Fischer corrected here ὡς ἂν—θίλει into ὅς ἂν—θίλῃ, and might have altered likewise ἐπιτηδεύων into ἐπιτηδεύων— virtue his pursuit,¹⁰ to be assimilated to god, as far as it is possible for a man to be. But in the Phædon he says that to be prudent and just is to have a similarity with a god, in these words—"Are not," says he,¹ "those the most fortunate and blessed,² and proceeding to the best place, who make the virtue relating to the people and the state their pursuit, which persons call temperance and justice?" At another time he says that the end (of life)³ is assimilated with god; and another, (it is) to follow (god),⁴ as when he states,⁵ "Now god, as the old saw (says, contains) the beginning and end," and so on. At another time both; as when he says,⁶—"But the soul, that follows god, and is likened to him," and so on. For the beginning of utility is the good, and this is said (to be) from god. The end therefore would follow⁷ upon the beginning, or⁸ on the being assimilated to god; ⁹that god, to wit, who is in heaven, or, by Zeus, above heaven, and who does not possess virtue, but is better than it.⁹ From whence one would correctly say that misery is the evil-doing of a

² Ficinus, "sancti—"

⁴ Here again Ficinus supplies the word, adopted by Stanley, wanting at present for the sense, in his version, "sequi deum—" as if his MS. read ἑπείθεαι θεῷ— where θεῷ (i. e. θεῷ) might have been easily lost after ἑπείθεαι.

⁷ Ficinus renders ἀκολουθεῖν by "consonus—" Hence Stanley, "conformable—" presiding genius, but happiness the good-doing; ¹ and that we shall arrive at the being assimilated to god by making use of a fitting nature, and morals, and ² of conduct according to law, and perception, (according to nature,) ³ and, what is the chief (of all), of reason and instruction, ³ and the handing down of contemplation, so that we may for the most part stand aside from human affairs, and be ever busied in those perceived by mind. ³ Now the previous sacrifice to, ⁴ and previous cleansing for, the deity within us, ⁵ if we are about to be initiated into the greater subjects of learning, ⁵ would be through Music, and Arithmetic, and Astronomy, and Geometry, while we are taking care at the same time of the body by means of the Gymnastic art, which puts bodies into a state well prepared for war and peace.

[28.] ⁶ What is Virtue, and how Virtues are divided by Plato.

⁷ While Virtue is a thing divine, ⁷ it is itself a constitution of the soul perfect and the best, by causing a man to be with a good habit, and firm, and consistent, in speaking and acting, as regards both himself and others. But of its forms some are under reason, some are not. For as the irascible, the rational, and the concupiscible are different, so different too would be the complete state of each. Now the perfection of the rational part is Prudence; of the irascible, Fortitude; but of the concupiscible, Temperance. Now Prudence is a knowledge of things good and bad, and ⁸ of what are neither

²⁻³ Ficinus, "morbisque et victu ac sensu secundum legem." But as "victu" is not the meaning of ἀγωγή, perhaps he found some other word in his MS. Moreover, as I cannot understand αἰσθῆσαι τῇ κατὰ νόμον, I have translated, as if the Greek were ἀγωγή τῇ κατὰ νόμον, καὶ αἰσθῆσαι τῇ κατὰ φύσιν: for thus νόμον and φύσιν would be properly opposed to each other.

²⁻³ Such is the literal version of the Greek; in lieu of which Ficinus has "ut ab humanis negotiis longe admodum alieni divinisque contemplationibus dediti semper vivamus."

⁴ On the proper and metaphorical meaning of προτίλεια see Ruhnken on Tim. p. 224.

the one nor the other.⁴ But Temperance is a 'well-ordering (of the soul)¹ relating to 'desires and longings,² and 'their obedience to the leading power.³ But when we say that Temperance is a well-ordering and obedience, we suggest⁴ something of this kind, that there is a power, 'according to which the longings are in a well-regulated and obedient state, as regards that, which is naturally the master, namely, the rational power.⁵ But Fortitude is 'a power preservative of a lawful dogma dreadful or not dreadful, [that is, a power preservative of a lawful dogma].⁶ But Justice is a certain agreement 'on the part of these with each other,⁷ being a certain power, according to which the three parts of the soul agree and harmonize with each other, and 'each performs its own office according to its worthiness,⁸ 'that there may be a completion of three combined virtues,⁹ Prudence, Fortitude, and Temperance, while reason is the ruler, and the rest of the parts of the soul are kept down, according to their own peculiarities, by reason, and by their being obedient to its

¹ I have translated, as if ψυχῆς had dropt out after τάξις—

² Ficinus, "voluptates atque libidines"—

³ Ficinus, "eas obediētes rationi efficiētes—" By uniting the two one might fancy the true reading to be πρὸς τὸ τοῦ λόγου ἡγεμονικόν—where τοῦ λόγου might easily have been lost between τὸ and ἡγεμονικόν. Stanley omits all between the numerals.

⁴ Ficinus translates παρίσταμεν by "intelligi volumus"—

⁵ Ficinus more briefly, "qua cupidines pedissequae naturalis domini sunt"—

⁶ Ficinus, "legitimae institutionis, seu arduae sive faciliae, servatio; id est conservatrix et executrix facultas legitimi rationis propositi—" But how Fortitude can be defined as δόγματος ἐννόμου σωτηρία, I must leave for others to explain, even if we take with Stanley δόγμα in the sense of "a precept." I could have understood λήματος ἐμόνου σωτηρία, "the preservation of an enduring spirit," as in § 30, δογμῶν ἐμόνων: and so I would read, where δόγματος ἐννόμου σωτηρία are repeated shortly afterwards. Moreover, the words between the brackets are evidently an interpolation.

⁷ Ficinus, "omnium animae partium—"

⁹ I have translated, as if the Greek were, ὥς δὲ παντὶ μὲν τις ὁ συντηρῶν ἀπερὶν—not ὥς δὲ—ὅσα τῶν—for ῥ could hardly be omitted here after ὥς δὲ— rein; from whence we must conceive that ¹these virtues follow (each other) in turn.¹ For as Fortitude is preservative of a lawful dogma, so it is of right reason.² [For a lawful dogma is a kind of right reason.]³ But right reason comes from Prudence. Moreover, Prudence stands as an ally⁴ with Fortitude. For it is the knowledge of good things. Now no one is able to see what is good, while it is rendered obscure by cowardice, and the feelings that follow upon cowardice. And nearly in the same manner a person is unable to act with prudence in union with intemperance,⁵ or generally through being subdued by any feeling. And if he does any thing contrary to right reason,⁶ Plato says that he suffers thus through ignorance and folly;⁶ so that he would not be able to possess Prudence, while he is intemperate and a coward. The perfect virtues therefore are thus inseparable from each other.⁶

[29.] On Virtues and Vices; and, further, how each of them are distinguished.

In another way likewise there are what are called Virtues,⁷ such as good natural qualities, and a progress towards them,⁷ that have an appellation, similar to their perfections, through a similarity with them. ⁸Thus, for instance, we call certain ¹ The Greek is merely ἀντακολουθεῖν. Ficinus has "conjugatione quadam se invicem consequi—" what I have with Stanley adopted partially.

² The words between the brackets are properly omitted by Ficinus and Stanley.

³ Such is the correct meaning of ἐπίσταται.

⁴ Such is the literal version of the Greek. Ficinus has "ac generatim quisquis perturbatione concitus quicquam præter rationem efficit; propter incitiam semper aberrat."

⁵ After "aberrat," Ficinus inserts here some matter, which ought to be placed at the end of § 33, where see my note.

⁶ With the words between the numerals Ficinus commences § 26, where he has more fully, "Quoniam vero secundum vires rationales et irrationales anima trifariam divisa est, id homini contingere Plato existimat, ut nunquam prudens esse queat, dum aut timidus aut intemperatus existit. Id eoque absolutæ virtutes invicem inseparabiles sunt." And he then goes on with the translation of the remainder of this section.

⁷ Ficinus, "naturæ dotes et inclinationes bonæ—"

⁸ Ficinus, more intelligibly, "Quamobrem milites fortes quandoque dicimus, necnon imprudentes ac temerarios quosdam fortes aliquando prædicamus, haud sane de perfectis virtutibus, sed de dotibus naturæ loquentes."

soldiers brave; and sometimes we say that certain persons are brave, although they are thoughtless, while we are taking into account virtues that are not perfect.³ Now the perfect virtues have neither an extension nor remission. Vices however admit both of extension and remission; for one person is more thoughtless and more unjust than another. And yet vices do not follow each other. For some are opposites; which cannot exist around the same person.¹ For such is the state of boldness as compared with cowardice, and extravagance, with a love of money; since it is really impossible for a man to exist,² who is laid hold of by every kind of vice; for neither can the body possess in itself all the evils of the body.³ We must therefore admit a certain intermediate state, neither bad nor good. For all men are not either (entirely)³ good or bad; since such are those,⁴ who are making a progress to a sufficient good;⁴ for it is not easy to pass immediately from vice to virtue; since there is a great interval between extremes from each other,⁵ [and an opposition].⁵ And we must consider that some Virtues lead and others follow; and that the leaders are those, which are⁶ in the (portion), influenced by reason,⁶ from whom the rest obtain their perfection; but the followers are those in the portion affected by suffering; for these work out what is right, not according to the reason that is in them—for they have it not—but according to that, which is bestowed upon them by Prudence, (and) generated⁷ by custom and practice. And since neither sci-

¹ Ficinus, "in idem—" as if his MS. read περί τὸ αὐτό, not περί τὸν αὐτόν. Hence Stanley, "which are not competent to the same."

² Ficinus, followed by Stanley, has "omnium vitiorum maculis inquinatus; quemadmodum nec corpus cunctis morborum corruptionibus simul afflictum."

³ I have translated, as if ὅπως had dropt out after φάουλους—

⁵ Ficinus omits καὶ ἐναντίωσιν, words quite superfluous here. Stanley, "interval and distance—" But ἐναντίωσις is not "distance." And if it were, the two words would be synonymous.

⁶ Ficinus, "in parte animæ rationali—" who therefore found in his MS. λογιστικῆς, the reading of ed. pr., not λογισμῆς, or rather ἐν τῇ λογιστικῇ μέρει.

⁷ Ficinus omits ὑπογινόμενοι— ences nor arts exist in any other part of the body, except the rational alone, the virtues connected with that, which is affected by suffering, are not to be taught, because there are neither arts nor sciences; for they do not possess a peculiar contemplation.¹ Prudence however, as being a science, imparts to each (subordinate virtue)² its own peculiarity, just as the pilot gives to the sailors certain orders, not contemplated³ by them, and they obey him. And the same reasoning applies to a soldier and a general.

Since then vices admit of extension and remission, the sins⁴ (arising from them)⁴ would be not equal, but some greater and others less; and consequently some are punished more, and others less, by lawgivers. But though Virtues are extremes, through their being perfect, and similar to what is straight,⁵ they would be in another way means, through there being seen about all or the most of them two vices, one on each side, in excess and deficiency; as in the case of liberality,⁶ there is on one side parsimony, on the other extravagance. For in such circumstances there is a want of moderation, according as what is becoming is either in excess or deficiency. ⁷For neither would a person be apathetic, who, when his parents are assaulted, is not angry; nor would he be moderately affected, who (is angry) at every thing even of a common kind; but quite the contrary.⁷ Again, in like manner, he, who is not pained, when his parents die, is apathetic;

¹ Ficinus renders θεώρημα by "intelligentiam," as if he had found something else in his MS. But see § 25, p. 290, n. ².

³ I have inserted the words between the lunes to complete the sense, and translated, as if the Greek were ἐκάσταις, answering to "unicuique" in Ficinus, in lieu of ἐκάστης—

⁴ Since Ficinus renders ἀγνοούμενα by "minime inspecta," I have translated "contemplated—" to make the sense more clear.

⁵ Here again I have inserted words necessary for the sense.

⁶ Ficinus strangely translates τοκίνας τῷ εὐθεῖ by "recto comparantur—" Stanley, "And though Virtues are certain heights, as being perfect, and like unto that, which is right—"

⁷ The word ἐλευθερίως, which is elsewhere applied to "birth" or "education," is here taken in the English sense of "liberality," applied to money matters.

while he, ¹who is affected excessively,¹ so as to waste away by grief, is immoderately affected; but he, who suffers this pain in moderation, is moderately affected.² Moreover he, who dreads every thing and beyond moderation, is a coward; but he, who fears nothing, is bold; while he, who is moderate in things of fear and boldness, is brave. And the same reasoning applies to other cases. Since then moderation in all affections is the best, and nothing else is moderate, but what is a mean between excess and deficiency,³ on this account Virtues (are) of this kind, through a mediocrity, because they cause us to be in a medium state in affections.³

[30.]⁴ How Virtue is a voluntary thing, but Vice an involuntary one.

⁵Since there is, if any thing else, what is in our power and without a master, Virtue is likewise a thing of this kind.⁶ For what is honourable would not be an object of praise, if it were from nature or a divine lot. ⁶Virtue therefore will be likewise a voluntary thing, existing, according to some impulse, fiery, and noble, and permanent. From Virtue then being voluntary, it follows that Vice is involuntary.⁶ For who would willingly choose to have in the best part of himself and in the most worthy of honour the greatest of ills. But if any one rushes on to Vice, in the first place he will rush on not as to Vice itself, but as to a good thing. And if a person ⁷improperly stretches himself onward⁷ altogether to viciousness, such a person has been deceived,⁸ as having been

² Ficinus, "moderatus dicitur—" what seems to be preferable.

³ Such is the literal version of the Greek. Ficinus, more intelligibly, "ob id virtutes huiusmodi mediocritates dicte sunt, quod nos medicriter affectos circa perturbationes humanas reddunt." And so Stanley.

⁴ In Ficinus § 27.

⁵— I confess I hardly understand the words between the numerals. I could have understood words to this effect—"If there be any thing in our power and without a master, Virtue is a thing of this kind." Stanley's version is "Virtue being chiefly of those things, which are in our power, not compulsive, it followeth that Virtue is voluntary."

⁶ This doctrine is laid down in the Gorgias.

⁷ By aid of "inclinatur" in Ficinus, I have translated, as if the Greek were παραινιναί, not παραινιναί— Stanley, "is carried onward—"

⁸— In lieu of the unintelligible ἀποικονομησόμενον, I have translated, as if the Greek were ἀποικον ἀμησόμενον— To avoid the difficulty Fici-about to reap a greater good at a distance from home⁴ by means of some lesser ill; and in this way he will arrive at it unwillingly. For it is impossible that a person should wish to rush on to what are ills in themselves, with neither ¹the hope of (some) good¹ nor the fear of a greater ill. Whatever wrongs then a bad man does are involuntary. Since then a wrong is involuntary, the doing an injustice is still more an involuntary act, by how much the greater ill it would be for that person to be active in doing an injustice, than for injustice to keep itself quiet. And yet, although acts of injustice are involuntary, we must punish the doers of injustice differently. For different are the mischiefs done; and the involuntariness lies either in ²ignorance or some suffering.² Now all of these it is permissible to turn aside by reasoning, and ³urbanity in conduct,³ and care. ⁴So great an ill (then) is injustice, that ⁵to act unjustly is a thing more to be avoided than to suffer unjustly.⁵ For the former is the work of a bad man; but the latter is the suffering of a weak one. And both is a base thing. But to act unjustly is so much the greater ill, as it is the baser thing. And it is an advantage to him, who acts unjustly, to undergo punishment,⁶ as it is to a person diseased to give up⁷ his body to a physician to cure. For all punishment is a cure for a soul that has sinned.

[31.]⁸ What are Affections; and on their distinctions.

nus has "ut per minus malum majus quoddam malum devitet—" Stanley, "that by a lesser ill he may arrive at a greater good—"

¹ Ficinus, followed by Stanley, "spe aliqua boni," as if his MS. read οὔτε τι νιν ἐλπίδι ἀγαθοῦ— I have translated, as if the author had written οὔτε τινός ἐλπίδι ἀγαθοῦ.

² Ficinus, "in ignorance quadam vel perturbatione." But as ἀγνοια can hardly be described by τις merely, I have translated, as if νιν followed πάθει.

³ So I have translated ἥθεισιν ἀστέροις— Ficinus, "consuetudine civili," as if his MS. read ἔθεισιν—

⁴ Here begins § 28, in Ficinus, with the heading, "On Injustice and the distinction in Affections;" but § 32 in Heins.

⁵ This doctrine is promulgated in the Crito and Gorgias.

⁶ Ficinus, "se judici ultro subjicere—" as if his MS. read ὑποσχέιν δικαστῇ ἐκουσίως, ὡς— in lieu of ὑποσχέιν δίκην ὡς— For thus δικαστῇ would be properly opposed to ἰατρῷ.

⁷ In lieu of ὑποσχέιν the sense evidently requires παρασχέιν, similar to "committere" in Ficinus.

⁸ This § is 32 in ed. pr. and Heins., but united to § 28 in Ficinus.

But since most Virtues are conversant with Affections, let us define what kind of a thing is an Affection.

Now an Affection is an irrational movement of the soul, as regards either an ill or a good. And a movement has been called irrational, because Affections are neither decisions nor opinions, but movements of the irrational portions of the soul. For in the part of the soul, subject to Affections, there exist¹ things, which, although they are our works, are nevertheless not in our power.¹ They are however frequently produced in us, when not willing and resisting. Sometimes too, while knowing that, what have fallen on us, are² neither painful, nor pleasant, nor fearful,² we are not the less led by them; ³ what we should not have suffered, had these Affections been the same as decisions.³ For the latter we reject, ⁴ when we condemn them, whether fittingly or not fittingly.⁴ ⁵ For a good or for an ill:⁵ since on the appearance of an indifferent thing an Affection is not put into motion. For all Affections exist, according to the appearance of a good or an ill. For if we imagine that a good is present, we are pleased; and if it is about to be, we desire it; but if we imagine that an ill is present, we are pained; and what is about to be, we fear. For⁶ there are two Affections, simple and elementary, (namely,) Pleasure and Pain, and from these the rest are formed. For

²— Ficinus, "neque dulcia, nec expetenda, nec etiam metuenda—" Stanley has, more fully, "neither pleasing nor displeasing, expetible nor avoidable—"

³— I have translated, as if the Greek were δ οὐκ ἂν ἡμῖν παθόντες, ταῦτα εἰ ἐπιστοῖ τὰ αὐτὰ ἡμῖν— similar to the Latin of Ficinus, "quod sane nunquam pateremur, si perturbationes idem essent atque iudicia—" The common reading, οὐκ ἂν παθόντες ταῦτα, εἰ— seems however to be defended by οὐκ ἂν συνίσταται δὲ τοῦτο, εἰ— but only seems; for there δὲ is added, what is wanting here. Stanley, "which could never be—"

⁴— Ficinus, "cum ipsa per consilium confutamus, sive, ut decet, seu non, id agamus." Stanley, "when we disapprove it, whether it ought to be so, or otherwise."

⁵— Ficinus, followed by Stanley, has, more fully and intelligibly, "Adjectum præterea in definitione est, boni cujusdam aut mali gratia."

⁶ The sense requires γὰρ for δὲ, or else we must omit, with Ficinus, both particles.

we must not number with these Fear and Desire, as being of the nature of principles and simple. For he, who fears, is not entirely deprived of pleasure: ¹ since if a person has existed through a time, that may have happened, while despairing of a release from, or an alleviation of, the ill; he abounds however in being pained and troubled; and on this account he is united to pain; ¹ and he, who desires, while remaining in the expectation of obtaining (his wish), is pleased; but as he is not completely confident, nor has a firm hope, he is weighed down. Since then Desire and Fear are not of the nature of principles, it will be conceded without a doubt that not one of the other Affections is simple, ² such, I mean, as Anger, and Regret, and Jealousy, and such like. For in these Pleasure and Pain are seen, ³ mixed up, as it were, in a manner with them. ³ But of Affections some are of a wild kind, others of a tame. Now the tame are such as exist in man according to nature; (being) ⁴ both necessary and proper; and they are in this state, while they preserve some measure; but when there is found in them ⁵ a want of measure, they then become deviations from right. Of such a kind are Pleasure, Pain, Anger, Pity, Shame. For it is proper to be pleased at things that happen according to nature, but to be pained at their contraries. And Anger is necessary ⁶ for self-defence and to avenge oneself upon foes; ⁶ and Pity is proper

² Ficinus, “minime simplices sunt—”

³—³ Although Ficinus by his “tanquam ex iis compositis—” seems to defend μειγμένους, yet as ed. pr. has μειγμένας, the author wrote, I conceive, μειγμένως, as I have translated.

⁴ I have translated, as if ὅντα had dropt out between τε and καὶ—Ficinus, followed by Stanley, has “atque hæ sane, dum modum tenent, necessariae ac propriae sunt—” as if his MS. read καὶ ταῦτα, ὥς ἂν σύμμετρα ὑπάρχῃ, ἀναγκαῖά ἐστι καὶ οἰκτῖα—not ἀναγκαῖα τε καὶ οἰκτῖα οὕτω δὲ ἔχει, ὥς ἂν σύμμετρα ὑπάρχῃ.

⁵ The sense and syntax evidently require αὐτοῖς, as I have translated, not αὐτῆς—

⁶—⁶ Ficinus, followed by Stanley, “ad repellendam ulciscendamque injuriam—”

¹for a love of mankind ;¹ and Shame is requisite for a retreat from things that are base.² But other Affections, which are contrary to Nature, are of a wild kind, and arise from a perversion (of mind),³ and improper habits. Of such a kind⁴ is (excessive)⁵ laughter, and a rejoicing over calamities, and a hatred of mankind ; which, by being stretched out and relaxed, and existing in any state whatsoever, are deviations from right,⁶ through not receiving any moderation.

And on the subject of Pleasure and Pain Plato says, that these Affections, existing somehow naturally in us from the beginning, are put into motion and carried onward ; since Pain⁷ and Sorrow⁷ are generated for those, who are excited contrary to nature ; but Pleasure for those, who return to their former state according to nature. Now he conceives that the state according to nature is a mean between Pain and Pleasure—⁸while it is the same with neither of them⁸—in which (mean) we exist for the greater portion of time. He teaches moreover that there are many kinds of Pleasures, some (felt) through the body, and others through the soul ; and that of Pleasures some are mixed with their opposites ;⁹ but others remain pure and undefiled ; and that some are the result of memory,¹⁰ and others united to hope ;¹⁰ and that some are disgraceful, such as are unrestrained, and combined with injustice, but others moderate, and participating somehow otherwise in the good,

² Ficinus, "ab adversis—" who therefore found in his MS. the reading of the ed. pr. ἐχθρῶν, altered by Heinsius in ed. 2, to αἰσχροῶν. The two words are frequently confounded elsewhere.

³ Ficinus, "ex perversione vitæ—" as if his MS. read βίον before καί—I have translated, as if ψυχῆς had dropt out after διαστροφῆς—

⁴ Ficinus, "hujusmodi—" for his MS. read not ταῦτα, but τοιαῦτα, what I have adopted.

⁵ Ficinus, followed by Stanley and myself, has "risus effusio—" as if his MS. read γίλας πολλὰς or γίλας πλατὰς, not simply γίλας—

⁶ Ficinus, whom Stanley follows, has "semper aberrant," as if his MS. read ἅτι ἡμαρτημένα, not Διημαρτημένα—

⁷—⁷ Ficinus omits καὶ ἀληθδονος—

⁸—⁸ Ficinus, followed by Stanley, has "dum neutro movetur—" as if his MS. read οὐδενίῳ κινούμενον τὸ αὐτὸ— not οὐδενίῳ ἰσχύονεν ὃν τὸ αὐτὸ—

⁹ This doctrine is promulgated in the Philebus. Here, however, Ficinus, whom Stanley follows, has "dolori," the explanation of τοῖς ἐναντίοις.

¹⁰—¹⁰ Ficinus, "secundum spem—" such as the good-will felt towards the good, and the pleasure received from 'acts of virtue.'¹ But since many pleasures are naturally in no repute,² we must not inquire, whether they can belong to 'the simple good.'³ For that seems (to be) evanescent⁴ and of no value, which 'is an after-production, not by nature,⁵ and 'has nothing essence-like, or that takes the lead,⁶ but is co-existing with its opposite; for Pleasure and Pain are mingled. Now this would not have happened, if one (namely, Pleasure) were a simple good, and the other (namely, Pain) an ill.

[32.]⁷ On Friendship.

That, which is called especially and properly Friendship, is 'nothing else⁸ than what exists according to a reciprocal kind feeling. Now this takes place, when each party wishes equally that his neighbour and himself should do well. And this equality is not otherwise preserved than through a similarity in manners. For like is friendly to like,⁹ when they are in moderation;⁹ but when they are immoderate, they can suit neither each other, nor what are moderate. There are likewise some other friendships so considered, but not however really being so, that receive a colour, as it were, from Virtue; such as the natural friendship of parents towards their offspring, and of relations towards each other, and that which is called political and sociable.¹⁰ But these do not always have a reciprocity of kind feelings. There is likewise an amatory kind of friend-

¹ Ficinus, whom I have followed, renders ἐν ἡδοναῖς by "ex virtutum operatione—"

² Ficinus strangely renders ἀδοκίμων by "obscena—"

³ Ficinus, followed by Stanley, more fully, "simpliciter et absolute bonum—"

⁴ Ficinus, "exilis—" Stanley, "poor—"

⁵ I have translated, as if the Greek were ἡ ἐπιγεννημά τι μὴ τῇ φύσει ὑπάρχουσα— not ἐπιγεννηματικὴ τῇ φύσει ὑπάρχουσα— Ficinus has "cujus natura pedissequa est alterique succedens—"

⁶ Ficinus, "neque substantiæ propriæ principalis particeps—" Hence Stanley, "and hath not a principal primary essence—"

⁷ This § is in ed. pr., Heins., and Stanley, 31.

⁸ Ficinus, "nihil aliud est—" who found therefore in his MS., not οὐκ ἄλλο τι ἐστὶ, but οὐκ ἄλλο τι ἐστὶ— what I have translated.

⁹ I have translated, as if the Greek were μερίω ὄντι— an absolute sentence, not μερίω ὄντι— For both the likes ought to be in moderation.

¹⁰ So Stanley translates ῥητορικὴ. But Ficinus has "rhetorica—" for his MS. doubtless read ῥητορικὴ, instead of ῥαιρικὴ.

ship. Now of the amatory one kind is well-behaved,¹ as being that for a virtuous soul; but another ill-conducted,² as being for a vicious (soul); and there is an intermediate (kind) for that, which is of a medium disposition. For³ as there are three states of the soul in a rational living being, one good, another bad, and a third between those two, so there will be three amatory states, differing from each other in kind. Now that they are three, their aims point out especially by differing from each other. For the bad is the love of the body alone, through its being overcome by what is pleasant; and this is after the manner of beasts; but the well-behaved is for the sake of the naked soul, ⁴in which there is seen a fitness for virtue;⁴ but the intermediate has a longing for the body, and a longing likewise for the beauty of the soul. He too, ⁵who is worthy to be loved,⁵ is himself a mean, as being neither ill-conducted nor well-behaved; from whence we must call the love, ⁶that lays claim to the body,⁶ some dæmon rather than a god, who has never ⁷been generated in an earthly body,⁷ (and) is ⁸the conveyer of what is sent by the gods to man, and conversely.⁸ The amatory then, being thus commonly divided into the three kinds before mentioned, ⁹the one, which relates to the love of the good,⁹ being freed from an affection, ¹⁰becomes a thing of art;¹⁰ from whence it is placed in the rational (portion) of the soul; and its contemplations are to know ¹¹the person worthy to be loved, and to possess and make use of him;¹¹ and further to judge¹² of him from his propensities and im-

⁴ Ficinus, more briefly, "ad virtutis officia promptum—"

⁵ Ficinus strangely translates ἀξιόπαιρος by "qui sumatur—"

⁶ Ficinus renders συναρπαστικόν, "ad corpus ex parte aliqua declinans—" pulses, whether they are noble, and ¹tending to what is honourable, and whether they are violent and fervid.¹ ²And he, who strives to possess it, shall possess it, not by rendering delicate or praising the object of his love, but by repressing it rather, and showing that by a person, being in the state he is now, life is not to be lived.² ³And when he gets the party loved into his power, he will make use of him, after having en-joined the things, through which he will, after being practised in them, become perfect; and the end to them (will be), that, instead of a lover and a beloved, they will become friends.³

[33.] On the Forms of Polity.

Of Politics (Plato) says that some ⁴(exist in reality, but some)⁴ are supposed to exist, such as⁵ he has detailed in the Republic. For in that (treatise), he has depicted ⁶the former as unwarlike; but the latter as being in a feverish state and warlike,⁶ while seeking which of these would be the best, and how they should be constituted. And it is there that, nearly alike to the division of the soul, is a Polity divided into three parts, relating to the guardians and aiders and operatives; to the first of which he assigns the counselling and ruling power; to the second, that of fighting for (the state), if need be; ⁷who are to be put into order according to the principle of anger,⁷ as if they were the allies of the rational principle;

² Such is the literal version of the Greek. Ficinus, after "perferantur," has "laudat et approbat; sin contra se habeant, nec assentabitur illi, neque suavis verbis obsequisque deleniet, sed absterrebit potius, atque docebit nequaquam illi, donec talis sit, esse vivendum."

³ Here again Ficinus has strangely represented the original, "Promittat autem semper ac porriget ea, quibus exercitatus is, quem amat, ad optimam frugem evadat. Finis tandem iis etiam, ut ex amore amicitia fiat."

⁴ The Greek is τὰς μὲν ἐνυποθίτους εἶναι— But as the apodosis is wanting for τὰς μὲν, I have translated, as if the Greek were τὰς μὲν εἶναι ὄντως, τὰς δὲ ὑποθίτους— Stanley has "some are supposed only and conceived by abstract from the rest."

⁵ The sense evidently leads to οἷας in lieu of ἀς— as I have translated.

⁶ Ficinus, more briefly, "priorem quidem concordem, secundam vero dissidentem—"

⁷ Such is the literal version of the Greek, which Ficinus strangely renders "quos iracundie comparat—" For he did not understand, nor can I, what the writer meant here. Stanley, "to defend—by arms, which answereth to the irascible power."

but to the last (he assigns) arts, and the rest of handicrafts. And he conceives it right for the rulers to be philosophers, and contemplative of the primary good; for they alone¹ will administer all things properly; ²for never will human affairs cease from ill, unless philosophers become kings, or those, who are called kings, become, from some divine allotment, truly philosophers.³ For states will act³ the best and with justice at that time, when each portion of it ⁴is under its own law;⁴ so that the rulers may consult for the people, and the co-fighters be their servants and fight in their behalf, while the rest follow them obediently. And he says there are five kinds of Politics; (the first),⁵ an aristocracy, when the best are in power; the second, a timocracy, where ⁶those fond of honours⁶ are the rulers; the third, a democracy; and after this an oligarchy; and the last, a tyranny, which is the worst. He depicts likewise other Politics, hypothetically; of which there is that in the Laws, and that too, ⁷after correction, in the Epistles;⁷ of which he makes use for the states, that are labouring, as mentioned in the Laws, under a disease, and ⁸possessing a region bounded off,⁸ and persons selected from every age, so that, according to the differences in their nature, and places, there may be a need of peculiar instruction⁹ and of bringing up and of using arms. For they, who are near the sea, would apply themselves to navigation and to naval battles: while those, dwelling inland, would be fitted for fighting on foot, and the use of

³ I have translated, as if the Greek were πράξειν, not ἐπράξειν—Ficinus, "administrari—"

⁴ So I have translated αὐτονομῆν. Ficinus, followed by Stanley, "suo munere fungitur."

⁵ I have translated, as if the Greek were τῇν τε ἀδρισταρῆσιν—where ἀ means πρώτην, as shown by "primam" in Ficinus. On the loss of a letter, indicative of a number, see my Poppo's Prolegom. p. 223.

⁶ Ficinus renders φιλοτιμῶν by "fastu inflati homines."

⁷ Such is the meaning of ἡ ἐκ διορθώσεως, rendered literally by Ficinus "ex emendatione—" instead of which Stanley, apparently unable to understand it, has given "that, which reformeth others." With regard to the Epistles, Alcinoüs seems to allude to the 8th and 11th, for only in them is there a reference to any forms of Polity.

⁸ See the commencement of book 4.

⁹ Ficinus, "importatione et exportatione—" as if his MS. read εἰσαγωγῆς καὶ ἐξαγωγῆς, not ἀγωγῆς simply.

arms, either the lighter, like mountaineers, or the heavier, like persons living¹ on hilly plains; and some would practise cavalry exercise. But in this state he does not lay down by laws that women are to be in common.

Political virtue is therefore contemplative and practical,² and that which chooses³ to make a state good and happy, and⁴ of one mind and of one voice;⁵ (and) it enjoins commands, and has under it the science of war, and generalship, and law-judgments. For Political science considers ten thousand other matters, and especially this very one, whether we must engage in war or not.⁶

[34.] On the Sophist.

It has been stated before what kind of person is the philosopher. From him the Sophist differs, first in manner, in that he is⁷ the seeker of pay from young persons,⁸ and is willing to be considered⁹ a person with bodily and mental accomplishments,¹⁰ rather than to be so; and (secondly) in matter, in that the philosopher is conversant with things existing for ever and in the same state; while the Sophist busies himself about that which is not, and¹¹ retires to a spot, difficult to be seen on account of its darkness.¹² For to that,

¹ Such is the literal version of γεωλόφοις—πεδίοις. But as such a combination of words is unintelligible, opportunely has Ficinus "littora," which has led me to believe that the author wrote ἐν αἰγιαλοῖς ἢ ἀφελίσιν—πεδίοις—where ἀφελίσιν—πεδίοις may be compared with ἀφελῶν πεδίων in Aristoph. 'Ικκ. 524. Stanley avoids all the difficulty by putting into English the Latin of Ficinus, "et armaturam leviozem, qui montes colant; graviorem, qui littora."

² Ficinus, "quæ eligit atque proponit—"

³ Ficinus, "secum maxime consentientem—" Stanley, "and convenient to itself."

⁵ See Sophist, p. 231, D. § 36, νῶν καὶ πλουσίων ἔμμοθος θηρεν-της— from whence one would read here ἔμμοστον θήραμα in lieu οἱ μωθαρνία—

⁶ Such is the proper rendering of καλὸς καὶ ἀγαθός.

⁷ Compare Sophist, p. 254, A. § 84, 'Ο μὲν (σοφιστής) ἀποδιδράσκων εἰς τὴν τοῦ μὴ ὄντος σκοτεινότητα—διὰ τὸ σκοτεινὸν τοῦ τόπου καwhich is, that, which is not, is not opposed. For the latter is unsubstantial and unintelligible, nor has it any basis; and which, if a person were compelled to speak of, or to think upon, he would be overthrown,¹ through his bringing a battle around himself.² Now that which is not, as far as it is understood,³ is not a naked negation of what is,⁴ but (it is) with a joint-meaning as regards another thing, which follows upon the primary being;⁵ so that, unless these too had participated in that, which is not, they would not have been separated from the others.⁶ But now, as many soever as are the beings that are, so many times is the being, which is not. For that, which is a not-being, is not a being.

So much it suffices to be said for an Introduction to the doctrine-making of Plato; of which a part has been stated in an orderly manner; but a part dispersedly and in no order; so that it is in the power of any one,⁶ from what has been said, to become contemplative and detective of the rest of his doctrines by following out these.⁷

ρανεῖσθαι χαλεπός. From whence I have, with Ficinus, omitted καὶ between σκοτεινόν and δυσδιόφανον.

¹ Ficinus, "oberrabit atque tergiversabitur—" as if his MS. read something else than ἀναρπαγήσεται. Stanley, "he is deceived, because he putteth together things contrary and repugnant—" which is not even a paraphrase, much less a translation.

² I have translated, as if the Greek were αὐτὸν ἐν ταύτῃ—not αὐτὸ ἐν ταύτῃ—for Ficinus has "secum ipse pugnet atque dissideat—"

³ Ficinus renders ἡξακούεσθαι, "pronuntiatum auditur—"

⁴ Such is the literal version of the Greek. Ficinus has "sed cum suspitione quadam et subinsinuatione alterius, quod quidem modo aliquo ipsum, quod est, comitatur;" where "modo aliquo" would lead to τῷ ῥήματι, in lieu of τῷ ῥήματι, which Heinsius corrected into τῷ ῥήματι. Stanley, "Yet that, which is not, as far as it is spoken, is not a pure negation of that which is, but implieth a relation to another, which in some measure is joined to Ens."

⁵ Stanley, "so that, unless we assume something from that, which is, to that, which is not, it cannot be distinguished from other things."

⁶ I have translated, as if the Greek were ἐνὶν τινας, not μὲντοι, which could not follow ὅτι—

⁷ I have translated, as if τούτων had dropt out before καὶ τῶν λοιπῶν—And so probably read the MS. of Ficinus, whose version is "ut horum vestigiis reliqua etiam—"

THE

INTRODUCTION OF ALBINUS

TO THE DIALOGUES OF PLATO.

[1.] THAT¹ for a person about to enter upon² the Dialogues of Plato, it is fitting that he should know previously what a Dialogue is. For neither without some art and power³ have dialogues been written, nor is it easy for a person, unskilled in contemplation, to know them artistically. It is agreeable then for a philosopher, who is making for himself an insight into every matter of whatever kind, to examine, (first,)⁴ the essence of the thing, and afterwards, what power it has, and not with reference to what is naturally useful and what is not. Now (Plato) says thus—⁵ “On every matter, O boy, there is one commencement to those about to consult properly. It is needful to know, about what is the consultation; or else there must needs be an erring in this matter. Now it lies hid from the majority, that they do not know the essence of each thing; (but), as if they did know, they do not, at the commencement

¹ From the word “Or”, here and elsewhere, it is evident that the whole of this Introduction is merely an extract from a longer treatise.

² I have translated, here and elsewhere, εἰσέλθαι, “to enter upon,” or “to meet with,” as being a meaning more nearly allied to the derivation of the word than “to read,” the sense given by others.

³ Perhaps “meaning” would be the proper rendering.

⁴ I have translated, as if μὴν had dropt out after τῆν, to answer to ἔπειτα—

of the inquiry, agree (amongst themselves),¹ but as they proceed, ²they pay the reasonable (penalty);³ for they agree neither with themselves nor with others." In order then that we may not suffer this,³ while entering upon the Dialogues of Plato, let us consider this very thing, which I have spoken of, what is a dialogue. ⁴[For neither without some art and power have dialogues been written.]⁴ ⁵It is then nothing else than a discourse composed of question and answer upon some political or philosophical matter, combined with a becoming delineation of the manners of the characters introduced, and the arrangement as regards their diction.⁵

[2.] Now a dialogue is called a discourse, as a man (is called) an animal. But since of a discourse there is one kind arranged (in the mind)⁶ and another pronounced (by the mouth),⁷ let us hear about the one pronounced (by the mouth). And since of the latter there is one kind spoken, as a continued narration, and another by question and answer, questions and answers are the peculiar mark of a dialogue; ⁸from whence it is said to be a discourse⁸ by interrogation; and moreover⁹ it is applied to some political and philosophical matter; because it is meet for the subject matter to be related to the dialogue.¹⁰ Now the matter is that relating to politics and philosophy.¹¹ For as the matter of fables is laid down as adapted to tragedy and poetry in general, so is to dialogue philosophy, that is (to say), what relates to philosophy. But as regards that, which is combined with a becoming deline-

² So Heindorf understands τὸ εἰκὸς ἀποδιδοῦσαι.

³ One would prefer τὸ αὐτὸ, "in the same way."

⁴ The words between the brackets are evidently a needless repetition.

⁵ The same definition of a dialogue is found in Diogen. L. iii. 48.

⁶ I have added the words between the lunas for the sake of perspicuity.

⁷ I have translated, as if the Greek were ᾄδεν λόγος, not ᾄδεν ὁ λόγος—where the article is improperly introduced.

⁸ I have translated, as if the Greek were ἐν δὲ, not τὸ δὲ—

⁹ One would expect here λόγῳ, "the discourse," not διαλόγῳ.

¹⁰ To complete the definition, one would have expected to find something added to this effect, "which is discussed the best during a dialogue."

ation of the manners of the characters introduced, (and) their being different in their discourses through life, some as philosophers, and others as sophists, it is requisite to assign to each their peculiar manners; to the philosopher that, which is noble, and simple, and truth-loving; but to the sophist that, which is of many hues, and tricky, and reputation-loving; but to an individual what is peculiar to him. Added to this, ¹(the definition) speaks likewise of the arrangement, ¹as regards their diction; and reasonably so. For as ²the measure ought to be ²adapted to tragedy and comedy, and the fiction (of the subject) to the bruited story, so ought the diction and composition, adapted to the dialogue, possess what belongs ³to the grace of an Attic style, ³and is neither superfluous nor deficient.

[3.] But if a so-called discourse, not being made in the form, as I have laid down, but deficient on these points, is said to be a dialogue, it will not be said so correctly. ⁴Thus that, which is said in the case of Thucydides to belong to the power to represent the peculiarity of dialogues, but rather two public speeches composed on set purpose against each other. ⁴—Since then we have ascertained what is a dialogue, let us look into the different kinds of the Platonic dialogue, that is, into their characteristics, how many are the topmost, ⁵and how many of them ⁶exist subdivided into the uncut. ⁶

[4.] As regards their characteristics, which are two, one explanatory and the other exploratory, the explanatory is suited to the teaching and practice of truth, but the explora-

¹—¹ I have translated, as if ὁ ὅρος had dropt out before φησι— and περί after κατασκευῆς— Fabricius too perceived that περί was wanting here.

²—² Here too I have translated, as if the Greek were οἰκίον εἶναι τὸ μέτρον— not τὸ οἰκίον μέτρον—

³—³ The Greek is τὸ Ἀττικόν, τὸ εὐχαραί— as if two things were mentioned; whereas, since τὸ Ἀττικόν is τὸ εὐχαραί, the author probably wrote, what I have translated, τοῦ Ἀττικοῦ τὸ εὐχαραί—

⁴—⁴ Such is the literal version of the unintelligible original; where it is to be hoped that some of the MSS., not hitherto collated, either exhibit what the author wrote, or furnish a clue to it.

⁵ On the uncertainty in the meaning of οἱ ἀνωτάτω, see in the Life of Plato by Diogenes, § 49.

⁶—⁶ I confess I cannot understand the words between the numerals, and especially how the middle aor., ἱετήσαντο, could be found here.

tory to an exercise and conflict,¹ and the confutation of falsehood; and while the explanatory directs its aim to things, the exploratory does so to persons.

[5.] Of the dialogues of Plato there are drawn out in the class of Physics, the Timæus; in that of Morals, the Apology; in that of Logic, the Theages, Cratylus, Lysis, Sophist, Laches, (and) Statesman; in that of confutation, the Parmenides (and) Protagoras; in that of statesmanship, the Crito, Phædon, Minos, Banquet, Laws, Epistles, Epinomis, Menexenus, Cleitophon, (and) Philebus; in the tentative (class are) the Euthyphron, Meno, Ion, (and) Charmides; in the obstetrical,² the Alcibiades; and in the overthrowing, the Hippias, Euthydemus, (and) Gorgias.

[6.] Since then we have seen their differences, how they exist naturally, and their characteristics, let us state, in addition, from what dialogues persons must begin their entrance upon a discourse of Plato. For opinions are different. For some begin with the Epistles; and some with the Theages. And there are those, who divide the dialogues into tetralogies;³ and rank as the first tetralogy that, which contains the Euthyphron, Apology, Criton, and Phædon; the Euthyphron, as in it the charge against Socrates is brought forward; the Apology, since it was necessary for him to defend himself; the Crito, on account of his staying in prison; and afterwards the Phædon, since in it Socrates meets with the end of life. And of this⁴ opinion are Derkylides and Thrasyllus. But they seem to me to have wished to assign an order to the persons (of the dialogues) and the circumstances of their lives—a matter which is perhaps useful for something else, but not however for that, which we are wishing now; for we wish to discover the commencement and arrangement of instruction that is according to wisdom. We say then that the commencement of a discourse of Plato is not one and defined; for that, being perfect, it is similar to the perfect figure of a circle. For as the commencement of a circle is not one and defined, so neither is it of a discourse.¹

[7.] We will not however on this account enter upon it in any manner soever, nor accidentally. For if it is requisite to describe a circle, a person does not describe it, beginning from any point, but:² * * * * in whatever state each of us may be with regard to the discourse, beginning from that he will enter upon the dialogues of Plato. For there is a state according to nature, for instance, good or bad; and that according to age, where a person, for instance, is in the season for philosophizing or has passed it; and that, according to a predilection, as, for instance, in favour of philosophy or³ history; and 'that, according to a habit,'⁴ as in being, for example, previously initiated (in instruction),⁵ or without instruction, and that, according to the matter, as being engaged, for example, in philosophy, or dragged around by (political)⁶ circumstances.

[8.] He then, who is, according to nature, well born, and according to age is in the season for philosophizing, and according to a predilection, for the sake of exercising himself, is proceeding to reasoning, and he, who, according to a habit, has been previously initiated in instruction, and has been drawn aside from political circumstances, will begin from the Alcibiades⁷ to be well-turned by the inclination of intellect,⁷ and to know of what thing it is needful to make for himself a τοῦ λόγου— For other instances of one reading made up out of two, see my Poppo's Prolegomena, p. 175, to which I could now add many more.

² Fabricius thus supplies the missing matter, "but from that which is nearest at hand; in like manner—"

³ I have translated, as if the Greek were ἡ, not καί— On the confusion in those particles, see Porson on Eurip. Orest. 821.

⁴ I have adopted the suggestion of Fischer, who conceives that ἡ δὲ καὶ have dropt out between ἐνικα and ἔξιν—

⁵ I have translated, for the sake of the antithesis, as if μαθήσει had dropt out, similar to προτετελεσμένος τοῖς μαθήμασι in the next §.

⁶ I have followed Fischer, who has inserted πολιτικῶν before περιστάσεων, similar to πολιτικῶν περιστάσεων in the next §.

⁷ I have translated, as if the Greek were πρὸς τὸ τῇ ῥοπῇ τοῦ εὐπιστραφῆναι, to avoid the unmeaning tautology in πρὸς τὸ τραπῆναι καὶ ἐπιστραφῆναι—care, and, as it were by a beautiful pattern, to see who is the philosopher and what is his pursuit, and upon what suppositions his discourse is carried on. ¹(Such a person)¹ must enter upon the Phædo next in order; for in it (Plato) states who is the philosopher, and what is his pursuit; and upon the supposition of the soul being immortal he goes through the discourse relating to it. After this it would be requisite to enter upon the Republic. For, commencing with the earliest instruction, he delineates the whole of education, by making use of which a person would arrive at the possession of virtue. But since it is requisite for us to be versed in the knowledge of things divine, so as to be able, by possessing² virtue, to be assimilated to them, we shall enter upon the Timæus; for by entering upon this² account relating to Nature, and on the so-called theology, and the arrangement of the Universe, we shall clearly have a recollection⁴ of things divine.

[9.] But if any one, to speak summarily, is able to survey correctly⁵ the arrangement of the dialogues, suited to the teaching according to Plato, to him who chooses the doctrines of Plato * *⁶ For as it is necessary to become a spectator⁷ of his own soul and of things divine,⁸ and of the gods themselves, and to obtain the most beautiful mind,⁸ he must cleanse

² The syntax requires κτησάμενοι, to answer to the plural ἐντευξόμεθα, in lieu of κτησάμενον—

³ In lieu of αὐτῷ, the sense requires ταύτῃ—

⁴ Fabricius was the first to read ἀναμνήσομεν for δν.

⁵ To avoid the incorrect syntax in εἰ—δύναται—δν— we may read, as translated, εἰ—δύναται—εὖ—

⁷ I have adopted, what Fischer has suggested, θεατῆν, required by the subsequent ἐαυτοῦ, in lieu of θεαράς—

⁸—⁸ The words between the numerals present a very strange sense, as if it were possible for a person to be a spectator of the gods themselves and to obtain the most beautiful mind. Unless I am greatly mistaken the author wrote “δὲδ ῥᾷ τῶν θεῶν αὐτοῦ τοῦ καλλίστου νοῦ τι ἴχεν—” “through having a portion of the most beautiful mind itself of the gods—” not καὶ τῶν θεῶν αὐτῶν καὶ τοῦ καλλίστου νοῦ τυχέιν.

out the false opinions of his conceptions. For not even have physicians deemed the body capable of enjoying the food brought to it, unless a person shall have previously cast out what was in it in the way of an obstacle. But after the cleansing out, it is requisite to excite and call forth the sentiments, imparted by nature, and to cleanse out these too, and to exhibit them pure, as principles. In addition to this, through the soul being thus¹ previously prepared, it is necessary to introduce into it its peculiar doctrines, according to which it may be perfected; now these relate to physics, and theology, and morality, and statesmanship. And² that the doctrines may remain in the soul and not be³ chased away, it will be necessary for it to be delivered to the reasoning relating to causation,⁴ in order that a person may lay hold firmly of the proposed aim. In addition to these it is meet that, what is not contrary to reason, should be furnished, in order that we may not be carried aside by some sophist, and turn our thoughts into a worse direction. That we may therefore cast out false opinions, it will be necessary to enter upon the dialogues of the tentative character, and which possess the confuting and the so-called cleansing power. And that a person may call forth into light the notions relating to physics, it will be necessary to enter upon the dialogues of the obstetrical character, for this is peculiar to them; since in those there are doctrines relating to physics, and to morals, and to statesmanship, and to the regulation of a household; of which some have a reference to contemplation and a contemplative life; but others to action and an active life; but both of them⁵ relate to the being assimilated to god.⁵ And that these, after being imparted, may be not escaping from us, it will be necessary to enter upon the dialogues of a logical character,

¹ I have translated, as if the Greek were not ὥς, but οὕτως—

² I have adopted δι, inserted by Fabricius, after ἵνα—

³ The syntax requires either the insertion of ἢ after ἀναπόδραστα, or else the omission of καί before it.

⁴ Such seems to be the meaning of αἰτίας here. Unless it be said that the author wrote τῆς ἀ αἰτίας, i. e. τῆς πρώτης αἰτίας, "the first cause." On this sense of ἀ and its loss before αι—see here, p. 312, n. ⁴.

⁵ Such some will perhaps consider a proper version of ἐπὶ τῷ ὁμοιωθῆναι θεῷ. But ἐπὶ could hardly, I think, bear that meaning. Hence I suspect the author wrote ἐποίει τὸ ὁμοιωθῆναι—where, since the imperfect indicates a custom, ἐποίει would mean "is wont to make—"

which is also of the exploratory kind. For they possess both the distinguishing and defining methods, and, moreover, the analytical and syllogistical, through which truths are shown and falsehoods confuted. Moreover, since it is requisite for us to be not led aside contrary to reason by sophists, we shall enter upon the dialogues of a demonstrative character; in which it is in our power to learn thoroughly how it is meet to listen to sophists, and¹ in what manner to carry ourselves towards those, who act wrongly in matters relating to reason.

THE DOCTRINES¹ OF PLATO.

BOOK I.

ON NATURAL PHILOSOPHY.

[1.]² THE conformation of his body gave to Plato his name;³ for he was previously called Aristocles. His father was said to have been Ariston; while his mother was Perictioné, the daughter of Glaucus;⁴ and on both sides the nobility of his birth was sufficiently remarkable. For his father Ariston derived through Codrus his origin from Neptune; while the blood on his mother's side flowed from Solon, the very wise, who was the founder of the laws of Athens. There are however those, who assert that Plato sprang from a more exalted origin, at the time when a certain vision in the form of Apollo had a connexion with Perictioné. He was born in the month called Thargelion⁵ at Athens, on the day⁶ in which Latona is reported to have brought forth Apollo and Diana at Delos, (and) on the day before that, in which we have heard that Socrates was born. Mention is likewise made of the pretty dream that

² The sections are adopted from Hildebrand's edition.

³ For the word Πλατ-ων was formed from πλατ-ω, as shown in the Life of Plato by Hesychius, p. 229, n. ¹.

⁴ Diogenes, more correctly, Glaucon, as remarked by Casaubon.

⁵ This month marks a period from the middle of May to the middle of June.

⁶ This was the 7th.

Socrates had ; for he thought he saw a cygnet flying from an altar, which was in the Academia, sacred to Cupid, and settling on his lap ; and that afterwards, a full-fledged swan, it directed its flight to heaven, entrancing the ears of men and gods with the music of its song. And after Socrates had mentioned the dream to some persons when they had come together, Ariston very opportunely¹ attended upon Socrates, with the view of offering Plato to him as (the youth's) instructor ; on whom when Socrates had cast his eyes and ²saw from his external appearance his internal disposition,³ he said, "This, friends, is the swan (from the altar) of Cupid in the Academy."

[2.] Such and (sprung) from such did Plato not only excel heroes in virtue, but he equalled likewise the gods in power. For Speusippus,³ who was furnished with family documents,³ praises the acuteness of the boy's talent in perception, and his disposition as regards his wonderful modesty ; and he makes mention of the first-fruits of his youth as being imbued with the proofs of labour and his love of study ; and testifies that in the man there met together the growth of these and of other virtues.

From the same parents were his brothers Glaucon and Adeimantus. For his instructors he had in 'the rudiments of education,'⁴ Dionysius ; and in the palaestra, Ariston, a native of Argos ; and such a progress did practice bring with it, that he contended for the wrestler's prize at the Pythian and Isthmian games. Nor did he disdain the painter's art. For Tragic and Dithyrambic compositions likewise he fitted himself ; and, carried away by a confidence in his poetical powers, he was already desirous of professing himself a competitor, had not Socrates driven from his mind the lowness of the desire, and taken care to implant in his soul the glory that arises from true praise. And even previously⁵ he had

² Compare Shakspeare's—"To read the mind's construction in the face"—which answers almost literally to the words of Apuleius, "ingenium internum de exteriore conspicatus facie."

³ For he was the nephew of Plato.

⁴ Such is the correct translation of "prima literatura—" For "literæ" in Latin, like γράμματα in Greek, meant something more extensive than "letters" do in English. See at Diogenes' Life of Plato, § 4, n. 1.

⁵ According to Diogenes, § 6, Plato attached himself to the sect of been imbued with the (doctrines of the) sect of Heracleitus. But when he had given himself up to Socrates, he was superior to the rest of the disciples of Socrates not only in genius and learning; but by labour likewise and elegance he shed a lustre on the wisdom imparted to him by Socrates; by the labour, through which he endeavoured to make that wisdom his own; and by the elegance, through which he contributed to it a considerable dignity from the beauty and majesty of his language.

[3.] But after Socrates had left the world,¹ he sought out from whence he might make a further progress; and he betook himself to the discipline of Pythagoras; and though he saw it possessed a method of diligence and splendour combined, he was still more desirous of imitating its continence and chastity. And, as he perceived that the talents of the Pythagoreans were aided by other kinds of learning, he went to Cyrené to learn Geometry under Theodorus, and travelled even to Egypt to obtain a knowledge of astrology, and that he might learn from thence the rites of the prophets there. And ²a second time he went ³to Italy, and became a follower of the Pythagoreans, Eurytus of Tarentum, and Archytas, who was rather advanced in years; and he would have directed his thoughts to the Indians and Magi, had not the wars in Asia ⁴at that time prevented him ⁵“(from proceeding thither).” ⁶On which account, ⁷by following out with more than usual study the discoveries of Parmenides and Zeno, he so filled his treatises with things, ⁸taken unitedly, which singly ⁹had been an ob-

Heracleitus after the death of Socrates. But Aristotle, in Metaphys. i. 6, agrees with Apuleius.

²⁻³ For the first time is alluded to in the expression “ad Pythagoræ disciplinam se contulit—” Perhaps, however, in lieu of “iterum venit,” Apuleius wrote “iter convertit,” i. e. “he turned his road—”

³ So the earlier edd. But as all the MSS. read “caletica,” Ouden-dorp has suggested “Chaldaica;” Hildebrand, “Halytica,” i. e. Lydian, in allusion to the war carried on by the younger Cyrus against his brother Artaxerxes, that forms the subject of the early part of Xenophon’s “Anabasis.”

⁴⁻⁵ The words between the lunes are due to Joann. Sarisbur. in Nug. Curial. vii. 5, who has “procedere vetuissent—” not “vetuissent” simply.

⁵ The introduction of “quapropter” here seems very strange.

⁶⁻⁸ So we must translate “omnibus, quæ—singula,” to preserve the antithesis.

ject of admiration, that he was the first to unite philosophy, previously tripartite, and to show that its parts, each necessary in its turn, were not only not at variance with each other, but that they afforded a mutual aid. For although the members of philosophy had been obtained from different factories, (such as) natural philosophy from the Heracliteans, mental from the Pythagoreans, and moral from the very fountain of Socrates, yet from them all he formed one body, and, as it were, of his own begetting. But as the chiefs of these families (of Philosophy) had delivered to their auditors their sentiments in unpolished (language) and a rudimental (form), Plato rendered them perfect and even to be admired by polishing them up with reasonings, and investing them with the honourable dress of lofty diction. [4.] Many of his hearers, belonging to either sex, flourished as philosophers. He left behind him his patrimony, consisting of a small garden, adjoining the Academy, and ¹two slaves, and a goblet,¹ with which he made supplications to the gods; and of gold so much, as he had worn, when a boy, in his ear,² to mark his (noble birth). Some evil-disposed persons carp indeed at his three journeys to Sicily, and discuss them with opinions at variance with each other. But he went thither³ the first time for the sake of information, that he might understand the nature of Ætna, and the burning of ⁴the hollow mountain;⁴ the second, at the request of Dionysius, to assist the people of Syracuse, and to learn the municipal laws of that province. His third arrival took place ⁵in the wish to restore⁵ Dion, then an exile, to his country, after Plato had obtained a pardon for him from Dionysius.

Of his tenets, that might be called by the Greek word δόγμα, which he promulgated for the beneficial use of man, and ¹ On Diogen. L. § 44, n. 2, Stanley has remarked the discrepancy in the statements of the two writers.

² This was the right ear, as we learn from Isidorus, in Origin. xix. 31, "In aures—in Græcia puellas utraque aure, pueri tantum dextra gerebant."

³ I have translated, as if the Latin word were "illic," not "ille—"

⁴ Unless I am greatly mistaken the words "concavi montis" are an explanation of "crateris—" which was the technical expression applied to that natural phenomenon. See at Diogenes' Life of Plato, § 18, p. 165, n. 2.

for a rational method of living, and understanding, and speaking, we will commence from hence. For since he first held that the three parts of philosophy have an agreement with each other, we too will speak of each separately, beginning with Natural Philosophy.

[5.] Plato considers the principles of (all) things to be three—God, Matter, and the Forms of Things, which he calls ἰδέαι, (Ideas,) that are incomplete, shapeless, (and) distinguished by no mark of species and quality. But of God his sentiments are that he is incorporeal.¹ He alone, says (Plato), is ἄπεριμετρος, (without a circumference,)² the father and adorer³ of all things, blessed (himself) and the cause of blessings (to others), the very best, in want of nothing himself, (and) conferring all things (upon all); whom he calls the heavenly, the ineffable, the not-to-be-named, or, as he says himself, ἄρρητον ἀκατωνόμαστον;⁴ whose nature it is difficult to discover; and, if discovered, it cannot be proclaimed to the many. ⁵[The words of Plato are these, θεὸν εὐρεῖν τε ἔργον, εὐρόντα δὲ εἰς πολλοὺς ἐκφέρειν ἀδύνατον.]⁵ But of Matter he makes mention as unable to create, and to be destroyed, and that it is neither Fire, nor Water, nor any other of the principles and positive elements; but that of all things it is the first recipient of forms, and subjective to the act of making; (and) being as yet shapeless and devoid of the quality of configuration,⁶ God, as the artificer, gives to it a form Uni-

² The word ἄπεριμετρος is not found, I believe, in Plato. The idea however may be compared with the well-known representation of God, who has been considered as a circle, whose centre is every where, and circumference no where.

⁴ Neither of these words are applied, if I rightly remember, to God by Plato.

⁵ The words between the numerals Scaliger was the first to reject, as being evidently introduced by some person, who had an incorrect recollection of the passage in Tim. p. 28, C., εὐρεῖν τε ἔργον καὶ εὐρόντα εἰς πάντας ἀδύνατον λέγειν.

⁶ Compare Alcinous, § 8, p. 260.

versal, which is infinite on that account, because it is a magnitude without a limit. For that which is infinite has the limit of magnitude undefined; and hence, when (Matter) is deprived of limit, it can properly be seen¹ as infinite. Nor yet does he concede that it is with a body nor without a body. On that account he thinks it is not a body, because no body is free from some kind of form; nor yet can he say that it is without a body, because nothing, which is without a body, can exhibit a body; but that it seems to be with a body² by the force of reasoning;² and it is therefore to be comprehended³ not by acting alone, nor yet by the opinion alone of thought—⁴ for bodies, through the remarkable evidence of themselves, are known by⁴ similar judgment—⁴ but that those things, which do not possess a bodily substance, are seen by cogitation; from whence, ⁵ opinion being adulterated, the ambiguous quality of this matter is to be comprehended.⁵ [6.] The ἰδέαι, namely, the simple forms of all things, (he says,) are eternal, nor yet with a body; but they exist from such, as God has taken as the patterns of things, which are or will be; and (he says) it is not possible for any thing⁶ to be found beyond the individual images in the patterns of each species; and that of all existing⁷ things the forms and configurations are marked out from the impression of those patterns, in the manner of wax (impressions).

¹ In lieu of "videri," one would have expected rather "vocari," i. e. "to be called." For how a thing that is without limit, can be seen even with the eye of the mind, much less with that of the body, it is hard to understand.

² So I have translated "vi et ratione;" for otherwise there would be nothing to which "vi" could be applied. The Delphin editor indeed explains "vi" by "virtute—" to which he was perhaps led by knowing that ed. Junt. has "ut" instead of "vi—" and fancying that vi ut was an error for "virtute." But we are yet to learn to what is "virtute" to be referred. Moreover, as one MS. offers "secunda" for "sibi eam," it is evident there is some corruption here, which I must leave for others to correct, if they can.

³ Here again I must confess myself quite at a loss.

⁴ That is, says the Delphin editor, by an evident judgment. But "evident judgment" is an union of words perfectly without meaning.

⁵ Here too I confess my inability to understand what Apuleius intended by the words between the numerals.

⁶ I have translated, as if "quid" had dropt out-before "quam—"

⁷ Here "gignentium" is taken in an intransitive sense, as it is in Apuleius de Mundo, n. 736, and Sallust, B. J. § 79, quoted by Ouden-dorp; who would otherwise have read "entium—"

Obstata, which we call "essentia," (existences,) he says are two-fold, through which all things are produced, and even the world itself; one of which is perceived by reflection alone; the other can be subjective to the senses. Now that, which is perceived by the eyes of the mind, is found (to exist) for ever, and in the same manner, and equal and similar to itself, and what truly is. But the other is to be estimated by opinion, affected by a sense and a want of reason, and which he says is produced and perishes. And as the former is said to exist truly, so the latter we may say does not exist truly. And ¹of the first substance or existence is the first God,¹ and Matter, and the Forms of Things, and the living principle; of the second substance are all the things, which receive a form, and are generated, and derive their origin from a pattern of the former substance; (and) which are able to be changed and turned about, gliding away and escaping in the manner of flowing water. Moreover, since that substance of perception, which I have mentioned, rests upon a power that is consistent, the points, that are made the subject of dispute relating to it, are full of firm reasoning and belief; but of the latter, which is the shadow, as it were, and the image of the former, the reasonings and the words, which are used in disputes relating to it, are expressed by a method of teaching which is not consistent.

[7.] The beginning of all bodies he has stated to be Matter; and that it is marked by the impress of Forms; and that from hence have been produced the elements, Fire and Water, Earth and Air; which ought, if they are elements, to be simple,² nor to be united by a mutual connexion, after the manner of syllables;³ what takes place in the case of those (things),³ whose substance is made up by the coming together of powers in many ways; which, when they had been in no order and mixed together, were brought by the deity, who is the builder of the world, into order ⁴by means of numbers and measures in a circuit.⁴ These (he says) were reduced

² This comparison is from Tim. p. 48, B. § 21.

³ Floridus understands "rebus," as the antecedent of "quarum—" but Hildebrand, "formis—" Others read "quorum—".

⁴ Such is the literal and unintelligible version of the text. But from very many elements into one; and that Fire, and Air, and Water, have their origin and beginning in a triangle, which is right-angled but with unequal angles; ¹ but that the Earth is formed of direct angles, triangles, and of equal footsteps; ¹ and that of the former form three kinds exist, the pyramidal, the ² octangular, and twenty-angular; ² but that ³ the sphere and pyramid ⁴ have in themselves the figure of Fire; and that the octangular sphere is dedicated to Air; and the twenty-angular to Water; but that the triangle with equal feet ⁴ forms out of itself a square, and the square ⁵ a cube, which is peculiar to the Earth. ⁵ On which account he gave to Fire the movable form of the pyramid, because ⁶ the quickness of one seemed to be very similar to the rapid movement of the other. ⁶ But of secondary velocity is the octangular sphere. This he assigned to the Air, which in lightness and quickness is the second after Fire. The sphere with twenty angles ⁷ is in the third place, ⁸ of this the rolling form seemed to be rather like that of flowing water. ⁸ There remains the form of dice (a

Plato, in Tim. p. 53, B. § 27, has δυσχηματίζατο εἶδεναι καὶ ἀριθμοῖς—where, however, there is nothing similar to “in ambitum;” nor is there in Alcinoüs, § 13, p. 271, who has, what is far more intelligible, “Matter—moved at first—without order—was subsequently reduced into order by the deity, while all things were fitted together according to a proportion with each other.”

¹ Such is the literal and unintelligible version of the words “terram vero directis quidem angulis trigonis et vestigiis paribus esse—” supplied by MS. Fulv. and Excerpt. Bat. But a right angle is not elsewhere, I believe, called in Latin “directus angulus,” nor does “vestigium” mean “the side” of a triangle. What Apuleius wrote and meant to say it is impossible to discover, even with the aid of Pseudo-Tim. Loc. p. 98, D. § 5.

² Floridus was the first to remark that Apuleius has mistranslated δεδάσπον and εἰκοσιῶπον, found in Pseudo-Tim. Loc. p. 98, D. § 5, by applying to the angles, what the Greek writer said of the sides, of triangles.

⁴ i. e. with equal sides—

⁵ Compare Tim. p. 55, C. § 30.

⁶ Compare Pseudo-Tim. Loc. p. 98, D. § 5.

⁷ So the Delphin editor understands “vigesimalis,” the correction of Elmenhorst, similar to “viginti angulam—” just above.

⁸ So I have translated, as if the words were “hujus forma volubilis cube);¹ which, since it is immovable, has not absurdly obtained by lot the steadiness of the Earth.¹ Other beginnings too (he says)² might be discovered, which are known to God,³ or to him who is a friend of the gods.³ [8.] But of the primary elements, Fire, and Water, and the rest, he asserts⁴ the slight bodies of things with life and without it, consist in the shape of particles; but that the World, taken as a whole, is made up of⁵ the whole of Water, and the whole of Fire, and the whole of Air, and the whole of Earth,⁵ and that not only no portion of these is left without the World, but that its power even is not⁶ found beyond it,⁶ and that these are fitted to and connected with each other within it; and consequently its seat is in Fire, Earth, Water, and Air; and as Fire is united to Air by a (certain) relationship, so Moisture is united⁷ by an affinity to Earth.

Hence (he says) that there is one World, and in it all things; ⁸ nor is there a place left, in which another World fluidæ aquæ similior est visa—"not "hujus forma fluida et volubilis . . ." which I will leave for those to understand, who can.

— Such is the literal version of "quæ cum sit immobilis, terræ constantiam non absurde sortita est—" where the natural train of thought would lead to quite the reverse. For it was the Earth, that was said to have obtained its stability from the form of the cube, not the cube from the form of the Earth. Hence Apuleius probably wrote "quam, cum sit immobilis Terræ substantia, constantem non absurde sortita est—" and hence we can account for what would be otherwise inexplicable, the variation in MSS. between "substantiam" and "constantiam." Unless indeed it be said that he had a confused and imperfect recollection of the passage in Pseudo-Loctr. Tim. p. 98, C. § 5, τὸν κύβον, ἐδραϊώτατον, καὶ σταδαίον παντὶ ὅμα—τοῦτο δὲ βαρύτατον τε καὶ δυσκίνητον ἂ γὰρ.

³ I have adopted "ait, quæ," found in one MS., in lieu of "quæ aut."

² I do not remember where Plato says this, even if he does say so, of which I have great doubts.

⁴ I have translated, as if the author wrote "ait," not "et," which is unintelligible; and I have elicited "ex illa—" furnished by one MS.

— By the aid of this passage may be restored Tim. p. 32, D., ἐκ γὰρ πυρὸς παντὸς ὑδατός τε καὶ ἀέρος καὶ γῆς ξυνίστησι—

— I have adopted, what Floridus suggested, "sed ne vim quidem—" (where "ne" is omitted in MSS.) and confirmed by Tim. p. 32, C., μέρος οὐδὲν οὐδένος οὐδὲ δύναμιν ἔξωθεν ὑπολιπών—

⁷ Colvius was the first to see that the syntax required the indicative "jugatur," instead of the subjunctive "jungatur—" could be;¹ nor are there (other)¹ elements remaining from which there could be formed the body of another World. Moreover, there is attributed to it ²a perpetual youth and a never-injured health;² and further, there is nothing left out of it that can corrupt its ³natural condition;³ and if there remained any thing ⁴(out of the World),⁴ it would not injure it; since it is on every side so put together and arranged, that what is adverse and contrary cannot do an injury to its nature and discipline. On this account then it has been sought by the fabricating God, in behalf of the World, which, ⁵like a beautiful and perfect sphere, is the most perfect and most beautiful, that it should be in want of nothing, and contain all things by shutting in and restraining them,⁵ (and be)⁶ beautiful and wonderful, like to and answering to himself. Now since there are held to be these⁷ seven movements in space, the forward and backward, the right and the left; and of things, that strive (to move)⁸ upwards and downwards; and of those, that are twisted into a spiral⁹ and circuit, this one (way),¹⁰ peculiar to wisdom and prudence, was left for the World, after the six former had been laid aside, that it should revolve according to reason.

And this World, he says, is now with a beginning; but ¹¹otherwise it has an origin,¹¹ and was produced, for there is no beginning or commencement, because it existed always; but that it seems to have been produced, because its¹² substance

¹ I have inserted, what the sense evidently requires; especially as "alia" might easily have been lost before "elementa."

²⁻³ Compare Tim. p. 33, A., ἵνα ἀγήρων καὶ ἀνοσον ᾖ.

³⁻⁴ Such seems to be the meaning of "ingenium," applied to the World.

⁴⁻⁵ The words between the lunes have been added to complete the sense.

⁵⁻⁶ Compare Tim. p. 33, B.—D., § 11.

⁶ I have translated, as if "et" had dropt out before "pulcher," and "sit" after "admirabilis—"

⁷ By the aid of this passage we may supply Tim. p. 34, A. § 11.

⁸ This insertion has been made for the sake of perspicuity.

¹⁰ As there is nothing in the text to which "una" can be referred, I have translated, as if "via" had been lost after "una—"

¹³ I have omitted, with the majority of MSS., "totius" after "rebus."

and nature consist of those things which have obtained, by lot, the quality of being produced. Hence it ¹is tangible, and visible, and comes under the senses of the body.¹ But ²because God has afforded a cause for its being produced, it is on that account about to be for ever of an immortal endurance.²

[9.] But the soul of all living beings (he says) is incorporeal, nor will it perish, when it shall have been released from the body; and that ³it is older than all things produced, and that it therefore has a command over and rules³ those things, of which it has obtained by lot the diligent care;⁴ and that it is ever moved by itself and is the mover of other things, which are by their nature unmoved and sluggish; and he proclaims that the heavenly soul, which is the fountain of all souls and the best and wisest parent of virtues, is subservient to God the maker, and is at hand for all his inventions; but that the substance of this mind is made up of numbers and measures⁵ by means of increase doubled and multiplied, and of increments obtained from themselves and from without;⁶ and hence it happens that the World is moved⁶ according to a system of music, instrumental and vocal.⁶ (He says too) that the Natures of things are two-fold; and that one of them is that, which can be seen by the eyes and touched by the hand, which he calls δοξαστήν, the subject of opinion; and the other is that, which presents itself to the mind, (called) διανοητική, the subject of cogitation and intellect:—for let pardon be granted⁷ to a novelty in words, that minister to the obscurity of things,⁷—and that the former portion is mutable, and easy

²— I confess myself quite unable to understand the cogency of this reasoning. Diogenes, as remarked by the Delphin editor, has produced a more intelligible one in his Life of Plato, § 72, “the world will continue undestroyed, on account of its being not resolved into that which is not—” for so properly read the MS. used by Ambrosius.

³— Compare Tim. p. 34, E. § 12, πρὸς βυτίραν ψυχῇν σώματος ὡς δισπότιν καὶ ἀρξουσιν—

⁴ So I have translated “curam—diligentiamque—”

⁵— What Apuleius meant by the words between the numerals will be perhaps best understood by Batteux’s note at the end of the translation of the Pseudo-Timæus.

⁶— Such is the full meaning of “musicæ—et canore—”

⁷— This excuse was demanded by Apuleius for the use of the words “opinabilem” and “cogitabilem—”

¹for a person beholding it; ¹ but that the latter, which is seen by the eye of mind, and is perceived and conceived by reflection, that penetrates it, is incorruptible, immutable, enduring, and the same for ever. Hence two-fold too, he says, is reasoning and interpretation. For the latter, which is visible, is inferred by a suspicion accidental, and not so ²very enduring; but the former, which is intelligible, is proved to be true by ratiocination perpetual and constant.

[10.] But Time (he says) is ³an image of Eternity; ³ although Time is subject to motion, (while) the nature of Eternity is fixed and motionless; and that Time goes into it, and can be ended and resolved into its magnitude, if at any time God, the maker of the World, shall so determine: (and) that by the spaces of the same Time the measures of the revolution of the World are comprehended; since the globes of the Sun and Moon do this, and the rest of the Stars, which we do not correctly say are ⁴Wandering and Wandering; ⁴ for our opinions and disputations respecting their orbits ⁵may be led from the reality by an error of the understanding; ⁵ whereas the disposer of (all) things has so appointed their ⁶returnings, risings, settings, recessions, delays, and progressions, ⁶ that there is no place left for even a moderate error; since days with nights fill up the space of a month, and months in their turn roll on the circle of a year; nor was it possible for the numeration of time to be

² I have adopted "non ita," elicited by Scioppius from "inita—"

³ Compare Tim. p. 37, D. § 14, αἰώνος—εἰκόνα—ὅν δὴ χρόνον ἀνομάσαμεν: and Alcinous, § 14, p. 274.

⁵ I have translated, as if the text were, not "in errorem intellectum inducere" or "incidere," but "per errorem intellectus induci e re," where "per" might have easily dropt out before "errorem—" Hildebrand has edited, he says from MSS., "in errorem intellectum incidere."

⁶ The words between the numerals are placed in a rather strange order; for the natural flow of ideas would be, "revolutions, risings, settings, returnings, progress, and delays—" entered upon, before those signs began to burn in the starry light; and the keeping of this reckoning would have perished, if this antique¹ chorus had stood still of old. For that the measures and returns of time might be known, and the circuit of the World be seen, the light of the Sun was lit up; and in turn the darkness of night invented, that desired rest might come to living beings; and a month² was made up, when the Moon, after completing the course of her circle, returned to the same spot from which she had departed; whereas the space of a year is completed, when the Sun shall have reached the four changes of the seasons, and be carried (back)³ to the same sign. The enumeration of those, ⁴that return into themselves, and of those, that depart from themselves,⁴ he discovered ⁵by the contemplation of the understanding;⁵ and (he says) that there are nevertheless ⁶determinate revolutions of the stars, preserved for ever in their legitimate courses, which the skill of man can with difficulty comprehend.⁶ From whence it happens, that the so-called Great Year is known very easily; the time of which will be filled up, when the company of the wandering stars shall arrive at the same end, and recover for itself a new commencement, and a journey through the roads of the World.

[11.] But of the celestial orbs, united to each other by mutual changes, the highest of all is that, ⁷which is reckoned as the ¹ Lipsius, unable, as I am, to understand "antiquus," suggested "astricus—" for he probably remembered the words of Varro, quoted by Nonius vi. 16, "Cœli choreas astricas—" similar to ἀστρων αἰθίροις χοροί in Eurip. El. 467.

² I have adopted "mensem," in lieu of "menses," as suggested by Wower; who aptly refers to Tim. p. 39, C. § 14, and to Alcinous, § 14. For the question is about each month, taken individually, not about many months.

³ I have translated, as if the text were, not "fuerit invecus," but "fuerit retrorsum vecus."

⁴ As the act of departure must precede that of return, one would have expected to find the two members of this period inverted.

⁵ I have translated, as if the text were, not "intellectu cogitationis," but "intellectus cogitatione," similar to "cogitatione animi" in the interpretation of the Delphin editor.

⁶ Compare Tim. p. 39, C. § 14.

⁷ I have translated, as if the text were "qui inerrabilem meatus censetur; cujus—" not "qui inerrabili meatu censetur; ejus—" for it was not the "meatus," which was "inerrabilis," but the stars, that were placed there.

path of the non-wandering (stars), by whose¹ embrace the rest are restrained; and that to the non-wandering the first place was assigned; the second to Saturn; the third to Jupiter; that Mars holds the fourth; that the fifth is assigned to Mercury; that the sixth belongs to Venus; and that the seventh is burnt up by the passage of the Sun; (and) that the Moon measures the eighth.

Hence (he says that) all things are occupied by elements and principles; that Fire is above all; and next is the place of Air; that next is that of Water; and next that the orb of Earth, situated in the middle, ¹stands equal in place,¹ and immovable in figure. He says too that these fires, fixed to the spheres of the stars, glide on in their courses perpetual and untired, and that they are living gods; but that the nature of the Spheres is nourished by, and made out of, Fire.

Moreover, the races of living beings are divided into four species; one of which is of the nature of Fire of such a kind, as we see the Sun and Moon to be, and the rest ²of the stars in the constellations;² another is of the quality of Air; and this he says is that of Dæmons; the third is a coalescence of Water and Earth; and that ³the mortal race of bodies³ (is) from this, (and) divided into the terrene and terrestrial—for so he considered the *χοῖκα*⁴ should be called—

²—² Such, I presume, is the meaning of "siderum stellas—" for such a combination of words is not, I suspect, to be met with elsewhere.

⁴ Since the word χοῖκα, applied to "mud," is not found except in the Alexandrine Greek of the Septuagint and New Testament, it is evident and that terrene belongs to trees and other productions, which drag out an existence, while they are fixed to the ground; but terrestrial to things, which the earth feeds and sustains.

Of gods he enumerates three kinds; of which the first is that one and alone the highest, who is beyond the World, and incorporeal; whom we have shown above to be the father and architect of this divine World; another is such as the stars possess, and the rest of the deities, whom we call the heaven-inhabiting; the third embraces¹ those, whom the old Romans² called "Medioxumi," because they are, with relation to themselves and place and power, inferior to the highest gods, but naturally superior to man.

[12.] But all things which are carried on naturally, and on that account correctly, are governed by the guardianship of Providence: ³nor can the cause of any evil be ascribed to God; ³on which account ⁴(Plato) conceives that not all things are to be referred to the lot of Fate.⁴ For he gives this definition, that Providence is a divine determination, the conservator of the prosperity of that, for the sake of which it has undertaken such an office; (and) that Fate is a divine law, by which the inevitable designs of, and the acts commenced by, the deity are fulfilled. And hence, if any thing is done by Providence, it is done likewise by Fate; and that, which is finished by Fate, should seem to have been commenced⁵ by Providence. Now the first Providence is that of the highest (power) and the most above all the gods; who has ordained not only the deities, that dwell in heaven, whom he has dispersed to be ⁶a guard and glory⁶ through all that Apuleius obtained his knowledge of the doctrines of Plato from some follower of that sect at Alexandria, who had himself only a slight acquaintance with the tenets of the Athenian. This inference, however, Hildebrand would not admit, as he rejects χοιρά, and would read "πρίζον et ἐνυδρον—"

¹ I have translated, as if the word were "habet," not "habent," which has nothing to which it can be referred.

² By these Apuleius probably meant Plautus; who has in Cistellar. ii. 1, "At ita me Dii, Deoque, Superi atque Inferi et Medioxumi."

³ Compare Plato Rep. ii. p. 379, C., τῶν κακῶν ἀλλ' ἄττα δὲ ζῆτεῖν τὰ αἰρία, ἀλλ' οὐ τὸν θεόν.

⁴ I do not remember where Plato has so expressed himself; nor where he has given the definitions alluded to.

⁵ I have translated, as if the word were, not "susceptum," but "inceptum," required by the very balance of the sentence.

the members of the World, but has given birth, ¹for ages upon ages, ¹to the deities naturally mortal; ²who are superior in wisdom to the rest of beings that live upon earth; and, after laying down laws, he delivered over to the other deities the disposition and guardianship of the other matters, which were necessary to be done daily. From whence so strenuously did the deities of the second providence keep their hold of the providence undertaken by them, that all things, ³which are shown to mortals from heaven, ³preserve the state of the father's arrangement unchanged. But the Dæmons, whom we might call Genii and Lares, (Plato) decides are the servants of the gods, and the protectors of man, and their interpreters, ⁴should they wish for any thing from the gods. Nor does he think that all things are to be referred to the force of Fate; but that there is something in ourselves, and something too in Fortune. He confesses, however, that the unforeseen ⁵accidents of Fortune are not known to us; for that something unsteady and running against us is wont to come between the affairs, which may have been undertaken with design and meditation, so that it does not permit, what has been thought upon, to come to an end. And when that impediment arrives advantageously, the circumstance is called Good Fortune; but Misfortune, when those hinderances are of a noxious kind.

[13.] Of all earthly things, nothing more excellent has Providence given than Man. Well therefore does the same (Plato) proclaim that ⁶the Soul is the mistress of the body. ⁶But since he asserts ⁷that the parts of the Soul are three, ⁷the reasoning power, which is the best portion of the mind, he

¹ Such is perhaps the best translation of "ad ævitatē temporis—" similar to the Ecclesiastical formula "per secula seculorum."

² That some of the deities were begotten, or supposed to be so, is stated in Tim. p. 40, D. § 15. But I do not remember where they are said to be mortal.

³ Oudendorp proposed to elicit from "quæ cœlestibus mortalibus exhibeantur," the reading in two MSS., "quæ cœlestes mortalibus exhibant—" for "cœlitus," he says, is not found in Apuleius nor in preceding authors; only in succeeding, as Lactantius, Prudentius, and Ammianus.

⁴ See the Banquet, p. 202, D. § 28.

⁵ I have translated, as if the word were "improvisos," not "improvidos—" ⁶ In Tim. p. 34, C.

says has possession of ¹the citadel of the head;¹ but that the feeling of anger, which is distant from the reasoning power, is carried down to the domicile of the heart, and follows it, and ²in place answers to wisdom;² and that lust and desire, the lowest portion of the mind, occupy the lowest seats of the belly, as if they were certain stews and hiding-places of jakes, the resorts of iniquity and luxury; and that this portion seems to have been removed at a greater distance from wisdom, lest, by an unseasonable vicinity, reason might, while consulting³ for the safety of all, be disturbed in the usefulness of its reflections. (He says too) that the whole of man is in the head and face; for prudence and all the senses are contained in no other⁴ part of the body but that; since the rest of the members act as handmaidens ⁵[and are subservient]⁵ to the head, (and) minister food and other things; while the crown (of the head) is placed on high, ⁶as a lord and ruler, and by its providence to be delivered from dangers.⁶ Moreover, that the organs, with which the senses are furnished for perceiving and judging of quantities and qualities, are placed in like

¹ On this expression, see Davies on Cicero, N. D. ii. 56, "in capite, tanquam in arce—"

² Such is the literal and unintelligible version of "in loco respondere sapientiæ;" which Oudendorp attempts to defend and explain by asserting that by "in loco" is meant, where the subject and place require; forgetting that, if anger is "procul a ratione," it will not be in a situation "respondere sapientiæ." Hence I suspect that Apuleius wrote "et illico respondere insipientiæ," i. e. "and straightway answers to a want of wisdom." Hildebrand says that "in loco" is the same as "illico," and refers to Hand on Tursellin. Particul. T. iii. p. 207.

⁴ I have, with Oudendorp, adopted "alia," as suggested by Colvius, in lieu of "alias," which means "otherwise," not "in another place."

⁵ Of the words "et subservire," the latter is evidently an interpretation of "ancillari," while the former should follow "capiti."

manner near the palace of the head, within the view of reason, in order that the truth, of understanding (by the mind) and perceiving (by the body), may be assisted.

[14.] But the senses themselves, being fitly formed by nature, have a cognate intelligence as regards those things, which are the objects of sense.

In the first place, the twin pupils of the eyes are very clear, and, shining with a certain light of vision, they possess the office of knowing light; while hearing, by partaking of the nature of air, has a perception of sounds, through messengers in the air; whereas the taste, being a sense more relaxed, is on that account suited to things rather moist and watery; but the touch, as being of the earth and corporeal, perceives things, that are rather solid, and which can be handled and struck against. Of those things likewise, which are changed, when corrupted ¹there is a separate perception.¹ For in the middle of the region of the face Nature has placed the nostrils, by ²the double door-way² of which there passes an odour together with the breath; and that conversions and changes furnish the causes of smelling; and that they³ are perceived from substances, when corrupted or burnt, or in a mucous⁴ or moistened state; ⁵when those substances are sought out, they are exhaled in vapour and smoke, the judgment and sense of a smell come upon them.⁵ For if the substances are ¹—¹ So Oudendorp from MSS. in lieu of "separanda vis intelligenda." But he does not show how "vis" could have crept in here, nor how "intelligentia" could be applied to a bodily, not mental, perception. The disorder probably lies somewhat deeper.

²—² In lieu of "symphonia" in some MSS., Vulcanius was the first to edit from others "bifori via—" a variation for which it would be difficult to account, except on the supposition that "symphonia" conceals some Greek word written in Latin letters, which Fulvius Ursinus and others conceive to have been "syphonibus—" referring to τοὺς ὀχετοὺς τῆς πύλης in Tim. p. 78, C.

³ As there is nothing to which "eas" can be referred, it is probable that Apuleius wrote "odoratus causas esse, odoresque—" not "odoratus causas dare, easque—"

⁴ So Colvius, by reading "mucescentibus" instead of "mitescenscentibus," which the Delphin editor says might allude to ripe fruit; while Scaliger suggested "putrescentibus," answering to σπυρμιένων in Tim. p. 66, D.

⁵—⁵ Such is the literal and unintelligible version of the text, "cum quidem ea quæruntur, vapore vel fumo exhalantur, odoris in his iudicium sensusque succedunt—" from which one might perhaps elicit "cum quidem, quas pereunt, putrem vapore vel fumo exhalante per aera odorem, sound and the air pure, ¹ they never vitiate the gales of that kind.¹

Now these very senses are common to us and the rest of animals. But by the divine blessing the skill of man in that way is better furnished and more advanced, since his hearing and sight are superior. For he measures with his eyes the heavens and the orbits of the stars, and the settings and risings of the constellations, and he understands their distances, together with ² the signs they give; ² from which has flowed ³ the most beautiful and plentiful fountain of philosophy.³ And what could happen to man more magnificent than the sense of hearing? by which he learns simultaneously prudence and wisdom, and measures and makes the numbers and modes of speech and melody, and becomes himself entirely attuned and musical. To this has been added the tongue, and the outwork of the teeth and the beauty of a little mouth, which has been furnished to other animals indeed for supplying the necessities of living, and bringing to the belly its resources; but to man this has been given as the storehouse of right reasoning and of sweetest discourse, in order that, what forethought has conceived in the heart, speech might bring forward to be understood.

nasi iis iudicium sensusque succedunt," i. e. "when the judgment and perception of the nose comes upon those substances, which are perishing, while vapour or smoke is exhaling the smell of rottenness through the air." Hildebrand has "cum quidem ea genuntur, vapore vel fumo exhalante; odori in his iudicium sensusque succedunt—" conceiving that "genuntur" might be written for "gignuntur;" and "exhalante" taken intransitively, as "vestes exhalant" in Statius, Theb. x. 108.

¹ Such is the literal and unintelligible meaning of "nunquam ejusmodi auras inficiunt—" But as nothing has been said of gales of any kind, it is evident there is some error here, which may be corrected by reading "nunquam ejusmodi odores nares afficiunt," i. e. "never do smells of this kind affect the nostrils." Opportunely then do some MSS. read "aures—"

² Such seems to be the meaning of "significatibus—" in which word there is an allusion to the signs of the seasons and of the weather given by different constellations at their rising and setting.

³ By this Apuleius probably meant Astronomy; which is called "holy" in Pseudo-Tim. Locr. p. 96, E. § 4. Compare likewise Tim. p. 47, B. ἡ ὡν ἱπορισάμεθα φιλοσοφίας γίνος (read γάνος, similar to "fons" in Apuleius) Ὁ μῆλλον ἀγαθὸν [οὐτ'] ἤλθεν οὐδ' ἤξει ποτε [τῷ] θνητῷ γίνε δωρηθὲν ἐκ θεῶν, λίγω [δὲ] Τοῦτ' ὁμμάτων μίγματος ἀγαθόν—where, by omitting the words placed between brackets, we can recover a dramatic fragment, spoken either by Teiresias, or Phineus, or Œdipus.

[15.] Moreover the bearing of the whole body and the form of the limbs are under one condition the best, (but) under another, worse. The inferior are ruled by the superiority of the chiefs, and they perform the ministering suited for living. 'Finally, the feet as far as the shoulders obey the head.' But the hedge of the eyebrows² protects the eyes, lest any thing should rush down from above, to disturb vision, which is tender and soft.

The Lungs by their place and affinity look very much to the welfare of the heart; (for) when it burns with anger and is palpitating³ with rather quick movements, the top of the heart itself, wet with blood, is received by the softness and thirst⁴ and cold of the lungs.

But the Spleen is near, and not vainly so, to the Liver, that it may relieve its redundancy, by sharing in its absorptions,⁵ and by cleansing what is filthy render the liver pure and clear;⁶ which is very advantageous to its fibres.

(He says too) that the belly is furnished with the folds of the intestines; but that there is an impediment by ligatures, so that what is eaten and drank may not pass through⁶ the place of sitting quickly,⁶ but, by being retained for a little

¹— Such is the literal and unintelligible version of "Pedes denique humerorum tenuis capiti obediunt—" by which the Delphin editor understands "Denique a pedibus usque ad humeros omnia membra parent capiti—" He therefore fancied perhaps that "et omnia membra" had dropt out after "denique—"

² One would have expected rather "palpebrarum—" for it is the eyelashes, not eyebrows, that protect the eyes; Plato has therefore correctly in Tim. p. 45, D., σωτηρίαν—της ὀφθαλμοῦ ἀμνηστῆσαντο τὴν τῶν βλέφαρων φύσιν.

³ I have adopted "trepidat," suggested by Lipsius, in lieu of "trepidans—"

⁴ I confess I do not understand what is meant by "siti—" The Delphin editor explains it by "siccitate—" But such is not the meaning of "sitia." Wower refers the thirst of the lungs to their porosity. But what connexion there is between these two ideas, I must leave for others to discover. By comparing however Tim. p. 70, C., where the lungs are said to be bloodless and porous and refrigerating, I suspect something has been lost here, of which "situ" in one MS., and "siti" in others, is the remnant.

⁵ Compare Tim. p. 72, C.

⁶ I have translated, as if the words were, not "sese penetrarent," which I cannot understand, but "sessum penetrarent—" remembering the expression in Tim. p. 73, A., τὴν—κοιλίαν ἐποδοχὴν ἰδεῖσαν, εἰλεῖαν τε περίε τὴν τῶν ἐντρίων γίνεσιν, ὥπως μὴ ταχὺ διεκπερῶσα ἢ τροφή πάλιν τροφῆς ἱταρὰς δεῖσθαι τὸ σῶμα ἱπαναγκάζοι.

time, they may show their utility to animals by their approach; and that the necessity of desiring food may not be impending at every moment through those things being exhausted and passing off, which had been introduced; and that there may not be a need for us to be occupied night and day for this purpose alone.

[16.] (Moreover) the bones are covered with flesh,¹ and the same are bound to nerves; yet nevertheless the members, which are the intermediate messengers of feeling, are hidden by flesh,³ in order that the sensations may not be blunted by the thickness (of the flesh).³ Those, too, that are connected by joinings and couplings for a rapidity in moving⁴ themselves easily, are not impeded by much flesh.⁵

Lastly, look at the top of the head itself, and you will see it covered with a thin skin, and shaggy with hair, (a protection) against the violence of cold and heat. But those parts are plump, ⁶which labour wears down, as, for instance, the buttocks themselves, where is the region of sitting.⁶

What shall I say of the food? ⁷which the roads, that emanate from the womb,⁷ and are joined to the fibres of the liver, disperse, after being turned into the form of blood, so that Nature may skilfully cause it to ⁸flow, like a river,⁸ from that place through all the joints.

But from the region of the heart the meanderings of the veins take their rise, transferring through the coils of the lungs the liveliness, which they had received from the heart;

^{1, 2, 3} Although "entrails" is elsewhere the meaning of "viscera," yet in all the three passages the Delphin editor, led by what the sense requires, explains the word by "carnibus—" whom I have followed.

³ The words between the lunes are added for the sake of perspicuity.

⁴ Hildebrand has "ad celeritatem, facilius se movendo—" and takes "movendo" as a dative "for moving—"

⁵ Such is the literal and unintelligible version of the words "quas labor subigit, ut femina ipsa, qua sessitandi regio est—" which it is evident Apuleius could not have written; for the parts, which labour wears down, would not be those, which, while a person is sitting, are worn down the least. What, however, he did write, might be recovered without much difficulty; but the subject must be passed by, "ne quid habeat injucunditatis oratio," as Cicero says on a similar occasion, in N. D. ii. 15.

⁷ Here again a literal version plainly proves the existence of some error in the text.

⁸ I have translated, as if the text were "fluere, rivi instar," not "derivari—" and being again distributed from that place through ¹the whole limbs they assist the whole man¹ by his breathing. From hence the alternations in breathing are drawn and given back in turn, in order that they may not be impeded by their mutual meetings.

The qualities (too) of the veins are various, which it is well known flow for the purpose of procreation from the region of the neck through the marrow of the loins, and are received into the place of the male organ; and again, that ²Venus excites the productive receptacle of seed, so that his power departs from a man.³

[17.] But when he says that the substances of the whole body are various, he means that the first seem to consist of fire and water, and the other elements; the second, of similar particles of the intestines,³ small bones, blood, and the rest (of substances); the third, of members discordant and various, that is, of head, belly, and unequal joints. From whence the substance, which consists of simple elements,⁴ if that, which by the necessity of living is asked for, in what manner it agrees even with the genus of each,⁴ guards the quality and temperature of the body; and increases the strength for those particles, which (consist of) the like, and of those, which we have said above are unlike to each other, it nourishes the beauty; and at the same time that equality of dry, moist, hot, and cold, gives health, strength, and form; just as an intemperate and immoderate permixture, while particles are individually and universally corrupted, destroys a living being with a rapid dissolution.

[18.] The same (philosopher) says that the soul is tripartite; (for) that one part is rational, another hot (with anger) or irritable, the third we may call a longing, and (give to) the

¹—¹ I have translated, as if the text were “per membra tota omnem hominem juvant—” not “per membra totum hominem juvant—”

²—³ The present text is “russum venarum genitale seminium humanitatis excire—” which nobody has been able to understand. I have translated, as if it were originally “russum Venerem genitale seminium, homine ut abest vis, excire—” where “excire” is due to Colvius. Hildebrand conceives the error to lie in “russum,” for which he would read “cursu—”

³ Here, as before, the Delphin editor interprets “viscerum” by “car-nium—”

⁴—⁴ Such is the literal version of words, which I confess I cannot understand.

same (feeling the name of) lustfulness; but that healthiness, and strength, and beauty, are then present to a being with soul, when reason rules it wholly, and passion and pleasure, two inferior parts, are obedient to reason, and, agreeing amongst themselves, long for nothing and make no stir, that reason deems to be useless. Now when the parts of the soul are regulated to an equability of that kind, the body is broken down by no disturbance; otherwise it introduces a sickness, and unhealthiness, and foulness, when the parts are, with respect to each other, not well put together and unequal, as when desire subdues anger and good counsel, and brings them into subjection with itself; or when anger, more hot than usual, overcomes reason, the mistress and queen, while desire is obsequious and appeased. But 'the sickness of the mind, he says, is a folly, and he divides it into two parts. One of these he calls unskilfulness; the other, madness;¹ and (he says) that the disease of unskilfulness takes place from a vain-glorious boasting, when a person falsely lays claim to the learning and knowledge of those things, of which he is ignorant; but that madness is wont to arise from very depraved habits and a lustful life; and that this madness, which a vicious quality of body produces, is called so, when those things, which are prepared by reason in the top (of the head), become contracted by inopportune straits; but that a ²man is then perfect when soul and body are united together,² and agree with, and respond to, each other, so that the firmness of mind be not inferior to the very strong powers of the body. The body however is increased then by natural increments when the portion of good health, being attended to ³with skilful art,³ knows not to exceed the measure of necessary living; and when health is not worn down by the greatness of external labours, nor by the weight of food introduced too immoderately, or not digested and distributed through the body as it should be. For then the joints and limbs retain the measure and force of due vigour, when that, which is introduced for the preservation of the whole body, is distributed to all the parts, as it were in equal proportions for each; but when that takes place in the least degree, then ensues the destruction of the body.

BOOK II

ON MORAL PHILOSOPHY.

[1.] THE head¹ of Moral Philosophy is, son² Faustinus, that you may know, by what means it is possible to arrive at a happy life. But previous to the other matters, which³ are known to appertain³ to happiness, which is the end⁴ of good things, I will show what Plato thinks upon this point.

Of good things then he thought that some were pre-eminently so, and in themselves the first; but the rest he conceived were good through a participation.⁵ The first good things are God, the highest, and that mind, which he calls Noûς; secondly, the things, which flow from the fountain of the first,⁶ are the virtues of the mind, (namely,) Prudence, Justice, Modesty,⁷ (and) Fortitude, but that amongst all these Prudence is the superior; but as the second in number and power he laid down Continence; to these succeeds Justice; (while) Fortitude is the fourth.

¹ I have written "head" in the sense in which Shakspeare uses that word in Othello, "The very head and front of my offending."

² It has been thought that Faustinus was not a son, but a disciple of Apuleius.

^{3, 4} I have translated, as if, instead of "contingent," found in one MS., the reading were originally "contingere nota—" similar to "notum properare" in Horace, according to the correction of Bentley; while (⁴) in lieu of "fine," I have adopted "finem," the emendation of Boescha, who understood by that word what Cicero does in his treatise "De Finibus Bonorum et Malorum." Hildebrand, unable to find a better reading, retains the one in MS. Flor., "bonorum finem contingere—"

⁵ In lieu of "per perceptionem," in one MS., and per receptionem" in another, I have translated, as if the text were "per participationem," which it is strange that Floridus did not suggest, who aptly refers to the expression κατὰ μίθεσιν in Alcinous, § 27.

⁶ Instead of "priorum," one would have expected "primorum," as understood by the Delphin editor.

⁷ What Apuleius call here "Pudicitiam," and just afterwards "Continentiam," is in Greek σωφροσύνη, commonly rendered "Temperance;" and the four are called the Cardinal Virtues. With regard to the order of the words, Oudendorp observes that "Pudicitiam" should precede "Justitiam," as shown by the following enumeration. But Plato, in Legg. l. p. 630, B. § 5, has δικαιοσύνη και σωφροσύνη και φρόνησις.

In good things likewise he made this distinction;¹ that some are of God² and in themselves the first,³ and are called simple goods; others are of man; nor are the same good things thought to be so by all; on which account the virtues of the mind are of God and simple; but those of man, which are goods in the opinion of some, are such as agree with the conveniences of the body, and are what we call external; which to the wise³ and those, who live rationally and moderately, are really good, but must needs be evils to the unwise and to those who are ignorant of their use.

[2.] The first good is the true, and divine, and best, and worthy to be loved and desired; and for the beauty of which the minds, that are under the influence of reason, have a longing, under the guidance of Nature, and are by the same power lit up to an ardent love for it. But as not all are able to obtain it, nor can possess the faculty of acquiring the first good, they are carried on to that, which is of man. The second good is not common to many, nor is it in a similar manner a good to all. For the longing after, and the desire to do any thing is excited either by a true good, or by what seems to be a good; from whence under the guidance of Nature there is a certain affinity between good things and that portion of the soul, which agrees with reason. But he considers that to be a good by accident, which is united to the body and to things that come from without, and that he, who is imbued by Nature to follow what is good, thinks he has been 'born not only for himself,'⁴ but for all men likewise; and that each one has been conceived⁵ not 'in an equal or similar manner,'⁶ but for the state; and next for those nearest to him; and then for the rest, who are united to him by familiarity or acquaintance.

[3.] That a man is (he says too) born, neither absolutely good

¹ In the Laws, i. p. 631, B. § 6.

²⁻³ I have translated, as if the text were not "per se et prima," but "et per se prima," similar to "prima per se" a little before.

³ Compare the Laws, ii. p. 662, B. § 7.

⁴⁻⁶ So the editors have adopted Casaubon's "sibimet ipsi natum," elicited from "sibimet intinatum," and supported by Plato, Epist. 9, p. 358, A., and Cicero.

⁵ Wower reads "conceptum" in lieu of "acceptum," from which, however, Hildebrand would elicit "assertum," and "civitati" from "etiam," not, as Oudendorp suggested, "communi—" from his stock, nor bad, but that his disposition inclines to both; that he has indeed some seeds of both, which are united to the origin of his birth, but which, by the discipline of education, ought to burst out into another¹ part; and that the instructors of boys ought to have no greater care than to thoroughly imbue them with morals and instructions, so that they may wish to become lovers of virtues, and learn to rule and be ruled by Justice as their mistress. On which account the boys ought to be brought to this point,² beside all the rest, that they may know that the things which are to be followed and avoided, are honourable and dishonourable; that to the former belong³ pleasure and praise; to the latter disgrace and baseness;⁴ (and) that we ought with confidence to wish for the honourable things which are good.

⁶⁻⁶ I confess I hardly understand the words between the numerals.

Of dispositions three kinds are classed by him; of which he calls one the superior and pre-eminent; another, the most foul and the worst; the third, which is tempered moderately from both, he calls a mean. In this mean he desires to be partakers the docile boy and the man, who is making a progress to moderation, and who is 'mild in his manner' and elegant; since he asserted that a mean of the same kind, (called) a third something, occurs in the case of virtues and vices; through which some acts are to be praised and others blamed. ⁵(Thus) between knowledge, (of one kind) firm, of another false, there is an obstinacy (of mind) united to a vanity;⁵

¹ Here again I am at a loss about the meaning of "alteram—" The train of thought requires rather "melioratam," or "præstantiorem—"

² I have translated, as if the text were "præter cætera—ad hoc—" not "hoc," which I cannot understand. Hildebrand too has "ad hoc—" between ¹a chaste and a lustful life he interposed abstinence and intemperance; ¹(and) has made ²shame and sluggishness² as the means between fortitude and fear. Since of those persons, whom he wished to appear moderate, neither the virtues were sincere, nor the vices sheer and untempered, but mixed up on this side and on that.

³ Such is the literal version of the text of Oudendorp. But the balance of the sentences evidently requires not "illa voluptatis ac laudis, hæc vero dedecoris ac turpitudinis," but something like "illa vere voluptatis ac laudis; hæc dedecoris ac ægritudinis;" for thus "vere voluptatis" would be balanced by "ægritudinis—" and "the pleasure" arising from honourable acts be properly called "true," as being mentally opposed to the not-true pleasure of acts not honourable. Hildebrand conceives the whole passage to be so corrupt, as to defy correction, except by the aid of better MSS.

⁴ I have adopted "comem modo," which Colvius elicited from "commodum—"

[4.] But the wickedness of a person stained with all vices he said was the worst; which, he asserted, took place, when that portion, which is the best and reasonable, and ought to rule the rest, was the slave of others; (and) when those leaders into vices, namely, anger and lust, are the lords, while reason is sent under the yoke. From things likewise quite different, (such as) abundance and want,³ is wickedness made up. Nor by the fault of an inequality alone does he consider that wickedness goes halting, but that ⁴it falls upon a dissimilitude;⁴ for it could not agree with goodness, since it differs in so many ways from itself; and carries before it not an inequality, but an incongruity. On which account he says that the three portions of the soul are pressed by three vices. (Thus) against prudence fights indocility, which not only introduces the destruction of science, but is adverse to the discipline of learning. Of this indocility we vanity. I have therefore translated, as if Apuleius had written "Ita inter scientiam validam alteram, alteram falsam, pervicaciam esse vanitatem junctam mentis; inter—" For thus one "alteram" might have been easily lost before another; and "junctam mentis inter" corrupted into "jactatam inter—" Hildebrand, objecting to "validam," would read "ruditum" in the sense of "ruditatem;" and conceives that "alteram" is a corruption of some word, that had the meaning of "collocavit—"

²— Here again two terms could not be interposed, as the means between two extremes. Besides, as "pudorem" and "pudicitiam" just before are nearly synonymous, the former word could scarcely be found here united to "ignaviam." Hence Apuleius probably wrote "mediam ignaviam fecit."

³ Compare Rep. iv. p. 422, A. § 2.

⁴— In these words, says Oudendorp, "Latet quid." I confess I do not understand them; nor could Hildebrand, who calls them "obscura."

have received from him two kinds, (one)¹ unskilfulness and stupidity—of which it is found that unskilfulness is a foe to wisdom, (but) stupidity to prudence; (another)² anger³ (and) boldness.³ ⁴Its companionship indignation follows,⁴ and unmovableness, called in Greek ⁵*ἀπορροία τοῦ ῥις*,⁵ for so I would say, which not only extinguishes the excitements of anger, but fixes them down by a stupor not to be moved. To the feelings of desire he applies luxuriousness, that is, a longing after pleasures, and insatiable draughts of things desired,⁶ ⁷for enjoyment and possession.⁷ From this luxuriousness there flows avarice and wantonness; of which the former puts a restraint upon liberality; the latter,⁸ by living too immoderately, squanders the means of a patrimony.⁸

[5.] But of a mind the best,⁹ says Plato, virtue is the bearing, that presents a noble figure; and which makes the person, on whom it is faithfully impressed, to be in accordance with himself, and tranquil and consistent, not in words alone, but in deeds likewise, agreeing with himself and the rest (of mankind). And this is the more likely, should Reason, seated on

¹ I have translated, as if "unam" had dropt out before "imperitiam," and (²) "alteram" between "inimicis" and "iracundiam."

³ I have adopted "audaciam" found in some MSS., and inserted "et—" for thus "iracundia et audacia" would properly form the second kind, just as "imperitia" and "fatuitas" form the first.

⁶ I have translated, as if the text were "desideratorium," not "desideriorum—"

⁷ One would have expected "ad potiendum fruendumque," as translated, rather than "ad fruendum potiendumque—" at least, if "potiendum" means "possession," as it must mean, to prevent an otherwise needless tautology.

⁸ The text at present is "fundendo patrimonia prodigit facultates." I have adopted "vivendo," suggested by Colvius, and "patrimonii," found in one MS.

⁹ I have adopted "optime" from some MSS., and rejected "et" after "optime" with a solitary one.

the throne of its kingdom, hold the appetites and passions ever in subjection and under the rein; and they¹ so obey it, as to do their ministering tranquilly. (He says), however, that virtue is of one form, because that, which is good by its own nature, has no need of assistance; but, that it may be perfect, it ought to be content with solitude. ²Nor is quality alone united to the natural disposition of virtue, but similitude likewise;³ for so does it agree with itself on every side, that it is fitted from itself and answers to itself. Hence he speaks of virtues as means, and the same too as extremes, not only because (the former)³ are from redundancy and want, but because they are placed in the middle-ground of virtues. For example, Fortitude is surrounded on this side by Boldness, on that by Timidity. Now Boldness comes from the abundance of confidence, but Fear from the fault of a deficient Boldness. * * *

[6.] Of Virtues, some are perfect, others imperfect. Now those are imperfect, which by the kindness of Nature alone come forth in all, or are furnished by discipline alone, or are taught by Reason, as a mistress. Those therefore, that are made up of all,⁴ we say are perfect. He denies, (however,) ⁵that imperfect virtues accompany themselves;⁵ but those, which are perfect, he conceives on that account especially to be inseparable and united to each other, because for the person, who has an uncommon natural disposition, if there be added industry, practice, and the discipline which Reason, the ruler of affairs, has laid down, there will be left nothing, that virtue cannot furnish.

¹ I have translated, as if the text were "ipsique ea ita obediunt—" not "ipsique ita obediunt—" for thus "ea," that is to be referred to "appetitus et iracundia," would be the subject to "obediunt—" which is at present without one.

² The words between the numerals I confess I do not understand.

³ I have introduced this expression for the sake of perspicuity. But there is still something wanting to show how the means of virtues are the same as extremes. And hence I have marked a supposed omission by asterisks.

⁵ Here too I am at a loss to understand how imperfect virtues can be said to accompany, or not, themselves.

He divides all the virtues amongst the parts of the soul; and he calls that virtue, which relies upon Reason, and is the spectator and judge of all matters, Prudence, and Wisdom; of which he wishes for Wisdom to appear as the instruction of things divine and human; but Prudence as the knowledge of understanding good and evil things, and those which are between the two. In that part then, which is considered as given rather to anger, is the seat of Fortitude and the strength of the soul, and the nerves, required for fulfilling those things, which are imposed upon us rather hardly by the rule of laws to be done. The third part of the mind belongs to desires and regrets; of which Abstinence is necessarily the companion; whom he wishes to be the preserver of an agreement in those things, that are naturally right and wrong in man. ¹By this is lustfulness turned to mildness and moderation; ¹ and by the method and modesty of this, voluptuary doings, he says, are restrained.

[7.] Through these three parts of the soul (he places)² a fourth Virtue, namely, Justice, as dividing itself equally; and the cause of it, he says, is knowledge, in order that each ³portion may be obedient both³ to reason and moderation in performing its duty. This the demi-god⁴ at one time calls Justice; at another he includes it in the appellation of virtue in general, and addresses it likewise by the name of Faithfulness;⁵ ⁶but when it is useful to the person, by whom it is possessed, it is benevolence;⁶ but when it looks abroad, and is the trustworthy spectator of utility to another, it has the name of Justice. There is too that Justice, which obtains the fourth place in the ordinary division of virtues,

² I have translated, as if “sistit” had dropt out between “se” and “scientiam—”

³—³ From “potiore” in MSS. I have elicited “portio et—”

⁴ So I have translated “heros;” for such the “hero” of antiquity was deemed to be.

⁵ Apuleius alludes to the Laws, i. p. 630, D. § 5, as remarked by Boeckh. Compare likewise Rep. i. p. 331, D., where Justice is defined to be the saying what is true, and the restoring what a person has received; which is Faithfulness.

⁶—⁶ The words between the numerals I confess I cannot understand.

which is coupled with Religiousness, that is, (in Greek,) δαιοτης; of which (the latter), Religiousness, is a slave devoted to the honour of the gods, and to the supplications in a divine rite; while the former (Justice) is the remedy and medicine¹ of human society and concord.¹ Now for two equal reasons Justice rules over human utility; of which the first is the observance of equality² in numbers and divisions, and in those matters, which have been bargained for³ according to a contract;³ add to this, that it is the guardian of weights and measures, and of the common distribution⁴ of public property; the second (reason) is that⁵ relating to boundaries,⁵ and is a sharing, proceeding from equity, so that a becoming ownership in lands may be assigned to each person, and the better (portion)⁶ be preserved for the good, but the worse for the bad. Add to this, let every one, who is by nature and industry the best, be preferred for honours and offices; (but) let the worst be in want of the light⁷ of dignity. Now in assigning and preserving honour that is the just measure on the part of him, who is the aider of the good, and the overthrower of the bad, that those things may ever be pre-eminent in the state, which are about to be of service to all; (but) that vices, together with their authors, may lie low and be trodden down; [8.] which result will be the more

¹ As a remedy and medicine would not be required for a healthy state of society, it is evident that the author wrote "hominum societatis discordiæ remedium," i. e. "a remedy for discord in human society."

² I have translated, as if the text were, not "æqualitas," but "æqualitatis," dependent on "observantia—"

³ I have translated, as if "ad" had dropt out before "symbolum;" for otherwise one can discover neither syntax nor sense in "eorum, quæ pacta sunt, symbolum."

⁴ The text is at present "communicatio—" But if that word had been meant to apply to justice, it would have been "communicatrix," to answer to "custos." Hence I have translated, as if the author wrote "communicationis," dependent on "custos—"

⁵ So the Delphin editor understands "finalis—"

⁶ By the conjecture of Oudendorp, "optio potior," I have been led to "portio potior—" what I have translated. Others perhaps would elicit "opima portio," from "optimis potior" in MSS. But "optimis" here is evidently a corrupt var. lect. for "bonus" in the next sentence; where the antithetical "pessimi" points to "optimus quisque" in lieu of "bonus quisque—" So too Hildebrand suggests "optima portio," or "optima optio—"

⁷ Instead of "luce" one would prefer "loco—" easily obtained, if we are supplied with two examples, one, of a person divine, tranquil, and happy; another, of a person irreligious, inhuman, and deservedly detestable,¹ so that he, who is a stranger to, and averse from, a correct manner of living, would wish his faculties to be more like to those of the worst man, (but)² the good person (his)³ to those of the divine and heavenly man.

Hence there are with him two portions of the Oratorical art; one of which is the discipline, that contemplates what is good, (and is) tenacious of what is just, (and) fitted to, and agreeing with, the sect of that (philosopher), who wishes to appear a statesman; but the other is the science of flattering,⁴ the catcher at what is like the truth, (and) an experience brought together without any reason—for so we express *ἄλογον τριβὴν*⁵ (irrational exercise)—which wishes that to be received by persuasion, which it is unable to teach. Now this Plato has defined as *δύναμιν τοῦ πείθειν ἄνευ τοῦ διδάσκειν*⁶ (a power to persuade without teaching); (and) to which he has given the name of ⁷the shadow, that is, the image,⁷ of a portion of the Statesman's art. But Statesmanship, which he calls πολιτικὴν, he wished to be so understood by us, that we should consider it in the number of virtues; and that not only the person, who is acting and ⁸(occupied) in the very administration of affairs, should be viewed by it, (but)⁸ that things universally should be discerned by it; and that not only forethought is profitable to state affairs, but that all the Statesman's feelings and design should be to render the situation of the state fortunate and happy.

¹ I have translated, as if the text were "detestabilis," not "intestabilis—" which means literally "unable to be a witness—" an idea ill-suited to the train of thought.

^{2, 3} I have translated, as if "sed" had dropt out between "suas" and "divino," and "suas" between "bonus" and "similior—"

⁴ See Gorg. p. 466, A. ⁵ In Gorg. p. 501, A.

⁷ Apuleius has thus expressed by two words, what Plato has by one—εἰδωλον, in Gorg. p. 463, D.

⁸ I have translated, as if "versatum," to which "verum" for "rerum," in some MSS. leads, had dropt out after "rerum" and "verum" before "universa—" and as if "atque," omitted in some MSS., were a corruption of "æque—"

[9.] Now this same (Statesman's) art has a care for the usefulness of the soul by two methods. One¹ relates to law-giving,² the other¹ to law-courts.² The former is similar to the exercise, by which is acquired the beauty and strength of the soul, just as by exercise the health and beauty of the body is preserved: but that relating to law-courts is on a par with medicine; for it cures the diseases of the soul, as medicine does those of the body. These he calls disciplines, and professes that an attention to them brings a very great advantage; while their imitators are the arts of cookery and perfumery; but that the sophist's art, and the bland profession of the law, and the allurements of flattery, are disgraceful to those, who profess them, useless to all; of which arts he unites that of the sophist to that of the cook. For as the art of the cook sometimes catches the (good) opinion of the imprudent by its professing medical science, as if the things, which it is doing, are suited to the cure of disorders; so the art of the sophist, by imitating the manner of law-courts, furnishes to fools a (good) opinion, as if that art were attending to justice, which it is clear is favouring iniquity; whereas the professors³ of law imitate the art of the perfumer; for while this wishes to be the remedy, through which beauty and health are preserved in bodies, it not only diminishes the usefulness of the body, but breaks down its strength and powers, and changes the true colour of the blood to slothfulness;⁴ so that, by imitating the

¹ How the feminine "altera" can be thus introduced with reference to the masculine "duobus modis," I confess I cannot understand. Perhaps Apuleius wrote "duabus methodis—" in allusion to the words of Plato, Δύοις ὄντοις τοῖν πραγμάτων δύο λόγοι τέχνας, in Gorg. p. 464, B. § 44.

² So I have translated "legalis" and "judicialis," remembering the expression just afterwards in Gorg., τῆς δὲ πολιτικῆς ἀντὶ μὲν τῆς γυμναστικῆς τὴν νομοθετικὴν, ἀντίστροφον δὲ τῇ ἱατρικῇ τὴν δικαστικὴν. See too the learned on Phædr. p. 261, D. § 97, and on Quintilian, ii. 21.

⁴ Oudendorp attempts to explain "desidiā" by "torporem sanguinis, quo palleat homo—" but in my opinion very unsuccessfully. For "desidia" never has nor could have such a meaning. Opportunely then science of law, pretends indeed to be able to increase virtue in souls, whereas it weakens whatever there is in them of natural industry.

He thinks (moreover) that those virtues can be taught and studied, which appertain to a rational soul, that is to say, Wisdom and Prudence; and that those, which in the place of a remedy offer a resistance to the portions (of the soul),¹ that are corrupt, namely, Fortitude and Continencc, are rational. Now the Virtues before mentioned are held to be in the place of discipline; the rest, if they are perfect, he calls virtues; (but) if only half-perfect,² he conceives they ought not indeed to be called disciplines, nor yet does he consider them to be entirely strangers to discipline. But Justice, in that ³it is scattered amongst three parts of the soul,³ he imagines to be the art of living and a discipline; and that is at one time teachable, and at another proceeds from use and experience.

[10.] Of good things some he asserts are to be sought for the sake of themselves, as for example, happiness, and a pleasure that is good; others, for not their own sake, as medicine; others, for the sake both of themselves and something else, as forethought, and the rest of virtues, which we seek after, both for their own sake, as being in themselves excellent and honourable; and for the sake of something else, that is to say, of happiness, which is the fruit of virtue the most to be wished for.⁴ On this ground some bad things are to be avoided for the sake of themselves; others, for the sake of other things; (but) the majority, (for the sake) of themselves and of other things, as for example, folly, and vices of that kind, which are to be avoided both for the sake of themselves, and (for the sake) of those things, namely, misery and unhappiness, which may arise from them.

Of those things, which are to be sought after, some we say are absolutely good, those, (to wit,) which, when they are present always and to all, bring with them advantages, as for example, the virtues, of which happiness is the fruit: others does one MS. offer "desideriam;" where probably lies hid "desidia luridum—" or something like it.

² These have been called in ii. § 6, imperfect, and are such as proceed from the gift of Nature.

³ See ii. § 7.

are a good to some persons, and not to all nor always, as for instance, strength, health, wealth, and whatever relate to the body and (depend on) fortune. In like manner, of those things too, which are to be declined, some appear always and to all to be evils, when they are a hurt or an obstacle, as for instance, vices and misfortunes; some are a hurt, and that too not always, to some,¹ as for instance, sickness, want, and ²other things of a similar kind.³

[11.] But that virtue is at liberty, and placed in ourselves, and is to be sought for with willingness; but that sins, although not less at liberty, and placed in ourselves, are not to be entered upon with willingness. For the beholder of virtue, when he shall have understood that it is thoroughly good and excels in kindness, ³will make for himself a road to it,³ and will think it ought to be pursued for its own sake; in like manner how can he, who shall have perceived that vices not only bring disgrace upon reputation, but do a hurt in another manner, and are guilty of a fraud, be able to unite himself of his own accord to their fellowship? But if he proceeds to evil things of that kind, and believes that the use of them is advantageous to himself, through his being deceived by an error, and tempted by some⁴ image of good, he is, ⁵while ignorant of the truth,⁵ thrown headlong into ills. For you would vary from common opinion, when you are indeed not ignorant, what difference there is between poverty and wealth, and, when these matters are placed easy to know, (namely,) that neither poverty brings honour, nor wealth baseness, you should prefer the want of things necessary for living to the abundance of means; (and)⁶ you would seem to

¹ From the Delphin editor's interpretation, "aliqua quibusdam—" which is the sense required by the train of ideas, it would seem that he wished to read "quædam nonnullis" instead of "quædam aliis—" for thus "nonnullis" would be properly opposed to "omnibus."

² As some MSS. read "cætera," and others "similia," I have united the two.

³ I have adopted the reading suggested by Oudendorp, "ad eam affectabit viam."

⁴ I have translated, as if the text were "imagine—quædam—" not "imagine—quidem—"

⁵ Floridus was the first to object to "sciens vero—" but he did not see that Apuleius wrote "nesciens veri—"

⁶ I have inserted the copulative conjunction required to unite "discrepes" and "videaris—" be silly, and ¹to pursue a conduct still more absurd than does the person,¹ who despises the health of the body by choosing in preference disease.

[12.] But that is an act of extreme madness, when he, who shall have beheld with the eyes of the soul the beauty of virtue, and shall have discovered by use and reason its utility, shall still, while not ignorant how much of disgrace and disadvantage he shall obtain from a participation in vices, be willing to give himself up to them. (He says too) that the health of the body, (and) strength, and freedom from pain, and other things of that kind, are extraneous, and that wealth likewise, and the rest of things, which we consider the advantages of fortune, are not to be called simply good. For if any one, who possesses them, withdraws himself from their use, they will be useless to him; and if any converts their use to wicked purposes, they will be seen to be even hurtful to him. But if any one abuses them, he will be exposed to vices; ²while he, who possesses them, is unable to hold them, when he is dead.³ From hence it is inferred that these ought not to be called simply good things; nor ought those, which ⁴sow diseases or poverty,⁵ and other things, to be considered evils. For he, whose property is small, and who is moderate in his expenses, will perceive no mischief (coming) from it; while he, who makes a right use of his poverty, will not only find no disadvantage, but, on the contrary, will become superior in enduring ⁶the rest of evils with a better

¹ I have translated, as if the text were, "et adhuc illo id absurdius sequi," where "sequi" is found in all the MSS.

² Since all the words between the numerals are omitted in nearly all the MSS., they have been thought by the generality of editors to be an interpolation, formed out of an explanatory gloss. Hildebrand however has given from his own conjecture, "haberi hæc etiam oberit—" i. e. "it will be a hurt to him for them to be possessed."

³ I have translated, as if the text were "quæ serunt morbos aut pauperiem—" not "quæ sunt morboæ, ut pauperiem—" Hildebrand gives up the passage in despair, except that he would read "contraria" for "ea—"

method.⁴ If then 'it is not contrary either to have poverty or to rule over it by reason,' poverty is not by itself an evil.

Pleasure, moreover, (he says,) is neither absolutely a good, nor simply an evil; nor is that to be fled from, which is honourable, and proceeds not from things to be ashamed of, but from glorious doings; but that, which Nature herself spurns, and is sought after with disgraceful delight, he considers ought to be avoided.

Anxiety and labour, if they are natural, and descend from virtue itself, and are undertaken² for the performance of some remarkable act, he considered to be an object of desire; but that they are bad³ and detestable, if they are produced contrary to Nature for the sake of things the most base.

Not only does he know⁴ that vices fall on the soul by an act of the will, and ⁵come to bodies,⁵ but that there is a certain middle state, such as, when sadness is absent, nor yet do we perceive that gladness is present.

[13.] Of the things, which are in ourselves, the first good and worthy of all praise is, to the person seeking a good, virtue. On that account⁶ it ought to be called honourable; since we say that, what is honourable, is alone good, and what is base, bad; and deservedly so; (for) what is base cannot be good.

Friendship he says is a fellowship,⁷ and consists in a fellow-feeling, and is reciprocal, and brings the alternation of de-

¹ I must leave for others to understand "contrarium" here. The Delphin editor explains it by "repugnat—" But we are not informed to what it is repugnant. I could have understood "neque habere pauperiem neque eam regere rationi contrarium est,"—"it is not contrary to reason to have poverty or to rule over it."

² How the feminine "susceptæ" and (?) "malas" can thus be applied to "sollicitudinem et laborem" I cannot understand. Hence I suspect Apuleius wrote "sollicitudines laborum—"

³ From "sed" found in two MSS. after "vitia" Oudendorp would elicit "ait" or "scilicet—" I have translated, as if the author had written "scit—"

⁴ The text is "venire corporibus," where the dative follows "venire" very strangely. Hence from "convenire" in ed. pr. one might elicit "convivere," i. e. "live together with," answering to συζῆν in Politic. p. 302, B.

⁵ I have translated the old reading "ideo," not "adeo—" which Oudendorp has adopted from two MSS., observing that the words are synonymous.

⁷ In lieu of "sociam" the sense evidently requires, as I have translated, "societatem—" light, when ¹(two persons) love equally in turn.¹ This result takes place for the benefit of friendship, when a friend is desirous that he, whom he loves, should enjoy a prosperous state equally with himself. Now that equality does not take place otherwise, than when a similarity in equal affection meets in both. For as ²like are united to like by an indissoluble connexion,³ so those, who are at variance, are disunited amongst themselves, nor are they the friends of others. Now the corruptions of enmity are produced from malevolence through a dissimilarity in manners and a difference in life, and sects, and opposite dispositions. There are likewise, he says, other kinds of friendship; one part of which is produced for the sake of pleasure, and another for that of a close relationship. Now the love of a close relationship and of children is agreeable to Nature; but that other feeling, which, abhorrent to the kindness of humanity, is called love, is a burning desire, by the lighting up of which the lovers of the body, being caught through their lustfulness, imagine a person to exist wholly in that, which ³they see (and wish for).³ Such ⁴unhappy feelings in the case of the soul⁴ Plato forbids to be called by the name of friendship; because they are not mutual, nor can be reciprocated,⁵ so that what is loved,⁵ may be loved in return; nor is there a constancy in them; and a length of time is wanting to them; and loves of that kind are put an end to by satiety⁶ and repentance.

¹ I have translated, as if the text were "quando duo æqualiter redamant—" not "quando—redamat—" where "redamat" has nothing to which it can be referred.

² Compare Homer in Od. xvii. 218, and Plato in Lyrid. p. 214, B., τὸ ὁμοῖον τῷ ὁμοίῳ ἀνάγκη εἶναι φίλον εἶναι.

³ The sense evidently requires, as I have translated, "et voluerint," after "viderint—" For it is not enough for a lover to see the loved object; he cannot fail to wish for it. With this union of "viderint" and "voluerint" may be compared the antithesis in ὁρῶν and ἐρῶν in Legg. viii. p. 837, C., ὁρῶν δὲ μᾶλλον ἢ ἐρῶν τῇ ψυχῇ.

⁴ So I have rendered "calamitates animarum—"

⁶ Oudendorp prefers "sanitate," furnished by many MSS., in lieu of "societate" in some, and "satiæte" in others; and refers to Ovid. Amor. i. 10, "Cum bene pertæsum est, animique resanuit error—" But "satiæte" answers to "pertæsum," and "pœnitentia" to "resanuit."

[14.] Of Loves of this kind Plato numbers three; because there is one, divine, agreeing with a mind uncorrupted and the method of virtue, (and) not to be repented of; another, pertaining to a degenerate mind, and to pleasure the most corrupt; the third, mixed up with both, belonging to a mediocre disposition and of moderate desires; but souls of a darker hue (he says) are impelled by a longing for the body, and that their only aim is to enjoy the use of it and to soften down their heart, by a pleasure and gratification of that kind. ¹But these are the acts of an elegant and well-educated mind,¹ to love passionately the souls of the good, and to make them a study, and to wish it done, that they should indulge as much as possible in good pursuits and be rendered better and superior. The mean between the two (he says) is formed of both; so that they are not entirely void of bodily gratifications, and yet are able to be caught by an elegant disposition of soul. As then that Love is inferred to be the most filthy and the least human and base, not from the nature of things, but from a bodily sickness and disease, so it may be believed that the divine (Love) comes into the minds of men, when it is granted by the gift and kindness of the gods, and by the breath of a celestial Cupid. There is too a third kind of Love, which we have mentioned as a mean. It is brought together by the proximity of what is divine and earthly; and since it is united ²by the connexion of a joint state amongst like persons,² it is, as ³being near to reason, the divine one; but ⁴the earthly, as being united ⁵to baseness and the longing after pleasure.⁵

[15.] ⁶Of persons worthy of blame there are four kinds;

²— I have translated, as if the text were "nexu utique consortii parilium." not "nexuque et consortio parili." which I confess I cannot understand; for the mention of persons, who are like, can scarcely be dispensed with.

³ I have adopted "ut." found in ed. Vulc.

⁴ In lieu of "et." the balance of the sentence requires "at."

⁵ Since some MSS. read "turpitudini" for "cupidini." Apuleius probably united both, as I have translated.

⁶— A similar idea, but expressed in more correct language, is found towards the end of this book, in p. 379.

of which the first is of the seekers after honours; the next is ¹of the lovers of substance; ¹ the third, of (the lovers) of popular rule; and the last of tyrannical (power).⁶ On which account² that first vice³ comes upon the mind, when the vigour of reason has become languid, and that portion of the soul, in which anger has the dominion, becomes the superior and stronger. Now that, which is called 'Ὀλιγαρχία,⁴ (Oligarchy,) is produced in this way; when on account of the worst food being given to that part of the soul, which consists of desires, not only are the seats of what is reasonable and given to anger occupied, but ⁵of that likewise, which sharpen not necessary desires.⁵ Such a person as this Plato has designated a gain-seeker and ⁶a hawk after money.⁶ ⁷The popular quality exists,⁷ when passions, being let loose⁸ by indulgence, burn not only with just desires, ⁹but with those

² I confess I cannot understand "quapropter" here. I suspect something has been lost, requisite to unite the broken chain of thought.

³ Namely, "the love of honours."

⁴ The word in Plato, as remarked by Floridus, is τιμαρχία, not Ὀλιγαρχία, as applicable to the honour-seekers.

⁹ The text at present is "sed his etiam quæ obviæ atque occurrentes—" from which, as being perfectly unintelligible, I have elicited "sed his etiam, quæ obvarant ab æquo occurrentes—" where "obvarant" means "to pervert," as shown by Nonius Marcellus, "Obvarare, pervertere, depravare."

likewise, which pervert from right the parties meeting with them,⁹ and oppress with their own conditions both the soul, that is susceptible of good counsel, and the other too, that is given rather to anger. But Tyrannical power is a life of luxury and full of lust; which, welded together out of pleasures endless and various and unlawful, holds a dominion over the entire mind.

[16.] Now the person, who is the worst, (Plato) says is not only base, and pernicious, and a despiser of the gods, and lives a life without moderation, and inhuman, and unsociable, but agrees likewise with neither his neighbours nor himself, ¹[and thus is at variance not only with other persons, but himself likewise,]¹ and is an enemy not to others only, but likewise to himself; and hence such a person is friendly neither to the good, nor to any one at all, and not even to himself; but that he, whom no excess of wickedness can go beyond, appears to be the worst of all.² (He says too) that such a person can never find a way for himself in the conduct of affairs, not merely on account of his ignorance, but because he knows not himself, and because thorough wickedness produces an unsettling in the mind, by impeding that person's designs, when commenced and reflected on, and by not permitting any of those things (to be done)³ which he may wish. Hence against a person the worst and most reprobate not only do those vices, which are according to⁴ Nature, produce a feeling of execration, such as envy is, and a delight in the misfortunes of others, but those likewise, which Nature does not reject, I mean pleasure, and sickness of mind, regret, love, pity, fear, shame, (and) anger. Now this takes place on that account, because an ill-regulated disposition has no moderation in whatever matter to which it rushes forward; and thus there is for it ever something deficient or redundant. Hence too the love of a man of this kind is de-

² I have translated, as if the text were "omnium," not "eum—"

³ I have translated, as if "feri" had dropt out after "eorum."

⁴ Such is the ordinary meaning of "secundum." But the antithesis requires "contrary to—" a sense that Oudendorp attempts, I conceive, vainly to defend; who once wished to read "quæ secus quam Natura sinit," in lieu of "quæ secundum Naturam sunt."

praved in its whole tenor; because it is not only eager from its unbridled lusts and insatiable thirst to swallow all kinds of pleasure, but because it is distracted in its judgment of beauty by an error without reason, through its being ignorant of true loveliness, and being a passionate admirer of the skin of the body, effete, enervated, and passing away; nor does it set a great value at least¹ upon limbs coloured by the sun,² or rendered firm by exercise, but³ (values rather)³ 'those darkened by shade, or soft by sloth,⁴ and moulded⁵ with too much care.

[17.] That wickedness does not stalk abroad willingly, is plain in many ways. For injuriousness Plato says⁶ is an ill-regulated suffering and sickness of the mind; from whence he holds it clear that men are not carried to it willingly. For who would with his own will take upon himself so much of evil, as to carry knowingly crime and flagitiousness in the best portion of the mind. When therefore the possession of

² To improve the colour of the skin, and the firmness of the flesh, the ancients were accustomed after washing first and then oiling themselves, to dry their skin in the sun, as shown by Aristophanes in Εκκλησι. 63, where a woman says, while imitating the acts of a man, Ἀλεψαμένη γὰρ οὖμ' ἔλυν, δι' ἡμέρας Ἐχλαινόμην ἰστώσα πρὸς τὸν ἥλιον: while effeminate persons were more fond of the shade, as we learn from Plato in Phædr. p. 239, C. § 35, Ὁφθήσεται δὲ μαλθακὸν τινα καὶ οὐ στερεὸν διώκων, οὐδ' ἐν ἡλίῳ καθαρῷ τετραμμένον, ἀλλ' ὑπὸ συμμεγεί σκιά, πόνοι μὲν ἀνδρείων καὶ ἰδρώτων ξηρῶν ἀπυρον, ἔμπυρον δὲ ἀπαλῆς καὶ ἀνάνδρου διαίτης.

³ I have inserted the words between the lunes for the sake of perspicuity.

⁵ I have retained "modulatos" with the ed. pr., in lieu of which Wower suggested "medicatos," elicited from "meditatos" in one MS.; while, since all the others offer "medullatos," Oudendorp would read "emedullatos," i. e. "without marrow." But then "cura nimia" would have been omitted; which could not be; for Apuleius had in mind the words of Horace, evil is taken by the unthinking, it is meet that its use and doings should be supported by the ignorant; and on that account it is a worse¹ thing to hurt than to be hurt; because the hurt is in those things, which are of less value, namely, in those of the body, and external, which can be either diminished or perish by fraud;² while the preferable are unhurt, that relate to the soul itself; while to hurt is a far worse act. From whence it can be understood that by this error a mischief is brought upon good souls; and that he hurts himself more, who desires the destruction of another, than he hurts him, against whom he plots things of such a kind.

"operata juvenus
In cute curanda nimio plus."

⁶ The whole of this doctrine is detailed at length in the Gorgias.

Since then to hurt another is of all evils the greatest,³ it is still much more grievous for him, who does a hurt, to depart with impunity;⁴ and it is more grievous and bitter than every punishment, if impunity is granted to a noxious person, and he does not suffer in the mean time a punishment from men; just as it is more grievous for (a troop)⁴ of most acute disorders to be in want of medicine, (and) to deceive medical men, and for those parts to be neither burnt nor cut off, by the pain of which the safety of the rest of the parts can be provided for.

[18.] Hence as the best physicians do not apply healing hands to bodies⁵ despaired of and cried over (as lost),³ in order that the attendance, which would do no good, may not prolong⁶ the period of pain; so it is better for those to die, whose souls are stained by vices, and cannot be cured by the medicine of wisdom. For⁷ Plato thinks that the man ought to be driven

² Scioppius would read "funditus" in lieu of "fraudibus—" I should prefer "imminui possunt fraudibus vel vi interire—"

³ See Gorg. p. 509, B. § 138.

⁴ I have translated, as if "cohorem" had dropt out before "carere—" remembering the expression in Horace, "morborum—cohors—"

⁵ The text is "conclamatis desperatisque—" I have in the translation avoided the ὑπερπον πρότερον.

⁶ In lieu of "promulget" two MSS. read "promulcet." Both words are equally unintelligible. Hence Wasse on Sallust, B. J. 29, suggested "promicet—" referring to Nonius, "Promicare, extendere et porro jacere;—Nevius, Siquidem loqui vis non perdocere, multa longe promicanda oratio est—" But there "promicare" means to "flash before," as a person is wont to do a drawn sword. I have therefore translated, as if the text were "prolonget—"

⁷ Oudendorp's text is "vita existimat Plato esse pellendum." But most of the MSS. read "vita existimate populo—" ; one, "Plato noster" from life,⁷ by whom the study of living properly cannot be obtained from Nature or his own exertions; or, if the love of life holds him fast, that he ought to be delivered over to the wise, by whose art at some time¹ he may be turned to better things. And truly it is better for such a person to be ruled over, and not to have the power of ruling over others, and to be not a lord, but a slave himself, as being impotent² over his own vices,³ and to be assigned to the power of others, after obtaining as his lot the office of obeying rather than of commanding. He said, likewise, that the worse man is the greater reprobate⁴ not on the sole ground,⁵ that he is ever distracted by a choice⁶ of vices, and torn in pieces by the wave swell of desires; but because⁶ the more he is desirous of more things, the more he seems to himself to be in want, and on that account to others likewise. For the things, that are hoped and wished for, arrive scarcely a few in number, and by the greatest trouble; and to these succeeds the still more burning madness⁶ of desires; nor by future evils only he is pained, but tortured likewise by the past⁷ and those in transit.⁷ All of which persons it is manifest can be drawn from evils of that kind by death alone.

[19.] But the pre-eminently good, and the immoderately bad, are very few and rather scarce, and, as he says,⁸ may be counted;

instead of "populo—" Perhaps Apuleius wrote "vita existimat Plato noster populove pellendum."

¹ I have translated, as if the word were "quondam," not "quadam—" which is scarcely intelligible.

²⁻³ As one MS. reads "servitio uni," and another "servorum," it is easy to elicit from both "suorum vitiorum—" where "vitiiorum" is due to Colvins; while to Modius is due "aliorumque," in lieu of "aliorum—"

²⁻³ I have translated, as if the text were "non ob solum id—" where "id" might easily have been lost before "deteriorem—"

⁴ In "editione" evidently lies hid "electione—" what I have translated.

⁶ I have, with Oudendorp, adopted "furores," the conjecture of Florinus, in lieu of "fluores" in MSS. Hildebrand suggests "fervores—" but the majority are those, who are neither clearly the best nor really the worst, but with, as it were, a medium in morals. And yet neither do the more excellent of them lay hold of all right things, nor do those, who are to be blamed, stumble in all. Of these the vices are not heavy nor out of season, nor with too much of crime, whose basis¹ is in a redundancy or deficiency; to whom there is of approbation both an entirety and measure; and who, while² they are taking a middle road between praise and blame, are constantly excited by the desire of undertaking matters of that kind, ³that at one time persons good and honourable invite them by reason; at another, dishonourable gains and base pleasures attract them.³ With such men fidelity in friendship does not endure; and loves not always incorrect, nor yet honourable, come into their minds.

⁸ Apuleius had perhaps in mind Phædon, p. 99, A. § 89, ἡγήσατο τοὺς μὲν χρηστοὺς καὶ πονηροὺς σφόδρα ὀλίγους εἶναι ἑκατέρους, τοὺς δὲ μεταξὺ πλείστους.

[20.] A man therefore, Plato says, cannot be perfectly wise, unless he excels the rest (of men) in disposition, and is complete in the arts, and in the parts of prudence, and has been imbued with them even from boyhood, and accustomed to deeds and words in accordance, ⁴while his soul has been cleansed and strained from the lees of pleasure,⁴ ⁵and abstinence and patience⁵ have been chosen with his (whole) soul, and learning and eloquence have proceeded from the knowledge of things. He, however, who has gone through these matters, and walked with a confident and secure step in the road of virtue, and has acquired a solid method of living, becomes on a sudden perfect, that is, he reaches on a sudden the extreme portions of time, past and future, and is in a

² I have translated, as if "quum" had dropt out after "qui—" Hildebrand would read "qui, quia—"

³ Such is the literal version of the text. But one would have expected rather to find the sentences more accurately balanced to this effect—"that at one time things good and honourable invite them to what is rational; at another, dishonourable gains attract them to disreputable pleasures:" in Latin, "ut nunc bona atque honesta eos ad rationalia invitent; nunc inhonesta lucra ad turpes alliciant voluptates."

⁴ So I have translated, as if the text were "purgata et effacata anima e voluptate—" not "purgata et effacata animi voluptate—" for as in the pleasures of the mind there are no lees, the lees cannot be said to be strained off.

certain manner intemporal.¹ After this, when vices are shut out and all things implanted and introduced, which conduce to a happy life, the wise man thinks correctly that he² does not depend upon others, nor can (any thing)³ be brought upon himself from others, but that (all things)⁴ are in his own hand. On which account he is neither elated in prosperity nor does he become contracted by adversity, when he knows that he is so furnished with adornments,⁵ that he can be separated from them by no violence. Such a person it behoves not only to inflict no injury, but even not to return it. For he does not consider that to be an act of contumely, which a wicked man commits; but he considers that (to be so), which patience cannot⁶ firmly endure. By which law of Nature⁷ let it be engraven on his mind, that not one of those things, which the rest of mankind conceive to be evils, can do a hurt to a wise man. Indeed,⁸ (Plato) asserts⁹ that the wise man, relying on his conscience, will be secure and confident in the whole of life, both because he considers, by drawing himself¹⁰ to better

¹ Others may, but I will never, believe that Apuleius wrote "intemporal—" which Oudendorp explains indeed "freed from time;" but since the ed. pr. has "in tempora lætum," it is evident that we must read "in tempora aëria elatum—" where "tempora aëria" may be compared with "O magna templa cœlitum Commixta stellis splendidis," quoted by Varro de Ling. Lat. vi. For thus such a person, carried up to the temples of the air, would be equal to the gods; as shown by Horace, "Hac arte Pollux et vagus Hercules Innisus arces attingit igneas."

^{2, 3, 4} I have translated, as if "se" had dropt out after "alii," and "quid" before "deferri," and "omnia" between "sua" and "manu." Compare Plato, Menexen. p. 247, E. § 20, ὅτι γὰρ ἀνδρὶ εἰς ἑαυτὸν ἀνηρηται πάντα τὰ πρὸς εὐδαιμονίαν φέροντα—καὶ μὴ ἐν ἄλλοις αἰσπεῖται—translated by Cicero in Tuscul. v. 12, and imitated in Paradox. 2, "nemo potest esse non beatissimus, qui est totus aptus ex sese, quique in se uno ponit omnia:" and in Epistol. ad Famil. v. 13, "Laudem sapientie statuo esse maximam, non aliunde pendere, nec extrinsecus bene aut male vivendi suspensas habere rationes."

⁵ In lieu of "ornamentis" one would have expected "armamentis—"

⁶ I have adopted the reading of Oudendorp, who places "non," found before "putat," after "patientia—"

⁷ This mention of the law of Nature seems very strange, where one would have expected rather "of instruction," in Latin "doctrina—"

⁸ In lieu of "equidem," which can hardly be united to "dicit—" one would prefer "Et quidem—"

⁹ I have adopted "dicit" found in one MS. in lieu of "dici et—" unless it be said that in "vita dici et" he hid "vita die dicit—"

¹⁰ I have translated, as if "se" had dropt out after "rationes—" reasons, that all things are accidents, and because he receives nothing with moroseness or difficulty, and persuades himself that his affairs belong to the immortal gods. The same person ¹ beholds the day of his death creeping on, neither unwillingly nor without hope,¹ because he trusts in the immortality of the soul. For the soul of the wise man, when liberated from the bonds of the body, migrates back to the gods, and for the merits of a life passed rather purely and chastely, he does by this very endeavour² ³ conciliate himself to the condition of the gods.³

[21.] To the same wise man he gives the name ⁴ of the best; and he rightly considers him both good⁴ and prudent, whose sound⁵ plans agree with acts the most correct, and whose principles proceed from a reason for what is just. This wise man he further says is the most brave; since by the vigour of his mind he is prepared to endure all things. Hence it is⁶ he says that fortitude is the nerve and very neck⁶ of the soul,⁷ just as cowardice he says borders upon weakness. Him too he correctly considers⁸ the only wealthy man; since he

¹ I have translated, as if the text were "diem mortis sue prorepentis, nec invitus exspesve spectat—" not "d. m. s. propitius nec invitus expectat—" where Oudendorp vainly endeavours to defend "propitius," not remembering the expression "obrepit non intellecta senectus," in Juvenal ix. 129, and not perceiving that the allusion to a hope could hardly be dispensed with. Or we may read "mortis sue prope euntis."

² I have translated, as if the text were "nisu," not "usu," which Oudendorp endeavours to explain by referring it to the use of a well-spent life. But "nisu" suits better with "hac arte—inissus" in Horace.

³ Such is the literal version of "deorum se conditioni conciliat—" words quite unintelligible, unless we suppose there is a change of cases for "deorum sibi conditionem conciliat." But, unless I am greatly mistaken, Apuleius wrote "deorum se conditioni ac concilio levat—" "lifts himself up to the condition and the council of the gods."

⁴ To find "bonum" thus following "optimum" seems rather strange. Perhaps the author wrote "Plato τῖμον—"

⁵ The balance of the sentence plainly requires "sana" instead of "sane—"

⁶ I do not remember where Plato says so of fortitude; although he has in Rep. iii. p. 411, B., ὡς ἀν' ἐκρίψυ (τὸν θυμὸν), ὥσπερ νῆρα, ἐκ τῆς ψυχῆς.

⁷ I have adopted Oudendorp's "animæ" in lieu of "animi—" who aptly refers to "fortitudinis sedem esse et vires animæ," in ii. § 6.

⁸ In Phædr. p. 279, C. § 147, where Ast refers to Cicero, Paradox. 6, "That the wise man alone is rich."

alone appears to possess the riches of virtue, which are more precious than all treasures. Moreover the wise man ought to appear the most wealthy indeed, since he alone is able to rule over (wealth)¹ for necessary uses. For the rest of men, although they are flowing over with riches, seem nevertheless to be poor; because they either know not their use, or apply them to the worst purposes. For it is not the absence of money, that gives birth to want, but the presence of immoderate desires. It behoves (then)² the philosopher, if he will be in want of nothing, and the despiser of, and superior to, all those things, which men consider bitter to be borne, to do nothing otherwise,³ than to endeavour constantly to separate the soul from its fellowship with the body. And hence Philosophy is to be deemed a desire for death and a habit of dying.

[22.] It is meet for all good men to be friends amongst themselves, even if they are little known (to each other); and they are to be considered friends by that power, through which their manners and tenets agree; since like is not abhorrent from like. From hence it is clear that the fidelity of friendship can exist amongst the good alone. (Now) wisdom makes that young man a sedulous⁴ lover of good, who by the goodness of his disposition is rather ready (to learn) good arts. Nor will a deformity of body be able to drive away such a desire. For when the soul itself is pleasing, the whole man is loved; but when the body is desired, a man's⁵ worse part becomes agreeable to the heart. Justly then it is to be deemed that he, who is acquainted with good persons, will be desirous⁶ likewise of things of that kind. For he alone burns with good desires, who sees what is good with the eyes

² I have translated, as if "ergo" had been lost before "oportet—"

³ In "sic," which is quite unintelligible, evidently lies hid "secius," as I have translated.

⁴ I have translated, as if the text were "sedulum," not "sed eum—" where Oudendorp has suggested "scilicet eum—" although he says that "sed" may be defended; but how that can be, I cannot understand.

⁵ I have adopted "hominis," found in one MS., in lieu of "ejus."

⁶ I have adopted "cupitum," furnished by some MSS., in lieu of "cupidum—" for the train of thought evidently requires the mention of a future time.

of the mind. ¹[This is to be wise.]¹ ²But because he who is ignorant of that,² must needs be a hater also, and not a friend to virtue. Nor vainly is such a person a lover of disgraceful pleasures. (But) the wise man will not come, in the manner of a wild beast,³ to do something⁴ for the sake of some pleasure, unless there shall be at hand the honourable emoluments of virtue. The same person it behoves to live a life in this kind of pleasure, honourable, and admirable, and full of praise and glory; and to be preferred to all the rest of men, not only for the sake of these things, but to enjoy likewise alone and always its pleasantness and security. ⁵Nor will he be pained, when deprived of the dearest objects of affection, either because all things, which tend to happiness, depend on himself,⁵ or because the infliction of such pain is forbidden by the decree and law of right reason; or⁶ because, if he tortures himself on such a ground, or takes upon himself that sickness of mind for the sake of him, who is dead,⁷ as if the person were in a worse part,⁷ for his own sake, because he grieves that he has been deprived of such an acquaintance.

¹—The words between the brackets Wower acutely saw were superfluous. But as it is not easy to discover how they came here, they probably conceal some error.

²—Such is the literal and unintelligible version of the words "istud vero quoniam qui est ignarus—" where Oudendorp would read "istius vero boni ignarus—" But he does not tell us from whence "quoniam" came, nor how it could be corrupted from "boni." Apuleius wrote, I suspect, "At studium veri quo animam agat—hoc enim est sapientiæ nosse—qui est ignarus, osor quoque ejus—" i. e. But he who knows not whither the study of truth leads the soul—for to know this is the part of wisdom—must needs be a hater of it (the study)—

⁴ Instead of "voluptatis quidem alicujus gratia," the sense and syntax evidently require "voluptatis alicujus gratia quiddam—" for thus "agen-" recovers, what it had lost, its object.

⁵ Compare Plato in Menexen. § 20.

⁶ The train of thought evidently requires "aut," not "et—"

⁷ Such is the literal version of "quasi sit in pejore parte—" But "parte" has no meaning here by itself. Besides, the apodosis of the sentence is clearly wanting; which may be supplied by reading "quasi in pejore statu sit, partes aget fatui, aut—" i. e. "as if the deceased were in a worse position, he will act the part of a simpleton;" for "statu" might easily have been lost before "sit," and "partes aget fatui aut" be corrupted into "parte aut—" ↗

But neither for the sake of the dead ought lamentations to be indulged in, since we know that the party has suffered no evil; and, if he had been with good feelings, that he is added to the number of the better; nor for the sake of himself; inasmuch as he places every thing upon himself, nor by the absence of anything can he be in want of virtue, of which he claims for himself the perpetual possession. The wise man, therefore, will not be sad.

[23.] The aim (then) of wisdom is that the wise man may by his merits¹ be carried up to god;² and this is about to be all his study, says (Plato),³ that he may by the emulation of his life approach to the doings of the gods. Now this will be able to happen to him, if he shows himself a man perfectly just, pious, (and) prudent. From whence, not only in the knowledge of looking forward, but in the labour of acting, it is fitting for him to follow those things, which are approved of by gods and men; since the highest of the gods not only thinks upon all this Universe through the reasoning of his reflections, but undertakes the first, the middle, and the last, and regulates what has been discovered thoroughly, by the universality and constancy of a provident arrangement.

Moreover, (he says) that the person⁴ appears to be happy to all, to whom good is supplied, and who knows in what manner he ought to be free from vices. Now one kind of happiness is, when we protect by the presence of our talents, what we are doing; another, when nothing is wanting to the perfection of life, and we are content with the mere contemplation of it. Now of each kind of happiness the source flows from virtue. But for the adornment⁵ of the genial place,⁵ or

^{1, 2} I have adopted "meritis," found in ed. pr., and changed "dei" into "deum" from conjecture, remembering the expression "everhat ad deos" in Horace. Hildebrand suggests "ad dei imaginem" in lieu of "ad dei meritum—"

³— I have translated, as if the text were "hancque omnem futuram ejus operam, ut—" not "hanc namque futuram ejus operam, ut—" where, since "namque" is found in a place not its own, it is probably a corruption of "que omnem;" at least "que" follows "hanc" in one MS. and ed. pr.; while "ait" might easily have been lost before "aut."

⁴ As I cannot discover to what thing "illud" can be referred, and, if I could, how such a thing could be said to know, I have translated, as if the text were "illum" to be referred to a person.

⁵— As no scholar has yet been able to explain or correct satisfactorily "genialis loci," I must leave the passage, as I find it, inexplicable; unless virtue, we need none of these aids from without, which we deem to be good. But for the uses of ordinary life there is a need of the care of the body, and of the protection of these things, which come from without; yet however in suchwise, that they may become better by virtue, and by its assistance be united to the advantages of happiness, without which they are least of all to be held in the place of good things. Nor is it in vain, that virtue alone can make persons most happy; since without it happiness cannot be found from other prosperous affairs. Since we say that the wise man is a foot-follower and imitator of god, and we fancy that he does follow the deity. For this does the saying¹ mean, "Ἐπὶ θεῷ," "Follow god." Now not only does it behove him, while he inhabits (this) life, to speak words worthy of the gods,² and not to do those acts, which are displeasing to their majesty; but at that time likewise, when he is leaving the body, which he will not do, against the will of god.³ For though the power over death is in his hand, (and) though he knows that, by leaving the things of earth, he shall obtain what are better, still he ought not to bring death upon himself, unless the divine law shall decree that he must of necessity suffer it; and, if the adornments of his previously-passed life do him honour, still it behoves him to be more honourable, ⁴and the lover⁴ of a favourable report, when, careless of the life of his posterity, he permits his soul to pass to immortality, and anticipates, because he has lived piously, that it will inhabit the places of the blest, and mingle with the choirs of the gods and demi-gods.

[24.] Respecting the constitution of states, and the preservation of commonwealths to be ruled over, Plato thus ordains.

it be said that Apuleius wrote "ingenii, aliisque dotis," i. e. "of disposition, or any other talent," to which I have been led by Lipsius's "ingenialis—"

¹ This saying has been attributed to Sosiades. It is not, I think, to be found in Plato; who speaks, however, in Phædr. § 59, 60, and 62, of "a soul following a god;" and in Legg. iv. p. 716, C., of an action being φίλη καὶ ἀκόλουθος θεῷ. But in i. p. 639, D., the Cretans are said in somewhat a different sense to be ἐπόμενοι τῷ θεῷ.

² I have adopted, with others, "dis dicere," the emendation of Stewechius, in lieu of "discere—"

³ Compare Phædon, p. 62, C. § 16.

⁴—I have translated, as if "et amantem" had dropt out after "tamen—" for the genitive "secundi rumoris—" would be otherwise without a word to govern it.

At the very commencement he defines the form of a state after this fashion. A state is the union of very many persons amongst themselves; where (some)¹ are rulers, others inferiors, bringing, when united, ²aid and assistance² to each other in turn, and regulating their duties by the same and correct laws; and a state would be one, ³like a villa,³ under the same walls, if⁴ the minds of the inhabitants are accustomed ⁵to like and dislike the same things.⁵ On which account we must persuade the founders of commonwealths, that they increase ⁶their own people to that point of places in such a way that⁶ all may be known to the same ruler, and not unknown to each other;⁷ for thus it will happen that all will be of one mind, and be willing for justice to be done to them.

(But) a great and healthy⁸ state it does not behove to depend on the multitude of its inhabitants, and on their great strength. For (Plato) thinks that not the power of the body nor of money, collected for the dominion of the many, is to be valued, ⁹with a bad heart and impotence, but when men, adorned with all virtues, and all the inhabitants, founded on laws, obey a common decree.⁹ But the rest of states, which

²⁻³ To avoid the tautology in "opem atque auxilium" one would prefer "operam—"

⁶ I have rejected "et" before "si," as perfectly at variance with the syntax and sense.

⁷⁻⁸ In the words "eadem velle atque eadem nolle" there is an allusion to Sallust's well-known definition of friendship, which he puts into the mouth of Catiline.

⁹ Such is the literal and unintelligible version of the text, "ut usque ad id locorum plebes suas taliter—augeant, ut—" first edited by Vulcanius, and found subsequently in two MSS.: with which Oudendorp is however not satisfied, nor am I. For Apuleius wrote, I suspect, "ut usque ad id plebes suas et taliter augeant, ut, vicorum instar—" i. e. "that they increase their people to such a point and in such a way, that, like villages—"

⁷ Compare Legg. v. p. 738, D. § 9.

⁸ I have translated, as if the text were, not "sane," but "et sanam—" similar to "sanas civitates" just afterwards.

⁹ Here a literal version best shows, how unintelligible is the text—"cum vecordia impotentiaque, sed cum decreto communi virtutibus omnibus ornati viri et omnes incolæ fundati legibus obsequuntur." And yet it is easy to see first, that "fundati legibus" could not be applied to

are not constituted after this model, he did not deem to be healthy, but were commonwealths filthy and swelling with disorders. Those, however, he said, were founded on reason, which were arranged after the manner of the soul, so that the best portion, which excels in wisdom and prudence, may rule over the multitude; and, as that has the care of the whole body, so ¹the beloved of prudence¹ may defend the things advantageous to the state in general. And let Fortitude likewise, the second portion of Virtue, as it chastises and restrains ²the feeling of desire by its rod,² be vigilant in the state. (And) in the place of watchers by day, let the youth become soldiers for the benefit of all; but let the discipline of a superior counsel bridle, restrain, and, if requisite, break down the restless and untamed, and on that account the worst of citizens. But that third part ³(of the soul, the seat)³ of desires, he considers on a par with the common people and land-tillers, which he thinks is to be supported for its moderate usefulness. ⁴He denies, however, that a commonwealth can stand, unless he, who rules, possesses a desire for wisdom, or unless he is chosen as the ruler, who, it is agreed amongst all, is the most wise.⁴

"incolæ;" and secondly, that something is required to balance "virtutibus omnibus ornati." Hence I suspect Apuleius wrote "sed cum decreto communi, virtutibus omnibus viri ornati, omnes incolæ sine vecordia imprudentiaque, fundatis legibus obsequuntur," i. e. "but when all the inhabitants, adorned with all the virtues of a man, obey without a bad heart and thoughtlessness the laws founded on a general decree." Perhaps however the words "cum vecordia impotentiaque" may be retained in their present place, at least, if we read after "putat," "junctas cum vecordia imprudentiaque," so that "vecordia" may be referred to "vires pecuniæ," and "imprudentia" to "vires corporis—"

¹ Such, I presume, is the meaning of "prudentiæ dilectus—" But whether such an expression is to be found elsewhere, is more than I know. Oudendorp indeed refers to Metam. viii. p. 554, A.; and, as regards the sense of the whole passage, Hildebrand refers to Plato, Rep. iv. p. 427—430.

² So Oudendorp. But since, in lieu of "via sua," one MS. reads "vi sua," and another "in sua," I suspect that Apuleius wrote "vi insanam appetentiam—"

⁴ In Plato, Rep. v. p. 473. See Ruhnken on Rutil. Lup. i. 6.

[25.] He says, moreover, that all the citizens should be imbued with morality,¹ so that there may be no desire of possessing gold and silver in those, to whose guardianship and good faith the commonwealth is intrusted; and that they may not seek private wealth under the guise of its being public; and that hospitality may not take place of such a kind, that, while the door is not opened to others, they may so take care of food and living for themselves, as to waste on common feasts the money they may receive from those whom they protect. Marriages too (he says)² are not to be entered into individually, but are to be common,³ through the wise men of the states and magistrates, appointed⁴ to that business by lot, arranging in a public manner the betrothals for marriages of that kind, and taking especial care that persons be not united unequal to, or unlike each other. With these is connected a useful and necessary confusion,⁴ so that through⁵ the bringing up of children, unknown as yet, being mixed together, there is produced a difficulty of recognition by parents; for, while they do not know their own, they believe all, whom they may see of that age, to be their own, and all become, as it were, the parents of all the children in common. Of these marriages there is sought at a proper time the union; of which he believes⁶ the fidelity will be firm, if the number of the days accords with the harmony of music; while they, who are born of such marriages, will be imbued with fitting studies, and taught by the best instructions in the common master-hall of the preceptors, (and this too) not merely those of the male sex, but of the female likewise; whom Plato⁷ wishes to be united in all arts, that are thought to be peculiar to men, and even in those of war; since to both there is the same power, as their nature is one. (He says too) that a state of this kind has no need of laws, laid down from without; for being

²⁻³ On this celebrated doctrine of Plato, see Rep. v. p. 459, E. and foll.

³ I have translated, as if the text were "traditis," not "præditis," omitting with two MSS. "et" before "sorte—"

⁴ Compare Tim. p. 18, D.

⁵ I have translated, as if the text were originally, as Oudendorp saw, "per mixta—afferat—" not "permixta—afferant—"

⁷ In Rep. v. p. 451, and Laws vi. p. 780, C. and foll.

founded on ¹the rules of prudence,¹ and on that kind of institutions and manners, (of)² which mention has been made, it does not require other laws. And this commonwealth he intends to have been formed by himself, as a feigned representation of the truth, for the sake of an example.

[26.] There is likewise another commonwealth built up (by him) sufficiently just, and ³the best indeed³ in a certain appearance and by way of an example, and not, as the former is, without proofs,⁴ but with some ground-work. In this, after seeking the principles of the origin of a state and its foundations, he discusses, not in his own name,⁵ its situation⁶ and advantages, and he proceeds to the point, as to how a civil governor, after obtaining a place of that kind, and an assembly of many persons, ought, according to the nature of things present and of persons coming together, to build up a state full of good laws and of good morals. In this too⁷ he wishes the same bringing up of children and the same discipline in arts to be adopted. But in the case of marriages, and births, and patrimonies, he swerves from the rules laid down for the former commonwealth,⁸ by making marriages an affair of individuals, and the business of the suitors themselves private.⁸ But though the parties in contracting a marriage ought to take counsel from

² I have inserted the preposition requisite for the syntax, in Latin "de—"

³ I have transposed the words "optima quidem," which could not precede "satis justa—" but might be found before "ipsa quidem," at least if we alter "quidem" into "quadam" and refer it to "specie," as translated.

⁵ But in that of an Athenian stranger.

⁶ I have translated, as if Apuleius had written, not "statu—" but "situ," remembering the passage in the Laws, iv. p. 704, where Plato discusses the advantages and disadvantages arising from the choice in the site of a city.

⁷ Here, as before, "equidem" is found united improperly to a third person.

their own wishes, yet he decrees that the matter, as belonging to public good, ought to be looked into by the chiefs of the state in general. ¹ Wherefore let not the rich refuse a marriage with their inferiors, and let those in poverty obtain an union with the rich; ¹ and should there be an agreement in the strength of property, still different dispositions are to be mixed together, so that a quiet woman may be joined to a passionate man; and to a mild man may be united a rather excitable woman, in order that ² by such remedies and the fruits of living together ³ the offspring, formed out of differing natures, may coalesce by a better produce of manners, and so the state be increased by the means of families put together. ³ Children, too, conceived in the seed-bed of dissimilar manners, ⁴ when drawing in the fashion of a likeness of both, ⁴ there will be wanting in them neither vigour in carrying on affairs, nor counsel in surveying them; but they are to be instructed ⁵ according as the parents may determine. ⁵ Individuals too may have houses and private property, as they may be able; which, however, he does not permit to be increased by avarice, or wasted by luxury, or deserted through negligence. And for this state he orders laws to be promulgated; and he exhorts the framer of laws, when he has an idea of doing such a thing, to direct his contemplation to virtue.

[27.] As regards the mode of government, he considers that to be useful, which is formed by the mixture of three (kinds); for he does not think that the mere form of government, either by the upper orders or of the mob, is by itself useful; nor does he leave the faults of rulers unpunished; but he de-

²—² I have translated, as if the text were "talibus remediis et conversationum proventibus," not "talibus observationum remediis et proventibus," which, I confess, I cannot understand.

³ One MS. has "consitarum," which better suits with the metaphor in "proventu," than "compositarum."

⁴—⁴ Such is the literal and unintelligible version of the text, "cum utriusque instar similitudinis traxerint—" Opportunely then does one MS. read "ab utrisque—" which lead to "cum ab utrisque insita formam similitudinis traxerint," i. e. "when, after being planted by both, they draw out the form of a likeness—"

termines that ¹a reason for ruling¹ exists rather with those, who are the superior in power. And other conditions of public affairs are thought to be defined by him, which have a leaning towards correct morals; and to the ruler over the commonwealth, which he wishes to stand fast by the correction (of errors), he gives an order, that he first fill up the laws, remaining (incomplete); and² that he desire the laws to be corrected, that are wrong; and then that he turn³ the teachings, which are corrupting the good of the state, to a better account; from which, if the depraved masses cannot be turned aside by advice and persuasion, they must be drawn from the course, they have commenced, by force and ⁴without a show of favour to any one.⁴ He describes too how in an active state the whole mass conducts itself when led by goodness and justice. For such persons will take to their arms their nearest relations; will guard their honours; drive off intemperance; restrain injustice, (and) give to modesty and the other ornaments of life the greatest honours. ⁵Nor let a multitude rashly fly together to the constitutions of commonwealths of that kind, except those who⁶ have been brought up under the best laws and superior institutions, (and are) moderate towards others, (and) agreeing amongst themselves.

[28.] ⁶Of citizens, worthy to be blamed, there are four kinds; one is of those, who are the chiefs in honour; another is of the few, with whom the power over affairs rests; the third is ¹ Instead of "rationem," Wower would read "gubernationem—". Perhaps Apuleius wrote "constare imperii rationem—" as I have translated.

² To fill up the sense this word is added, and "aut" altered into "et—"

³ I have translated, as if the text were, what the syntax demands, "convertat," not "convertit."

⁴ Such, I presume, is the meaning of "ingratis" here.

⁵ In the words between the numerals there is evidently something to be supplied. For Apuleius is here alluding to what Plato has laid down in the Laws, v. p. 740, that when by any event the prescribed number of 5040 of families shall become reduced, their place is to be supplied not from any source, but only from a select one. Hence he probably wrote "ad ejusmodi rerum publicarum status restituendos, si desit quid, sed qui—" where "restituendos" might easily have been lost after the letters "-rum status," and "si desit quid, sed qui," corrupted into "nisi qui—" and thus the sense will be, "to restore, if any thing be wanting, the constitution of commonwealths of this kind—" of the rule of all; the last of that of a tyrant.⁶ Now the first kind, ¹he says, is produced then, ¹when the more prudent persons are driven from the state by seditious² magistrates, and the power is transferred to these, who are strong in hand merely; and when not those, who could conduct affairs with milder counsels, obtain the means of ruling, but those, who are turbulent and violent. But the state of the few³ is obtained, ⁴when many persons poor, (and) criminal, and at the same time lying under the impotence of the wealthy few, give themselves up and permit,⁴ and when all the power of government not good morals but riches have obtained. The popular faction is strengthened, when the mass without wealth does by its strength hold out against the means of the rich, ⁵and the law is at the bidding⁵ of the people promulgated, that it is lawful

⁶ The same idea, expressed in less perfect language, has been repeated in p. 361.

² The word "seditiosos" seems strangely introduced here. Apuleius wrote, I suspect, "seditiosne usos—" i. e. "taking advantage of a sedition—" as the so-called thirty tyrants did at Athens.

³ Oligarchy.

⁴ Such is the literal and unintelligible version of "cum inopes criminosi multi simul paucorum divitum impotentis subiacentes dederint se atque permiserint—" But, unless I am greatly mistaken, Apuleius wrote "cum inopes, crimine usi multo, suum modo, paucorum divitum impudentis subiacentes dederint se atque permiserint omnia; omnemque—" For this comparison of persons, wallowing in crimes, to swine, is confirmed by the expression in Rep. ii. p. 373, εἰ—ὧν πόλιν—κατασπαζέας, and by ὥσπερ θηρίον ὕιον ἐν ἀμαθίᾳ μολύνῃται in Rep. vii. p. 535, E., where one would prefer θρίμμα νοβοιωτῶν, in allusion to Pindar's Βοιωτῶν ὧν in Ol. vi. 152, on which see Porson in Supplement, Pref. ad Hec. 57, who might have remarked, and so too might Meineke in Cratin. Fragm. 153, that the words Οὔτοι δ' εἰσὶν νοβοιωτοὶ lie hid in οὔτοι δ' αὖ οὗς in Plutarch, Περὶ Σαρκοφάγ. ii. p. 995, E. See too Pseudo-Locr. Tim. p. 104, E. § 12, where the souls of the lascivious are feigned to be sent into swine; and Horace, "Epicuri de grege porcus," which I have quoted in p. 364, n. ⁴—, to support my restoration "Epicurei suis." Or we might read in Rep., ὥσπερ θρίμμα ἡμερὸν ὕιον— and compare ὥσων ἡμεροὶ εἰσὶν ἀγέλας in Legg. v. p. 713, D. Moreover, I cannot understand why Elmenhorst and Oudendorp should prefer "impotentis" to "potentis;" for assuredly the wealthy are not powerless, as shown by Rep. i. p. 336, A., μήνα ολιμύτου δύνασθαι πλουσίον ἀνδρός. Lastly, "omnia" might easily have been lost before "omnem—" Or we may read "—permiserint totum—" similar to "se totum dedit atque permisit," with which Apuleius closes his treatise De Mundo.

⁵ In the letters "ejus sub" lie hid "ea jussu," not "ejus jussu," as Oudendorp imagined, for "ejus" is scarcely intelligible.

for all to obtain honours equally. After this there arises then ¹the individual head of that tyranny,¹ when he, who shall have broken through the laws through his contempt for them, ²shall make an attack upon the government, after being fitted for it by a similar conspiracy amongst the lawless,² and ordain subsequently that the whole mass of citizens are to obey his desires and wishes, and to regulate their obsequiousness by such an aim.³

BOOK III.

ON THE PHILOSOPHY OF REASONING.⁴

[1.] THE study of wisdom, which we call philosophy, seems to most persons to contain three kinds or parts, relating to Nature, (and) Morals, and Reasoning, of which (last) I now propose to speak, and in which is comprehended the art of Discussion. But while we are discussing the subject of

²—² I have translated, as if the text were “simili illegum conjuratione aptatus ad imperium invaserit—” not “simili legum conjuratione adoptatum imperium invaserit—” which, as being unintelligible, various scholars have attempted to amend in various ways; of whom Lipsius alone has hit upon the truth by reading “illegum,” while, as regards “adaptatus,” since Oudendorp vainly assimilates it to “cooptatus,” I have altered it into “aptatus ad—”

³ How true is this description of a tyranny, is shown by the history of not only ancient-but modern times.

⁴ There is another title, “Or about Interpretation—” which I have omitted, as being scarcely intelligible in English; although it is the very word taken from Aristotle, whom Apuleius, through the whole of this book, had constantly in mind; for of the rules and forms of Logic scarcely a vestige is to be found directly in the writings of Plato; while of the treatise itself Colvius truly says, towards the close of it, that it contains passages in not a sufficiently sound state, and such as cannot be restored without the aid of MSS., although something may be done in that way by comparing the Latin of Apuleius with the Greek of Aristotle.

speaking—of which there are various kinds, such as of giving a command [or orders],¹ of narrating, [being angry,]² wishing, vowing,³ being angry,⁴ hating, envying, favouring, pitying, admiring, despising, reproaching, repenting, deploring, and as well of bringing pleasure, as of striking terror, in which it is the part of a superior speaker to be able to make statements, that are diffused, in a narrow compass, (and) what are narrowed, in a wide one; what is common-place, in a pretty manner; (and) what is new, in a customary one; ⁵to make, what is great, little, and matters very great out of little;⁵ and (to do) very many other things of that kind—there is amongst these one, relating for the most part to a Proposition. This is called enunciative, when it comprehends an absolute sentiment; and is the only one of all, ⁶that is exposed to truth or falsehood;⁶ which Sergius calls “Effatum” (an expression); ⁷Varro, “proloquium” (a fore-speaking); Cicero, “enuntiatio” (an enunciation);⁷ the Greeks, πρότασις (a fore-stretching); likewise ἄξιωμα, which I (render)⁸ word for word, as well by “protensionem,” as by “rogamentum,”⁹ (an asking,)⁹ but which may be called more familiarly a proposition.

[2.] Now of Propositions, as well as of their Conclusions, there are two kinds; one, the Predicative, which is simple too,¹⁰ as if we should say—“He, who rules, is happy;” another, Substitutive, or Conditional, which is compounded too,¹¹ as if you should say¹²—“He, who rules, if he is wise, is happy.”

¹ As in the whole of this list “vel” is never found elsewhere, it is pretty evident that either “imperandi” or “mandandi” is an interpolation.

² Either “succensendi” here, or “irascendi” in ⁶, is an interpolation.

³ I have adopted “vovendi,” suggested by Lipsius, in lieu of “fovendi.”

⁴ Compare Phædr. p. 267, A. § 113, where see Heindorf.

⁵ Aristotle, Περὶ Ἑρμηνείας, § 4, defines in like manner πρόφαντικὸν λόγον, ἐν ᾧ τὸ ἀληθεύειν ἢ ψεύδεσθαι ὑπάρχει.

⁷ Compare Seneca, Epist. 117, § 13, Aul. Gell. Noct. Att. xvi. 8, who drew their information chiefly from Cicero, Academ. iv. 29, Tuscul. i. 7, and De Fato, 1, 1; 9, 19; 12, 28.

⁸ I have supplied the verb required by the sense.

⁹ Floridus correctly remarks, that “rogamentum” is not the meaning of ἄξιωμα—which is rather, “a settled opinion,” like “axiom” in Geometry. In English, however, the word “question” is used in the sense of an inquiry into any subject for discussion.

¹⁰ ¹¹ It is difficult to understand why “etiam” should be thus written before “simplex,” and “composita.”

¹² In lieu of the unintelligible “Ajax,” Nansius happily suggested “aisa.”

For you substitute a condition, through which a person, unless he is wise, is not happy. (But) we will now speak of the Predicative, which naturally precedes, and is, as it were, the element (i. e. the principle) of the Substitutive.

There are likewise other differences, (namely) of Quantity and Quality. Of Quantity, in that some are General; as "Every breathing thing is alive; others Particular, as "Some animals do not breathe;" others Undefined, as "Animal breathes;" for the assertion does not define, whether it is every one, or some one. ¹ Nevertheless it always avails in the place of a Particular; because it is more safe to admit from what is uncertain that, which is less.¹ But of Quality, in that some are Affirmative;² because they affirm something about something, as "Virtue is a good;" for it affirms that there is goodness in Virtue; others Negative,³ as "Virtue is not a good;" for it denies that there is goodness in Virtue. The Stoics consider this too an Affirmative, when they say "It happens to a certain pleasure to be not a good." It affirms therefore, what happens to it, that is, what it is. For that reason, they say, it is Affirmative, because it affirms there is in that thing, in which it has denied there is that, which does not seem to be in it; but they call that alone Negative, to which a negative particle is prefixed. Now these will be beaten⁴ as well in other points as in this, should a person make this inquiry, ⁵ "That, which has not substance, does not exist." For they will be compelled, according to ¹ Such is the literal version of words, which, I confess, I do not understand. Martianus Capella, who evidently drew from the same source as Apuleius did, or rather Pseud.-Apuleius, according to Hildebrand, has in iv. § 396, more intelligibly—"Quod igitur indefinite dicimus, necessario particulariter accipimus; non necessario universaliter; et quoniam id potissimum enumerandum, quod securum habet intellectum, indefinitum pro particulari accipitur."

² The word in Apuleius is "dedicativæ," derived from "dedico," which Nonius identifies with "dico—" The modern expression is "Affirmative;" which I have adopted throughout.

³ The word in Apuleius is "Abdicativæ," answering to the modern "Negative."

⁴ I have translated, as if the text were, not "vincuntur," but "vincuntur," as required by the subsequent "rogaverit—"

what they assert, to confess that, what has no substance, is that, which does not exist.¹

[3.] A proposition, says Plato in the Theætetus,¹ consists of two parts of speech, a noun and verb, in the fewest words, as "Apuleius discusses;" which is either true or false; and is therefore a proposition. From whence some² have laid it down, that there are only those two parts of speech; because from those alone can be formed a perfect speech, that is, one which includes a sentence entirely; and that adverbs and pronouns and participles and conjunctions, and the rest of things of that kind, which Grammarians enumerate, are no more the parts of speech than are the (parts) of ships their ornaments, or of men their hairs; but³ that in the whole framework of a speech they are certainly to be reckoned in the place of bolts and pitch and glue. Moreover, of the two parts before-mentioned one is called the Subjective,⁴ as if it were placed under, as "Apuleius;" the other the Declarative,⁵ as "discusses," or "discusses not;" for it declares what Apuleius is doing. It is permissible, however, while the meaning remains the same, to extend each part to more words; as if, instead of "Apuleius," you should say, "the Platonic philosopher of Madaura;" and in like manner, instead of "discussing," you should say that "he is making use of a speech." For the most part the Subject is the minor

¹ The passage alluded to is not, I think, in the Theætetus, but in the Sophist, p. 262, C. § 103, where the Stranger, while conversing with Theætetus, says that "words cannot express an act, or the existence of any thing, unless a person mixes up verbs with nouns; and then, if they have been fitted properly, their combination becomes a speech, nearly of all speeches the first and shortest. . . . When, therefore, a person says, 'Man learns,' you assert that this is the shortest speech and the first—" for so that passage should have been translated, where Plato evidently wrote τὸν δὲ, εἰ ἥρμοστο εὖ ἐκείνα, λόγος ἱγίαιτο εὐθὺς ἢ συμπλοκή, σχεδὸν πάντων τῶν λόγων πρῶτος καὶ μικρότατος— οὐκ ὅτι δὲ ἥρμοστο καὶ λόγος ἱγίαιτο εὐθὺς ἢ πρώτῃ συμπλοκῇ, σχεδὸν τῶν λόγων πρῶτος— where ἥρμοστο and σχεδὸν are equally at variance with syntax and sense.

² Of the modern Philologists, who have adopted this notion, the principal are Hemsterhuis and Horne Tooke.

³ I have translated, as if the text were "at," not "aut—" which is here unintelligible.

⁴ Instead of "Subjective" and "Declarative," the expressions in modern Logic are "Subject" and "Predicate;" which I have adopted generally elsewhere.

(in a proposition), and the Predicate the major, inasmuch as it embraces not only this Subject, but others likewise. For not only does Apuleius discuss, but many others who can be comprehended under the same Predicate; unless perchance a peculiarity belonging to something is predicated of it; as if you should say, "That, which is a horse, is able to neigh;" now "to neigh" is peculiar to a horse. Hence in these peculiarities equal is the Predicate, and equal too the Subject; but not, as in other cases, (the former,) ¹ is the major; since, when ² the same proposition might conversely become the Subject, and have as the Predicate of itself that, which it had previously as the Subject; as if, by changing the order, ³ you should say, "That, which is able to neigh, is a horse." But you would not be able to convert in like manner the terms, when they are unequal. For, not because it is true that "Every man is an animal," will it on that account be true, if you convert the terms, that "Every animal is a man." For it is not as peculiar to a man to be an animal, as it is to a horse to neigh; since there are other animals without number. Hence the Predicate is known in many ways; although the question be proposed in a converse order. First, because the Predicate can embrace more things than the Subject; next, because it is never ended by a Noun, but always by a Verb; by which especially it is distinguished even in the peculiarities alluded to from an equal Subject. This likewise is to be considered in the way of a comparison, that as propositions ⁴ (taken as a whole) ⁴ are both definite and indefinite, so it is agreed that portions of them, Subjective as well as Declarative, are partly defined, as "man" (and) "animal," and partly undefined, as "not a man" (and) "not an animal." For they do not define what a thing is, when (they say) it is not, but merely show that there is something else besides it.

¹ I have added "the former" for the sake of perspicuity.

² If "cum" be retained, the apodosis of the sentence will be wanting; and if it be rejected, it is difficult to say, from whence it came.

³ Such is the proper meaning here and elsewhere of "mutata vice—"

⁴—"I have added the words between the numerals for the sake of the antithesis in "particulas—" The Delphin editor explains, however, "particulas" by "vocabula—" with a view of making something like sense out of what would be otherwise nonsense.

[4.] We must now state in what manner these four¹ propositions are affected towards each other; which it will not be foreign to the purpose to view in the figure of a square. Let there be then on the upper line, as expressed below,² an Affirmative and a Negative, (both) Universal, as "All pleasure is a good," (and) "No pleasure is a good;" and let these be called Disagreeing.³ And in like manner on the lower line under each (Universal) let a Particular be noted, "Some pleasure is a good," (and) "Some pleasure is not a good;" and let these be called "Sub-equals"⁴ to each other. Then let oblique lines be drawn from the angles (of the square), one extending from the Universal Affirmative to the Particular Negative; another from the Particular Affirmative to the Universal Negative; and let them, as they are the contrary to each other in Quantity and Quality, be called "One or the other,"⁵ because it is necessary for one or the other to be true; which is called a perfect and whole contest; but between the Sub-equals and the Disagreeing the contest is divided; because the

² Although "infra scriptum est" is found here, and further on "ostendunt infra scripta—" yet in both places one would prefer "in figura—"

³ In modern Logic, the expressions are "Contrary" and "Subcontrary." See the figure in Aldrich's Logic.

⁵ Such is the literal meaning of "alterutra." The expression in Aristotle is ἀντιπαρισταὶ ἀντισταναί, or simply ἀντιπαρῆς, as remarked by others. Hence in modern Logic the expression is "Opposites," "Contradictory."

Disagreeing never become at the same time true, although they are occasionally at the same time false; while conversely the Sub-equals are never indeed false at the same time, although occasionally they are at the same time true; and on this account the refutation of either of these confirms the other; whereas the confirmation of either does not refute the other. But of the Disagreeing he, who has laid down¹ either one, takes off² the other, whereas conversely he, who takes off either one, does not lay down the other. For in truth he, who confirms either of (the so-called One or the other)³ never refutes the other; while⁴ he, who refutes the other confirms either of the (so-called)⁵ One or the other.⁶ But when either of the Universals is proved, it confirms its own Particular; but when it is refuted, it does not weaken it; and conversely, when either of the Particulars is refuted, it weakens its own Universal; but, when it is proved, it does not confirm it. Now that all this is so, as we assert, that, which is delineated below,⁶ easily shows from the propositions themselves. For it is ascertained what a person concedes, who shall have made any proposition.

[5.] Now either of the Universals is destroyed in three ways; when its Particular is shown to be false, or either one of the two others, whether the Disagreeing or the Sub-neutral.⁷ But it is supported in one way, if the Sub-neutral⁸ belonging

^{1, 2} Such is the literal version of "posuit" and "tollit;" which the Delphin editor interprets by "probavit" and "negat."

³ I have added these words to show that they refer to the definition mentioned a little above.

⁴ The antithesis evidently requires "at," not "et—"

⁵ As the MSS. vary between "alteram" and "quamvis," I have translated, as if the text were "alterutrarum quamvis," for the sake of the antithesis.

⁶ Here too, for the balance of the sentence, I have translated, as if "utramvis" had dropt out after "autem—"

⁷ See p. 386, n. 2, where the figure alluded to is given.

to it is shown to be false. On the other hand, either of the Particulars¹² is destroyed,³ if its Sub-neuter.⁴ But it is supported in three ways; if its Universal is true, or either of the two others is false, whether its Sub-equal or Sub-neuter.

The same facts we shall observe in the case of Equivalent propositions. Now those are said to be "Equivalent," which under another enunciation have an equal power, and are at the same time true, or at the same time false, one on account of the other, as the Undefined⁵ and the Particular. Moreover every proposition, if it assumes at its commencement a Negative particle, becomes (as)⁶ its Sub-alternate Equivalent; as when there is an Universal Affirmative, "All pleasure is a good," if a negation be prefixed to it, it will be "Not all pleasure is a good," having the same meaning as its Sub-alternate had, "Some pleasure is not a good." And in the three other propositions the same thing is to be understood.

[6.] Then with respect to Conversion, an Universal Negative and its Sub-alternate, a Particular Affirmative, are said to be Convertible propositions, on that account, because their portions, Subjective and Declarative, are able to preserve always their mutual changes, the condition of truth or falsehood still remaining. For as this proposition is true—"No prudent man is impious—" so, if you make a change in its parts, it will be true (to say), "No impious man is prudent." In like manner, as it is false (to say), "No man is an animal," so, if you make a change, it will be false (to say), "No animal is man." By parity of reasoning a Particular Affirmative becomes Convertible, "A certain grammarian is man," and dita." By referring, however, to the diagram, it would seem that both "alterutra" and "subneutra," would be best understood by "the diagonal" or "cross" proposition. But I have preferred the word "Sub-alternate," adopted in modern Logic, as the translation of "alterutra."

¹ Since "subneutra" has been used just above in the sense of "alterutra," so, I think, it was written originally, both here and in the next sentence (⁴), instead of "alterutra—" as I have translated.

² I have translated, as if "utravis" had been lost before "Particularis—" for it is absolutely requisite to balance the preceding "utravis Universalis."

³ I have adopted "destruitur" from one MS., similar to "destruitur" just before; for the future would have no meaning here.

⁵ I have translated, as if "uti" had been lost after "fit—"

"A certain man is a grammarian." This result the two other propositions cannot always effect; although they sometimes undergo a Conversion; nor yet are they on that account said to be Convertible; for that which sometimes 'deceives, is rejected as uncertain.¹ Each proposition must therefore be laid open² through all its significations, as to whether it agrees, when it is taken Conversely. ³ Nor are those universally true;³ but only five. For either the peculiarity of something is declared, or its genus, or difference, or ⁴defined limit,⁴ or accident; nor beyond these (predicates) can any thing be found in any proposition. For instance, should you lay down "man" as the subject, you would say something of him, or mark out a peculiarity of his, as "being able to laugh;"⁵ or his genus, as "an animal;" or his difference, as "being rational;" or defined limit, as "a mortal animal endowed with reason;" or accident, as "being an orator." Since every thing, which is Declarative of any thing, either can, or cannot, be in turn its Subjective. And if it can, it either marks out what it is, and is (thus) a defined limit; or it does not mark out, and is (thus) a peculiarity. But if it cannot, there is either that, which ought to be placed in the definition, and (thus) there is a genus or difference; or what ought not (to be placed), and is (thus) an accident. Through these means then it will be known that the Particular Negative is not convertible. Now the Universal Affirmative is not by itself convertible; but it can be nevertheless made convertible,

² Instead of "reperienda," Wower suggested "repetenda—" I have translated, as if Apuleius had written "aperienda—"

³—³ So Oudendorp from MS. Petav.; another reads "nec universæ vere sunt;" a third, "nec innumeræ revera sunt istæ—" which seems far preferable, as regards the antithesis in "quinque solæ—" I confess, however, I do not see what the writer meant by the words between the numerals. I could have understood, "Nor are Universal propositions in reality numberless, but only these five—" in Latin, "nec universæ sunt innumeræ revera; sed istæ quinque solæ."

⁴—⁴ By "finis," some understand "definition," others "limit." I have united both.

as a Particular. For example, when the proposition is, "Every man is an animal," it cannot be converted, so as to be, "Every animal is a man;" but it may be, as a Particular, "A certain animal is man." But this (is) in a simple 'conversion, which is called in the inferences of conclusions a Reflex.¹ There is likewise another Conversion of propositions, which draws not only the order, but likewise the parts themselves to the contrary; so that, what is defined, becomes undefined; and, on the other hand, what is undefined (becomes) defined. This conversion the two remaining, (namely,) the Universal Affirmative and the Particular Negative, admit in turn; as, "Every man is an animal;" (and) "Every thing, that is not an animal, is not a man;" in like manner, "A certain animal is not rational;" (and) "A certain thing, which is not rational, is (not)² an animal." Now that this is so constantly, as we have said, you will discover by exploring all the five species before-mentioned.

[7.] The combination of propositions is said to be their connexion through another common part,³ by which they are united; for they can thus agree towards one conclusion. Now that common part must needs be in both propositions the Subject, or in both the Predicate; or in one the Subject, (and) in the other the Predicate. The forms therefore become three; of which let that be called the first, when that common part is in one the Subject, in the other the Predicate; which order 'is content not with an enumeration only, but with the worthiness of the conclusions;⁴ since the third form

² I have inserted, what Floridus has suggested, the negative particle, required by the sense.

³ This is now called in Logic "a middle term," as remarked by Floridus.

⁴— Such is the literal version of the text, and this the Delphin editor's interpretation, "which arrangement depends not merely upon an accidental enumeration, but on the excellence of the inferences." But as there is nothing in the text to answer to "fortuita," that word has been evidently introduced to make something like sense out of what seemed to

is the last ; because from it nothing is inferred, except a Particular ; (but) superior to this is the second, which contains Universal inferences, but only of a Negative kind : and the first is thus the powerful one, because in it¹ every kind of inferences is contained. Now I call that an inference or inferential question² which is collected and inferred from admissions. Moreover an admission is the proposition, which is conceded by the respondent ; for instance, should a person propose (this question)—Is every honourable thing good ?—it is a proposition ; and if (the respondent)³ says that he assents, there is, on the question being removed, an admission ; which is itself in common parlance the proposition—“ Every honourable thing is good.” To this you may unite⁴ another admission proposed and conceded in a similar manner—“ Every good thing is useful.” From this combination arises, as we shall presently show, the inferential (kind) of the first mode ; Universal, if (stated) Directly—“ Therefore every honourable thing is useful ;” (but) Particular, if (stated) Inversely,⁵—“ Therefore a useful thing is honourable ;” because a Universal Affirmative can be converted in the manner of a Particular only in the case of Inverted Propositions. Now an inference I say is made Directly⁶ when the same part is the Subject, as well in the combination as in the inference itself ;⁶ and likewise the Predicate is the same, when it exists in both ways ; but it is made Inversely,⁷ when the same thing takes place in an inverse order.⁷

be otherwise nonsense. One MS. has “numeri ratione,” from which however nothing seems to be gained.

¹ I have translated, as if the text were not “in omne genus—concluditur—” but “in ea omne—”

² On the meaning of “rogamentum,” see iii. § 1, p. 382, n. ².

³ I have inserted the respondent, for the sake of perspicuity.

⁴ I have translated, as if the text were “jungere est,” not “junge.”

⁵ So I have translated here and elsewhere “reflexim.”

⁷ That is, says Floridus, when the Predicate of the Conclusion is the Subject in one of the Premises, but the Subject is the Predicate in another.

[8.] Now let the whole of the reasoning, which is made up of admissions and inferences, be called by the name of a gathering-together of a conclusion; (and) it may be most conveniently defined, according to Aristotle,¹ as "a discourse, in which some things being conceded, something else beside what have been conceded, necessarily turns out, but yet through what have been conceded." In which definition no other kind of a discourse is to be understood than what is enunciable; which, as we have stated above,² is alone either true or false. And the expression, "some things being conceded," is put in the plural on that account, because a gathering together cannot take place from one admission; although it appears to Antipater the Stoic,³ contrary to the opinion of all, that (this)⁴ conclusion is complete—"Thou seest; therefore thou art alive;" whereas it would be complete in this way—"If thou seest, thou art alive; but thou dost see, therefore thou art alive." Moreover, because we want to draw a Conclusion not in what is conceded, but in what is denied, on that account (it is stated)⁵ in the definition that "something else necessarily turns out, beside what has been conceded." On which account the forms adopted by the Stoics are superfluous, that go through not the same thing in a different manner. For example—"It is day or night. Now it is day."⁶ Moreover, they double the same—"If day is, day is; therefore day is." Vainly then do they draw an inference, where a

² See iii. § 1, p. 382, n. ⁶.

³ This Antipater, the Stoic of Tyre, was the preceptor of Cato the younger, as we learn from the Life of the Roman by Plutarch.

⁴ I have translated, as if "hæc" had dropt out between "plena" and "conclusio—"

⁵ I have added these words for the sake of perspicuity.

⁶ To complete the Syllogism, there is evidently wanting the Conclusion, "Therefore it is not night—" as in Isidorus Origin. ii. 28, "Quartus modus est ita—Aut dies est aut nox. Utique dies est. Nox ergo non est:" unless it be said that Apuleius designedly omitted the Conclusion, to show how illogically the Stoics reasoned; as Cicero does in Academ. Quæst. ii. 24, "Quid enim faceret huic conclusioni? 'Si lucet, lucet. Lucet autem. Lucet igitur.' Crederet scilicet. Ipsa enim ratio conexi, cum concesseris superius, cogit inferius concedere:" a passage the most apt for enabling us to understand here the pseudo-syllogism immediately following.

concession is made willingly and without a controversy. This is more like the truth, when I assert—"If day is, there is light. Now day is. Therefore it is light," that I am not wrongly drawing a conclusion beyond what I have admitted. For "it is light," which is in the Conclusion, has been also in the (major) proposition. But this we will refute in this manner, (by saying) that, "therefore it is light," is said in a different manner in the Conclusion, so that it may be shown it is now light; but it is taken in a different manner in the (minor) proposition, in which it is not said, that it is now light, but merely that it follows, that, if there be day, there will be likewise light. Now there is a great difference, whether you affirm that something exists in this way now, or merely that it is wont to be, when something else goes before. That too has taken place—namely, that in the same definition the idea of necessity has been included—in order that the force of the Conclusion may be distinguished from the likeness to an Induction. For in an Induction some things are conceded; for instance—"A man moves the lower jaw; a horse moves the lower jaw; and so does the ox and dog." From these admissions something else is inferred in the Conclusion—"Therefore every animal likewise moves the lower jaw." But as this is not true in the case of the crocodile, you cannot, although the preceding are conceded, admit the inference, which it would not have been lawful for you to refuse in the Conclusion; since the inference is comprehended in the admission itself; and on this account there has been added the expression—"turn out necessarily." Nor is even the last part of the definition superfluous; but it shows from the very things, which it has conceded, that the inference ought to turn out, but not that it would be established.

[9.] But on these points enough has been said. And we must now lay down, by what modes and combinations true conclusions take place within a determinate number of the Predicative kind (of propositions). ¹In the first form there are found nine modes, taken by themselves, but six combinations; in the second, four modes, (but) three combinations; in the third, six modes, (but) five combinations; ¹respecting which ¹ On these forms, modes, and combinations, the inquisitive reader must turn to Martian. Capell. iv. 411, and to the treatises on Logic by Aldrich and others.

(taken) in their order I will here put down the proofs, premising that a conclusion cannot be established from Particular propositions alone, or from Negative alone, because they can often lead even to what is false; moreover, that although, if either Negative¹ is united to many Affirmatives, an inference is produced, not Affirmative, but Negative, (still) only one (Negative), mixed with the rest, has any power. Similar too is the force of Particular propositions. For either of them,² if mixed with Universals, produces a particular inference.

Hence in the first form the first mode is that, which deduces³ from Universal Affirmatives an Universal Affirmative directly, as,—“Every just thing is honourable. (Now) every honourable thing is good. Therefore every just thing is good.” But if you draw the inference by a bend,⁴ (for instance,) “Therefore a certain good thing is just,” there is produced by the same combination the fifth mode; for in this manner alone I have shown above can an Universal Affirmative undergo a bend.⁵

The second mode is that, which deduces from Universals, Affirmative and Negative, an Universal Negative directly, as,—“Every just thing is honourable. (But) no honourable thing is base. Therefore no just thing is base.” Now if you draw the inference by a bend, as, “Therefore no just thing is base,” you will produce the sixth mode; for, as it has been stated, an Universal Negative is bent back on itself. We ought however to remember only that the Subject is to be drawn from the Affirmative to the inference in the second mode, and on that account it (the Affirmative) is to be considered the prior, although the Negative is enunciated previously. In like manner in the case of the rest that, which

² Affirmative or Negative.

³ I have translated here and elsewhere, as if the text were “deducit,” not “conducit—” which Oudendorp says, after Isidorus in Origin. ii. 28, has the same meaning as “colligere—” which is found in the same sense towards the end of this book, “illationes colligit,” and “colligunt—illationem.”

⁴ In the terms of the Syllogism, by substituting a Particular in the place of an Universal assertion.

is the prior in power,¹ is to be undestroyed as the prior (in order). But in the sixth mode the Subjective is drawn from the Negative; (and) this is their only difference.

Further, the third mode (is that), which deduces from Affirmatives, Particular and Universal, a Particular Affirmative, as, "A certain just thing is honourable. (But) every honourable thing is useful. Therefore a certain just thing is useful." But if you draw an inference with a bend—Therefore a certain useful thing is just—you will produce the seventh mode; for, as it has been stated, a Particular Affirmative is turned back on itself.

The fourth mode is that, which deduces from a Particular Affirmative and an Universal Negative a Particular Negative directly, as, "A certain just thing is honourable. (But) no honourable thing is base. Therefore a certain just thing is not base." From this mode are discovered the changes contrary to the preceding; ²since the eighth and ninth preserve the inference of that (proposition), not as it is bent by it; (and) the (two) merely bend the combination itself² by propositions (called)³ Equivalent, and in an inverted order, so that the Negative becomes the prior; and thus (the mode)⁴ is said to deduce both by an inversion of the combinations. For if you insert the Universal Negative of the fourth (mode) and subjoin to it the Universal Affirmative, which the Particular Affirmative shall have inverted, there will be produced the eighth mode,⁵ which deduces from Universals, Negative

²⁻³ Such is the literal version of the text of Oudendorp, who has adopted, with Floridus, the readings of the Carnot MSS. in lieu of the corruptions to be found in other documents. I confess, however, I do not understand "non ut illi reflexam—" and the less so, as I do not know why "illi" should thus follow "ejus—" I suspect there is an omission here of some matter, which Apuleius drew from another source than Aristotle; who, as remarked by Floridus, rejects the five indirect modes of the first form as useless.

³ I have inserted "called," remembering the passage in iii. § 5, where Apuleius defines the expression "propositiones æquipollentes."

⁵ Since three modes, namely, the fifth, sixth, and seventh, here omitted, are found in the abridgment made of this book of Apuleius by Isidorus in Origin. ii. 28, Colvius conceives that something has been lost here, and Affirmative, a Particular Negative, in a bent manner, as, "No base thing is honourable. (But) every honourable thing is just. Therefore a certain just thing is not base."

But why the fourth mode alone should generate two (others), (while) the rest (generate) only one each, the reason is, that if we invert both propositions of the second mode, there will be produced a vain combination of two Particular (propositions); but if only one or the other,¹ there will be produced either the second form or the third.

[10.] Of these nine modes in the first form the four first are called "Non-Demonstrable;" not because they cannot be demonstrated, as ²the swelling of the tides of the whole sea, which has not been demonstrated as yet by a person, who knows the things of Nature, and ³the squaring of the circle; but because they are so simple and so manifest, as not to require demonstration; so that they produce themselves the rest, and impart from themselves a belief in them.

Of the second form we will now lay down the modes.

The first mode in the second form is that, which deduces which Isidorus met with in a more perfect MS. of Apuleius. But Hildebrand says that "the three modes, which Colvius asserts are wanting, have been explained already," and he refers to Martianus Capella iv. 411, but without remarking that there, as here, "Octavus modus—" follows the mention of "Quartus modus—" from which the just inference would be, that the MS. of this treatise, used by Martian. Capell., was less perfect than the one, which Isidorus possessed.

¹ I have adopted "alterutram," found in the Delphin interpretation, in lieu of "alteram," in the text at present; which cannot be opposed to "utramque—"

² So I have translated, as if the text were "universi maris aestuum tumentia, quod nondum demonstratum naturæ res scienti, et—" which I have elicited by uniting the readings of MS. Carnot, "universi maris aestimat quod non demonstrantur sicut," with that of MS. Petav., "universi maris aestum quod nondum demonstratum ei sit ut—" where "aestum tumentia" might easily have been corrupted into "aestimat," and "naturæ res scienti" into "entur sicut;" while "tumentia" might be used for a substantive, as "faventia" is. But though no demonstration had been given of the cause of the tides by any Natural philosopher, still it had been remarked that "menstruis cursibus Lunæ decremēta et accessus fretorum atque aestum deprehenduntur," to use the language of Apuleius, de Mundo, p. 731 = 332, where Elmenhorst refers to Strabo, iii. p. 173 = 262, and other writers, who have alluded to the subject. Oudendorp, however, proposes to read "ut universim Aristoteles aestimat, aut quod nondum demonstratum ei sit, ut—" conceiving that Apuleius alluded to Aristotle, the Peripatetic philosopher of Alexandria, mentioned a little below, and by Diogenes Laert. in Zeno, § 164.

from Universals, Affirmative and Negative, an Universal Negative directly, as, "Every just thing is honourable. (But) no base thing is honourable. Therefore that, which is not just, is dishonourable." This¹ (mode) is reduced to the second not-demonstrable by its second terms being inverted.

The second mode is that, which deduces from the Universals, Negative and Affirmative, an Universal Negative directly, as, "No base thing is honourable. (But) every just thing is honourable. Therefore no base thing is just." This mode does not differ from the former combination, except that it draws the Subjective portion from the Negative to the inference; because the order of the enunciation is varied in this way, a circumstance that could not take place in the first form.

The third mode is that, which deduces from a Particular Affirmative and an Universal Negative a Particular Negative directly, as, "A certain just thing is honourable. (But) no base thing is honourable. Therefore a certain just thing is not base." In this proposition if we invert the Universal Negative, there will arise² the fourth not-demonstrable; ³from which this is produced.³

The fourth mode is that, which deduces from a Particular Negative and an Universal Affirmative a Particular Negative directly, as, "A certain just thing is not base. (But) every bad thing is base. Therefore a certain just thing is not bad." Now this mode alone is proved through the impossible alone; about which kind of proposition we will speak, while explaining the modes of the third form.

[11.] In the third form the first mode is that, which deduces from Universal Affirmatives a Particular Affirmative as well directly as inversely, as, "Every just thing is honourable. (And) every just thing is good. Therefore a certain honourable thing is good," or thus, "Therefore a certain good thing is honourable." Since it matters not, what part from each proposition you make the Subject, as it does not matter, which you first enunciate. Hence Theophrastus does not

² I have translated, as if the text were "fiat," not "fit—"

³ I confess I do not see any necessity for the words between the numerals.

rightly decide that on this account there is not one mode, but two.

The second mode is that, which deduces from Affirmatives, Particular and Universal, an Affirmative Particular directly, as, "A certain just thing is honourable. (And) every just thing is good. Therefore a certain honourable thing is good."

The third mode is that, which deduces from Affirmatives, Universal and Particular, an Affirmative Particular directly, as, "Every just thing is honourable. (And) a certain just thing is good. Therefore a certain good thing is honourable."

The fourth mode is that, which deduces from Universals, Affirmative and Negative, a Negative Particular directly, as, "Every just thing is honourable. (But) no just thing is bad. Therefore a certain honourable thing is not bad."

The fifth mode is that, which deduces from an Affirmative Particular and a Negative Universal an Affirmative Particular directly, as, "A certain just thing is honourable. (But) no just thing is bad. Therefore a certain honourable thing is not bad."

The sixth mode is that, which deduces from an Affirmative Universal and a Negative Particular, a Negative Particular directly, as, "Every just thing is honourable. (And) a certain just thing is not bad. Therefore¹ a certain honourable thing is not bad."

[12.] Of these six modes, the three first are reduced to the third not-demonstrable, by the first proposition of the first and second (mode) being inverted; while the third has the same combination with the second, (but) differing in this alone, that it takes from an Universal its Subjective portion, inasmuch as it is reduced to the third by the inversion not only of the proposition but of the inference. In like manner the fourth and fifth are produced from the fourth not-demonstrable by their first propositions being inverted. But the sixth mode cannot be reduced to any not-demonstrable mode by either both propositions, or one, or the other,² being inverted; but it is proved merely by what is impossible; just as the fourth mode in the second form; and on that account both are numbered the last. But of the rest the arrangement is made in all the forms according to the difference of the combinations and inferences. For since to make an assertion is prior to giving a denial, and an Universal has a greater power than a Particular, Universals are prior to Particulars; and to both are similar an Affirmation and an Inference; and that mode is placed before, which is reduced more quickly to the not-demonstrable mode, that is to say, by one inversion; which is one method of proving that those modes are fixed for a conclusion. There is likewise another method, which is common to all, even the not-demonstrable, and which is said to be through what is impossible, and is called by the Stoics the first laying down or the first exposition; which they define thus, "If from two (assertions) a third is deduced, one of them, 'when it collects inferences (from) a contrary, leaves the contrary.' But the old (logicians) have thus defined, "When one or the other of (two) propositions is assumed, if the ²inference of every conclusion is done away,³ the remaining (proposition) is done away." Now this was invented in opposition to those, who, after admissions have been made, impudently refuse (to receive) what is deduced from them; while from that, which they deny, something may be discovered contrary to that, which they had previously conceded. Moreover, (since)³ it is impossible for contraries to be at one and the same time true, they are consequently driven by what is impossible to the conclusion. Nor have logicians vainly laid down that that mode is true, in which the contrary to an inference, together with an admission, of one or the other⁴ (proposition), does away the remaining one. But the Stoics conceive that an inference is rejected, by merely prefixing a negative particle, or that one of the propositions is done away, as, for example, "All," (and) "Not all;" (or) "Some one," (and) "Not some one."¹

² Here, as in iii. § 9, p. 396, n. 1, I have translated, as if the text were "alterutra," not "altera," which cannot mean "one of two."

¹ Such is the literal and unintelligible version of the text, where Oudendorp confesses he sticks fast; and so too did Floridus; who would elicit "Si ex duobus tertium quid colligitur, alterum eorum cum contrario illationis colligit contrarium relictum—" from the reading of MSS. Carnot, "si colligitur, alterum eorum cum contrarium illationis colligit, contrarium relinquit." Oudendorp has proposed "tollit" in lieu of "colligit," referring to "cujus adversum illationis — tollit reliquam."

² I confess I cannot understand "conclusionis illatio," for the two words are elsewhere synonymous. With regard to "tollo," the Delphin interpreter considers it here, and every where else, as synonymous with "nego." See iii. § 4, p. 387, n. ¹ ²

³ I have translated, as if "cum" had dropt out before "contraria—"

[13.] There are then produced against each Conclusion eight of a contrary kind, which may be opposed to it; since each admission may be done away by two methods; and there are produced twice four conclusions by a negative particle being at one time prefixed to the inference, and at another, by one or the other² of the inferences being accepted. Let there be, as an example, the first not-demonstrable (mode)—"Every just thing is honourable. (And) every honourable thing is good. Therefore every just thing is good." Now he who, after admitting the propositions, denies the inference, must necessarily say—"Some one just thing is not good." To this if you prefix³ the former of the two conceded—"Every just thing is honourable," an inference is produced, according to the second mode in the third form,— "Therefore some one honourable thing is not good;" which is repugnant to the second proposition, that had conceded that "Every honourable thing is good." In like manner this conclusion is altogether an opposite one, if, while things remain the same, you introduce its equivalent, as for instance,— "Therefore not every thing honourable is good." In a similar manner two other conclusions would be produced, if, as we have just now laid down the former proposition, so we assume the latter—"Some one just thing is not good. (But) every honourable thing is good," there will be produced⁴ a double inference belonging to the fourth mode of the second form, (namely)— "Therefore not every just thing is honourable," or—"Therefore some one just thing is not honourable;" both of which are equally repugnant to the former proposition, which had conceded that—"Every just thing is honourable." While these four conclusions remain, the proposition alone being changed, if, in lieu of that, which was—"Some one just thing is not good,"

¹ Hildebrand has introduced here from MS. Petav. "Veteres vero et per alterutram. Igitur bifariam omnis non omnis, quidam—"

² Here, as elsewhere, the Delphin interpreter explains "alterutra" by "contradictory." See p. 386, n. ².

³ I have adopted "præponas," found in MS. Petav., in lieu of "proponas."

⁴ Instead of "fit," the sense requires "fiet," what I have translated. See p. 397, n. ².

you make the proposition—"Not every just thing is good," so that the inference may be done away in two methods, there will be through the same changes four conclusions of the second form. In like manner, if in lieu of the same proposition, you make it—"No just thing is good," so that the inference may be done away by three methods, there will be four conclusions of the third form, but only in the case of those which have an Universal inference. For that alone can be done away by three methods; but in the others there are only eight; which, if a person wishes, he will be able to arrange¹ singly under each mode through all the forms, after the example we have laid down, so that, ²in the manner of persons arguing hypothetically by means of letters,² the order of the propositions being changed, while their power remains, the first not-demonstrable mode may be—"A (is affirmed) of every B. And B of every C. Therefore A is of every C." ³They begin from the Declaring, and consequently from the second proposition. This mode then, made perfect according to these, becomes backwardly of this kind³—"Every C (is) B. (And) every B (is) A. Therefore every C (is) A."⁴ The Stoics however instead of letters adopt numbers,⁵ as—"If there is a first, there is a second. But there is a first. Therefore there is a second." But Aristotle puts forth in the first form only four modes not-demonstrable; while Theophrastus and the

² This is the manner adopted by Aristotle in his Analytics.

³ Such is the literal version of the whole passage, as it is read in MSS. Carnot. But since in MS. Petav. the readings are "inferunt a declarata," in lieu of "incipiunt a declarante," and "modus secundus hos si pretexas" in lieu of "modus secundum hos perfectus—" I must leave for others to discover what Apuleius wrote, and to explain it, when discovered, with the aid of Floridus; who says that, "by the word 'Declarans' is meant that proposition, in which is found the Attribute of the Conclusion; which proposition Apuleius considers as the second, and holds that as the first, in which is found the Subject of the Conclusion—a point in which he is at variance with Aristotle; while by 'retro' is meant 'in an inverse order,' so that the second proposition may become the first, and in each proposition the Subject may be enunciated the first, and the Attribute the last."

⁴ I have adopted the interpretation of the Delphin editor.

⁵ So too does Cicero in Topic. § 4, quoted by Kopp on Martian. Capell. iv. 420.

rest enumerate five; for¹ by uniting an Indefinite proposition,¹ they deduce likewise an Indefinite inference. But this it is needless to bring forward; since an Indefinite (proposition) is done away in the place of a Particular (one); and the modes become the same as those in the case of a Particular proposition.

[14.] So too we have shown there are four in the first form; which if a person wishes to double, by accepting an Indefinite in the place of a Particular, and subjoining an Indefinite inference, there will be in all twenty-nine.² But Aristo of Alexandria and some younger Peripatetics suggest moreover five other modes of an Universal inference, (namely,) three in the first form and two in the second; in the place of which they deduce³ something of a Particular one; for it is very silly³ for him, 'to whom more has been conceded, to infer less.'⁴ Now it is proved that all the determinate modes in the three forms are only the nineteen, which we have shown above. (For) there are four propositions, (namely,) two Particulars (and) two Universals. Each of these, says Aristotle, is combined in four ways, so that it may be subjoined to itself,⁵ and be put before three others; and thus there will be sixteen combinations in each form. Of these there are six that possess a power equally in all; two, when of Negatives either one precedes the other; but four, when of Particulars any one precedes itself, or is subjoined to another. For nothing can be concluded, whenever there are either two Particulars

¹ Here is evidently something defective. For it should be stated to what the indefinite proposition is united.

⁴ Compare the expression of Cicero, quoted in p. 392, n. 2, "cum concesseris superius, cogit inferius concedere."

⁵ How a proposition can be said "to be subjoined to itself," as here, or "to precede itself," as just afterwards, I cannot understand; and the less so, as I do not know to what passage of Aristotle Apuleius is alluding.

or two Negatives. There remain then for each form ten combinations. Moreover out of these, as well in the first as second form, two possess no power, when an Universal Affirmative is placed before a Particular one. Similarly in both the first and second form two may be cut out, in which a Particular Negative precedes either of the Universals. From whence it arises that there remain of the first form six combinations, in nine modes; (and) still eight for the two remaining forms; of which there is one, that is proved in neither of them, when an Universal Negative precedes a Particular Affirmative. Of those seven, which remain, there are four in the second form peculiar (and) false, when an Universal Affirmative is united either to itself or to its Particular in any place, or when the other precedes. In like manner two in the third form are peculiar (and) possess no power, when either of the Negatives precedes an Universal Affirmative; but the remaining three in the second form, and five in the third, we have shown to be determinate, when we reduced them to six combinations of the first form. Hence out of forty-eight combinations fourteen alone are proved. The remaining thirty-four, which I have reckoned up, are rejected, because they are able to exhibit false conclusions from true premises; of which it is easy for any one to make a trial by means of the five significations mentioned above, of kind, peculiarity, &c. But of those fourteen, which we have proved, the inferences themselves show that there are not more modes than have been stated above, so that they may be received as well directly as inversely, as far as the very truth permits; and on that account their number cannot be increased.

SOME ACCOUNT
OF
THE DIALOGUES AND OF THE EPISTLES OF

BY THOMAS GRAY.

THE edition of Plato to which the following remarks are constantly referred, is that printed by Henry Stephens in 1578, in three volumes folio. But almost every other edition may be used with equal convenience, as the pagination of Stephens is given in the margin.

PREFACE

BY MATTHIAS.

BEFORE the reader enters on the perusal of this section, it is proper that he should be informed of what he is to expect. When the editor first heard that the works of Plato had been the subject of Mr. Gray's serious and critical attention, and that he had illustrated them by an analysis and by ample annotations, his curiosity was raised to no ordinary height. When the names of Plato and of Gray, of the philosopher and of the poet, were thus united, it was difficult to set bounds to his, or indeed to any, expectation. But when the volume, containing these important remarks, was first delivered into his hands, his sensation at the time reminded him of that which was experienced by an eminent scholar, at his discovery of the darker and more sublime hymns which antiquity has ascribed to Orpheus. His words on that occasion are as pleasing and as interesting as the enthusiasm was noble which inspired them: "In abyssum quandam mysteriorum descendere videbar, quum silente mundo, solis vigilantibus astris et luna, μελανήφαρος istos hymnos in manus sumpsi."¹ Many a learned man will acknowledge, as his own, the feelings of this animated scholar.

It might, indeed, be conceived that, from the intense contemplation on the subjects offered to him by Plato, so full of dignity and so pregnant with the materials of thought, Mr. Gray might have indulged himself in a continuation of the discussions, by expanding still wider the exalted and diversified ideas of his sublime original. He had a spirit equal and adapted to such an exertion, and congenial with that of the philosopher; but it seems as if he had, on purpose, restrained his own powers and tempered their ardour. What he chiefly sought and aimed at, and what he indeed effected, was to exhibit the sobriety of truth, the importance of the doctrines, and the great practical effects of true philosophy on life, on manners, and on policy;

Ψυχῆς ὄμμα φαινέν ἐκείν βίβροιο τινάμεν.

He never for a moment deviated from his original; as he was desirous only to lay before himself and his reader the sum and substance of the dialogues as they are, when divested of the peculiar attractions which so powerfully recommend these conversations on the banks of the Ilyssus. As a scholar, and as a reflecting man, he sat down to give an account to himself of what he had read and studied; and he gave it in words of his own, without addition, without amplification, and without the admixture of any ideas with those of Plato. He made large and valuable remarks and annotations, drawn from the stores of his own unbounded erudition, with a felicity and an elegance which never lost sight of utility and of solid information, without the display of reading, or the encumbrance of pedantic research. He never pretended to have consulted manuscripts, but, whenever he thought that an alteration of the text was necessary, or when a passage appeared to him to be obscure or corrupted, he proposed his own conjectural emendation. Yet it is pleasing to know, that Mr. Gray neither despised nor depreciated the advantages which may be derived from minuter and more subtle verbal criticism, and from the rectifying, or from the restoration, of the text of any author by that steady light which shone full on Bentley, and which, in after times, descended upon Porson. What he proposed to himself, that he effected; and through the whole of these writings there is such a perspicuity of expression, an eloquence so temperate, a philosophic energy so calm and unaffected, and the train of the specific arguments in each composition is presented so entire and unbroken, that his spirit may be said to shine through them; and, in this point of view, the words of Alcinous to Ulysses have a peculiar force, when applied to Mr. Gray;

Σοὶ ἐν μὲν μορφῇ ἐπίων, ἐν δὲ φρήνες ἰσθλαί,
Μῦθον δ', ὡς ὁ τ' αἰοῖδος, πισταμένως κατέλεξας.¹

His illustrations from antiquity, and from history, are as accurate as they are various and extensive. When, for instance, we peruse many of his notes drawn from those sources, we have often, as it were, the memoirs of the time and the politics of Syracuse; and scarcely could a modern writer feel himself more at home in the reign of Charles the Second, than Mr. Gray in the court of Dionysius. Or, if we turn to subjects of a different nature, where shall we find a nobler specimen of judicious analysis, and of manly, eloquent, interesting, and animated composition, than in his account of the Protagoras? But it would be useless, or invidious, to specify particulars where all is excellent. It is a proud consideration for Englishmen, that Mr. Gray composed all his remarks in his own native tongue, and with words of power unsphered the spirit of Plato.

In an age like this, it would be superfluous to speak of the merits and the character of the great philosopher, who has found such a commentator. We all know, that when Cicero looked for the master and for the example of eloquence and of finished composition, he found that master and that example in Plato; and all succeeding times have confirmed his judgment.

Plato has certainly ever been, and ever will be, the favourite philosopher of great orators and of great poets. He was himself familiar with the father of all poetry. The language of Plato, his spirit, his animated reasoning, his copiousness, his invention, the rhythm and the cadence of his style, the hallowed dignity and the amplitude of his conceptions, and that splendour of imagination with which he illuminated every subject, and threw into the gloom of futurity the rays of hope and the expectations of a better life, have always endeared and recommended him to the good and to the wise of every age and of every nation. From the legitimate study of his works, from that liberal delight which they afford, and from the expanded views which they present, surely it cannot be apprehended that any reader should be "spoiled through philosophy and vain deceit."

A GENERAL VIEW OF THE WORKS OF PLATO

BY FLOYER SYDENHAM.

THE dialogues¹ of Plato are of various kinds, not only with regard to those different matters, which are the subjects of them, but in respect also of the manner in which they are composed or framed, and of the form under which they make their appearance to the reader. It will not therefore be improper to distinguish the several kinds; by dividing them, first, into the most general, and then, subdividing them into the subordinate kinds; till we come to those lower species, which particularly and precisely denote the nature of the several dialogues, and from which they ought to take their respective denominations.

The most general division of the writings of Plato is, into those of the sceptical, and into those of the dogmatical, kind. In the former, nothing is expressly either proved or asserted; as some philosophical question only is considered and examined, and the reader is left to himself to draw such conclusions, and to discover such truths, as the philosopher means to insinuate. This is done either in the way of inquiry, or in that of controversy and of dispute. In the way of controversy are carried on all such dialogues, as tend to eradicate false opinions; and that is done, either indirectly, by involving them in difficulties and embarrassing the maintainers of them; or directly, by confuting them. In the way of inquiry proceed those dialogues, whose tendency is to raise in the mind right opinions; which is effected, either by exciting to the pursuit of some part of wisdom and by showing in what manner to investigate it, or by leading the way and helping the mind forward in the search.

The dialogues of the other kind, namely, the dogmatical or didactic, teach explicitly some point of doctrine: and this they do, either by laying it down in the authoritative way, or by proving it in the way of reason and of argument. In the authoritative way the doctrine is delivered sometimes by the speaker himself magisterially, and at other times as derived to him by tradition from wise men. The argumentative or demonstrative method of teaching, used by Plato, proceeds either through analytical reasoning, resolving things into their principles, and from known or allowed truths tracing out the unknown; or through induction, from a multitude of particulars inferring some general thing in which they all agree.

According to this division is framed the following scheme, or table:

DIALOGUES	SCEPTICAL	DISPUTATIVE	EMBARRASSING
		INQUISITIVE	CONFUTING
	DOGMATICAL	DEMONSTRATIVE	EXCITING ASSISTING
		AUTHORITATIVE	ANALYTICAL INDUCTUAL
			TRADITIONAL

The philosopher, in thus varying his manner and diversifying his writings into these several kinds, means not merely to entertain the reader with their variety, nor to teach him, on different occasions, with more or less plainness and perspicuity, nor yet to insinuate different degrees of certainty in the doctrines themselves: but he takes this method as a consummate master of the art of composition in the dialogue-way of writing; and from the different characters of the speakers, as from different elements in the frame of these dramatic dialogues, or from different ingredients in their mixture, he produces some peculiar genius and turn of temper, as it were, in each.

Socrates, indeed, is in almost all of them the principal speaker, but when he falls into the company of some arrogant sophist, when the modest wisdom and clear science of the one are contrasted with the confident ignorance and the blind opinionativeness of the other, dispute and controversy must of course arise; where the false pretender cannot fail of being either puzzled or confuted. To puzzle him only is sufficient, if there be no other persons present, because such a man can never be confuted in his own opinion; but when there is an audience round them, in danger of being misled by sophistry into error, then is the true philosopher to exert his utmost, and the vain sophist must be convicted and exposed.

In some dialogues, Plato represents his great master mixing in conversation with young men of the best families in the commonwealth. When these persons happen to have docile dispositions and fair minds, then is occasion given to the philosopher to call forth the latent seeds of wisdom, and to cultivate the noble plants with true doctrine, in the affable and familiar way of joint inquiry. To this is owing the inquisitive genius of such dialogues; in which, by a seeming equality in the conversation, the curiosity or zeal of the mere stranger is excited, and that of the disciple is encouraged, and, by proper questions, the mind also is aided and forwarded in the search of truth.

At other times, the philosophic hero of these dialogues is introduced in a higher character, engaged in discourse with men of more improved understandings and of more enlightened minds. At such seasons he has an opportunity of teaching in a more explicit manner, and of discovering the reasons of things: for to such an audience truth, with all the demonstration possible in the teaching it, is due. Hence, in the dialogues composed of these persons, naturally arises the justly argumentative or demonstrative genius: it is of the analytical kind, when the principles of mind or of science, the leading truths, are to be unfolded; and of the inductive kind, when any subsequent truth of the same rank with others, or any part of science, is meant to be displayed.

But when the doctrine to be taught admits not of demonstration; of which kind is the doctrine of outward nature, being only hypothetical and a matter of opinion; the doctrine of antiquities, being only traditional and a matter of belief; and the doctrine of laws, being injunctive and the matter of obedience; the air of authority is then assumed: in the former cases, the doctrine is traditionally handed down to others from the authority of ancient sages; but in the latter, it is magisterially pronounced with the authority of a legislator. That this turn may be given to such dialogues with propriety, and with justice to the character of the speakers, the reasoning Socrates is laid aside, or he only sustains some lower and obscure part; while that which is the principal, or the shining, part is allotted to some other philosopher, to whom may properly be attributed a more authoritative manner; or to such an antiquary, as may be credited or may be deemed to have received the best information; or finally, to such a statesman or politician, as may fairly be presumed best qualified for making laws.

Thus much for the manner in which the dialogues of Plato are severally composed, and for the turn of genius which is given to them in their composition. The form under which they appear, or the external character that marks them, is of three sorts: 1. Either purely dramatic, like the dialogue of tragedy or comedy; or, 2. Purely narrative, where a former conversation is supposed to be committed to writing and communicated to some absent friend; or, 3. It is of the mixed kind, like a narration in dramatic poems, where the story of things past is recited to some person present.

Having thus divided the dialogues of Plato, with respect to that inward form or composition, which creates their genius; and again with reference to that outward form, which marks them, like flowers and other vegetables, with a certain character; we are to make a further division of them, with regard to their subject and to their design, beginning with their design or end, because for the sake of this are all the subjects chosen. The end of all the writings of Plato is that, which is the end of all true philosophy or wisdom, I mean, the perfection and the happiness of man. Man therefore is the general subject; and the first business of philosophy must be to inquire, what is that being, called man, who is to be made happy; and what is his nature, in the perfection of which is placed his happiness.

The philosopher considers man as a compound being, consisting of body and of soul, the superior part of which soul is mind, by which he is intimately connected with the divine nature, and of near kindred to it; while the inferior part is made up of passions and of affections, reducible all to two kinds, having all of them either pain or pleasure for their object: by means of which, and also of his body, he is outwardly related to the fellows of his own species, and is connected with them and with all outward nature. He is moved by some commanding power within him, the principle of action, commonly called Will; and when the motion, given by it, is right, and in a right direction, it moves him for his real good. The motion and the direction are both right, when the one is measured and the other dictated by right reason. The motion is thus measured, and the direction is thus dictated; or, in other words, the measure and the rule of a man's actions are agreeable to right reason, when the governing power within him (i. e. the reason of his own mind) harmonizes with reason universal: and this it does, when his mind sees things as they are, and partakes of truth; because truth is the standard of right reason, is the same in every and in all mind, and is the perfection and the end of mind itself. By means of truth therefore, or by the knowledge of it, (for the mind is in possession of truth by knowing it,) is a man's reason empowered to govern him, and his will is enabled to move him, for his good. Now the power of so governing and of so moving him is man's virtue; the virtue of every thing being its power to produce, or to procure, some certain good. Thus the two great objects of the Platonic philosophy are truth and virtue; truth, which is the good of all mind; and virtue, which is the good of the whole man.

Every truth, in every particular science, is the relation of any two or more things, that is, of such things as are the subjects of that science; and in the knowledge of all of which that science consists. The subjects of every science are things in their real essences, or ideas; and truth universal comprehends all the relations of all the real essences of all things. These relations being eternal, absolute, and independent on any particular mind, the real essences of things themselves not only must always be, but must always have the same manner also of being; that is, they must be always uniform and invariable, not subject to the differences or to the changes of any thoughts concerning them, and must indeed be seated above the comprehension or the reach of any particular minds. Our ideas, when true, are the exact copies or perfect images of these essences; and when we know them to be such, and can resolve them into their principles, then have we true science, properly so called. It is the nature of the human soul to have these ideas generated in her, and to partake of mind eternal and immutable. Hence she is the offspring, and the image, of the divine nature; and hence, by a participation of that nature which is eternal, and whose principle is unity, she is herself indissoluble and immortal.

The resemblances of those real essences are also in outward things, serving first to excite in the soul those true ideas: but, because of the ever-changing and transient nature of such things, (those resemblances being uncertain,) they are no less apt to raise false fancies, and to give birth to erroneous opinions.

But besides these natural representations of things, there are others which are arbitrary; invented by men, in order to express, or to signify to each other, whatever they perceive, or fancy, or know, or think. These are words framed into propositions and discourses; in which we give an account of what we think, or would have others think. They are delivered in three ways: either, 1. In the way of reason, applying themselves to the understanding with pretensions to prove; or, 2. In the way of oratory, addressing the passions in order to persuade; or, 3. In the way of poetry, engaging the imagination with a view to please. The mind therefore is in danger of being seduced into error by words, in four different ways: either, 1. By wrong names attributed to things, disguising thus their real nature; or, 2. By sophistical arts of reasoning, thus exhibiting falsehood in a dress like that of truth; or, 3. By the adulterated colours of rhetoric, deluding us; or, 4. By the fantastic figuring of poetry, enchanting us. In this manner does Plato warn his readers against the ways which lead aside into error; while he conducts his followers along the road of truth.

As to the other object of Platonic wisdom, namely, virtue, or the settled power in the soul of governing man rightly; when it is considered as adhering to its divine principle, truth, it takes the form of sanctity; when considered as presiding over every word and action, it has the nature of prudence; when it is employed in controlling and ordering the concupiscible part of the soul, or the affections and passions which regard pleasure, it is called temperance; and when it is engaged in composing and directing the irascible part of the soul, or the affections and passions relative to pain, it assumes the name of fortitude. And thus far it respects private good immediately, yet it also extends its influence to the good of others through the connexions of kindred nature and of social life.

But since every man is a member of some civil community, since he is linked with the fellows of his own species, and is related to every nature superior and divine, and is also a part of universal nature; he must always of necessity participate of the good and evil of every whole, greater as well as less, to which he belongs; and he has an interest in the well-being of every species with which he is connected. Virtue therefore, with immediate reference to the good of others, to the public good, to the general good of mankind, and to universal good, (yet remotely, and by way of consequence, affecting private good,) virtue, we say, as she regulates the conduct of man, in order to these ends, has the title given her of justice, (universal, or particular in all its various branches,) friendship, patriotism, humanity, equity, and piety, with every subordinate duty springing out of these.

But since, in order to effect thoroughly, and fully to accomplish, the good of any vital whole, there must be a conspiration and a co-operation of all the parts; there ought in every public body to be one mind or law presiding over, disposing, and directing all; that through all may run one spirit, and that in all one virtue may operate. To illustrate this, the idea is presented of a perfect commonwealth, and a just model is framed of public laws: and in this the nature of virtue is seen most godlike, that is, of herself most diffusive and productive of the most good in her making all happy, as she is political and legislative.

Thus all virtue is order and proportion, whether in the soul of man, or in a civil state; and by putting measure into all the manners, and into every action, whether of private or of public life, it produces in them symmetry and beauty; for of these proportioned measure is the principle. Virtue can do this, because the rule, according to which the virtuous mind or the will governs, is beauty itself; and the science, through which she governs, is the science of that beauty: for truth and beauty concur in one; and wherever they are, there also is good found. The love of beauty then is nothing different from that first and leading motive in all minds to the pursuit of every thing, namely, that motive whence the philosopher sets out in his inquiry after wisdom, the desire of good. Thus the perfection of man consists in his similitude to this supreme beauty; and in his union with it is found his supreme good.

The dialogues of Plato, with respect to their subjects, may be divided, conformably to this sketch of their design, into the speculative and the practical, and into such as are of a mixed nature. The subjects of these last are either general, which comprehend both the others; or differential, which distinguish them. The general subjects are either fundamental, or final: those of the fundamental kind are philosophy, and human nature, and the soul of man: those of the final kind are love, and beauty, and good. The differential subjects regard knowledge, as it stands related to practice, in which are considered two questions; one of which is, whether virtue is to be taught; the other is, whether error in the will depend on error in the judgment. The subjects of the speculative dialogues relate either to words or to things: of the former sort are etymology, sophistry, rhetoric, and poetry: of the latter sort are science, true being, the principles of mind, and outward nature. The practical subjects relate either to private conduct and to the government of the mind over the whole man, or to his duty towards others in his several relations, or to the government of a civil state and to the public conduct of a whole people. Under these three heads the particular subjects practical rank in order; namely, virtue in general, sanctity, temperance, and fortitude; justice, friendship, patriotism, and piety; the ruling mind in a civil government, the frame and order of a state, and law in general; and lastly, those rules of government and of public conduct which constitute the civil laws.

Thus, for the sake of giving the reader a scientific, that is, a comprehensive, and at the same time a distinct, view of Plato's writings, it has been attempted to exhibit to him their just and natural distinctions; whether he choose to consider them with regard to their inward form or essence, or to their outward form or appearance, or to their matter or their end, that is, with regard to their genius, to their character, to their subject, and to their design.

OF SOCRATES AND OF HIS FRIENDS.

SOCRATES.

ALL which Socrates possessed was not worth three minæ, in which he reckons a house he had in the city.¹ Critobulus often prevailed upon him to accompany him to the comedy.² Xantippe, his wife, the most ill-tempered of women: he made use of her to exercise his philosophy.³ He amused himself by dancing when he was fifty years old: his face remarkably ugly, and resembling that of the Sileni or satyrs, with large prominent eyes, a short flat nose turned up, wide nostrils, great mouth, &c., nick-named ὁ Φορτιστής.⁴ He rarely went out of the walls of Athens;⁵ was never out of Attica, but when he served in time of war, and once to the Isthmian games.⁶ He was seventy years old when he died.⁷ He left three sons, the eldest a youth, the two youngest children. His intrepid and cheerful behaviour at his trial and death.⁸ Compared to a torpedo.⁹ Called Prodicus, the sophist, his master.¹⁰ Learns, at near fifty years of age, to play on the lyre of Connus, son of Metrobius.¹¹ His mother, Phænarete, married Chæredemus, and had by him a son named Patrocles.¹² Seldom used to bathe, and commonly went barefooted.¹³ He could bear great quantities of wine without being overpowered by it, but did not choose to drink voluntarily.¹⁴

THE COMPANIONS OF SOCRATES.

CRITOULUS.

A MAN of fortune; his estate was worth above eight talents, which in Athens was very considerable. Had served the offices of gymnasiarch, choregus, &c., the most expensive of the city. Of an amorous disposition; negligent of economy; a lover of dramatic spectacles; he married a very young, inexperienced woman, with whom he conversed very little:¹⁴ he was present at the entertainment given by Callias to Autolycus, Socrates, and others, and at that time was newly married. OL. 89, 4. He was remarkable for his beauty; his fine panegyric on it: was passionately fond of Clinias. Crito, the father of the latter, introduced him to the acquaintance of Socrates, that he might cure him of this passion.¹⁵

ISCHOMACHUS.

HE was called in Athens, by way of pre-eminence, ὁ καλὸς ἀγαθός; he married a young maid under fifteen years of age, whom he educated and instructed himself. His first serious conversation with her, related by him to Socrates, on the duties of a mistress of a family. The order and arrangement of his house described: his morning exercises, walk to his villa, and ride from thence. He was a remarkably good horseman, of a vigorous constitution, and lasting health; was one of the richest men in Athens. His instruction and treatment of his slaves; his knowledge in agriculture. His father before him was a great lover of that art.¹⁷ He meddled not much in public affairs:¹⁸ was believed, while he lived, to be worth above seventy talents: but at his death he left not twenty, to be divided between his two sons.¹⁹

Callias was in love with Autolycus, the son of Lyco, who gained the victory (while yet a boy) in the Pancratiun during the greater Panathenæa, OL. 89, 4, upon which occasion Callias gave an entertainment to his friends²¹ at his house in the Piræus. He had been scholar to the sophists Protagoras, Gorgias, and Prodicus; was very wealthy; and had learned the art of memory from Hippias of Elis, at the recommendation of Antisthenes. He was Ἰσοκράτης of the Lacedæmonians who came to Athens; was hereditary priest of the Eleusinian deities, ὁ Ἀεθούης; was remarkable for his nobility and the gracefulness of his person;²² he had two sons, who were instructed by Evenus, the Parian sophist;²³ he entertained Protagoras, Prodicus, and Hippias, and other sophists, their companions, in his house, OL. 90, 1.²⁴

NICERATUS.

He was son to the famous Nicias; was present at the symposium of Callias, OL. 89, 4, and then newly married. He could repeat by heart the whole Iliad and Odyssey, and had been scholar to Stesimbrotus and Anaximander. He was very wealthy and somewhat covetous; was fond of his wife, and beloved by her;²⁵ was scholar to Damon, the famous musician, who had been recommended to his father by Socrates;²⁶ and finally, he was put to death by order of the Thirty, with his uncle Eucrates.²⁷

ANTISTHENES.

He was extremely poor, but with a contempt of wealth; was present in the symposium of Callias, where he proved that riches and poverty are in the mind alone, and not in externals. His way of life was easy and contented: he passed whole days in the company of Socrates, who taught him (he says) to be mentally rich. He was much beloved in the city, and his scholars were esteemed by the public. He recommended Prodicus and Hippias the Elean to Callias;²⁸ bore great affection to Socrates, and was present at his death.²⁹

CHÆREPHON.

A man of warmth and eagerness of temper;³⁰ he was a friend to the liberties of the people; he fled to and returned with Thrasybulus; he died before Socrates's trial, for he is mentioned in Socrates's Apology, as then dead, and in the Gorgias, as then living:

his death must therefore have happened between Ol. 93, 4, and Ol. 95, 1. He consulted the Delphian oracle to know if any man were wiser than Socrates. His brother, Chærecrates, survived him.³⁴

EPIGENES.

He was the son of Antipho of Cephisia:³⁵ and was present at the death of Socrates.³⁶

APOLLODORUS.

He was brother to Aiantodorus:³⁷ was a man of small abilities, but of an excellent heart, and remarkable for the affection he bore to Socrates;³⁸ he was present in the prison at the time of his death.³⁹ He lived at Phalerus, of which Δῆμος he was;⁴⁰ was but a boy when Socrates was fifty-three years old, and must therefore have been under thirty-seven at the time of Socrates's death. He was called Μαυρός from the warmth of his temper.

PHÆDO.

He was an Elean. See his account of Socrates's last moments.⁴¹

SIMMIAS.

He was a Theban, and a young man at the time of Socrates's death (as was Cebes), at which they were both present. He had received some tincture of the Pythagorean doctrines from Philolaus of Crotona; and was inquisitive and curious in the search of truth, far above all prejudice and credulity.⁴²

CEBES.

He was a Theban. (Vid. Simmiam.)

HERMOGENES.

He was a man of piety, and believed in divination. He was present in Callias's symposium; was a person of great honesty, mild, affable, and soberly cheerful:⁴³ not rich, and a man of few words;⁴⁴ was son to Hipponicus and brother to Callias.⁴⁵ He was present at the death of Socrates.⁴⁶

CHARMIDES.

He had a considerable estate in lands before the Peloponnesian war, which he thence entirely lost, and was reduced to great poverty. He was present at the symposium of Callias, where he discoursed on the advantages and pleasures of being poor. He ran at the stadium, at Nemea, contrary to Socrates's advice.* He was of extreme beauty when a youth.^a

ÆSCHYLUS.

He was of Phlius, and was introduced by Antisthenes to Socrates.

CRITO.

He was father to Critobulus; was of Alopecæ, and about the same age with Socrates.* He made the proposal to contrive the escape of Socrates out of prison, and to send him into Thessaly;^a he attended him daily in his confinement, and at the time of his death; he received his last orders; he closed his eyes, and took care of his funeral.^a

PHÆDRUS.

THIS is supposed to be the first dialogue which Plato wrote, according to Diogen. Laert. iii. 38. Dionysius Halicarnassus (ii. 270, ed. Hudson) calls it one of his most celebrated discourses; and from it he produces examples both of the beauty and of the blemishes of Plato's style, which is all purity, all grace, and perspicuity; and he remarks that he sometimes rises to a true sublimity, and sometimes falls into an ungraceful redundancy of words and of ill-suited figures, ungraceful and obscure.

There is a good analysis of the Phædrus by the Abbé Sallier, wherein he shows its true subject and intention. It is upon eloquence, and is designed to demonstrate, that no writer, whether legislator, orator, historian, or poet, can do any thing excellent without a foundation of philosophy. The title prefixed to it, "On the Beautiful," cannot be genuine. It has no other relation to it, than that beauty is accidentally the theme of Socrates's second little oration, which is contained in this dialogue; not that it is, directly, even the subject of that, for the tendency of it is to prove, that a person ought to gratify rather the party who loves, than the one who does not, as the two preceding orations were to show the contrary. These are what Diogenes Laertius calls questions of a juvenile kind, though he may mean it of the whole dialogue, which is something juvenile and full of vanity, and such, Dionysius very justly says, was the character of Plato.

The Socratic dialogues are a kind of drama, wherein the time, the place, and the characters are almost as exactly marked as in a true theatrical representation. Phædrus here is a young man particularly sensible to eloquence and to fine writing, and thence a follower and an admirer of the famous Lysias, whose reputation was then at its height in Athens. He had been sitting the greatest part of the morning at the house of Epicrates, near the Olympium, to hear Lysias recite a discourse; and, having procured a copy of it, is meditating upon it with pleasure, as he walks without the city walls, where Socrates meets him. To avoid the heat of the day they retire to the shade of an ancient plane-tree, that over-shadows a fane of Achelœus and the Nymphs on the banks of a rivulet, which discharges itself at a little distance into the Ilyssus. The spot lay less than a quarter of a mile above the bridge, which led over the river to the temple of Diana Agræa. Here they pursue their conversation during the hours of noon, till the sun grows lower and the heat becomes more mild.

We may nearly fix the year when this conversation is supposed to have happened. Lysias was now at Athens; he arrived there from Thurii in Italy in the forty-seventh year of his age, OL 92, 1. Euripides is also mentioned as still in the city; he left it to go into Macedonia, OL 92, 4, and, consequently, it must have happened in some year of that Olympiad, probably the 2nd or 3rd, and Plato must have written it in less than ten years afterwards, for his Lysis was written before the death of Socrates, which was OL 95, 1, but the Phædrus was still earlier, being his first composition; so he was between twenty and twenty-nine years of age.

NOTES ON THE GREEK TEXT.

P. 231, § 12. In my request.] What he desired, will appear but too plainly in the course of these little orations, and must appear a most strange subject of conversation for Socrates, to all who are unacquainted with the manners of Greece. The President de Montesquieu has observed, but too justly, on the nature of their love and gallantry. Esprit des Loix, v. 1. See also Xenoph. CEconomic and Symposium; and the Symposium of Plato; see also de Legib. i. 636.

P. 231, § 13. The law.] There were, indeed, laws of great severity in Athens against this vice; but who should put them in force in such general and shocking depravity?

P. 235. Nothing from myself. Παρά γὰρ ἑμαυτοῦ οὐδέν.] It is observable, that Socrates, whenever he would discourse affirmatively on any subject, or when he thought proper to raise and adorn his style, does it not in his own person, but assumes the character of another. Thus, for instance, he relates the beautiful fable between Virtue and Pleasure after Prodicus; he treats of the miseries of human life in the words of the same sophist; he describes the state of souls after death from the information of Gobryas, one of the Magi; he makes a panegyric on wine in the style of Gorgias; and here he does not venture to display his eloquence, till the Nymphs and the Muses have inspired him. This is consistent with that character of simplicity and of humility which he assumed.

P. 241. Ὀσπράκου μεταπρόβντος.] A proverb, taken from a game in use among children, called Ὀσπράκινδα, described by Jul. Pollux, ix. 154, and by Eustathius. They were divided into two parties, which fled or pursued each other alternately, as the chance of a piece of broken potsherd, thrown up into the air, determined it: the boy who threw it cried out Νεῖξ ἢ Ἡμίπα; if the black (or pitched) side came uppermost, his party ran away, and the other gave them chase; if the white one, the others ran, and they pursued them. Hence Ὀσπράκου Περιπροπή was used to describe a total reverse of fortune. Erasmus, in his Adagia, has not explained it well.

P. 257. A pleasant bend.] Erasmus explains it in his Adagia, Εὐφημία φέρεται, as though in a part of a river, where there was a long and dangerous winding, the sailors used this piece of flattery by way of propitiating the Nile; but this does not fully clear up the passage here. That this proverb was so used may appear from the words of Athenæus, xii. 516, Τὸν τόπον καλοῦσι Γυναικῶν ἀγῶνα, γλυκὺν ἀγκῶνα: "they call the place of the women's contest 'pleasant bend;'" which last may mean, a specious term to cover their ignominy. Casaubon does not explain it: here it seems applied to such as speak one thing and mean another.

P. 259, § 90. Falling asleep.] The Greeks usually slept at noon in summer, as it is still the custom in Italy and Spain, and in other hot countries.

P. 259, § 91. τερρίγων.] The tettix, in Latin "cicada," is an animal with wings, the size of a man's thumb, of a dark brown colour, which sits on the trees and sings, that is, makes a noise like a cricket; but much more shrill, and without any intervals, which grows louder as the sun grows hotter. Some supposed it to live on the air, others, on dew only. It does in reality live on the exudations of plants, having a proboscis, like flies, to feed with; but is capable of living a long time, like many of the insect race, without any nourishment at all. The tettigometra, which is this creature in its intermediate state between a worm and a fly, was esteemed a delicacy to eat by the Greeks.

P. 261. The Eleatic Palamedes.] Quintilian, iii. 1—10, informs us, that the person here meant is Alcidamas of Elea. Diogen. Laert. ix. 25, takes it to be meant of Zeno Eleates, who is looked upon as the inventor of disputation and of logic, and who was at Athens when Socrates was not above eight years old, that is, above fifty years earlier than the time of this dialogue; but his contemporary Empedocles was the first who cultivated rhetoric as an art, and taught it to Gorgias, who published a book on that subject.

P. 270. Νοῦ τε καὶ ἀνοίας.] He (i. e. Anaxagoras) attributed the disposition of the universe to an intelligent cause, or mind, whence he himself was called Νοῦς. He was nearly of the same age with Pericles, and came to Athens Ol. 75, 1, where he passed about thirty years.

P. 275. This discourse of Thamus (or Jupiter Ammon) on the uses and inconveniences of letters is excellent; and he gives a lively image of a great scholar, that is, of one who searches for wisdom in books alone.

LYSIS.

THERE is no circumstance in this dialogue to inform us when it happened; but it is certain that Plato wrote it when he was yet a young man, before OL. 95, 1, for Socrates heard it read. The scene of it is in a Palæstra, then newly built, a little without the walls of Athens, near the fountain of Panops, between the Academia and the Lycæum. The interlocutors are, Socrates; Hippothales and Ctesippus, two young men of Athens; Lysis, a boy of noble birth and fortune, beloved by Hippothales; and Menexenus, also a boy, and cousin to Ctesippus, and friend to Lysis. The characters are, as usual, elegantly drawn; but what is the end or meaning of the whole dialogue, I do not pretend to say. It turns upon the nature and definition of friendship. Socrates starts a hundred notions about it, and confutes them all himself; nothing is determined, the dialogue is interrupted and there is an end. Perhaps a second dialogue was designed on the same subject and never executed. As to all the mysteries which Serranus has discovered in it, they are mere dreams of his own.

The first part of this dialogue is of that kind called Μαυριώδης, "Obstetrical," and the second part, Παρασκευώδης, "Tentative."

N. B. The discourse with Menexenus is intended to correct a boy of a bolder and more forward nature than Lysis, by showing him that he knows nothing; and leaves him in the opinion of his own ignorance. The second title of the dialogue is a false or an incorrect one, for friendship is only by accident a part of it. The intent of the whole seems to be, to show in what manner we should converse with young people according to their different dispositions.

NOTES ON THE GREEK TEXT.

P. 204—211. Thus far the dialogue is very easy and elegant, particularly the short conversation with Lysis, which is an example how children of fortune and family ought to be treated, in order to correct that arrogance which those advantages are apt to inspire, and to win them gradually to reflection and good sense.

P. 206. The Hermæa.] A festival celebrated in all the places of education for boys. We see here how little the severe laws of Solon on this head were observed, which particularly forbade grown persons to be admitted on that occasion, as we learn from Æschin. in Timarch.

P. 211. "Ορνυα.] The passion of the Athenians for fighting quails and game-cocks is well known. See Plutarch in Alcibiade.

P. 214. The wisest.] Empedocles, perhaps, who ascribed the first formation of things to this friendship, "Ἄλλοτε μὲν φιλότῳ συνίρχομεν αὖ ἐν παντί, &c. as stated in Diogen. Laert. viii. 76, or Anaxagoras, who taught that the Universe was made up of small bodies consisting of similar particles, as we learn from Diogen. Laert. ii. 8.

P. 219. After drinking hemlock.] A quantity of wine, drunk after the cicuta, "hemlock," was believed to prevent its mortal effects.

P. 223. It was late.] It was a law of Solon, that school-rooms were to be closed before sunset.

ALCIBIADES I.

THE title expressing the subject of this dialogue (like that of Lysis) is wrong. Dacier rightly observes, that the titles are commonly nothing to the purpose; but he is strangely mistaken in saying, they are of modern invention, and that Diogenes Laertius makes no mention of them. That author actually mentions them all, and from his account they appear to be more ancient than Thrasyllus, who lived probably under Augustus and Tiberius, and who seemingly took them to be all of Plato's own hand.

The true subject certainly is, to demonstrate the necessity of knowing one's self, and that, without this foundation, all other acquisitions in science are not only useless, but pernicious.

The time of this dialogue is towards the end of Alcibiades' nineteenth year, which (as Dodwell reckons) is Ol. 87, 1. Socrates was then about thirty-nine years old.

NOTES ON THE GREEK TEXT.

P. 106. To mount the platform.] Boys when they had undergone the δοκιμασία, "Scrutiny," before the Thesmothetæ, who presided in the court of Heliaæ, see Lysias in Diogeiton. p. 508 and 515; Aristoph. Vesp. 576; and Antiphont. de cæde Choreutæ, p. 143, ed. Steph.; and were enrolled among the men, though they were for a year excused from undertaking all ἀστροπύια, "Public Duties," seem to have been at liberty, at this time of the republic, to vote and speak in the assembly of the people. Therefore, Potter (Archæolog. i. 17) is not correct when he affirms that they could not speak there, who were under thirty years of age. They could not indeed be chosen into the senate, &c. till that age.

P. 106. Γράμματα καὶ καθάριζαν.] The usual education of the Athenian children from seven years old to fifteen. See Æschines de Axioco, p. 94, ed. Le Clerc, and Aristoph. in Nubibus, vs. 961.

P. 122, § 37. There is a care to not one of the Athenians.] Of old the court of Areopagus were inspectors of the education of youth. The members of it divided that care among them, and each of them in his province took note of such fathers as gave not their children an education suitable to their fortune and way of life, as Isocrates shows at large in his beautiful Areopagitic oration. At what time their vigilance on this head began to decline, I cannot fix; but it was probably towards the beginning of the administration of Pericles, when the authority of that venerable body was lessened and restrained by Ephialtes, that is, before Ol. 80, 1; yet I find the form of the thing still continued, though not the force of it: for Æschines, in Axioch. p. 367, § 8, speaking of the discipline young men were subject to, from about the age of eighteen to twenty, says that "The whole period of youth is under Moderators, and the selection of those who are placed over youths by the council of the Areopagus. The "Sophronists" here mentioned, are distinct from the Areopagites; being the name of a magistracy described in Etymolog. Magn. in Σοφρονιστῆραι, as certain officers, chosen by votes, ten in number, one for each ward, who have the care over the temperate conduct of youths.

P. 122, § 39. Already for many generations.] We are not told, I believe, by any other writer, that the use of money was so early introduced into Lacedæmon; but there is a passage of Posidonius in Athenæus, vi. 233, that throws light on the subject. Plutarch says, that money was not even allowed for the uses of the state, till after the siege of Athens and its surrender to Lysander, when that point was carried after a great struggle; although, at the same time, it was made capital to apply it to private occasions. This happened twenty-seven years after the date of this dialogue.

ALCIBIADES II.

THIS is a continuation of the same subject; for what is said on prayer is rather accidental, and only introductory to the main purpose of the dialogue. It is nothing inferior in elegance to the former. Some have attributed it to Xenophon, but it is undoubtedly Plato's, and designed as a second part to the former.

I could be glad if it were as easy to fix the time of it, as Dacier would persuade us, who boldly fixes it Ol. 93, 1, but there are facts alluded to in it, that will neither be reconciled to that date, nor indeed to one another; and besides, it is better to allow Plato to be guilty of these inaccuracies in chronology, than of those improprieties of character which must be the consequences of Dacier's supposition. It is plain that Socrates continues, as in the preceding discourse, to treat Alcibiades with a certain gentle superiority of understanding, and that he prescribes to, and instructs him in, a manner extremely proper to form the mind of a youth just entering into the world, but ill-bred and impertinent to a man of forty years of age, who had passed through the highest dignities of the state and through the most extraordinary reverses of fortune. Plato himself may convince us of this, by what he makes Socrates say in the first Alcibiades, p. 127, § 48: "But now you ought to take courage. For if you had perceived that you were suffering so at the age of fifty, it would have been difficult to take care of yourself. But now you are at the very time of life, when it is meet for you to perceive it."

The principal difficulties are that he speaks of Pericles as yet living, who died Ol. 87, 4, and of the murder of Archelaus king of Macedon as a fact then recent, which did not happen till Ol. 95, 1, the same year with Socrates's death, and near five years after that of Alcibiades.

NOTES ON THE GREEK TEXT.

P. 141. Τα παιδία.] Craterus conspired with Hellenocrates and Decannichus to murder that prince, (Archelaus of Macedonia,) as he was hunting. Aristotle calls him Cratæus, and gives a fuller account of this conspiracy than any other author. Aristot. Politic. v. 10. Archelaus had promised him one of his daughters in marriage, for he had two, but gave one to the king of Elimeia and the other to his own son Amyntas.

Hellenocrates was a Lariſſean who had likewise been ſubſervient to the king's pleaſures.

P. 148. Sacrifices the moſt numerous.] The Athenians were remarkably ſumptuous in their temples and public worſhip, beyond any other people. Two months in the year were taken up entirely in theſe ſolemnities. See Schol. on Ariſtoph. in Vesp. vs. 655, and Xenoph. Rep. Athen. p. 699.

P. 150. It is he of whoſe care you are the object.] Socrates may either mean the Divinity here, as in the former dialogue, Alcibiad. I. p. 122, § 37; for it was the character of Socrates to aſſume nothing to himſelf, but all to the demon, who directed him, whom he calls his, ἑρμηνεύς, "Guardian;" or Socrates may here mean himſelf, as I rather think. Some Chriſtian writers indeed would give a very extraordinary turn to this part of the dialogue, as though Plato meant to prove the neceſſity of a Revelation. But I can ſee no ſuch mysteries in it. Socrates has proved that we are neither fit to deal with mankind, till we know them by knowing ourſelves; nor to addreſs ourſelves to the Divine power, till we know enough of his nature to know what we owe him: what that nature is, he defers examining till another opportunity, which is done to raiſe the curioſity and impatience of the young Alcibiades, and to avoid that prolixity, into which a diſquiſition ſo important would have naturally led him.

THEAGES.

DEMODOCUS of Anagyrus, an old Athenian who had paſſed with reputation through the higheſt offices of the ſtate, and now, after the manner of his anceſtors, lived chiefly on his lands in the country, employed in agriculture and ruſtic amuſements, brings with him to Athens his ſon Theages, a youth impatient to improve himſelf in the arts then in vogue, and to ſhine among his companions who ſtudied eloquence,¹ and practiſed politics, as ſoon as ever their age would permit them to appear in the popular aſſemblies.

Socrates, at the father's deſire, enters into converſation with the young man, and decoys him by little and little into a confeſſion that he wanted to be a great man, and to govern his fellow citizens.

¹ Ariſtophanes ridicules in many places this turn of the age in which he lived. Reading, and the knowledge of the Belles Lettres, having more generally diffuſed itſelf through the body of the people, than it had done hitherto, had an ill effect on the manners of a nation naturally vain and lively. Every one had a ſmattering of eloquence and of reaſoning, and every one would make a figure and govern; but no one would be governed: the authority of age and of virtue was loſt and overborne, and wit and a fluency of words ſupplied the place of experience and of common ſenſe.

After diverting himself with the naïveté of Theages, he proposes ironically several sophists of reputation, and several famous statesmen, who were fit to instruct him in this grand art: but as it does not appear that the disciples of those sophists, or even the sons of those statesmen, have been much the better for their lessons, both Demodocus and Theages entreat and insist that Socrates himself would admit him to his company and favour him with his instructions. The philosopher very gravely tells them stories of his demon, without whose permission he undertakes nothing, and upon whom it entirely depends, whether his conversation shall be of any use, or not, to his friends; but at last he acquiesces, if Theages cares to make the experiment.

The scene of the dialogue is in the portico, described by Pausanias, i. 3, of Jupiter the Deliverer, in the Ceramicus, the principal street of Athens; and the time Ol. 92, 3-4, during the expedition of Thrasyllus, in which he was defeated at Ephesus by the Persians and other allies of Sparta. Socrates was then sixty years old.

NOTE ON THE GREEK TEXT.

P. 125. Callicreté.] The poem of Anacreon on Callicreté the daughter of Cyane, is now lost. Dacier seriously imagines that she was a female politician, like Aspasia. But it is more agreeable to Anacreon's gallantry, that we should suppose the seat of tyranny was only in her face.

P. 129. Κλειτόμαχον ἰπίσθαι.] This assassination of Nicias, the son of Heroscamander, by Philemon and Timarchus, and the condemnation of the latter with Euathlus, who had given him shelter, is not recounted in any other author.

SOCRATES,¹ about the time that an accusation had been preferred against him for impiety in the court of the Βασιλεὺς,² second Archon,

² Impeachments for murder were laid in the court of the Βασιλεὺς, but not tried till four months after in the court of Areopagus, where the Βασιλεὺς had himself a vote. The cause was judged in the open air, for all such as were (ὁμορόφιοι) under the same roof with the defendant were thought to partake of his guilt. The accuser gave him immediate notice not to approach the forum, the assembly, the temples, or the public games, and in that state he continued, till he was acquitted of the crime. See called "king," meets while he is walking in the portico, where that magistrate used to sit in judgment, with Euthyphro, a person deeply versed in the knowledge of religious affairs, as sacrifices, oracles, divinations, and such matters, and full of that grave kind of arrogance which these mysterious sciences use to inspire. His father, having an estate in the isle of Naxos, had employed among his own slaves a poor Athenian who worked for hire. This man, having drunk too much, had quarrelled with and actually murdered one of the slaves. Upon which, the father of Euthyphro apprehended and threw him into a jail, till the Ἐξηγῆται,¹ Interpreters, had been consulted, in order to know what should be done. The man, not having been taken much care of, died in his confinement: upon which Euthyphro determines to lodge an indictment against his own father for murder. Socrates, surprised at the novelty of such an accusation, inquires into the sentiments of Euthyphro with regard to piety and the service of the gods, by way of informing himself on that subject against the time of his trial, and by frequent questions, entangling him in his own concessions, and forcing him to shift from one principle and definition to another, soon lays open his ignorance, and shows that all his ideas of religion were founded on childish fables and on arbitrary forms and institutions.

The intention of the dialogue seems to be, to expose the vulgar notions of piety, founded on traditions unworthy of the Divinity, and employed in propitiating him by puerile inventions and by the vain ceremonies of external worship, without regard to justice and to those plain duties of society, which alone can render us truly worthy of the Deity.

THE APOLOGY OF SOCRATES.

PLATO was himself present at the trial of Socrates, being then about twenty-nine years of age; and he was one of those who offered to speak in his defence, though the court would not suffer him to proceed, and to be bound as a surety for the payment of his fine: yet we are not to imagine, that this oration was the real de-

Antipho Orat. de cæde Herodis, and de cæde Chæreutæ. Informations might also (as it seems) be laid in the court of Helisia before the Theomothetæ.

¹ The Ἐξηγῆται at Athens, like the Pontifices at Rome, were applied to, when any prodigy had happened, or any violent death, to settle the rites of expiation, or to propitiate the manes of the dead.

fence which Socrates made. Dionysius Halicarnassus says, that it "never saw even the door of the Judgment-Hall, nor of the Agora, but was written with some other design;" and what that design was, he explains himself by saying, that, under the cover of an apology, it is a delicate satire on the Athenians, a panegyric on Socrates, and a pattern and character of the true philosopher. Nevertheless, it is founded on truth; it represents the true spirit and disposition of Socrates, and many of the topics used in it are agreeable to those which we find in Xenophon, and which were doubtless used by Socrates himself; as where he mentions his demon, and the reasons he had for preferring death to life, his account of the oracle given to Chærepho, and the remarkable allusion to Palamedes, &c., the ground-work is manifestly the same though the expressions are different. In one thing only they seem directly to contradict each other: Xenophon says, he neither offered himself any thing in mitigation of his punishment, nor would suffer his friends to do so, looking upon this as an acknowledgment of some guilt. If the word in the text, ἰπομιᾶσθαι, means that he would not submit to ask for a change of his sentence into banishment, or perpetual imprisonment, so far it is agreeable to Plato, p. 37; but if it means, that he would not suffer any mulct himself, nor permit his friends to mention it, we see the contrary, p. 38, where he fines himself one mina, all he was worth, and where his friends Crito, Critobulus, Plato, and Apollodorus, offer thirty minæ, (£96 17s. 6d.,) which was, I suppose, all they could raise, to save him. Now this being a fact, at that time easily proved or disproved, I am of opinion that Plato never would have inserted into his discourse a manifest falsity, and, therefore, we are to take Xenophon's words in that restrained sense which I have mentioned.

Potter says, that from the nature of the crime Ἀσέβεια, "Impiety," it is evident that the trial was before the court of Areopagus. But I take the contrary to be evident from the style both here and in Xenophon. He always addresses his judges by the name of Ἄνδρες, "Men," or Ἄνδρες Ἀθηναῖοι, "Men of Athens;" whereas the form of speaking either to the Areopagites or to the senate of Five Hundred was constantly ὦ Βουλῇ, "Oh! thou the Council:" and in the courts of justice, Ἄνδρες Δικασταί, "Jurymen," or sometimes Ἄνδρες Ἀθηναῖοι, "Men of Athens," or Ἄνδρες, "Men," alone: he therefore was judged in some of these courts.

NOTES ON THE GREEK TEXT.

P. 32. Ἐβουλευσα δέ.] Socrates was in the senate of Five Hundred, Ol. 93, 3, being then sixty-five years of age. The Prytanes presided in the assemblies of the people, were seated in the place of honour,

The reasoning part is far inferior, sometimes weak, sometimes false, too obscure, too abstracted, to convince us of any thing; yet with a mixture of good sense and with many fine observations. The fabulous account of a future state is too particular and too fantastic an invention for Socrates to dwell upon at such a time, and has less decorum and propriety in it than the other parts of the dialogue.

Socrates attempts in this dialogue to prove that true philosophy is but a continual preparation for death; its daily study and practice being to wean and separate the body from the soul, whose pursuit of truth is perpetually stopped and impeded by the numerous avocations, the little pleasures, pains, and necessities of its companion. That, as death is but a transition from its opposite, life, (in the same manner as heat is from cold, weakness from strength, and all things, both in the natural and in the moral world, from their contraries,) so life is only a transition from death; whence he would infer the probability of a metempsychosis. That, such propositions, as every one assents to at first, being self-evident, and no one giving any account how such parts of knowledge, on which the rest are founded, were originally conveyed to our mind, there must have been a pre-existent state, in which the soul was acquainted with these truths, which she recollects and assents to on their recurring to her in this life. That, as truth is eternal and immutable, and not visible to our senses, but to the soul alone; and as the empire, which she exercises over the body, bears a resemblance to the power of the Divinity, it is probable that she, like her object, is everlasting and unchangeable, and, like the office she bears, something divine. That, it cannot be, as some have thought, merely a harmony resulting from a disposition of parts in the body, since it directs, commands, and restrains the functions of that very body. That, the soul, being the cause of life to the body, can never itself be susceptible of death; and that, there will be a state of rewards and punishments, the scene of which he takes pains in describing, though he concludes, that no man can tell exactly where or what it shall be.

Dacier's superstition and folly are so great in his notes on the Phædo, that they are not worth dwelling upon.

THE RIVALS.

THE scene lies in the school of Dionysius the grammarian, who was Plato's own master. The design is to show, that philosophy consists not in ostentation, nor in that insight (which the sophists affected) into a variety of the inferior parts of science, but in the knowledge of one's self, and in a sagacity in discovering the characters and dispositions of mankind, and of correcting and of modelling their minds to their own advantage.

The dialogue is excellent, but too short for such a subject. The interlocutors are not named, nor is there any mark of the time when it happened.

NOTE ON THE GREEK TEXT.

P. 135. The price of a slave skilled in carpenter's work, was five or six minæ, about £19 7s. 6d.; of an architect, 10,000 drachmæ, i. e. above £322 17s.

LACHES.

THE persons in this dialogue are men of distinguished rank and figure in the state of Athens.

1. Lysimachus, son to the famous Aristides, surnamed The Just.
2. Melesias, son to that Thucydides who was the great rival of Pericles in the administration.

3. Nicias, so often the general in the Peloponnesian war, celebrated for his goodness, for his conduct, and for his success, till the fatal expedition to Syracuse, in which he perished.

4. Laches, son of Melanopus of the district Æxone, and tribe Cæcropia, commander of the fleet sent to the assistance of the Leontines in Sicily, Ol. 88, 2, in which expedition he defeated the Locrians, reduced Messene, Mylæ, and other places, and after his recall seems to have been prosecuted by Cleon for corruption in this very year; whence it appears, that he was in the battle of Delium.

5. Thucydides, son to Melesias. } Two youths under twenty years of age.
6. Aristides, son to Lysimachus. }
7. Socrates, then in his forty-seventh year.

The two first of these persons, being then very ancient, and probably about seventy years of age, and sensible of that defect in their own education, which had caused them to lead their lives in an obscurity unworthy the sons of such renowned fathers, were the more solicitous on account of their own sons, who were now almost of an age to enter into the world. They therefore invite Nicias and Laches, men of distinguished abilities and bravery, but some years younger than themselves, to a conference on that subject; and after having been spectators together of the feats of arms exhibited by Stesilaus, a professed master in the exercise of all weapons, they enter into conversation. Socrates, who happened to be present, is introduced by Laches to Lysimachus, as a person worthy to bear a part in their consultation. The first question is occasioned by the spectacle which they had just beheld, namely, "whether the management of arms be an exercise fit to be learned by young men of quality?" Nicias is desired first to deliver his opinion, which is, that it may give grace and agility to their persons, and courage and confidence to their minds; that it may make them more terrible to their enemies in battle, and more useful to their friends; and at the same time may inspire them with a laudable ambition to attain the higher and more noble parts of military knowledge. Laches has a direct contrary opinion of it: he argues from his own experience, that he never knew a man, who valued himself upon this art, that had distinguished himself in the war; that the Lacedæmonians, who valued and cultivated military discipline beyond all others, gave no encouragement to these masters of defence; that, to excel in it, only served to make a coward more assuming and impudent, and to expose a brave man to envy and calumny, by making any little failing or oversight more conspicuous in him.

Socrates is then prevailed upon to decide the difference, who artfully turns the question of much greater importance for a young man of spirit to know, namely, "what is valour, and how it is distinguished from a brutal and unmeaning fierceness." By interrogating Laches and Nicias, he shows, that such as had the highest reputation for courage in practice, were often very deficient in the theory; and yet none can communicate a virtue he possesses, without he has himself a clear idea of it. He proves, that valour must have good sense for its basis; that it consists in the knowledge of what is and what is not to be feared; and that, consequently, we must first distinguish between real good and evil, and that it is closely connected with the other virtues, namely, justice, temperance, and piety, nor can it ever subsist without them. The scope of this fine dialogue is to show, that philosophy is the school of true bravery.

The time of this dialogue is not long after the defeat of the Athenians at Delium, OL 89, 1, in which action Socrates had behaved with great spirit, and thence recommended himself to the friendship of Laches.

HIPPARCHUS.

THE intention of the dialogue is to show, that all mankind in their actions equally tend to some imagined good, but are commonly mistaken in the nature of it; and that nothing can properly be called gain which, when attained, is not a real good.

The time of the dialogue is no where marked.

PHILEBUS.

THIS dialogue is too remarkable to be passed over slightly: we shall therefore annex the principal heads of it. The question is, "What is the supreme good of mankind?" and, "whether pleasure or wisdom have the better pretension to it?"

The persons are, Protarchus, the son of Callias, who supports the cause of pleasure, and Socrates, who opposes it: Philebus, who had begun the dispute, but was grown weary of it, and many others of the Athenian youth, are present at the conversation. The time of it is no where marked. The end of the dialogue is supposed to be lost.

P. 12. The name of pleasure, variously applied, to the joys of intemperance and folly, and to the satisfaction arising from wisdom, and from the command of our passions.

Though of unlike, and even of opposite natures, they agree so far, as they are all pleasures alike; as black and white, though contrary the one to the other, are comprehended under the general head of colours.

Though included under one name, if some are contrary and of opposite natures to others, they cannot both be good alike.

P. 14. Vulgar inquiry, how it is possible for many to be one, and one many, laid aside by consent as childish. Obscure question on our abstracted idea of unity.

P. 15. The vanity and disputatious humours of a young man, who has newly tasted of philosophy and has got hold of a puzzling question, are well described.

Every subject of our conversation has in it a mixture of the infinite and of the finite.

P. 16. The true logician will, as the ancients prescribed, first discover some single and general idea, and then proceed to two or three subordinate to it, which he will again subdivide into their several classes, which will form, as it were, a medium beneath finite and infinite.

Example in the alphabet. The human voice is one idea, but susceptible of a variety of modulations, and to be diversified even to infinity: to know that it is one, and to know that it is infinite, are neither of them knowledge; but there can be no knowledge without them.

When we first attain to the unity of things, we must descend from number to infinity, if we would know any thing: and when we first perceive their infinity, we must ascend through number to unity. Thus the first inventor of letters remarking the endless variety of sounds, discovered a certain number of vowels, distinguished others of a different power, called consonants, some of which were mutes, and others liquids, and to the whole combination of elements he gave the form and name of an alphabet.

P. 20. The good, which constitutes happiness, must be in itself sufficient and perfect, the aim and end of all human creatures.

A life of mere pleasure considered by itself, which, if pleasure only be that good, must need no mixture nor addition.

If we had no memory nor reflection, we could have no enjoyment of past pleasure, nor hope of future, and scarcely any perception of the present, which would be much like the life of an oyster: on the other hand, a life of thought and reflection, without any sense of pleasure or of pain, seems no desirable state. Neither contemplation therefore nor pleasure are the good we seek after, but probably a life composed of both.

P. 22. Whether the happiness of this mixed state is the result of pleasure, or rather of wisdom, and which contributes most to it?

P. 23. Division of all existence into the infinite, the limited¹

¹ Or rather, that which limits and gives bounds, such as figure, which gives bounds to extension; as time, which limits duration, &c.

the mixed, which is composed of the two former, and the supreme cause of all.

Example of the first; all that admits of increase or decrease, greater or less, hotter or colder, &c., i. e. all undetermined quantity.

Of the second; all that determines quantity, as equality, duplicity, and whatever relation number bears to number, and measure to measure.

Of the third, or mixed; all created things, in which the infinity of matter is, by number and measure, reduced to proportion.

P. 27. Pleasure and pain, having no bounds¹ in themselves, are of the nature of the infinite.

P. 28, § 49. The supreme power and wisdom of the Deity asserted.

P. 28, § 53. But a small portion of the several elements is visible in our frame. Our soul is a small portion of the spirit of the universe, or fourth kind mentioned above.

P. 31. Pain is a consequence of a² dissolution of that symmetry and harmony in our fabric, which is the cause of health, strength, &c.; as pleasure results from the return and restoration of the parts to their just proportions.

Thus hunger and thirst are uneasinesses proceeding from emptiness; eating and drinking produce pleasure by restoring a proper degree of repletion. Excess of cold is attended with a sensation of pain, and warmth brings with it an equal pleasure.

Pleasures and pains of the soul alone arise from the³ expectation of pleasure or pain of the body: these are hopes and fears, and depend upon the memory.

A state of indifference is without pleasure or pain, which is consistent with a life of thought and contemplation.

P. 33. Sensation is conveyed to the soul through the organs of the body; the body may receive many motions and alterations unperceived by the mind.

P. 34. Memory is the preserver of our sensations.

Recollection, an act of the mind alone, restores to us ideas imprinted in the memory, after an intermission.

¹ Happiness and misery, says Mr. Locke, are the names of two extremes, the utmost bounds whereof we know not: but of some degrees of them we have very lively ideas. (Chapt. of Power, i. 41.)

² This is an idea of Timæus, the Locrian, p. 100, C. § 7. And Mr. Locke makes much the same observation. Excess of cold, (says he,) as well as heat, pains us; because it is equally destructive of that temper, which is necessary to the preservation and the exercise of the several functions of the body, and which consists in a moderate degree of warmth, or, if you please, a motion of the insensible parts of our bodies confined within certain bounds. Essay on H. U. ch. vii. § 4.

³ "Hope is that pleasure in the mind, which every one finds upon the thought of a profitable future enjoyment of a thing which is apt to delight him. Fear is an uneasiness upon the thought of future evil, likely to befall us." Locke, ib. ch. xx.

Desire, in the mind alone, by which it supplies the wants of the body: it depends on memory.

In the appetites, pleasure and pain go together, a proportionable satisfaction succeeding, as the uneasiness abates.

Memory¹ of a past pleasing sensation inspires hope of a future one, and thereby abates an uneasiness actually present; as the absence of hope doubles a present pain.

P. 36. Whether truth and falsehood belong to pleasures and pains?

They do: as these are founded on our opinions² of things preconceived, which may, undoubtedly, be either true or false.

P. 38. Our opinions are founded on our sensations, and the memory of them. Thus we see a figure at a distance beyond a certain rock, or under a certain tree, and we say to ourselves, it is a man; but on advancing up to it, we find a rude image of wood carved by a shepherd.

P. 39. The senses, the memory, and the passions, which attend on them, write on our souls, or rather delineate, a variety of conceptions and representations, of which, when justly drawn, we form true opinions and propositions; but when falsely, we form false ones.

On these our hopes and fears are built, and consequently are capable of truth and falsehood, as well as the opinions on which they are founded.

P. 40. The good abound in just and true hopes, fears, and desires; the bad, in false and delusive ones.

P. 41. As pleasures³ and pains are infinite, we can only measure them by comparison, one with the other.

P. 42, § 89. Our hopes and fears are no less liable to be deceived by the prospect of distant objects, than our eyes. As we are always comparing those which are far off, with others less remote or very near, it is no wonder that we are often mistaken; especially as a pleasure, when set next a pain, does naturally appear greater than its true magnitude, and a pain less.

P. 42, § 90. So much then of pains and pleasures as exceeds or falls short of its archetype, is false.

P. 42, § 92. A state of indolence, or of apathy, is supposed by the school of Heraclitus to be impossible, on account of the perpetual motion of all things.

¹ What Plato calls by the name of Μνήμη, "Memory," and Ἀνάμνησις, "Recollection," are by Locke distinguished under the names of Contemplation and Memory, (l. i. ch. 10,) being the different powers of retention.

² All this head is finely explained by Locke in ch. on Power, § 61 and foll., which is the best comment on this part of Plato.

³ "If we will rightly estimate what we call good and evil, we shall find it lies much in comparison." Locke, ch. on Power, § 42.

Motions and alterations¹ proved to happen continually in our body, of which the soul has no perception.

P. 43. Therefore, (though we should allow the perpetual motion of things,) there are times when the soul feels neither pleasure nor pain; so that this is a possible state.

Pleasure, and its contrary, are not the consequences of any changes in our constituent parts, but of such changes as are considerable and violent.

P. 44. The sect of philosophers, who affirm² that there is no pleasure but the absence of pain, is in the wrong, but from a noble principle.

P. 45. To know the nature of pleasure, we should consider such as are strongest: bodily pleasures are such.

Pleasure is in proportion to our desires. The desires and longings of sick persons are the most violent: the mad and thoughtless feel the strongest³ degree of pleasure and of pain; so that both the one and the other increase with the disorder and depravity of our body and mind.

P. 46. Pleasures of lust have a mixture of pain, as the pain of the itch⁴ has a mixture of pleasure, and both subsist at the same instant.

Anger, grief, love, envy, are pains of the soul, but with a mixture⁵ of pleasure. Exemplified in the exercise of our compassion and terror at a tragic spectacle, and of our envy at a comic one. The pleasure of ridicule arises from vanity and from the ignorance of ourselves. We laugh at the follies of the weak, and hate those of the powerful.

P. 47. Pure and unmixed pleasures⁶ proved to exist: those of the senses resulting from regularity of figure, beautiful colours, melodious sounds, odours of fragrance, &c., and all whose absence is not necessarily accompanied with any uneasiness. Again: satisfactions of the mind resulting from knowledge, the absence or loss of which is not naturally attended with any pain.

P. 53, § 121. A small portion of pure and uncorrupted pleasure is preferable to a larger one of that which is mixed and impure.

P. 53, § 122. The opinion of some philosophers, that pleasure is continually generating, but is never produced, i. e. it has no real existence, seems true with regard to mere bodily pleasures.

P. 55, § 130. Inquiry into knowledge. The nature of the arts:

¹ Whatever alterations are made in the body, if they reach not the mind, whatever impressions are made on the outward parts, if they are not taken notice of within, there is no perception. Locke, ch. ix.

² "Pleasure," says Mr. Selden, "is nothing but the intermission of pain, the enjoyment of something I am in great trouble for, till I have it."

such of them as approach the nearest to real knowledge, are the most¹ considerable, being founded on number, weight, and² measure, and capable of demonstration.

P. 55, § 131. Secondly, those attainable only by use and frequent trial, being founded on conjecture and experiment, such as music, medicine, agriculture, natural philosophy, &c.

P. 60. Recapitulation.

P. 61. Happiness resides in³ the just mixture of wisdom and pleasure; particularly when we join the purest pleasures with the clearer and more certain sciences.

P. 63. Prosopopœia of the pleasures and sciences, consulted on the proposal made for uniting them.

P. 64. No mixture is either useful or durable, without proportion. The supreme good of man consists in beauty, in symmetry, and in truth, which are the causes of all the happiness to be found in the above-mentioned union.

MENO.

THE subject of the dialogue is this: That virtue is knowledge, and that true philosophy alone can give us that knowledge.

I see nothing in this dialogue to make one think that Plato intended to raise the character of Meno. He is introduced as a young man who seems to value himself on his parts, and on the proficiency he has made under Gorgias the Leontine, whose notions are here exposed, and the compliments Socrates makes him on his beauty, wealth, family, and other distinctions, are only little politenesses ordinarily used by that philosopher to put persons into good humour, and draw them into conversation with him.

The time of the dialogue seems to be not long before the expedition of the ten thousand into Asia, for Meno was even then a very young man, and still beardless, as he is represented here; and the menaces of Anytus (p. 94) show, that it was not long before the accusation of Socrates; so that we may place it Ol. 94, 4, if Plato may be trusted in these small matters of chronology, which, we know, he sometimes neglected. Gorgias was yet at Athens, Ol. 93, 4, and it is probable, that the approaching siege of that city might drive him thence into Thessaly, and he returned not till after Socrates's death.

Socrates here distinguishes (p. 75) the true method of disputation from the false.

P. 77. Meno's first definition of virtue is, that it consists in desiring good, and in being able to attain it. Socrates proves that all men desire good, and consequently all men are so far equally virtuous, which is an absurdity; it must therefore consist in the ability to attain it: which is true in Socrates's sense of the word good. (which makes him say, ἵσως ἂν εὖ λέγοις): but it is necessary to know if men's ideas of it are the same. Upon inquiry, Meno's meaning appears to be, health, honour, riches, power, &c.; but, being pressed by Socrates, he is forced to own, that the attainment of these is so far from virtue, that it is vice, unless accompanied with temperance, with justice, and with piety; as then the virtue of such an attainment consists in such adjuncts, and not in the thing attained; and as these are confessedly parts of virtue only, subordinate to some more general idea, they are no nearer discovering what virtue in the abstract is, than they were at first.

Though the doctrine of reminiscence, repeated by Plato in several places, be chimerical enough; yet this, which follows it, (p. 84,) is worth attending to, where Socrates shows how useful it is to be sensible of our own ignorance. While we know nothing, we doubt of nothing; this is a state of great confidence and security. From the first distrust we entertain of our own understanding springs an uneasiness and a curiosity, which will not be satisfied till it attains to knowledge.

Whoever reads the dialogue, "On Virtue, whether it is to be taught," attributed to Æschines the Socratic, will see so great a resemblance to this of Plato, and at the same time find so great a difference in several respects, that he will believe both one and the other to be sketches of a real conversation, which passed between Socrates and some other person, noted down both by Æschines and by Plato at the time: the former left his notes in that unfinished condition, but the latter supplied them as he thought fit, and worked them up at his leisure into this dialogue.

NOTES ON THE GREEK TEXT.

P. 70. Ἐφ' ἱππικῇ τε καὶ πλοῦτι.] The breed of Thessalian horses was the most celebrated in Greece; and when the cities of Thessaly were united among themselves, they could raise a body of six thousand, equal to any cavalry in the world. (Xenophon, Hellenic. vi. p. 339. Pausan. x. p. 799. Plato in Hipp. Maj. p. 284.) They were of great service to Alexander in his expeditions. The country was very rich in pasture and in corn, and, as their government was generally remiss and ill-regulated, their wealth naturally introduced a corruption (Athenæus, xiv. p. 663) of manners, which made them first slaves themselves, and then the instruments of slavery to other people. It was they who invited the Persian (Herod. vii. and ix.) into Greece; and afterwards gave rise to the power of the Macedonians. Isocrates (Orat. de Pace, p. 183) produces them as an example of a strong and wealthy people, reduced by their own bad management to a low and distressed condition.

P. 70. Ἀριστίππου τοῦ Λαρίσσαιου.] Aristippus of Larissa, one of the potent house of the Aleuadæ, descendants of Hercules, from which the Thessalians had so often elected their Tayoi, or captains-general. There had been a friendship kept up between them and the royal family of Persia, ever since the invasion of Greece by Xerxes, in which they were of great use to him. This Aristippus had particular connexions with the younger Cyrus, (Xenoph. Anab. i. 145, and ii. 173,) who lent him a body of four thousand mercenaries, which he made use of to subdue the faction which opposed him in Thessaly, and seems to have established a sort of tyranny there. Meno (also of Larissa) son of Alexidemus, led a body of fifteen hundred men to the assistance of Cyrus in his expedition against his brother, Artaxerxes, Ol. 94, 4, and (after the death of Cyrus) betrayed the Greek commanders into the hands of the Persian, who cut off their heads. He himself survived not above a year, but was destroyed by the Persians. His character is admirably drawn by Xenophon, (Anab. ii. p. 173,) and many have looked on this as a mark of the enmity between Plato and Xenophon. See Athenæus, xi. p. 505 and 506; Diog. Laert. ii. sect. 57, and iii. sect. 34; and Aul. Gellius, xiv. sect. 3.

P. 76. The definition of colour, in the manner of Gorgias, (perhaps we should read σμάρων, in lieu of σχημάτων,) is that there is from that efflux, or those effluvia, of figured bodies, an efflux which is proportioned to our sense of seeing. This is true, if understood of the particles of light reflected from bodies; but not otherwise. Empedocles, however, and after him Epicurus, in Diogen. Laert. x. 49, thought, that the immediate objects of vision were certain particles detached from the surface of the bodies which we behold.

P. 80. The torpedo.] This fish, called by the French on the coast of the Mediterranean, "la torpille," is of the skate or ray kind. As all of that species have a wide mouth and prominent eyes, the face of Socrates, who had these two remarkable features, reminds Meno of this fish. Its figure and extraordinary property of benumbing any creature which touches it are described by Mr. Reaumur, in the Mémoires de l'Académie des Sciences, pour l'Année 1714, where there is a print of it.

P. 89. In the citadel.] Where the sacred treasure was kept. It consisted of one thousand talents, never to be touched, unless the city were to be attacked by a naval force; in any other case it was made capital to propose it.

GORGIAS.

P. 451. Σκολιον.] These Scolia were a kind of lyric compositions, sung either in concert, or successively, by all the guests after a banquet: the subjects of them were either the praises of some divinity, or moral precepts, or reflections on life, or gay exhortations to mirth, to wine, or to love. There were some Scolia of great antiquity; the most esteemed were those of Alcæus, of Praxilla, and of Anacreon.

P. 453. The election of physicians.] There were public physicians elected in most of the Greek cities, who received a salary from the commonwealth, and seem to have taken no fees of particular people. Those physicians who exercised this office, were said δημοσύνειν. See Aristoph. Birds, vs. 585, and Acharn. 1029; Plut. 508; but the custom seems to have been laid aside before OL. 97, 4, in Athens. See Aristoph. Plut. 407; Gorg. p. 514; and the Statesman, p. 259.

P. 563. There is much good sense in this part of the dialogue: he distinguishes the arts, which form and improve the body, into the gymnastic, which regulates its motions and maintains its proper habit, and the medical, which corrects its ill habits and cures its distempers: those of the soul, which answer to the former, are the legislative, which prescribes rules for its conduct and preserves its uprightness, and the judicative, which amends and redresses its deviation from those rules. Flattery, ever applying herself to the passions of men, without regarding any principle or proposing any rational end, has watched her opportunity, and assuming the form of these several arts, has introduced four counterfeits in their room, viz. 1. Cookery, which, while it tickles the palate, pretends to maintain the body in health and vigour; 2. Cosmetics, which conceal our defects and diseases under a borrowed beauty; 3. Sophistry, which, by the false lights it throws upon every thing, misleads our reason and palliates our vices; and, 4. Rhetoric, which saves us from the chastisement we deserve and eludes the salutary rigour of justice.

P. 467. If a person is doing something, &c.] He is here proving that fundamental principle of his doctrine, namely, that the wicked man is doing he knows not what, and sins only through ignorance: and that the end of his actions, like that of all other men, is good, but he mistakes the nature of it, and uses wrong means to attain it.

P. 470. Yesterday and the day before.] As the time of this dialogue plainly appears (from that passage in p. 473, "Last year becoming by lot one of the council," which is taken notice of by Athenæus, in v. p. 217) to be Ol. 93, 4, the year after the sea-fight at Arginusæ, these words must be taken in a larger sense, as we say of a thing long since past, "It happened but the other day," when we would compare it with more ancient times; for Archelaus had now reigned at least nine years, and continued on the throne about six years longer. So in p. 503, by the words, "Pericles recently dead," we must understand recenti, "recently," in the same manner, for Pericles had been dead twenty-three years. But the time is there compared with that of Cimon, Themistocles, and Miltiades, who died many years before. Socrates indeed might have seen and remembered Cimon, the other two he could not. These particulars of Archelaus's history are curious and not to be met with elsewhere: viz. That he was the bastard son of Perdiccas by a female slave belonging to his brother Alcetas; that he caused his uncle and master Alcetas, together with Alexander his son, to be murdered after a banquet, to which he had invited them; that he caused his own brother, a child of seven years old, (the true heir to the crown and the son of Perdiccas by his wife Cleopatra,) to be drowned in a well. Athenæus (in xi. p. 506) is absurd enough to question the truth of these particulars, or, supposing them true, he says, that they are instances of Plato's ingratitude, who was much in favour with Archelaus. The passage, which he cites immediately after from Carystius of Pergamus, disproves all this, for it shows Plato's connexion to have been with Perdiccas the Third, who began to reign thirty-five years after Archelaus's death, and was elder brother to the famous Philip of Macedon. We have an epistle of Plato to that prince still remaining. At the time of Archelaus's death, Plato was under thirty years of age.

P. 481. Demus, the son of Pyrilampes, was much in the friendship of Pericles, and remarkable for being the first man who brought peacocks to Athens, and bred them in his volaries. (Plutarch in Pericle, and Athenæus, ix. p. 397.) Plato often put much truth and good sense into the mouth of characters which he did not approve. The Protagoras is a remarkable instance of this, where Socrates is introduced in the beginning, arguing against the very doctrine, which naturally follows from those principles, which he himself lays down in the end, and of which he obliges the sophist to confess the truth.

P. 488. First proof against Callicles, who had advanced that, by the law of nature, the stronger had a right to govern the weaker, that the many are stronger than the few, and consequently ought to govern them: so that the positive law of the commonwealth is the result of the law of nature.

P. 501. Cinesias, the son of Meles, was a dithyrambic poet in some sort of vogue among the people at this time. He was still a worse man than a writer, and the depravity of his character made even his misfortunes ridiculous; so that his poverty, his deformities, and his distempers, were not only produced on the stage, but frequently alluded to by the orators, and exposed to the scorn of the multitude. The comic poet, Strattis, who lived at this time, made Cinesias the subject of an entire drama.

P. 503. The bold attack made in this place on some of the greatest characters of antiquity, has drawn much censure on Plato; but we are to consider that he is here proving his favourite point, which seems to me the grand aim and intention of this dialogue, that philosophy alone is the parent of virtue, the discoverer of those fixed and unerring principles, on which the truly great and good man builds his whole scheme of life, and by which he directs all his actions; and that he, who practises this noblest art, and makes it his whole endeavour to inspire his fellow-citizens with a love for true knowledge, and this was the constant view and the employment of Socrates, has infinitely the superiority not only over the masters of those arts which the public most admires, as music, poetry, and eloquence, but over the most celebrated names in history, as heroes and statesmen; as the first have generally applied their talents to flatter the ear, to humour the prejudices, and to inflame the passions of mankind; and the latter, to soothe their vanity, to irritate their ambition, and to cheat them with an apparent, not a real, greatness.

P. 511. The price of a pilot from Ægina to Attica was two oboli (about two-pence halfpenny); from Attica to Pontus, or to Egypt, two drachmæ (fifteen-pence halfpenny).

P. 514. To learn the potter's art in a pitcher.] Proverb. To begin with a jar before we have made a gallipot.

Amphora cœpit

Institui, currente rotâ cur uroeus exit?

P. 515. To giving pay.] The administration of Pericles was the ruin of the Athenian constitution. By abridging the power of the Areopagus, and by impairing their authority, who were the superintendents of education and the censors of public manners, he sapped the foundations of virtue among them; by distributing the public revenue among the courts of justice, he made them mercenary and avaricious, negligent of their private affairs, and ever meddling in those of their neighbours; by the frequency and magnificence of the public spectacles, he inured them to luxury and to idleness; and by engaging them in the Peloponnesian war, he exposed them to be deserted by all their allies, and left to the mercy of the braver and more virtuous Lacedæmonians. Isocrates, although he had no prejudice against Pericles, and does justice to his disinterestedness and honesty in the management of the public money, still he looked upon the first of these alterations as the ruin of his country, in Orat. Areopag. p. 147, &c.

The Μισθὸς Δικαστηνῶν, "the pay of the jurymen," here spoken of by Socrates, was three oboli a day, paid to 6000 citizens, for so many sat in the courts of justice, which was to the state a yearly expense of one hundred and fifty talents; i. e. reckoning ten months to the year, for two months were spent in holidays, when the courts did not meet. A payment, appointed by Agyrrius about Ol. 96, 4, was made by every Athenian citizen who came to the assembly of the people. The ill effect which this had upon their manners is painted by Aristophanes with much humour in several of his dramas, and particularly in the Vespæ.

P. 517. Neither the true nor the flattering.] This shows that Plato meant only to distinguish between the use of eloquence and its abuse; nor is he in earnest when he says just above, that we have not known a single good man, who has been good for state affairs—for he afterwards himself names Aristides, as a man of uncommon probity, but only to show that he had puzzled Callicles, who could not produce one example of a statesman, who had abilities, or art, sufficient to preserve him from the fury of the people.

1b. Nor do I blame.] Hence it appears that he only means to show how much superior the character of a real philosopher is to that of a statesman.

MINOS.

THIS dialogue takes its name, as also does the Hipparchus, not from either of the persons introduced in it, but from the Cretan Minos, whose character and laws are mentioned pretty much at large. Socrates, and another Athenian nearly of the same age, who is not named, are considering the nature of laws in it; and the intention of Plato is to show, that there is a law of nature and of truth, common to all men, to which all truly legal institutions must be conformable, and which is the real foundation of them all.

Unfortunately the dialogue remains imperfect: it is indeed probable that it was never finished.

NOTES ON THE GREEK TEXT.

P. 315. Human sacrifice, and particularly of their children, to Saturn was in use among the Carthaginians: the sacrifices of the Lycians and of the descendants of Athamas, though people of Greek origin, were barbarous; the ancient Attic custom is mentioned of sacrificing victims near the bodies of dead persons, before they were carried out to burial, and hiring ἔγχεσθαι, and the still more ancient one of interring them in the houses where they died: both long since disused.

P. 318. Lycurgus.] The time of this dialogue is no where marked; but we see from p. 321, that Socrates was now advanced in years; supposing him then to be only sixty, it is 367 years from the first Olympiad of Coræbus; but most critics agree that Lycurgus lived one hundred and eight years before that time, and Eratosthenes, with the most accurate chronologers, affirms, that he was still more ancient. Plato therefore places him half a century later than any one else has done. The computation of Thucydides, who reckons it something more than 400 years to the end of the Peloponnesian war, from the time of the institution of Lycurgus's laws, comes nearest to that of Plato. For as the war ended Ol. 94, 1, Lycurgus settled the constitution about 27 years before the first Olympiad of Coræbus.

CHARMIDES.

OL. 87, 2 OR 3.

THE subject of this dialogue is ἡ Σοφροσύνη, "Temperance;" and what was Plato's real opinion of that virtue, may be seen in Rep. iv. p. 430, and Laws, iii. p. 696.

The dramatic part of it is very elegant.

P. 153. That a battle had taken place.] I take the particular action here mentioned to be the attack made on the city, soon after the arrival of Hagno and Cleopompus with fresh troops. See Thucyd. ii. 58. If we consider the purport of the narration there we shall find that Thucydides meant to say that Phormio and his 1600 soldiers, among whom were Socrates and Alcibiades, had returned from their expedition into Chalcidice, mentioned in i. 63, and had joined the army newly arrived from Potidea.

Ib. Critias.] It is extraordinary that Plato, from a partiality to his own family, should so often introduce into his writings the character of Critias, his cousin, whose very name, one should imagine, must be held in detestation at Athens even to remotest times, he being a monster of injustice and cruelty. Plato seems to have been not a little proud of his family. See Rep. ii. p. 368.

P. 156. Zamolxis.] This person, said by some to have been a slave of Pythagoras, but by Herodotus, in iv. 94, to have been of much greater antiquity, was the king and prophet of the Getae, who were at first only a clan of the Thracians, but afterwards, having passed the Danube, became a great and powerful nation. It is very remarkable, that they had a succession of these high priests, who lived sequestered from mankind in a grotto, and had communication only with the king, in whose power they had a great share from Zamolxis down to the time of Augustus, and possibly long after. See Strabo vii. p. 297.

P. 167: The third to the Saviour.] A proverbial expression frequent with Plato, as in Philebus, p. 66, D., and in Epist. viii. p. 340, A. I imagine it alludes to the Athenian custom detailed by Athenæus from Philochorus in ii. p. 38, which was to serve round after supper a little pure wine, with these words, Ἀγαθὴ Δαίμωνι, "To the good Genius," and afterwards as much wine and water as every one called for, with the form of Διὶ Σωτῆρι, "To Zeus the Saviour."

CRATYLUS.

THIS long dialogue on the origin of words was probably a performance of Plato when he was very young, and is the least considerable of all his works.

Cratylus, a disciple of Heraclitus, is said to have been the master of Plato after Socrates's death; but the latter part of the dialogue is plainly written against the opinions of that sect, and of Cratylus in particular.

P. 398. Ancient Attic words, δαίμων, εἶπεν: and p. 401, ἰσία; 410, Ὀραί; 418, Ἱμερα, vel Ἐμερα. He remarks that the ancient Attic abounded in the Ι and Δ, which in his time had been often changed to the Η or Ε and the Ζ, and that the women preserved much of the old language among them.

P. 409. Much of the Greek language derived from the Barbarians: Ὑψ, Πῦρ, Κῦων, borrowed from the Phrygians.

P. 425. The Barbarians acknowledged to be more ancient than the Greeks.

P. 427. The powers of the several Greek letters, and the manner of their formation: viz. the P expressive of motion, being formed by a tremulous motion of the tongue; the I of smallness and tenuity; the Φ, Ψ, Σ, Ζ, of all noises made by the air; the Δ and Τ of a cessation of motion; the Α of slipperiness and gliding; the same with a Γ prefixed, of the adherence and tenacity of fluids; the Ν of any thing internal; the Α of largeness; the Ο of roundness; and the Η expressive of length.

SYMPOSIUM.

As to the time of this dialogue, Athenæus, in v. p. 217, tells us, that Agatho first gained the prize when Euphemus was Archon, which was Ol. 90, 4. What he adds, namely, that Plato was then only fourteen years old, and consequently could not be at this entertainment, is very true, but nothing to the purpose; for it is not Plato who uses those words which he cites, but Apollodorus, who recounts the particulars of this banquet, as he had them from Aristodemus, who was present at it ten or twelve years before.

Among the ancients, Cicero, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Hermogenes, Athenæus, Gellius, and Ausonius, and among the moderns, Jos. Scaliger, Petavius, Ger. Vossius, Fraguier, Freret, and La Mothe le Vayer, believed the Cyropædia of Xenophon to be a romance: on the other side, are Usher, Marsham, Le Clerc, Prideaux, Bossuet, Tourne mine, Banier, Lenglet, Rollin, Guyon.

P. 177. ἄλλους μὲν ῥίσι τῶν θεῶν.] No hymns, nor temples, nor religious rites were offered to Love in Greece. See Sympos. p. 189.

P. 215. The figures of the Sileni in the shops of the sculptors were made hollow, which opened and discovered within the statues of the gods.

P. 219. An army.] They went thither with the supplies under the command of Phormio, Ol. 87, 1. (See Thucyd. i. 64.) Alcibiades being then twenty years of age, and Socrates thirty-nine. The folly of Athenæus, in v. c. 15, who would prove, against the authority of Plato and of Antisthenes, that Socrates was not in any of these actions, is justly exposed by Casaubon. We may add, that if the silence of Thucydides could prove any thing with regard to Socrates, it would prove, at least as strongly, that Alcibiades was not at Potidæa neither; but the contrary is certain from that very oration of Isocrates, to which Athenæus refers, Περὶ Ζεύρους, p. 352, where he is said to have gained the 'Aporia, namely, a crown and a complete suit of armour, before that city; and if the orator had not totally suppressed the name of Socrates, it would have been highly injudicious in a discourse pronounced by the son of Alcibiades, where he was to exalt the character of his father, and by no means to lessen the merit of any of his actions. He left that to his enemies, who, it is likely, did not forget the generosity of Socrates on this occasion. It is clear from the many oversights of Athenæus here, that he either trusted to his memory, or only quoted from his own extracts, and not from the originals. Plato mentions no second 'Aporia gained at Delium, and only speaks of the coolness and presence of mind shown by Socrates in his retreat; as he has done also in the Laches. Athenæus affirms, that Alcibiades was not in the battle of Delium, but he assigns no reasons. If he concludes it from the silence of Thucydides, as before, this is nothing; since that historian mentions none but the commanders-in-chief on any of these occasions, and often only one or two of the principal of these: but probably Alcibiades and Laches might then only serve as private men.

This dialogue, particularly the end of it, the Protagoras, the Gorgias, the Euthydemus, &c., are strong instances of Plato's genius for dramatic poetry in the comic kind, noticed by Athenæus, in v. p. 187. See also Olympiodor. in the Life of Plato. The Phædo is an instance of Plato's power in the tragic kind.

EUTHYDEMUS.

THERE is a good deal of humour, and even of the "vis comica," in this dialogue. Its end is to expose the vanity and weakness of two famous sophists, and to show, by way of contrast, the art of Socrates in leading youth into the paths of virtue and of right reason.

P. 287. Are you so Saturn-like,] i. e. "simple and old-fashioned." It is scarcely possible to see with patience Plato seriously confuting these childish subtleties, as low as any logical quibbles, used by our scholastic divines in the days of monkery and of deep ignorance. But he best knew the manners of his own age, and doubtless saw these things in a graver light than they of themselves deserve, by reflecting on the bad effects which they had on the understandings and on the morals of his countrymen, who not only spent their wit and their time in playing with words, when they might have employed them in inquiring into things; but, by rendering every principle doubtful and dark alike, must necessarily induce men to leave themselves to the guidance of chance and of the passions, unassisted by reason. Whereas if, in reality, there be no certain truth attainable by human knowledge, both the means and the end of disputation are absolutely taken away, and it becomes the most absurd and the most childish of all occupations.

HIPPIAS MAJOR.

We learn from this dialogue in how poor a condition the art of reasoning on moral and abstracted subjects was, before the time of Socrates; for it is impossible that Plato should introduce a sophist of the first reputation for eloquence and knowledge in several kinds, talking in a manner below the absurdity and weakness of a child, unless he had really drawn after the life. No less than twenty-four pages are here spent in vain, only to force it into the head of Hippias, that there is such a thing as a general idea; and that, before we can dispute on any subject, we should give a definition of it.

The time of the conversation seems to be after Ol. 89, 2, for the war had permitted no intercourse between Athens and Elis before that year, and we see in the Protagoras that Hippias was actually at Athens Ol. 90, 1, so that it seems to fall naturally between these two years.

NOTE ON THE GREEK TEXT.

P. 289. Passages of Heraclitus: Πιθήκων ὁ κάλλιστος αἰσχρός ἄλλω γίνεσθαι συμβαλεῖν.—Ἀνθρώπων ὁ σοφώτατος πρὸς θεὸν πιθήκος φάνεσθαι. This latter passage is undoubtedly the original of that famous thought in Pope's Essay on Man, b. ii.;

“And showed a Newton, as we show an ape;”

which some persons have imagined that he borrowed from one Palingenius,* an obscure author, who wrote a poem called “Zodiacus Vitæ.”

[* Pope, who was versed in the modern Latin poets, might have taken it from Palingenius, and Palingenius from Plato. EDITOR.]

HIPPIAS MINOR.

THE time of this dialogue is after the Hippias Major, with which it may be ranked.

P. 368. Hippias appeared at Olympia in a dress of his own weaving, buskins of his own cutting out and sewing, with a ring on his finger, and a seal engraved by himself, and a beautiful zone of his own embroidery. He brought with him epic poems, dithyrambics, tragedies, and orations, all of his own composition.

P. 368, § 10. Belt.] The Greeks therefore girt their under-garment with a cincture.

PROTAGORAS.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE DATE OF THIS DIALOGUE.

PLATO, in this dialogue, one of the noblest he ever wrote, has fallen, through negligence, into some anachronisms, as Athenæus has remarked, (in v. p. 218,) though some things in reality are only mistakes of his own, and others he has omitted, which are real faults. Dacier undertakes wholly to justify Plato. We shall show that neither of them are quite in the right.

There are two marks, which fix the time of this conversation, as it is generally thought, and as Athenæus has shown. One, that Callias is mentioned in p. 315, as then master of himself, and in possession of the estate of his father, Hipponicus, who was slain in the battle of Delium, Ol. 89, 1, so that it must be after that year; the other, that the Ἄγριοι, "The Savages," a comedy of Pherecrates, alluded to, is said to have been played the year before. Now that play was brought upon the stage in the magistracy of Aristion, Ol. 89, 4; consequently this must have happened Ol. 90, 1.

There is yet a third circumstance which may ascertain the date of the dialogue. Athenæus produces it as an instance of Plato's negligence; but he has only discovered his own by it. Hippias the Elean, he says, and others of his countrymen are introduced, in p. 315, as then present at Athens, whereas it is impossible they could be there during the Peloponnesian war, while the Eleans were confederates with Sparta against the Athenians; for though a truce was agreed upon for one year, under Isarchus, Ol. 89, 1, yet it was broken through presently, and no cessation of arms ensued. But in reality Hippias might be at Athens any year after Isarchus's magistracy; since though the war broke out afresh afterwards with Sparta, yet the allies of Sparta entered not into it, as at first, but either continued neuter, or joined the Athenians, and Elis particularly entered into a defensive league with them this very year, as shown by Thucyd. v. 47; so that when Athenæus speaks of the truce as not remaining, it is plain that he did not know but that Sparta entered the war again with all the confederates which she had at first, and consequently he had read Thucydides very negligently. This very thing then may fix it to Ol. 90, 1, at least it will prove that it could not be earlier than Ol. 89, 1.

Athenæus further remarks, that Eupolis in his Κόλασις, "The Flatterers," which was played Ol. 89, 3, speaks of Protagoras as then present at Athens, and that Ameipsias in his Κόρυς, "Conus," acted two years before, has not introduced him into his chorus of Φρονιμοὶ, "The Men of Thought;" so that it is probable that he arrived at Athens in the interval between the representation of these two dramas, which is three or four years earlier than the dialogue, in which Plato nevertheless says that he had not been three days come; and that after many years' absence. Dacier attempts to answer this, but makes little of it; and indeed it was impossible to do better, since both the comedies are lost, and we do not know to what parts of them Athenæus alludes, as he cites nothing.

But in truth there are other circumstances inconsistent with the date of the dialogue, of which neither Athenæus nor Dacier have taken any notice. 1st, Alcibiades is represented as just on the confines of youth and manhood, whereas in Ol. 90, 1, he was turned of thirty. 2ndly, Criso of Himera, celebrated for gaining three victories successively in the course at Olympia, the first of which was Ol. 83, is spoken of in p. 335, as in the height of his vigour. Now it is scarcely possible, that one, who was a man grown at the time I have mentioned, should continue in full strength and agility twenty-nine years afterwards: but this I do not much insist upon. 3rdly, Pericles is spoken of in p. 320, as yet living, although he died nine years before; and what is worse, his two sons, Xanthippus and Paralus, are both represented as present at this conversation, though they certainly died during the plague some time before their father.

ANALYSIS OF THE DIALOGUE.

Socrates is wakened before day-break with a hasty knocking at his door: it is Hippocrates, a young man, who comes eagerly to acquaint him with the arrival of Protagoras, the celebrated sophist, at Athens, and to entreat him to go immediately and present him to that great man; for he is determined to spare no pains nor expense, so he may be but admitted to his conversation. Socrates moderates his impatience a little, and while they take a turn about the hall together, waiting for sun-rise, inquires into his notions of a sophist, and what he expected from him; and finding his ideas not very clear upon that head, shows him the folly of putting his soul into the hands of he knew not whom, to do with it he knew not what. If his body had been indisposed, and he had needed a physician, he would certainly have taken the advice and recommendation of his family and friends; but here, where his mind, a thing of much greater importance, was concerned, he was on the point of trusting it, unadvisedly and at random, to the care of a person, whom he had never seen nor spoken to. That a sophist was a kind of merchant, or rather a retailer of food for the soul, and, like other shop-keepers, would exert his eloquence to recommend his own goods. The misfortune was, we could not carry them off, like corporeal viands, set them by a while, and consider them at leisure, whether they were wholesome or not, before we tasted them; that in this case we have no vessel, but the soul, to receive them in, which will necessarily retain a tincture, and perhaps much to its prejudice, of all which is instilled into it. However, by way of trial only, they agree to wait upon Protagoras, and accordingly they go to the house of Callias, where both he and two other principal sophists, Prodicus and Hippias, with all their train of followers, were lodged and entertained.

The porter, an eunuch, wearied and pestered with the crowd of sophists who resorted to the house, mistaking them for such, gives them a short answer, and shuts the door in their face. At last they are admitted, and find Protagoras with Callias, and more company, walking in the porticos. The motions of Protagoras's followers are described with much humour; how at every turn they divided and cast off, as in a dance, still falling in, and moving in due subordination behind the principal performer. Hippias is sitting in a great chair, on the opposite side of the court, discoursing on points of natural philosophy to a circle, who are seated on forms round him; while Prodicus, in a large inner apartment, in bed and wrapped up in abundance of warm clothes, lies discoursing with another company of admirers. Socrates approaches Protagoras, and presents the young Hippocrates to him. The sophist, having premised something to give an idea of his own profession, its use and dignity, the rest of the company, being summoned together from all quarters, seat themselves about him; and Socrates begins by entreating Protagoras to inform him, what was the tendency and usual effect of his lessons, that Hippocrates might know what he was to expect from him. His answers show, that he professed to accomplish men for public and private life, to make them good and useful members of the state, and of a family. Socrates admires the beauty of his art, if indeed there be such an art, which, he confesses, he has often doubted; for if virtue is a thing which may be taught, what can his countrymen the Athenians mean, who in their public assemblies, if the question turn on repairing the public edifices, consult the architect, and if on their fleet, the ship-builder, and laughed at such as, on pretence of their wit, of their wealth, or of their nobility, should interfere in debates which concern a kind of knowledge, in which they have neither skill nor experience; but if the point to be considered relate to the laws, to the magistracy, to the administration of peace and war, and to such subjects, every merchant, every little tradesman and mechanic, the poor as well as the rich, the mean as well as the noble, deliver their opinion with confidence, and are heard with attention. Besides, those greatest statesmen, who have been esteemed the brightest examples of political virtue, though they have given their children every accomplishment of the body which education could bestow, do not at all appear to have improved their minds with those qualities for which they themselves were so eminent, and in which consequently they were best able to instruct them, if instruction could convey these virtues to the soul at all.

Protagoras answers by reciting a fable delivered in very beautiful language. The substance of it is this. Prometheus and Epimetheus, when the gods had formed all kinds of animals within the bowels of the earth, and the destined day approached for producing them into light, were commissioned to distribute among them the powers and qualifications which were allotted to them. The younger brother prevailed upon the elder to let him perform this work; and Prometheus consented to review afterwards and correct his disposition of things. Epimetheus then began, and directed his care to the preservation of the several species, that none might ever be totally lost. To some he gave extreme swiftness, but they were deficient in strength; and the strong he made not equally swift: the little found their security in the lightness of their bodies, in their airy wings, and in their subterraneous retreats; while those of vast magnitude had the superiority of their bulk for a defence. Such as were formed to prey on others, he made to produce but few young ones; while those, who were to serve as their prey, brought forth a numerous progeny. He armed them against the seasons with hoofs of horn and callous feet, with hides of proof and soft warm furs, their native bed and clothing all in one. But when Prometheus came to review his brother's work, he found that he had lavished all his art and all his materials upon the brute creation, while mankind, whose turn it was next to be produced to light, was left a naked, helpless animal, exposed to the rigour of the seasons and to the violence of every other creature round him. In compassion therefore to his wants, Prometheus purloined the arts of Pallas and of Vulcan, and with them fire, without which they were impracticable and useless, and bestowed them on this new race, to compensate their natural defects. Men then, as allied to the divinity and endowed with reason, were the only part of the creation which acknowledged the being and the providence of the gods. They began to erect altars and statues; they formed articulate sounds, and invented language; they built habitations, covered themselves with clothing, and cultivated the ground. But still they were lonely creatures, scattered here and there; for Prometheus did not dare to enter the citadel of Jove, where Policy, the mother and queen of social life, was kept near the throne of the god himself; otherwise he would have bestowed her too on his favourite mankind. The arts which they possessed, just supported them, but could not defend them against the multitude and fierceness of the wild beasts: they tried to assemble and live together, but soon found that they were more dangerous and mischievous to one another than the savage creatures had been. In pity then to their condition, Jove, lest the whole race should perish, sent Mercury to earth, with Shame and Justice; and when he doubted how he should bestow them, and whether they should be distributed, as the arts had been, this to one, and that to another, or equally divided among the whole kind; Jove approved of the latter, and he commanded that if any did not receive his share of that bounty he should be extirpated from the face of the earth, as the pest and destruction of his fellow-creatures.

This then, continues Protagoras, is the reason, why the Athenians, and other nations, in debates, which turn on the several arts, attend only to the advice of the skilful; but give ear in matters of government, which are founded on ideas of common justice and probity, to every citizen indifferently among them: and that this is the common opinion of all men, may hence appear. If a person totally ignorant of music should fancy himself an admirable performer, the world would either laugh or be angry, and his friends would reprimand or treat him as a madman: but if a man should have candour and plain-dealing enough to profess himself a villain and ignorant of common justice, what in the other case would have been counted modesty, the simple confession of truth and of his own ignorance, would here be called impudence and madness. He that will not dissemble here, will be by all regarded as an idiot; for to own that one knows not what justice is, is to own that one ought not to live among mankind.

He proceeds to show, that no one thought our idea of justice to be the gift of nature; but that it is acquired by instruction and by experience: for with the weak, the deformed, or the blind man, no one is angry; no reprimands, no punishments attend the unfortunate, nor are employed to correct our natural defects; but they are the proper consequences of our voluntary neglects or offences. Nor is the punishment, which follows even these, intended to redress an evil already past, for that is impossible, but to prevent a future, or at least to deter others from like offences; which proves, that wickedness is by all regarded as a voluntary ignorance.

Next he shows, how this knowledge is acquired. It is by education. Every one is interested in teaching another the proper virtue of a man, on which alone all his other acquisitions must be founded, and without which he cannot exist among his fellow-creatures. His parents, as soon as understanding begins to dawn in him, are employed in prescribing what he ought to do and what he ought not to do; his masters, in filling his mind with the precepts, and forming it to the example, of the greatest men, or in fashioning his body to perform with ease and patience whatever his reason commands; and lastly, the laws of the state lay down a rule, by which he is necessitated to direct his actions. If then the sons of the greatest men do not appear to be greater proficient in virtue than the ordinary sort, it must not be ascribed to the parent's neglect; much less must it be concluded, that virtue is not to be acquired by instruction: it is the fault perhaps of genius and of nature. Let us suppose, that to perform on a certain instrument were a qualification required in every man, and necessary to the existence of a city, ought we to wonder, that the son of an admirable performer fell infinitely short of his father in skill? Should we attribute this to want of care, or say, that music were not attainable by any art? or should we not rather ascribe it to defect of genius and to natural inability? Yet every member of such a state would doubtless far surpass all persons rude and unpractised in music. In like manner, the most worthless member of a society, civilized by some sort of education and brought up under the influence of laws and of policy, will be an amiable man, if compared with a wild and uncultivated savage.

It is hard indeed to say, who is our particular instructor in the social virtues; as, for the same reason, it is hard to say, who taught us our native tongue; yet no one will therefore deny that we learned it. The public is in these cases our master; and all the world has a share in our instruction. Suffice it, continues the sophist, to know, that some there are among us, elevated a little above the ordinary sort, in the art of leading mankind to honour and to virtue; and among these I have the advantage to be distinguished.

Socrates continues astonished for a time and speechless, as though dazzled with the beauty of Protagoras's discourse. At last, recovering himself, he ventures to propound a little doubt which has arisen in his mind, though perfectly satisfied, he says, with the main question, whether temperance, fortitude, justice, and the rest, which Protagoras has so often mentioned, and seemed to comprehend under the general name of virtue, are different things, and can subsist separately in the same person; or whether they are all the same quality of mind, only exerted on different occasions. Protagoras readily agrees to the first of these; but is insensibly betrayed by Socrates into the toils of his logic, and makes such concessions, that he finds himself forced to conclude the direct contrary of what he had first advanced. He is sensible of his disgrace, and tries to evade this closer kind of reasoning by taking refuge in that more diffuse eloquence, which used to gain him such applause. But when he finds himself cut short by Socrates, who pleads the weakness of his own memory, unable to attend to long-continued discourses, and who entreats him to bring down the greatness of his talents to the level of a mind so much inferior, he is forced to pick a frivolous quarrel with Socrates, and break off the conversation in the middle. Here Callias interposes, and Alcibiades, in his insolent way, by supporting the request of Socrates and by piquing the vanity of Protagoras, obliges him to accommodate himself to the interrogatory method of disputation, and renews the dialogue.¹

To save the dignity of Protagoras, and to put him in humour again, Socrates proposes that he shall conduct the debate, and state the questions, while he himself will only answer them; provided Protagoras will in his turn afterwards condescend to do the same for him. The sophist begins by proposing a famous ode of Simonides, which seems to carry in it an absolute contradiction, which he desires Socrates to reconcile. Socrates appears at first puzzled, and after he has played awhile with Protagoras and with the other sophists, that he may have time to recollect himself, he gives an explanation of that poem, and of its pretended inconsistency, in a manner so new and so just as to gain the applause of the whole company. He then brings back Protagoras, in spite of his reluctance, to his former subject, but without taking advantage of his former concessions, and desires again his opinion on the unity, or on the similitude, of the virtues. Protagoras now owns, that there is a near¹ affinity between them all, except valour, which he affirms that a man may possess, who is entirely destitute of all the rest. Socrates proves to him, that this virtue also, like the others, is founded on knowledge and is reducible to it; that it is but to know what is really to be feared, and what is not; that good and evil, or in other words, pleasure and pain,² being the great and the only movers of the human mind, no one can reject pleasure, but where it seems productive of a superior degree of pain, or prefer pain, unless the consequence of it be a superior pleasure. That to balance these one against the other with accuracy, to judge rightly of them at a distance, to calculate the overplus of each, is that science on which our happiness depends, and which is the basis of every virtue. That, if our whole life's welfare and the interests of it were as closely connected with the judgment, which we should make on the real magnitude of objects and on their true figure, or with our not being deceived by the appearance which they exhibit at a distance, who doubts but that geometry and optics would then be the means of happiness to us, and would become the rule of virtue? That there is a kind of knowledge no less necessary to us in our present state, and no less a science; and that, when we pretend to be misled by our passions, we ought to blame our ignorance, which is the true source of all our follies and vices. And now, continues Socrates, who would not laugh at our inconsistency? You set out with affirming that virtue might be taught, yet in the course of our debate you have treated it as a thing entirely distinct³ from knowledge, and not reducible to it: I, who advanced the contrary position, have shown that it is a science, and consequently that it may be learned.

Protagoras, who has had no other share in the dispute than to make, without perceiving the consequence, such concessions as absolutely destroy what he set out with affirming, tries to support the dignity of his own age and reputation, by making an arrogant compliment to Socrates, commending his parts, very considerable, he says, and very promising for so young a man, and doing him the justice to say to all his acquaintance, that he knows no one more likely, some time or other, to make an extraordinary person; and he adds that this is not a time to enter deeper into this subject; but on any other day he shall be at his service.

² Plato reasons on the principles of the most rational Epicurean in this place, and indeed on the only principles which can be defended. As our sense of pleasure and of pain is our earliest sentiment, and is the great instrument of self-preservation, some philosophers have called these affections, The first according to nature. See Aul. Gell. xii. 6.

³ It was the opinion of Socrates, that all the virtues were only prudence, or wisdom, exerted on different occasions. An opinion in which, says Aristotle, in Ethic. Nicom. vi. 13, he was partly right and partly wrong.

NOTES ON THE GREEK TEXT.

P. 320. At liberty.] Every divinity had some such animals, which fed at liberty within the sacred enclosures and pastures. Such were the oxen of the Sun, in Homer, Od. M.; the owls of Minerva in the Acropolis at Athens, (Aristoph. Lysist.) the peacocks of Juno at Samos, (Athenæus, xiv. p. 655,) the tame serpents of Æsculapius, at Epidaurus, (Pausan. iii. 28, and at Athens, Aristoph. Plut. 733,) the fishes of the Syrian goddess, &c. (Xenoph. Anab. i. p. 254.)

P. 328. Worthy of the money I make.] It is remarkable in what general esteem and admiration Protagoras was held throughout all Greece. If any scholar of his thought the price he exacted was too high, he only obliged him to say upon his oath, what he thought the precepts he had given were worth, and Protagoras was satisfied with that sum. Yet he got more wealth by his profession than Phidias the statuary, and any other ten the most celebrated artists of Greece, as we learn from Meno, p. 91, and Hipp. Maj. p. 282. Quintilian says, in iii. 1, that Euathlus gave him 10,000 drachmæ (about £300 sterling) for his art of rhetoric in writing. He was the first sophist in Greece who professed himself a teacher of education and virtue, and such an one as could make men better and better every time he conversed with them. See p. 318, and 349.

P. 357. The want of instruction.] The true key and great moral of the dialogue is, that knowledge alone is the source of virtue, and ignorance the source of vice. It was Plato's own principle, as shown in Epist. vii. p. 336, and elsewhere. The consequence of it is, that virtue may be taught, and may be acquired; and that philosophy alone can point us out the way to it.

As Serranus, and, I think, every commentator after him, has read this dialogue with a grave countenance, and understood it in a literal sense, though it is throughout a very apparent and continued irony; it is no wonder if such persons, as trust to their accounts of it, find it a very silly and frivolous thing. Yet under that irony, doubtless, there is concealed a serious meaning, which makes a part of Plato's great design, a design which runs through all his writings. He was persuaded that virtue must be built on knowledge, not on that counterfeit knowledge, which dwells only on the surface of things, and is guided by the imagination rather than by the judgment, (for this was the peculiar foible of his countrymen, a light and desultory people, easily seduced by their fancy wherever it led them,) but on the knowledge which is fixed and settled on certain great and general truths, and on principles as ancient and as unshaken as nature itself, or rather as the author of nature. To this knowledge, and consequently to virtue, he thought that philosophy was our only guide: and as to all those arts, which are usually made merely subservient to the passions of mankind, as politics, eloquence, and poetry, he thought that they were no otherwise to be esteemed than as they are grounded on philosophy, and are directed to the ends of virtue. They, who had best succeeded in them before his time, owed, as he thought, their success rather to a lucky hit, to some gleam of truth, as it were providentially breaking in upon their minds, than to those fixed and unerring principles which are not to be erased from a soul, which has once been thoroughly convinced of them. Their conduct therefore in their actions, and in their productions, has been wavering between good and evil, and unable to reach perfection. The inferior tribe have caught something of their fire, merely by imitation, and form their judgments, not from any real skill they have in these arts, but merely from (what La Bruyere calls) a gout de comparaison. The general applause of men has pointed out to them what is finest; and to that, as to a principle, they refer their taste, without knowing or inquiring in what its excellence consists. Each Muse (says Plato in this dialogue) inspires and holds suspended her favourite poet in immediate contact, as the magnet does a link of iron, and from him, through whom the attractive virtue passes and is continued to the rest, hangs a long chain of actors, and singers, and critics, and interpreters of interpreters.

NOTES ON THE GREEK TEXT.

P. 533. Dædalus was the son of Palamaon, of that branch of the royal family called Metionidæ, being sprung from Metion, the son of Erectheus. (See Pausan. vii. p. 531, and i. p. 13.) There were statues of his workmanship still preserved in several cities of Greece, at Thebes, Lebadea, Delos, Olus, and Gnossus, even in the time of Pausanias, above six hundred years after this. See Pausan. ix. p. 793, and Plato, Hippias Maj. p. 282. Epeus, the son of Panopeus, was the inventor of the Trojan horse; in the temple of the Lycian Apollo at Argos, was preserved a wooden figure of Mercury made by him. Theodorus, the Samian, son of Tecleles, first discovered the method of casting iron, and of forming it into figures: he also (with his countryman Rhæcus the son of Phileus) was the first who cast statues in bronze; he worked likewise in gold, and graved precious stones.

P. 533. Ὀλύμπιον.] Olympus, the Phrygian, lived in the time of Midas, before the Trojan war, yet his compositions, as well the music as the verses, were extant even in Plutarch's days. Aristotel. Politic. viii. c. 5, and Plato, Sympos. p. 215. Hence also it seems that they had the music of Orpheus, of Thamyris, and of Pheuius, then in being. (See Hom. Odys. A. 325, and X. 330.)

P. 533. The Magnesian.] Euripides gave it this name, probably from the city of Magnesia near the hill of Sipylius, where it was found. Mr. Chishull tells us, that as they were ascending the castle-hill of this city, a compass, which they carried with them, pointed to different quarters, as it happened to be placed on different stones, and that at last it entirely lost its virtue; which shows that hill to be a mine of loadstone. Its power of attracting iron and of communicating its virtue to that iron, we see, was a thing well known at that time, yet they suspected nothing of its polar qualities.

P. 534. ὑπορχήματα.] Pindar was famous for this kind of compositions, though we have lost them, as well as his dithyrambics. Xenodemos also, Bacchylides, and Pratinas the Phliasian, excelled in them. Athenæus has preserved a fine fragment of this last poet, xiv. p. 617. These compositions were full of description, and were sung by a chorus who danced at the same time, and represented the words by their movements and gestures. Tynnichus of Chalcis, whose pæan was famous, and indeed the only good thing he ever wrote.

P. 535. Ἀπὸ τοῦ βήματος.] The Rhapsodi, we find, were mounted on a sort of suggestum, with a crown of gold (see p. 530 and 541 of this dialogue) on their heads, and dressed in robes of various colours, and after their performance was finished, a collection seems to have been made for them among the audience.

P. 536. The Corybantes.] This alludes to a peculiar phrensy, supposed to be inspired by some divinity, especially Cybele, and attended with violent motions and efforts of the body. Persons so affected believed they heard the sound of loud music continually in their ears, and were peculiarly sensible to certain airs, when really played, as it is reported of those who are bitten by the tarantula.

THEÆTETUS.

TERPSION meeting Euclides at Megara, and inquiring where he has been, is informed that he has been accompanying Theætetus, who is lately come on shore from Corinth, in a weak and almost dying condition, upon his return to Athens. This reminds them of the high opinion which Socrates had entertained of that young man, who was presented to him (not long before his death) by Theodorus of Cyrene, the geometrician. The conversation, which then passed between them, was taken down in writing by Euclides, who, at the request of Terpsion, orders his servant to read it to them.

The Abbé Sallier, in Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions, vol. xiii. p. 317, has given an elegant translation of the most shining part of this dialogue; and also in vol. xvi. p. 70, has translated all that part of the dialogue, in which Plato has explained the system of Protagoras. The description of a true philosopher in p. 172, though a little exaggerated, and more in the character of Plato than of Socrates, has yet an elevation in it which is admirable. The Abbé Sallier has also given a sketch of the dialogue, which is a very long one, and, as he rightly judges, would not be much approved in a translation. It is of that kind called Παραρτήσις, "Tentative," in order to make trial of the capacity of Theætetus, while Socrates, as he says, only plays the midwife, and brings the conceptions of his mind to light. The question is, What is knowledge? and the purpose of the dialogue is rather to refute the false definitions of it, as established by¹ Protagoras in his writings, and resulting from the tenets of Heraclitus,² of Empedocles, and of other philosophers, than to produce a better definition of his own. Yet there are many fine and remarkable passages in it, such as the observations of Theodorus on the faults of temper, which usually attend on brighter parts, and on the defects of genius often found in minds of a more sedate and solid turn; Socrates's illustration of his own art by the whimsical comparison between that and midwifery; his opinion, adopted by Aristotle in Metaphys. i. p. 335, ed. Sylb., that admiration is the parent of ¹ His fundamental tenet was, that every man's own perceptions of things were (to him) the measure and the test of truth and of falsehood.

² Viz. that motion was the principle of being, and the only cause of all its qualities.

philosophy; the explanation of active and passive powers of matter, arising from the perpetual flux and motion of all things, which was the doctrine of Heraclitus and others; the reflections on philosophical leisure, and on a liberal turn of mind, opposed to the little cunning and narrow thoughts of mere men of business; the description of Heraclitus's followers, then very numerous in Ionia, particularly at Ephesus; the account of the tenets of Parmenides and of Melissus, directly contrary to those of the former; the distinction between our senses, the instruments through which the mind perceives external objects, and the mind itself, which judges of their existence, their likeness, and their difference, and founds its knowledge on the ideas which it abstracts from them; to which we may add, the comparison of ideas fixed in the memory to impressions made in wax, and the dwelling on this similitude in order to show the several imperfections of this faculty in different constitutions.

THE SOPHIST.

I AM convinced that this is a continuation of the Theætetus, which ends with these words, "To-morrow, Theodorus, let us meet here again," as this begins with "According to our agreement, Socrates, yesterday, we are come ourselves in due order." The persons are the same, except the philosopher of the Eleatic school, who is here introduced, and who carries on the disputation with Theætetus, while both Theodorus and Socrates continue silent. The apparent subject of it is the character of a sophist, which is here at large displayed in opposition to that of a philosopher; but here too he occasionally attacks the opinions of Protagoras, Heraclitus, Empedocles, and others, on the incertitude of all existence and on the perpetual flux of matter.

This dialogue, in a translation, would suit the taste of the present age still less even than the Theætetus; particularly that part, which is intended to explain the nature of existence and of non-existence, which to me is obscure beyond all comprehension, partly perhaps from our ignorance of the opinions of those philosophers, which are here refuted; and partly from the abstracted nature of the subject; and not a little, I doubt, from Plato's manner of treating it.

The most remarkable things in this dialogue appear to be, his description of that disorder and want of symmetry in the soul, produced by ignorance, which puts it off its bias on its way to happiness, the great end of human actions: the distinction he makes between Ἀγνοια, "the want of knowledge," and Ἀμαθία, "the want of learning;" of which the former is simply our ignorance of a thing, the latter, an ignorance which mistakes itself for knowledge, and which, as long as this sentiment attends it, is without hope of remedy: the explanation of the Socratic mode of instruction, adapted to this peculiar kind of ignorance, by drawing a person's errors gradually from his own mouth, ranging them together, and exposing to his own eyes their inconsistency and weakness: the comparison of that representation of things, given us by the sophists, and pieces of painting, which, placed at a certain distance, deceive the young and inexperienced into an opinion of their reality: and the total change of ideas in young men when they come into the world, and begin to be acquainted with it by their own sensations, and not by description. All these passages are extremely good.

NOTES ON THE GREEK TEXT.

P. 252. Eurycles.] He was a ventriloquist, and set up for a prophet. Such as are possessed of this faculty, can manage their voice in so wonderful a manner, that it shall seem to come from what part they please, not of themselves only, but of any other person in the company, or even from the bottom of a well, down a chimney, from below stairs, &c., of which I myself have been witness.

P. 265. We see here that it was the common opinion, that the creation of things was the work of blind, unintelligent nature; whereas the contrary was the result of philosophical reflection and disquisition, believed by a few people only.

THE STATESMAN.

THIS dialogue is a continuation of the Sophist, as the Sophist is a continuation of the Theætetus; and they were accordingly ranged together by Thrasyllus in that order, as stated by Diog. Laert. iii. 58, though Serranus in his edition has separated them. The persons are the same, only that here the younger Socrates is introduced, instead of Theætetus, carrying on the conversation with the stranger from Elea. The principal heads of it are the following:

P. 258. The division of the sciences into speculative and practical.

P. 259. The master, the economist, the politician, the king; which are taken as different names for men of the same profession.

The private man, who can give lessons of government to such as publicly exercise this art, deserves the name of royal no less than they.

No difference between a great family and a small commonwealth.

The politician must command on his own judgment, and not by the suggestion of others.

P. 262. The absurdity of the Greeks, who divided all mankind into Greeks and barbarians. The folly of all distinction and division without a difference.

P. 269. The fable of the contrary revolutions in the universe at periodical times, with the alternate destruction and reproduction of all creatures.

P. 273. The disorder and the evil in the natural world, accounted for from the nature of¹ matter, while it was yet a chaos.

The former revolution, in which the Divinity himself immediately conducted every thing, is called the Saturnian age; the present revolution, when the world goes the contrary way, being left to its own² conduct. Mankind are now guided by their own free-will, and are preserved by their own inventions.

P. 275. The nature of the monarch in this age is no other than that of the people which he commands. His government must be with the consent of the people.

¹ Plato, with the Pythagoreans, looked upon matter as co-eternal with the Deity, but receiving its order and design entirely from him.

² Here too, as in the Timæus, p. 63, A., he considers the universe as one vast, animated, and intelligent body.

P. 276. Clear and certain knowledge is rare and in few instances; we are forced to supply this defect by comparison and by analogy. Necessity of tracing things up to their first principles. Examples of logical division.

Greater, or less, with respect to our actions, are not to be considered as mere relations only depending on one another, but are to be referred to a certain middle term, which forms the standard of morality.

P. 284. All the arts consist in measurement, and are divided into two classes: 1st, Those arts which compare dimensions, numbers, or motions, each with its contrary, as greater with smaller, more with less, swifter with slower; and 2dly, Those, which compare them by their distances from some middle point, seated between two extremes, in which consists what is right, fit, and becoming.

The design of these distinctions, and of the manner used before in tracing out the idea of a sophist and a politician, is to form the mind to a habit of logical division.

The necessity of illustrating our contemplations, on abstract and spiritual subjects, by sensible and material images, is stated.

P. 286. An apology for his prolixity.

Principal, and concurrent, or instrumental causes, are named; the division of the latter, with their several productions, is into seven classes of arts which are necessary to society: viz.

1. Tò πρωτογενὲς εἶδος. That class which furnishes materials for all the rest; it includes the arts of mining, hewing, felling, &c.

2. Ὀργάνον. The instruments employed, in all manufactures, with the arts which make them.

3. Ἀγγεῖον. The vessels to contain and preserve our nutriment, and other movables, furnished by the potter, joiner, brazier, &c.

4. Ὀχήμα. Carriages, seats, vehicles for the land and water, &c., by the coach-maker, ship and boat-builder, &c.

5. Πρόσθαμα. Shelter, covering, and defence, as houses, clothing, tents, arms, &c., by the architect, weaver, armourer, &c.

6. Παίγμων. Pleasure and amusement, as painting, music, sculpture, &c.

7. Θρέμμα. Nourishment, supplied by agriculture, hunting, cookery, &c., and regulated by the gymnastic and medical arts.

P. 289. None of these arts have any pretence to, or competition with, the art of governing; no more than the class which voluntarily exercise the employment of slaves, such as merchants, bankers, and tradesmen: the priesthood too are included under this head, as interpreters between the gods and men, not from their own judgment, but either by inspiration, or by a certain prescribed ceremonial.

P. 291. There are three kinds of government: monarchy, oligarchy, and democracy: the two first are distinguished into four, royalty, tyranny, aristocracy, and oligarchy-proper.

P. 294. The imperfection of all laws arises from the impossibility of adapting them to the continual change of circumstances, and to particular cases.

P. 296. Force may be employed by the wise and just legislator to good ends.

P. 298. The supposition of a set of rules in physic, in agriculture, or in navigation, drawn up by a majority of the citizens, and not to be transgressed under pain of death, applied to the case of laws made by the people.

P. 307. Some nations are destroyed by an excess of spirit; others by their own inoffensiveness and love of quiet.

P. 308. The office of true policy is to temper courage with moderation, and moderation with courage. Policy presides over education.

This dialogue seems to be a very natural introduction to the books De Republicâ, and was doubtless so intended. See particularly iii. p. 410, &c., and iv. p. 442.

NOTE ON THE GREEK TEXT.

P. 290. The Egyptian kings were all of them priests, and if any of another class usurped the throne, they too were obliged to admit themselves of that order.

THE REPUBLIC.

THE scene of this dialogue lies at the house of Cephalus, a rich old Syracusan, father to Lysias the orator, then residing in the Piræus, on the day of the Bendidea, a festival, then first celebrated on the 19th day of the month Thargelion, answering to the middle of June, with processions, races, and illuminations in honour of the Thracian Diana. The persons engaged in the conversation, or present at it, are Cephalus himself, Polemarchus, Lysias, and Euthydemus, his three sons; Glauco and Adimantus, sons of Aristo and brothers to Plato; Niceratus, son of Nicias; Thras-machus the sophist of Chalcedon; Clitophon, son of Aristonymus, and Charmantides of Pæania, and Socrates.

As to the time of these dialogues, it is certain that Cephalus died about Ol. 84, 1, and that his son Lysias was born fifteen years before Ol. 80, 2, consequently they must fall between these two years, and probably not long before Cephalus's death, when he was seventy years old or more; and Lysias was a boy of ten or twelve and upwards. Therefore I should place it in the 83rd Ol. See Fastos Atticos, Corsini, vol. ii. Dissert. 13, p. 312. But I must observe that this is not easily reconcilable with the age of Adimantus and Glauco, who are here introduced as men grown up, and consequently must be at least thirty-six years older than their brother Plato. If this can be allowed, the action at Megara there mentioned must be that which happened Ol. 83, 2, under Pericles; and the institution of the Bendidea must have been Ol. 83, 3 or 4. It is observable also that Theages is mentioned in vi. p. 496 of this dialogue, as advanced in the study of philosophy. He was very young, when his father Demodocus put him under the care of Socrates, which was in Ol. 92, 3, and consequently thirty-five years after the time which Corsini would assign to this conversation.

BOOK I.

HEADS OF THE FIRST DIALOGUE.

The pleasures of old age and the advantages of wealth.

P. 335. The just man hurts no one, not even his enemies.

P. 338. The sophist's definition of justice, namely, that it is the advantage of our superiors, to which the laws of every government oblige the subject to conform, is refuted.

P. 341. The proof, that the proper office of every art is to act for the good of its inferiors.

P. 343. The sophist's attempt to show, that justice is not the good of those who possess it, but of those who do not; and that injustice is only blamed in such as have not the art to carry it to its perfection, refuted.

P. 347. In a state composed all of good men, no one would be ambitious of governing.

P. 349. The perfection of the arts consists in attaining a certain rule of proportion. The musician does not attempt to excel his fellows by straining or stopping his chords higher or lower than they; for that would produce dissonance and not harmony; the physician does not try to exceed his fellows by prescribing a larger or less quantity of nourishment, or of medicines, than conduces to health; and so of the rest. The unjust man therefore, who would surpass all the rest of his fellow-creatures in the quantity of his pleasures and powers, acts like one ignorant in the art of life, in which only the just are skilled.

P. 351. The greatest and most signal injustices, which one state and society can commit against another, cannot be perpetrated without a strict adherence to justice among the particular members of such a state and society : so that there is no force nor strength without a degree of justice.

P. 352. Injustice even in one single mind must set it at perpetual variance with itself, as well as with all others.

P. 353. Virtue is the proper office, the wisdom, the strength, and the happiness of the human soul.

BOOK II.

HEADS OF THE SECOND DIALOGUE.

P. 357. Good is of three kinds : the First we embrace for itself, without regard to its consequences ; such are all innocent delights and amusements. The Second, both for itself and for its consequences, as health, strength, sense, &c. The Third, for its consequences only, as labour, medicine, &c. The second of these is the most perfect : the justice of this class. Objection—To consider it rightly we must separate it from honour and from reward, and view it simply as it is in itself.

P. 358. Injustice is a real good to its possessor, and justice is an evil : but as men feel more pain in suffering than inflicting injury, and as the greater part are more exposed to suffer it than capable of inflicting it, they have by compact agreed neither to do nor to suffer injustice ; which is a medium calculated for the general benefit, between that which is best of all, namely, to do injustice without fear of punishment, and that which is worst, to suffer it without a possibility of revenge. This is the origin of what we call justice.

Such as practise the rules of justice do it from their inability to do otherwise, and consequently against their will. Story of Gyges's¹ ring, by which he could make himself invisible at pleasure. No person, who possessed such a ring, but would do wrong.

P. 360. Life of the perfectly unjust man, who conceals his true character from the world, and that of the perfectly just man, who seems the contrary in the eye of the world, are compared : the happiness of the former is contrasted with the misery of the latter.

P. 362. The advantages of probity are not therefore, according to this representation, in itself, but in things exterior to it, in honours and rewards, and they attend not on being, but on seeming honest.

P. 363. Accordingly the praises bestowed on justice, and the reproaches on injustice, by our parents and governors, are employed not on the thing itself, but on its consequences. The Elysian fields and the punishments of Tartarus are painted in the strongest colours by the poets; while they represent the practice of virtue as difficult and laborious, and that of vice, as easy and delightful. They add, that the gods often bestow misery on the former, and prosperity and success on the latter; and, at the same time, they teach us how to expiate our crimes, and even how to hurt our enemies, by prayers, by sacrifices, and by incantations.

P. 366. The consequence is, by this mode of argument, that to dissemble well with the world is the way to happiness in this life; and for what is to come, we may buy the favour of the gods at a trifling expense.

P. 369. The nature of political justice. The image of a society in its first formation: it is founded on our natural imbecility, and on the mutual occasion we have for each other's assistance. Our first and most pressing necessity, is that of food; the second, of habitation; the third, of clothing. The first and most necessary society must therefore consist of a ploughman, a builder, a shoemaker, and a weaver: but, as they will want instruments, a carpenter and a smith will be requisite; and as cattle will be wanted, as well for their skins and wool, as for tillage and carriage, they must take in shepherds and the herdsmen. As one country produces not every thing, they will have occasion for some imported commodities, which cannot be procured without exportations in return, so that a commerce must be carried on by merchants; and if it be performed by sea, there will be an occasion for mariners and pilots. Further; as the employment of the shepherds, agricultors, mechanics, merchants, and such persons will not permit them to attend the markets, there must be retailers, and tradesmen, and money to purchase with; and there must be servants to assist all these, that is, persons who let out their strength for hire. Such an establishment will not be long without a degree of luxury, which will increase the city with a vast variety of artificers, and require a greater extent of territory to support them: they will then encroach on their neighbours. Hence the origin of war. A militia will be required; but as this is an art, which will engross the whole man, and take up all his time, to acquire and exercise it, a distinct body will be formed of chosen men for the defence of the state.

P. 374. The nature of a soldier: he must have quickness of sense, agility, and strength, invincible spirit tempered with gentleness and goodness of heart, and an understanding apprehensive and desirous of knowledge.

P. 376. The education of such a person. Errors and dangerous prejudices are instilled into young minds by the Greek poets. The scandalous fables of Homer and of Hesiod, who attribute injustice, enmity, anger, and deceit to the gods, are reprobated; and the immutable goodness, truth, justice, mercy, and other attributes of the Divinity are nobly asserted.

NOTES ON THE GREEK TEXT.

P. 363. Ἐργαὶ καὶ καράδες τοὶ τῶν Θεῶν.] Incantations and magical rites, to hurt one's enemies, were practised in Greece and taught by vagabond priests and prophets: a number of books ascribed to Musæus and Orpheus were carried about by such people, prescribing various expiatory ceremonies and mysterious rites: so the chorus of Satyrs in the Cyclops of Euripides, vs. 642.

P. 372. Chick-peas and beans.] This was a common dessert among the Greeks, both eaten raw, when green and tender, or when dry, parched in the fire. See Athenæus, ii. p. 54; Theocritus, Id. vii. 65. Crobylus (quoted by Athenæus, p. 54) calls this kind of entables, "the monkeys' dessert."

BOOK III.

HEADS OF THE THIRD DIALOGUE.

P. 386. Wrong notions of a future state are instilled into youth by the poets, whence arises an unmanly fear of death.

P. 388. Excessive sorrow and excessive laughter are equally unbecoming a man of worth.

P. 389. Falsehood and fiction are not permitted, but where they are for the good of mankind; and consequently they are not to be trusted but in skilful hands.

P. 390. Examples of impiety and of bad morality in the poets, and in other ancient writers.

P. 392. Poetic eloquence is divided into narration, in the writer's own person, and imitation, in some assumed character. Dithyrambs usually consist wholly of the former; dramatic poesy, of the latter; the epic, &c., of both mixed.

P. 395. Early imitation becomes a second nature. The soldier is not permitted to imitate any thing misbecoming his own character, and consequently he is neither permitted to write, nor to play, any part which he himself would not act in life.

P. 396. Imitative expression in oratory, or in gesture, is restrained by the same principle.

P. 398. Music must be regulated. The Lydian, Syntono-Lydian, and Ionian harmonies are banished, as accommodated to the soft, enervate passions; but the Dorian and the Phrygian harmonies are permitted, as manly, decent, and persuasive. All instruments of great compass and of luxuriant harmony, the lyra, the cythara, and the fistula, are allowed; and the various rhythms or movements are in like manner restrained.

P. 401. The same principle is extended to painting, sculpture, architecture, and to the other arts.

P. 403. Love is permitted, but abstracted from bodily enjoyment. Diet and exercises, plain and simple meats, are prescribed.

P. 405. Many judges and physicians are a sure sign of a society ill-regulated both in mind and in body. Ancient physicians knew no medicines but for wounds, fractures, epidemical distempers, and other acute complaints. The diætic and gymnastic method of cure, or rather of protracting diseases, was not known before Herodicus introduced it.

P. 409. The temper and disposition of an old man of probity, fit to judge of the crimes of others, is described.

P. 410. The temper of men, practised in the exercises of the body, but unacquainted with music and with letters, is apt to run into an obstinate and brutal fierceness; and that of the contrary sort, into indolence and effeminacy. The gradual neglect of this, in both cases, is here finely painted.

P. 412. Choice of such of the soldiery, as are to rise to the magistracy; namely, of those who, through their life, have been proof to pleasure and to pain.

P. 414. An example of a beneficial fiction. It is difficult to fix in the minds of men a belief in fables, originally; but it is very easy to deliver it down to posterity, when once established.

P. 416. The habitation of the soldiery: all luxury in building to be absolutely forbidden them: they are to have no patrimony, nor possessions, but to be supported and furnished with necessaries from year to year by the citizens; they are to live and eat in common, and to use no plate, nor jewels, nor money.

BOOK IV.

HEADS OF THE FOURTH DIALOGUE.

P. 419. Objection—That the Φύλακες, or “soldiers,” in whose hands the government is placed, will have less happiness and enjoyment of life than any of the meanest citizens.

Answer—That it is not the intention of the legislature to bestow superior happiness on any one class of men in the state; but that each shall enjoy such a measure of it, as is consistent with the preservation of the whole.

P. 421. Opulence and poverty are equally destructive of a state; the one producing luxury, indolence, and a spirit of innovation ; the other producing meanness, cunning, and a like spirit of innovation.

The task of the magistracy is to keep both the one and the other out of the republic.

P. 422. Can such a state, without a superfluity of treasure, defend itself, when attacked by a rich and powerful neighbour ?

As easily as a champion, exercised for the Olympic games, could defeat one or more rich fat men unused to fatigue, who should fall upon him in a hot day.

The advantage of such a state, which neither needs riches nor desires them, in forming alliances.

Every republic formed on another plan, though it bear the name of a state, is in reality several states included under one name ; the rich making one state, the poor another, and so on ; always at war among themselves.

P. 423. A body of a thousand men bred to war, and united by such an education and government as this, is superior even in number to any thing that almost any state in Greece could produce.

P. 424. No innovation is to be ever admitted in the original plan of education. A change of music in a country betokens a change in their morals.

P. 425. Fine satire on the Athenians, and on their demagogues.

P. 428. The political wisdom of the new-formed state is seated in the magistracy.

P. 429. Its bravery is seated in the soldiery : in what it consists.

P. 430. The nature of temperance : the expression of subduing one's self, is explained ; when reason, the superior part of the mind, preserves its empire over the inferior, that is, over our passions and desires. The temperance of the new republic, whose wisdom and valour, in the hands of the soldiery, exercise a just power over the inferior people by their own consent, is described.

P. 433. Political justice distributes to every one his proper province of action, and prevents each from encroaching on the other.

P. 435. Justice in a private man : its similitude to the former is stated. The three distinct faculties of the soul, namely, appetite, or desire, reason, and indignation, or the concupiscible, the rational, and the irascible, are described.

P. 441. The first made to obey the second, and the third to assist and to strengthen it. Fortitude is the proper virtue of the irascible, wisdom of the rational, and temperance of the concupiscible, preserving a sort of harmony and consent between the three.

P. 443. Justice is the result of this union, maintaining each faculty in its proper office.

P. 444. The description of injustice.

P. 445. The uniformity of virtue, and the infinite variety of vice. Four more distinguished kinds of it are enumerated, whence arise four different kinds of bad government.

NOTES ON THE GREEK TEXT.

P. 420. 'Ανδρίαç.] This word seems to be used here for a painting, not a statue, as elsewhere.

Ib. Fine garments.] The ἔσθρις was a long variegated mantle, which swept the ground, worn by the principal characters in tragedy, and on great solemnities by the Greek women. See Theocrit. Id. ii. 73.

P. 435. The Scythians, the Thracians, and other northern nations were distinguished by their ferocity, the Greeks by their curiosity and love of knowledge, and the Phœnicians and Egyptians by their desire of gain. Plato marks the threefold distinction.

BOOK V.¹

HEADS OF THE FIFTH DIALOGUE.

P. 451. On the education of the women. There is no natural difference between the sexes, but in point of strength; their exercises, therefore, both of body and mind, are to be alike, as are their employments in the state.

P. 452. Custom is forced in time to submit to reason. The sight of men exercising² naked was once held indecent in Greece, till the Cretans first, and then the Lacedæmonians, introduced it: it is still held scandalous by the Persians, and by other barbarians.

P. 454. When the entire sexes are compared with each other, the female is doubtless the inferior; but, in individuals, the woman has often the advantage of the man.

P. 456. Choice of the female soldiery.

P. 457. Wives in common to all men of the same class. Their times of meeting to be regulated on solemn days, accompanied with solemn ceremonies and sacrifices, by the magistracy, who are to contrive by lots, the secret management of which is known to them alone, that the best and bravest of the men may be paired with women of like qualities, and that those, who are less fit to breed, may come together very seldom.

¹ It is probable that this 5th book, and perhaps the 3rd, were written when Plato was about thirty-five years old, for he says in his 7th Epistle, p. 328, when speaking of himself before his first voyage to Sicily—And I was compelled to say while praising true philosophy, &c.; and Aulus Gellius asserts in xiv. 3, that Xenophon, after reading the two books of Plato's Republic which were first published, wrote in opposition to them his Cyropædia. I know not how ancient the division of this work into ten books may be; but there is no reason at all for it, the whole being one continued conversation.

² The Lacedæmonians, says Thucydides in i. 6, were the first to undress themselves and to appear naked in public; whereas formerly the Athletes in the Olympic contests wore a girdle round their middle; and not many years have passed since the custom was left off. This change is said to have been made about the 32nd Olymp.

P. 460. Neither fathers nor mothers are to know their own children, which, when born, are to be conveyed to a separate part of the city, and there, so many of them as the magistrate shall choose, to be brought up by nurses appointed for that purpose.

The time of propagation to be limited, in the men from thirty years of age to fifty-five, in the women from twenty to forty. No children born of parents under or above this term to be brought up, but exposed, and the parents severely censured; as are all who meet without the usual solemnities, and without the licence of the magistrate.

P. 461. All children, born within seven or ten months from the time any person was permitted to propagate, are to be considered as their own children: all that are born within the time, in which their parents are suffered to breed, are to regard each other as brethren. Marriage is to be prohibited between persons in these circumstances.

P. 462. Partiality and dissension among the soldiery are prevented by these appointments. A fellow-feeling of pleasures and of pains is the strongest band of union which can connect mankind.

P. 466. Children are to be carried out to war very early, to see and to learn their intended profession, and wait on their parents in the field.

P. 468. A soldier who deserts his rank, or throws away his arms, is to be reduced to the rank of a mechanic: he who is taken prisoner alive is never to be ransomed.—The reward of the bravest.

P. 469. It is not permitted to reduce a Greek to captivity, nor to strip the dead of any thing but of their arms, which are forbidden to be dedicated in the temples; it is not permitted to ravage the country further than to destroy the year's crop, or to burn the buildings.

P. 472. The reason why a state, thus instituted, seems an impossibility. No people will ever be rightly governed, till kings shall be philosophers, or philosophers be kings.

P. 474. The description of a genius truly philosophic.

▷ 476. The distinction of knowledge and opinion.

NOTE ON THE GREEK TEXT.

P. 460. This was actually the practice of Sparta, as we learn from Plutarch in Lycurg., where the old men of each tribe sat in judgment on the new-born infants, and, if they were weakly or deformed, ordered them to be cast into a deep cavern, near Mount Taygetus. Thence also are borrowed the prohibition of gold and silver, the ἕσθια, "the eating together" in public, the naked exercises of the women, the community of goods, the general authority of the old men over the young, the simplicity of music and of diet, the exemption of the soldiery from all other business, and most of the fundamental institutions in Plato's republic, as Plutarch observes in his Lycurgus.

BOOK VI.

HEADS OF THE SIXTH DIALOGUE.

Plato is no where more admirable than in this book: the thoughts are as just as they are new, and the elocution is as beautiful as it is expressive; it can never be read too often: but towards the end it is excessively obscure.

P. 485. The love of truth is the natural consequence of a genius truly inclined to philosophy. Such a mind will be little inclined to sensual pleasures, and consequently will be temperate, and a stranger to avarice and to illiberality.

P. 486. Such a mind, being accustomed to the most extensive views of things and to the sublimest contemplations, will contract an habitual greatness, and look down, as it were, with disregard on human life and on death, the end of it; and consequently will possess the truest fortitude. Justice is the result of these virtues.

Apprehension and memory are two fundamental qualities of a philosophic mind.

P. 487. Such a genius is made by nature to govern mankind.

Objection from experience—That such as have devoted themselves to the study of philosophy, and have made it the employment of their maturer age, have turned out either very bad men, or entirely useless to society.

P. 488. Their inutility, with regard to government, is allowed and accounted for. The comparison of a bad government to a ship, where the mariners have agreed to let their pilot have no hand in the steerage, but to take that task upon themselves.

P. 491. Those very endowments, before described as necessary to the philosophic mind, are often the ruin of it, especially when joined to the external advantages of strength, beauty, nobility, and wealth, when they light in a bad soil, and do not meet with their proper nurture, which an excellent education only can bestow.

Extraordinary virtues and extraordinary vices are equally the produce of a vigorous mind: little souls are alike incapable of one or of the other.

The corruption of young minds is falsely attributed to the sophists, who style themselves philosophers: it is the public example which depraves them; the assemblies of the people, the courts of justice, the camp, and the theatres inspire them with false opinions, elevate them with false applause, and fright them with false infamy. The sophists do no more than confirm the opinions of the public, and teach how to humour its passions and to flatter its vanities.

P. 495. As few great geniuses have strength to resist the general contagion, but leave philosophy abandoned and forlorn, though it is their own peculiar province, the sophists step into their vacant place, assume their name and air, and cheat the people into an opinion of them. They are compared to a little old slave, worth money, dressed out like a bridegroom to marry the beautiful, but poor, orphan daughter of his deceased lord.

P. 495, § 10. A description of the few of true genius who escape depravation, and devote themselves really to philosophy; which happens commonly either from some ill fortune, or from weakness of constitution. The reason why they must necessarily be excluded from public affairs, unless in this imaginary republic.

P. 500. The application of these arguments to the proof of his former proposition, namely, that until princes shall be philosophers or philosophers shall be princes, no state can be completely happy.

P. 503. The φύλακες, "Guardians," therefore, are to be real philosophers. The great difficulty is to find the requisite qualifications of mind united in one person. Quickness of apprehension and a retentive memory, vivacity and application, gentleness and magnanimity, rarely go together.

P. 508. The idea of the supreme good is the foundation of philosophy, without which all acquisitions are useless. The cause of knowledge and of truth is compared to light; truth, to the power which bodies have of reflecting light, or of becoming visible; and the sovereign good itself is compared to the sun, the lord and father of light.

P. 509. The author of being is superior to all being.

P. 510. There are different degrees of certainty in the objects of our understanding.

NOTES ON THE GREEK TEXT.

P. 485. The existence that is for ever.] Our general abstracted ideas, as they exist in the mind independent of matter, which is subject to continual changes, were regarded by Plato as the sole foundations of knowledge, and emanations, as it were, from the divinity himself.

P. 497. Those who engage in it, &c.] This is a remarkable passage, as it shows the manner in which the Athenians usually studied philosophy, and Plato's judgment about it, which was directly opposite to the common practice.

BOOK VII.

HEADS OF THE SEVENTH DIALOGUE.

P. 514. The state of mankind is compared to that of persons confined in a vast cavern from their birth, with their legs fettered, and with their heads so placed in a machine that they cannot turn them to the light, which shines full in at the entrance of the cave; nor can they see such bodies as are continually in motion, passing and repassing behind them, but only the shadows of them, as they fall on the sides of the grotto directly before their eyes.

If any one should set them free from this confinement, oblige them to walk, and drag them from their cavern into open day, they would hang back or move with unwillingness or pain; their eyes would be dazzled with the brightness of each new object, and comprehend nothing distinctly; they would long for their shadows and darkness again, till, being more habituated to light, they would first be brought to gaze on the images of things reflected in the water, or elsewhere; then on the bodies themselves; then on the skies, on the stars, and the moon, and gradually on the sun himself, whom they would learn to be the source and the author of all these beautiful appearances.

If any thing should induce one of these persons to descend again into his native cavern, his eyes would not for a long time be reconciled to darkness, his old fellow-prisoners would treat him as stupid and blind, would say that he had spoiled his eyes in those upper regions, and grow angry with him, if he proposed to set them at liberty.

P. 518. An early good education is the only thing which can turn the eyes of our mind from the darkness and uncertainty of popular opinion to the clear light of truth. It is the interest of the public neither to suffer unlettered and unphilosophic minds to meddle with government, nor to allow men of knowledge to give themselves up for their whole life to contemplation, as the first will have no principle to act upon, and the others no practice nor inclination to business.

P. 526. The use of the mathematics, in education, is principally to abstract the mind from sensible and material objects, and to turn it to contemplate certain general and immutable truths, whence it may aspire to the knowledge of the supreme good, who is immutable, and is the object only of the understanding.

The great improvement of a mind versed in these sciences, which quicken and enlarge the apprehension, and inure us to intense application, and what are their practical uses, particularly in military knowledge, is eloquently described.

P. 537. The Φύλακες, "Guards," to be initiated in mathematical knowledge and studies before seventeen, and for three years more are to be confined to their continual and necessary exercises of the body, that is, till about twenty years of age; they are not to enter upon logic till after thirty, in which they are to continue five years.

Knowledge is not to be implanted in a free-born mind by force and violence, but by gentleness accompanied with art, and by every kind of invitation.

The dangerous situation of the mind, when it is quitting the first prejudices of education and has not yet discovered the true principles of action, is here admirably described. It is compared to a youth brought up in affluence, and surrounded by flatterers, by persons who have passed hitherto for his parents, but are not really so; when he has found out the imposition, he will neglect those whom he has hitherto obeyed and honoured, and will naturally incline to the advice of his flatterers, till he can discover those persons to whom he owes his duty and his birth.

The levity, the heat, and the vanity of our first youth make it an improper time to be trusted with reasoning and disputation, which is only fit for a mind grown cooler and more settled by years; as old age on the other hand weakens the apprehension, and renders us incapable of application.

From thirty-five to fifty years of age the Φύλακες, "Guards," are to be obliged to administer the public affairs, and to act in the inferior offices of the magistracy; after fifty they are to be admitted into the highest philosophy, the doctrine of the supreme good, and are in their turn to submit to bear the superior offices of the state.

BOOK VIII.

HEADS OF THE EIGHTH DIALOGUE.

Plato here resumes the subject which he had dropped at the end of the fourth book.

P. 544. Four distinct kinds of government are enumerated, which deviate from the true form, and gradually grow worse and worse: namely, 1. The timocracy, so he calls the Lacedæmonian or Cretan constitution; 2. The oligarchy; 3. The democracy; and 4. Tyranny: they are produced by as many different corruptions of the mind and manners of the inhabitants.

P. 545. The change from the true aristocracy (or constitution of Plato's republic) to a timocracy is described. Every thing, which has had a beginning, is subject to corruption. The introduction of property, and the division of land among the Φύλακες. The encroachment on the liberty of the inferior part of the commonwealth. Secret avarice and love of pleasure are the consequence of private property. The neglect of music and of letters. The preference given to the exercises of the body. The prevalence of the irascible over the rational part of the soul.

The character of a citizen in such a state and the origin of such a character are described.

P. 550. The change from a timocracy into an oligarchy, where none are admitted to the honours and offices of the commonwealth, who do not possess a certain proportion of property. The progress of avarice is the cause of this alteration. Such a state is always divided into two, always at enmity among themselves, the rich and the poor, which is the cause of its weakness. The alienation of property, which is freely permitted by the wealthy for their own interest, will still increase the disproportion of fortune among the citizens. The ill consequences of prodigality, and of its attendant extreme poverty, in a state. The poor are compared to drones in a bee-hive, some with stings and some without.

P. 552. The gradual transition of the mind from the love of honour to the love of money.

When a young man has seen the misfortunes which ambition has brought upon his own family, as fines, banishment, confiscation, and even death itself, adversity and fear will break his spirit and humble his parts, which he will now apply to raise a fortune by securer methods, by the slow and secret arts of gain: his rational faculties and nobler passions will be subjected to his desire of acquisition, and he will admire and emulate others only in proportion as they possess the great object of his wishes: his passion for wealth will keep down and suppress in him the love of pleasure and of extravagance, which yet, for want of philosophy and of a right education, will continue alive in his heart and exert itself, when he can find an opportunity to satisfy it by some secret injustice at the expense of others.

P. 555. The source of a democracy: namely, when the meaner sort, increasing with a number of men of spirit and abilities, reduced to poverty by extravagance and by the love of pleasure, begin to feel their own strength, and compare themselves to the few wealthy persons who compose the government, whose body and mind are weakened by their application to nothing but to the sordid arts of lucre. The change of the constitution. The way to the magistracy laid open to all, and decided by balloting. A lively picture of the Athenian commonwealth.

P. 558. The distinction between our necessary and unnecessary desires, is stated; when the latter prevail over the former by indulgence, and by keeping bad company, they form a democratic mind. The description of such a soul, when years have somewhat allayed the tumult and violence of its passions; it is the sport of humour and of caprice, inconstant in any pursuit, and incapable of any resolution.

P. 562. When liberty degenerates into extreme licence and anarchy, the democracy begins to tend towards tyranny. The picture of the Athenian government and manners is continued with great force and severity: where youth assumes the authority and decisiveness of age, and age mimics the gaiety and pleasures of youth; where women and slaves are upon the same footing with their husbands and masters; and where even the dogs and horses march directly onwards, and refuse to give way to a citizen. The common mutation of things from one extreme to another.

P. 564. The division of those who bear sway in a democracy into three kinds: 1. The busy, bold, and active poor, who are ready to undertake and execute any thing; 2. The idle and insignificant poor, who follow the former, and serve to make a number and a noise in the popular assemblies; and 3. The middling sort, who earn their bread by their labour, and have naturally little inclination to public affairs, nor are easily brought together, but when allured by the hopes of some gain, yet, when collected, are the strongest party of all. The conversion of a demagogue into a tyrant, from necessity and from fear, the steps which he takes to attain the supreme power, the policy of tyrants, and the misery of their condition, are excellently described.

P. 568. The accusation of the tragic poets, as inspiring a love of tyranny, and patronized by tyrants; they are encouraged also in democracies, and are little esteemed in better governments.

NOTES ON THE GREEK TEXT.

P. 544. The Cretan.] Lycurgus borrowed his constitution from that of the Cretans, as Herodotus, Strabo, Plutarch, and other writers, allow; and it is plain, that Plato thought it the best form of government that any where existed, which seems indeed to have been the general opinion of the greatest men in Greece.

P. 547. Dwellers around and domestics.] The Lacedæmonians gave the name of Περίοικοι, "Dwellers around," to their subjects, the inhabitants of Laconia, who were not Spartans. As they were used, I imagine, hardly enough by their superiors, and had no share in the government, many authors do not distinguish them from the Heliotæ, who were absolutely slaves; yet, in reality, they seem to have been on a distinct footing, being reckoned free men, and employed by the Spartan government to command such troops as they often send abroad, consisting of Heliotæ, to whom they had given their liberty. The Περίοικοι likewise seem to have had the property of lands, for when Lycurgus divided the country into thirty thousand portions, and gave nine thousand of them to the Spartans, to whom did the other twenty-one thousand portions belong, unless to the Περίοικοι? who else should people the hundred cities, besides villages, which were once in Laconia? It is plain also, that the Περίοικοι served in war, as ὀπλίται, "heavy-armed foot," which the Heliotæ never did, as we learn from Thucydides, iv. p. 238, and as in the battle of Platææ, according to Herodotus in ix. 29, there were ten thousand Lacedæmonians, of which five thousand were Spartans; it follows, that the other five thousand were Περίοικοι; for he mentions the Heliotæ by themselves, as light-armed troops in number thirty-five thousand, that is, seven to each Spartan; and Xenophon, in Lacedæmon. Republ. p. 289, and Græc. Hist. i. p. 256, plainly distinguishes the Ἱππομεινέες, who were Spartans, but excluded from the magistracy, the Νεοδαμῶνεις, who were Heliotæ made free, the Heliotes, and the Πελοποννησιοί. See also Isocrates in Panegy. p. 11, and in Panathen. p. 270. The Cretans called their slaves, who cultivated the lands, Πελοποννησιοί. See Aristot. Polit. ii. c. 10

BOOK IX.

HEADS OF THE NINTH DIALOGUE.

P. 571. The worst and most lawless of our unnecessary desires are described, which are particularly active in sleep, when we go to our repose after drinking freely, or eating a full meal.

P. 572. The transition of the mind from a democratic to a tyrannical constitution. Debauchery, and what is called love, are the great instruments of this change. Lust and drunkenness, names for two different sorts of madness, between them produce a tyrant.

P. 573. Our desires from indulgence grow stronger and more numerous. Extravagance naturally leads to want, which will be supplied either by fraud or by violence.

P. 575. In states in which there are but a few persons of this turn, and the body of the people are uncorrupted, they usually leave their own country, and enter into the guards of some foreign prince, or serve him in his wars: or, if they have not this opportunity, they stay at home and turn informers, false evidences, highwaymen, and housebreakers, cut-purses, and such characters; but, if they are numerous and strong, they form a party against the laws and liberties of the people, set at their head commonly the worst among them, and erect a despotic government.

The behaviour of a tyrannical nature in private life; unacquainted with friendship, always domineering over, or servilely flattering, his companions.

P. 577. The comparison between a state enslaved, and the mind of a tyrant. The servitude, the poverty, the fears, and the anguish of such a mind are described; and it is proved to be the most miserable of human creatures.

P. 578. The condition of any private man of fortune, who has fifty or more slaves. Such a man with his effects, wife and family, supposed to be separated from the state and his fellow-citizens, in which his security consists, and placed in a desert country at some distance, surrounded with a people, who look upon it as a crime to enslave one's fellow-creatures, and are ready to favour any conspiracy of his servants against him: how anxious and how intolerable would be his condition! Such, and still worse, is that of a tyrant.

P. 581. The pleasures of knowledge and of philosophy are proved to be superior to those which result from honour or from gain, and from the satisfaction of our appetites. The wise man, the ambitious man, the man of wealth and pleasure, will each of them give the preference to his favourite pursuit, and will undervalue that of the others, but experience is the only proper judge which can decide the question, and the wise man alone possesses that experience; the necessity of his nature must have acquainted him with the pleasure which arises from satisfying our appetites. Honour and the public esteem will be the consequence of his life and studies, as well as of the opulent or of the ambitious man; so that he is equally qualified with them to judge of their pleasures, but not they of his, which they have never experienced.

P. 584. Most of our sensual joys are only a cessation from uneasiness and pain, as are the eager hopes and expectations which attend them. A fine image is drawn of the ordinary life of mankind, of their sordid pursuits, and of their contemptible passions.

P. 588. The recapitulation, and conclusion, that the height of injustice and of wickedness is the height of misery.

P. 590. The intention of all education and laws is to subject the brutal part of our nature to the rational. A scheme of life, worthy of a philosophic mind, is laid down.

NOTE ON THE GREEK TEXT.

P. 578. Fifty slaves.] The more wealthy Greeks had very large families of slaves. In Athens the number of slaves was to that of citizens as 20 to 1: the latter being about 21,000; the former, 400,000. Mnaso of Phocis, a friend of Aristotle, had 1000 slaves or more, as had likewise Nicias, the famous Athenian. In Corinth, there were reckoned 460,000 slaves; at Ægina, above 470,000; and many a Roman had in his own service above 20,000: this was a computation made Ol. 110, by Demetrius Phalereus.

BOOK X.

HEADS OF THE TENTH DIALOGUE.

P. 595. Plato's apology for himself. His reasons for banishing all imitative poetry from his republic: 1. Because it represents things not as they really are, but as they appear; 2. The wisdom of the poets is not equal to their reputation; 3. There is no example of a state having been better regulated, or of a war better conducted, or of an art improved, by any poet's instructions; and 4. There is no plan of education laid down, no sect nor school founded, even by Homer and the most considerable of the poets, as by the philosophers.

P. 602. Their art concurs with the senses to deceive us and to draw off the mind from right reason, it excites and increases the empire of the passions, enervates our resolution, and seduces us by the power of ill example.

P. 604. The passions and vices are easy to imitate by reason of their variety; but the cool, uniform, and simple character of virtue is very difficult to draw, so as to touch or delight a theatre, or any other mixed assembly of men.

P. 607. The power of numbers and of expression over the soul is great, which renders poetry more particularly dangerous.

P. 608. Having shown that virtue is most eligible on its own account, even when destitute of all external rewards, he now comes to explain the happiness which waits upon it in another life, as well as in the present. The immortality of the soul and a state of future rewards and of future punishments are asserted.

NOTES ON THE GREEK TEXT.

P. 595. Plato professes a great admiration, even from a child, for Homer, but yet is forced to exclude him from his commonwealth, for a man is not to be held in honour before truth. The Greeks had carried their admiration for Homer to a high pitch of enthusiasm in Plato's time: it was he, they said, who first had formed Greece to knowledge and humanity; and in him were contained all the arts, all morality, politics, and divinity.

P. 600. Εἰς τίχνας.] Thales is said to have discovered the annual course of the sun in the ecliptic, and to have made several improvements in astronomy and geometry. To Anacharsis is ascribed the invention of anchors, and of the potter's wheel. See Diog. Laertius.

P. 608. By Zeus, not I.] Is it possible that the immortality of the soul should be a doctrine so unusual, and so little known at Athens, as to cause this surprise in Glauco?—Yet in the Phædo likewise, p. 70, Cebes treats this point in the same manner.

P. 611. Like those who see Glaucus.] He speaks as if this divinity were sometimes actually visible to seafaring men, all covered with seaweed and shells.

P. 614. The story of Er, the Pamphylian, who, when he had lain twelve days dead in appearance on the field of battle, and was placed on the funeral pile, came to life again, and related all he had seen in the other world. The judgment of souls, their progress of a thousand years through the regions of bliss or of misery, the eternal punishment of tyrants, and of others guilty of enormous crimes, in Tartarus, the spindle of Necessity, which turns the eight spheres, and the employment of her three daughters, the Fates, are all described, with the allotment and choice of lives (either in human bodies, or in those of brute animals) permitted to those spirits who are again to appear on earth; as of Orpheus.

who chooses that of a swan, Ajax, of a lion, Thersites, of a monkey, Ulysses, that of an obscure private man, &c. : their passage over the river Lethe is also mentioned. The whole fable is finely written.

Milton alludes to the spindle of Necessity in his entertainment called the Arcades. Virgil has also imitated many parts of the fable in his sixth Æneid, and Tully in the Somnium Scipionis. See Macrobian. i. c. 1.

THE LAWS.

THE persons of the dialogue are Clinias, a Cretan of Gnosus, and two strangers, who are his guests, the one a Lacedæmonian, called Megillus, the other an Athenian, who is not named, but who appears by the character and sentiments to be Plato himself. See Diog. Laert. iii. 52. They are, all three, men far advanced in years, and as they walk or repose themselves in the fields under the shade of ancient cypress trees, which grew to a great bulk and beauty, in the way that led from the city of Gnosus to the temple and grotto of Jupiter, (where Minos was believed to have received his laws from the god himself,) they enter into conversation on the policy and constitution of the Cretans.

There is no præmium nor introduction to the dialogue, as there is to most of Plato's writings. I speak of that kind of præmium usual with Plato, which informs us often of the occasion and of the time of the dialogue, and of the characters of the persons introduced in it. In reality the entire four first books of "the Laws" are but introductory to the main subject, as he tells us himself in the end of the fourth book, p. 722.

BOOK I.

HEADS OF THE FIRST DIALOGUE.

P. 625. The institutions of Minos were principally directed to form the citizens to war. The great advantages of a people superior in military skill over the rest of mankind are stated. Every people is naturally in a state of war with its neighbours; even particular cities, nay, private families, are in a like situation within themselves, where the better and more rational part are always contending for that superiority which is their due, over the lower and the less reasonable. An internal war is maintained in the breast of each particular man, who labours to subdue himself by establishing the empire of reason over his passions and his desires.

P. 628. A legislator, who makes it the great end of his constitution to form the nation to war, is shown to be inferior to him who reconciles the members of it among themselves, and prevents intestine tumults and divisions.

P. 631. The view of the true lawgiver is to train the mind and manners of his people to the virtues in their order, that is, to wisdom, to temperance, and to justice, and, in the fourth place, to valour. The method he ought to lay down in the disposition of his laws is stated.

P. 634. The fault of the Cretan and of the Lacedæmonian laws is, that they do not fortify the soul as well against pleasure as against pain. Youth is not permitted to examine into the rectitude of those laws by which they are governed, nor to dispute about them; this is the privilege of age, and only to be practised in private.

P. 636, § 8. The division of the citizens into companies, called Zeuxaria, which daily assembled to eat together in public, was apt to create seditions and conspiracies. The regular naked exercises of the youth were often the cause of an unnatural passion among them. Crete and Lacedæmon are blamed particularly on this account.

P. 636, § 9. Pleasure and pain are the two great sources of all human actions: the skill of a legislator consists in managing and opposing one of them to the other.

P. 639. The use of wine, when under a proper direction, in the education of youth.

P. 642. An apology for his own garrulity and diffuseness, which is the characteristic of an Athenian.

P. 643. The nature and intent of education.

P. 644. Mankind are compared to puppets: but whether they are formed by the gods for their diversion, or for some more serious purpose, (he says,) is uncertain. Their pleasures and pains, their hopes and fears, are the springs which move them, and often draw contrary ways at once. Reason is the master-spring which ought to determine their motions; but as this draws gently and never uses violence, some of the passions must be called to its aid, which may give it strength to resist the force of the others.

P. 645. The effects of wine upon the soul: it heightens all our passions and diminishes our understanding, that is, in reality, it reduces us again to childhood. As physicians, for the sake of our body, give us certain potions, which for a time create sickness and pain in us, and put our whole frame into disorder; so possibly might the legislator, by a singular experiment, make wine subservient to a good purpose in education, and, without either pain or danger, put the prudence, the modesty, and the temper of youth to the trial, and see how far they could resist the disorder of the mind which is naturally produced by this liquor.

P. 647, § 14. The fear of dishonour is opposed to the fear of pain; the first is a great instrument in the hands of a wise legislator to suppress and to conquer the latter.

P. 647, § 15. If there were any drug or composition known that would inspire us with fear and with dejection of spirits, for the time its influence lasted, what need would there be of fatiguing our youth with long laborious exercises, or of exposing them in battle to real danger, in order to fortify the soul against the attacks of fear and of pain? This draught alone, properly applied, would be a sufficient trial of our valour under the eye of the magistrate, who might confer honour and disgrace on a youth, according to his behaviour during the operation. Unluckily, there is no such drug discovered; but there is a potion which exalts our spirits, and kindles in the mind insolence, and imprudence, and lust, and every fiercer passion, while it lays open to view our ignorance, our avarice, and our cowardice. Why should we wait till these vices exert themselves into real action, and produce their several mischiefs in society; when, by a well-regulated use of this liquor, we might, without danger, discover them lurking in the disposition of youth, and suppress them even in their infancy?

NOTES ON THE GREEK TEXT.

P. 629. Διαβάντες δὲ εἰς αὐτὴν.] The Spartans, when they passed the frontier of their own state to enter into the territory of an enemy, always performed sacrifice; and if the victims proved inauspicious, they retired, and gave over their enterprise.

P. 630. Of the mercenaries.] In Plato's time, about Ol. 106, and soon after, the intestine tumults in the Greek cities, joined to a sort of fashion, which prevailed, of going to seek their fortune in a foreign service, had so depopulated Greece, that Isocrates tells Philip of Macedon, that he might form a better and stronger army out of these mercenaries, than he could out of the citizens themselves, who continued in their own country. The strength of the Persian king's armies was entirely composed of these Greeks, as was that of his enemies also, the kings of Egypt and of Cyprus, and the revolted viceroys in Asia Minor. They were also employed by Athens, and by other states of Greece, to save their own troops; so that the Athenian heavy-armed infantry now consisted of mercenaries, though the citizens themselves served as rowers on board the fleet; just contrary to what had been the ancient practice, when the ships were manned by foreigners and slaves, and the Athenians themselves were the heavy-armed.

P. 636. Ἐκτερόδυμα.] This seems to me to be the nominative, and Νόμῳ the accusative; and the sense will thus be, "This practice (of exercising constantly naked) appears to me to have weakened greatly that ancient and natural law, by which the pleasures of love, not only among human creatures, but even in the brute creation (mutually belong to the two sexes)." This is a remarkable passage: and Tully judges in the same manner of these exercises. How far the Cretans indulged their passions in the way here mentioned, may be seen in Ephorus, quoted by Strabo x. The purity of manners at Sparta is strongly asserted by Xenophon, De Lacedæmon. Republ. p. 395, and by Plutarch in Lycurgus; but here is a testimony on the other side at least of equal authority.

P. 637. Ὀρχὴν ἐν ἀμαξίαις.] A sort of drunken farces performed in the villages of Attica, during the Dionysia, which seem to be the origin of the ancient comedy and tragedy. Hence the proverb, Ἐξ ἀμαξίας λέγειν: and hence, too, Aristophanes gives the name of Τραγωδία to comedy. Acharnenses, vs. 498, 499, and 627. They seem to have still continued in use in the country.

P. 642. The hearth of our city.] As each private family had its Vesta, to whom the hearth was particularly sacred, so that of the public was seated in the Prytaneum, as we learn from Pindar, Nem. Od. 11; where in most cities a perpetual lamp was kept burning in honour of this goddess: and as every private family of rank had their Πρόξενoi, "public hosts," in several cities of Greece, with whom they were connected by the ties of hospitality, and in whose houses they were lodged and entertained, so cities themselves had a like connexion with each other; and there were public Πρόξενoi nominated to receive and to defray the expenses of such as came on business from other cities in alliance with them.

P. 647. Αἰδῶ.] This is, what we call honour, that is, the fear of shame; and which is left to supply, as well as it can, the place of all the virtues among us. Plato calls this sentiment, in p. 674, θεῖος φόβος, "a divine fear." Montesquieu makes it the grand principle of monarchical governments, in L'Esprit des Loix, i. 6, and in France its effects are most conspicuous.

BOOK II.

HEADS OF THE SECOND DIALOGUE.

P. 653. The great purpose of a right education is, to fix in the mind an early habit of associating its ideas of pleasure and of desire with its ideas of virtue, and those of pain and aversion with that of vice: so that reason, when it comes to maturity, and happy are they with whom, even in their old age, it does come to maturity! may look back with satisfaction, and may approve the useful prejudices instilled into the soul in its infancy.

The early inclination of children to noise and motion is noticed, which, when reduced to order and symmetry, produce harmony and grace, which are two pleasures known only to humankind. The origin of music and of the dance.

P. 655. In what kind of imitation their true beauty consists. Every sound, or movement, or attitude, which naturally accompanies and expresses any virtue, or any laudable endowment of mind and of body, is beautiful, as the contrary is deformed and unpleasing. The error of such as make pleasure the sole end of these arts.

Reasons for the diversity of men's taste and judgment in them are assigned. Some from having been early depraved, and little accustomed to what is lovely, come to approve and take delight in deformity: others applaud what is noble and graceful, but feel no pleasure from it, either because their mind has a natural depravity in it, though their education has been good, or because their principles are right, but their habits and practice have not been conformable to them. The danger of this last defect is stated, when men delight in what their judgment disapproves.

P. 657. The restraint, which ought to be laid on poets in all well-disciplined states, is named. Musicians in Egypt¹ were confined by law, even from the remotest antiquity, to certain simple species of melody, and the painters and sculptors to some peculiar standards for their measures and attitudes, from which they were not to deviate.

P. 658. A reflection on the usual wrong determinations of the persons appointed to judge of their musical and poetical entertainments at Athens, who, though they took an oath to decide impartially, were biased, either through fear or from the affectation of popularity, by the opinion of the crowd; whereas they ought to have considered themselves as masters and directors of the public taste. From this weakness arose the corruption of their theatrical entertainments. In Italy and in Sicily the victory was adjudged by the whole audience to that poet who had the greatest number of hands held up for him.

P. 659. The manners, exhibited in a drama to the people, ought always to be better than their own.

P. 662. The morality inculcated by the poets, even in Sparta and in Crete, where all innovations were by law forbidden, was defective enough. What sentiments they ought to inspire. Plato's² great principles are explained, namely, that happiness is inseparable from virtue and misery from wickedness, and that the latter is rather an error of the judgment than of the will.

P. 663. If these opinions were actually as false, as they are immutably founded on truth, yet a wise lawgiver would think himself obliged to inculcate them as true, by every method possible.

¹ This will account for the little improvement the Egyptians ever made in the fine arts, though they were perhaps the inventors of them: for undoubtedly the advancement and perfection of these things, as well as their corruption, are entirely owing to liberty and innovation.

² Aristotle looked upon this as the distinguishing part of Plato's doctrine; as we see from a fragment of his elegy to Eudemus, preserved in Olympiodorus's commentary on the Gorgias.

It is easy to persuade men, even of the most absurd fiction; how much more of an undoubted truth!

P. 664. The institution of the three choruses, which are to repeat in verse, accompanied with music and with dances, these great principles of society, and to fix them in the belief of the public: the first chorus is composed of boys under eighteen, and sacred to the Muses; the second, from that age to thirty, and sacred to Apollo; the third, to Bacchus, consisting of all from thirty to sixty years of age.

P. 666. The use of wine is forbidden to boys: it is allowed, but very moderately, to men under thirty; after that age, with less restraint: the good effects of it in old age are mentioned.

P. 667. The principles and qualifications which are required in such as are fit to judge of poetry, and of the other imitative arts.

P. 669. Instrumental music by itself, which serves not to accompany the voice, is condemned, as uncertain and indefinite in its expression. The three arts of poetry, of music, and of the dance, (or action,) were not made to be separated.

P. 671. The regulation of entertainments, with the manner of presiding at them, is enforced; without which the drinking of wine ought not to be permitted at all, or in a very small degree.

NOTES ON THE GREEK TEXT.

P. 658. It is here said, that puppet-shows and jugglers' tricks are best accommodated to the taste of young children; as comedy is to that of bigger boys, tragedy to that of young men, and of the women of the better sort, and of the bulk of the people in general, and the rhapsodi to that of the older and wiser sort.

P. 665. After practising their voices.] The singers in these choruses were subjected to a course of abstinence and of physic, for a considerable time before they put their voices to the trial. See Antipho. Orat. de Cæde Choreut.

BOOK III.

HEADS OF THE THIRD DIALOGUE.

P. 676. The immense antiquity of the earth, and the innumerable changes it has undergone in the course of ages. Mankind are generally believed to have been often destroyed, a very small remnant excepted, by inundation and by pestilence.

The supposition of a handful of men, probably shepherds, who were feeding their cattle on the mountains, and were there preserved with their families from a general deluge, which had overwhelmed all the cities and inhabitants of the country below.

P. 677. The destruction of arts and sciences, with their slow and gradual revival among this infant society, is nobly described.

P. 680. The beginnings of government: the paternal way first in use, which he calls the justest of all monarchies. Assemblies of different families agree to descend from the mountain-tops, and to settle in the hill-country below them; and as each of them has a head or a prince of its own, and customs in which it has been brought up, it will be necessary to describe certain laws in common, and to settle a kind of senate, or of aristocracy.

P. 683. The causes of the increase and declension of states, are exemplified in the history of Sparta, Messene, and Argos. The original league between the three kingdoms founded by the Heraclidæ, and the mutual engagements entered into by the several kings and by their people, are stated.

P. 684. The easiness of establishing an equality of property in a new conquest, which is so difficult for a legislator to accomplish, who would give a better form to a government already established.

P. 688. States are destroyed, not so much for the want of valour and of conduct, as for the want of virtue, which only is true wisdom. The greatest and the most pernicious of all ignorance is, when we do not love what we approve.

P. 691. Absolute power, unaccountable to any and uncontrolled, is not to be supported by any mortal man. The aiming at this was the destruction of the Argive and Messenian monarchs. That which probably preserved the Lacedæmonian state, was the originally lodging the regal power in the hands of two; then the institution of the senate by Lycurgus; and lastly, that of the Ephori by Theopompus. Had the three kingdoms been united and governed in the Spartan manner, the Persian king would never have dared to invade Greece: his repulse was entirely due to the Athenians and Lacedæmonians, and not to the common efforts of the Greeks.

P. 693. The two great forms of government, from which all the rest are derived, are monarchy and democracy: Persia is an example of the first carried to its height, and Athens an example of the latter. The best constitution is formed out of both.

P. 694. The reason of the variations observable in the Persian power is given; the different administration of different princes, who succeeded one another, and the cause of it, is accounted for from their education. The care of Cyrus's children, while he was abroad in the field, was trusted entirely to the women, who bred them up in high notions of that grandeur to which they were to succeed, and in the effeminate and luxurious manners of the Medes.

Darius, who succeeded them, had been bred as a private soldier, and he restored the declining empire to its former greatness. Xerxes, his son, brought up as great princes usually are, by his folly weakened it again, and ever since it has been growing worse and worse.

P. 696. Honour is the proper reward of virtue only; in what manner it ought to be distributed in a well-regulated state.

P. 697. The impossibility is stated of any government's subsisting long, where the people are enemies to the administration, which, where despotism in its full extent prevails, must always be the case.

P. 698. A picture of the reverse of this, a complete democracy, as at Athens. The constitution of that state was different before the Persian invasion. The reasons for their distinguished bravery on that occasion. An account of the change introduced in their music, and the progress of liberty, or rather of licence, among them.

P. 701. The great aim of a legislator is to inspire liberty, wisdom, and concord. Clinias, being appointed with nine other citizens to superintend and to form a body of laws for a new colony they are going to settle, asks advice of the Athenian and Lacedæmonian strangers on that head.

NOTE ON THE GREEK TEXT.

P. 677. 'Ο, τι μὲν γὰρ μυριάκις.] I imagine he means to say, "For, without supposing some such destruction as this, how can we account for all the useful arts among mankind, invented, as it were but yesterday, or, at farthest, not above two thousand years old? It is impossible that men in those times should have been utterly ignorant of all which had passed so many thousand ages, unless all records, and monuments, and remains of their improvements and discoveries had perished." Compare Lucret. v. 329.

BOOK IV.

HEADS OF THE FOURTH DIALOGUE.

P. 704. The advantages and disadvantages arising from the situation of a city, and the great difficulty of preserving the constitution and the morals of a maritime and trading state, are described.

P. 706. The manner of carrying on a war by sea is unworthy of a brave and free people; it impairs their valour, depends too much on the lower and more mechanic arts, and is hardly ever decisive. The battles of Artemisium and of Salamis could not have preserved Greece, as it has been commonly thought, from the Persians, had they not been defeated in the action at Plataeæ.

P. 708. The difficulties which attend new colonies, if sent out by a single city, are stated: they will more hardly submit to a new discipline, and to laws different from those of their native country: but then they concur more readily in one design, and act with more strength and uniformity among themselves. If they are collected from various states, they are weak and disjointed, but more apt to receive such forms and impressions as a legislator would give them.

The constitution of states and of their laws is owing more to nature, or to chance, or to the concurrence of various accidents, than to human foresight: yet the wise lawgiver will not therefore despair, but will accommodate his art to the various circumstances and opportunities of things. The mariner cannot command the winds and the waves, yet he can watch his advantages, and make the best use possible of both, for the expedition and security of his voyage.

P. 709. The greatest advantage which a lawgiver can ever meet with is, when he is supported by an arbitrary prince, young, sober, and of good understanding, generous and brave; the second lucky opportunity is, when he can find a limited monarch of like disposition to concur in his designs; the third is, when he can unite himself to the leading men in some popular government; and the fourth and most difficult is, in an oligarchy.

P. 711. The character and manners of a whole people, in a despotic government, are easily changed by the encouragement and by the example of their prince.

P. 712. The best governments are of a mixed kind, and are not reducible to any of the common forms. Thus those of Crete and of Sparta were neither tyrannical, nor monarchical, nor aristocratical, nor democratical, but had something of all these.

P. 713. The fable of the Saturnian age is introduced, when the gods or dæmons in person reigned over mankind. No mortal nature is fit to be trusted with an absolute power of commanding its fellow-creatures: and therefore the law, that is, pure reason, divested of all human passions and appetites, the part of man which most resembles the divinity, ought alone to be implicitly obeyed in a well-governed state.

P. 715. The first address to the citizens of the new colony, is to inculcate the belief of providence and of divine justice, humility, moderation, obedience to the laws, and piety to the gods and to parents: this should be by way of procemium to the laws; for freemen are not to be treated like slaves; they are to be taught and to be persuaded, before they are threatened and punished.

P. 721. The laws of marriage, and the reasons and inducements to observe them, are stated.

P. 722. The necessity and the nature of general and of particular introductions are stated.

NOTES ON THE GREEK TEXT.

P. 704. The great advantage of a maritime power with respect to its influence, its commerce and riches, its politeness of manners and language, and the enjoyment of every pleasure and convenience of life, are admirably explained by Xenophon in Athen. Republ. p. 201, who considers it in every light, in which Montesquieu and the best modern political writers would do. But Plato extended his views farther. He never regarded statesmanship as the art of preserving mankind in a certain form of society, or of securing their property or their pleasures, or of enlarging their power, unless so far as all these were consistent with the preservation of their virtue, and of that happiness which is the natural result of it. Isocrates, in Panathen. p. 256, is constrained to own, that when Athens became a great naval power, she was forced to sacrifice her good order and morals to her ambition; although he justifies her for doing so from necessity; but in the Orat. on Peace, p. 174, he speaks his mind more freely, and shows that the dominion of the sea was every way the ruin of the Athenians, and afterwards of the Lacedæmonians.

P. 714. Conducive to the continuance of its own power.] This was the doctrine of Thrasymachus, and it is in appearance that of Montesquieu in his Esprit des Loix; but this great man did not dare to speak his mind, in a country almost despotically governed, without disguise. Let any one see the amiable picture which Montesquieu draws of freer governments, and, in contrast to it, his idea of a court, and they will not be at a loss to know his real sentiments. That constitution and policy which is founded, as he says himself, on every virtue, must be the only one worthy of human nature.

BOOK V.

HEADS OF THE FIFTH DIALOGUE.

P. 726. After showing the reason of that duty, which men owe to the gods and to their parents, he comes to that, which we owe to ourselves; and first, of the reverence due to our own soul; that it consists not in flattering its vanity, nor indulging its pleasures, nor in soothing its indolence, nor in satisfying its avarice.

P. 729. The second honours are due to our body, whose perfection is not placed in excess of strength, of bulk, of swiftness, of beauty, nor even of health, but in a mediocrity of all these qualities; for a redundancy, or a deficiency, in any one of them is always prejudicial to the mind.

The same holds with regard to fortune. The folly of heaping up riches for our children is exposed, as the only valuable inheritance which we can leave them is a respect for virtue. The reverence due to youth is inculcated. True education consists not in precept, but in example.

The duty to relations and to friends: strict justice, hospitality, and compassion, are due to strangers and foreigners, but above all to suppliants.

What is that habit of the mind which best becomes a man of honour and a good citizen. Veracity is the prime virtue. Justice consists in this; not only to do no injury, but to prevent others from doing any, and to assist the magistrate in punishing those who commit them. Temperance and wisdom: the persons who possess these or any other virtues deserve our praise; those who impart them to others, and multiply their influence, are worthy of double honours. The use of emulation in a state: the hatefulness of envy and detraction.

P. 731. Spirit and indignation are virtues, when employed against crimes and vices, which admit of no other cure than extreme severity: yet they are not inconsistent with lenity and tender compassion, when we consider that no man is voluntarily wicked, and that the fault is in his understanding, and not in his intention. The blindness of what is called self-love. Excessive joy and sorrow are equally condemned.

P. 733. A life of virtue is preferable to any other, even with respect to its pleasures. This passage is admirable.

P. 736. The method of purgation requisite in forming a society, in order to clear it of its noxious parts, either by punishments, or by sending out colonies.

P. 737. The number of citizens limited. Equal divisions of lands among them. The institution of temples and sacred rites, in which nothing of novelty is to be permitted nor the slightest alteration made; but ancient opinions and traditions are to be religiously followed. Festivals and general assemblies serve to familiarize the citizens to one another, and to bring the whole people acquainted with the temper and character of each particular man.

P. 739. The recommendation of his first scheme of government laid down in his Republica, v., p. 462, in which all things are in common; and the whole state, their possessions, their families, their passions, are so united as that they may all act together, like the faculties of a single person. The present scheme comes next to it in perfection.

The number of the shares allotted to the citizens is never to be diminished nor increased. Each man is to choose one among his sons who is to succeed to his portion; the rest to be given in adoption to those who have none of their own. The supreme magistrate is to preside over this equality, and to preserve it. If the number of children exceed the number of shares, he may send out a colony; if it fall short, he may, in cases of great necessity, introduce the sons of foreigners. No alienation of lands to be permitted.

P. 741. The increase of fortune by commerce is to be prohibited, and the use of gold or silver small money, of a species not valued, nor in request with other people, only permitted for the ordinary uses of life. The common coin of Greece is to be in the hands of the public, or employed only on occasion of an embassy, or of an expedition into foreign states. No private person may go abroad without leave of the government; and if he bring back with him any foreign money, he must deposit it in the hands of the magistrate, or he, and all who are privy to the concealment, shall forfeit twice the value and incur disgrace.

P. 742. No securities shall be given among citizens in any case; no fortune paid on a marriage; no money lent on interest.

The folly of a legislator who thinks of making a great, a flourishing, a rich, and a happy state, without regard to the virtue of the inhabitants.

P. 743. The inconsistency of great wealth and of great virtue. The good men will never acquire any thing by unjust means, nor ever refuse to be at any expense on decent and honest occasions. He, therefore, who scruples not to acquire by fair and by unfair means, and will be at no expense on any occasion, must naturally be thrice as rich as the former. A good man will not lavish all he has in idle pleasures and prodigality; he will not therefore be very poor. Business and acquisition ought to employ no more of our time than may be spared from the improvement of our mind and of our body.

P. 744. A colony cannot be formed of men perfectly equal in point of fortune: it will be therefore necessary to divide the citizens into classes according to their circumstances, that they may pay impositions to the public service in proportion to them. The wealthier members are also, cæteris paribus, to be preferred before others to offices and dignities of expense; which will bring every one's fortune gradually to a level.

Four such classes to be instituted: the first worth the value of his land; the fourth, four times as much. Above or below this proportion no one is to go, on pain of forfeiture and disgrace: therefore, the substance of every man is to be publicly enrolled, under the inspection of a magistracy.

P. 745. The division of the country. Every man's lot is to consist of two half-shares, the one near the city, the other near the frontier: every one also is to have two houses, likewise within the city, the one near the midst of it, the other near the walls. The country is to be divided into twelve tribes, and the city into as many regions; and each of them to be dedicated to its several divinity.

P. 746. An apology for this scheme, which to some will seem impracticable.

P. 747. The great difference of climates and of situations, and the sensible effects which they produce, not on the bodies alone, but on the souls of men, are stated.

[It is matter of just but unavailing regret that Mr. Gray proceeded no further in his analysis and annotations on the books of Plato De Legibus. The editor had once intended to endeavour to analyse the remaining five books; but, on the maturest consideration, a respect for the reader and for the memory of Mr. Gray prevented his attempting to offer any writing of his own, as a continuation of the work of so great and so consummate a master.

Perhaps, indeed, the reader may be inclined to consider this fragment in that point of view in which the elder Pliny, in language of refined eloquence, speaks of some productions of ancient art, as peculiarly interesting from the very circumstance of their being left unfinished; "In lenocinio commendationis dolor est manūs, dum id ageret, extinctæ."—EDITOR.]

THE EPISTLES.

DIODEGENES Laertius, who lived probably about the time of Septimius Severus, in the catalogue he gives us of Plato's works, counts thirteen epistles, and enumerates their titles, by which they appear to be the same as those which we now have. Yet we are not thence to conclude them to be all genuine alike. Fictions of this kind are far more ancient than that author's time; and his judgment and accuracy were not sufficient to distinguish the true from the false, as plainly appears from those palpable forgeries, the letters of the seven sages, which yet easily passed upon him as genuine.

EPISTLE I. OL. 103, 2.

This letter is not from Plato, but from his favourite scholar, the famous Dion; nor is it possible that the philosopher himself could have any hand in it, he being with Dionysius at Syracuse, as he tells us himself, when Dion was forced away, and continuing there some time after. It is sent by Baccheus, who had conducted Dion on his way, together with a sum of money, which Dionysius had ordered to be given to him for his expenses, which he returns to the tyrant with much contempt. The spirit of it and the sentiments are not amiss; and yet it is not very consistent with the indignation which Dion must have felt, and with the suddenness of the occasion, to end his letter with three scraps of poetry, though never so well applied. To say the truth, I much doubt of this epistle, and the more so as it contradicts a fact in Plutarch, who assures us that at the very time when Dion was hurried away, his friends were permitted to load two ships with his wealth and furniture, and to transport them to him in Peloponnesus; besides which, his revenues were regularly remitted to him, till Plato went into Sicily for the last time, which was at least six years after.

EPISTLE II. OL. 105, 1.

This epistle appears to have been written soon after Plato's return from his third voyage to Syracuse, and the interview which he had with Dion at the Olympic games, which he himself mentions, Epist. vii. p. 350, and in this place also. Archedemus, who brought the letter from Dionysius, and returned with this answer, was a friend and follower of Archytas, the Pythagorean of Tarentum, as stated in Epist. vii. p. 339, p. 521, but was himself probably a Syracusan; at least he had a house in that city where Plato was lodged, after he had been turned out of the citadel, as shown in p. 349. He was sent on board a ship of war, with Dionysius's letters of invitation to Plato, wherein he pressed him to come the third time into Sicily, as a person well known and much esteemed by the philosopher, and he is mentioned as present in the gardens of the palace at an interview which Plato had with Dionysius, about three weeks before he returned home again. See Epist. iii. p. 319.

EPISTLE III. OL. 105, 4.

This epistle, like those to the friends of Dion afterwards, was apparently written to be made public, and is a justification of Plato's conduct, as well as an invective against the cruelty and falsehood of Dionysius. The beginning of the letter is a reproach, the more keen for being somewhat disguised; and in the rest of it he observes no longer any measures with the tyrant: whence I conclude that it was written after Dion's expedition against him was professedly begun, and perhaps after his entry into Syracuse, particularly from p. 315. But now that I have taught Dion to do these very things, &c.

EPISTLE IV. OL. 105, 4.

This was written probably the same year with the former, or the beginning of the next, on account of those differences which Dion had with Heraclides and his uncle Theodotes, who at last drove him out of Syracuse: their history may be seen in the 7th Epistle, and in Plutarch.

EPISTLE V. OL. 103, 4.

Perdiccas, the second son of Amyntas, succeeded to the crown of Macedon, after the death of his brother-in-law, Ptolemy of Alorus, OL 103, 4. There seem to have been ancient ties of hospitality and of friendship between the royal family of Macedon, from Archelaus's time, and the principal literati of Athens. Plato here recommends his friend and scholar, Euphræus, a native of Oreus in Eubœa, to be of Perdiccas's council, and his secretary. He grew into the highest favour with Perdiccas, and was trusted with the entire management of all his affairs. He used his power arbitrarily enough. Caristius, of Pergamus, quoted by Athenæus, xi. p. 506, and 508, gives the following instance of it, that he would not suffer any one to sit at the king's table who was ignorant of geometry or of philosophy. And yet to Plato and to Euphræus did the great Philip of Macedon owe his succession to the kingdom, as Speusippus writes in a letter to Philip reproaching him with his ingratitude, for by them was his brother Perdiccas persuaded to bestow on him some districts as an appanage, where, after his death, Philip was enabled to raise troops and to recover the kingdom. Euphræus, upon the death of his master, having rendered himself hateful to the principal Macedonians, was obliged, as it seems, to retire into his own country; where, soon after Philip was settled on the throne, Parmenio was ordered to murder him.

Ficinus and H. Stephanus, finding in the margin of some manuscripts this fifth epistle ascribed to Dion and not to Plato, seem inclined to admit that correction, but without reason. Plato has in his other undoubted epistles spoken of himself, as he has done in this, in the third person. He is here apologizing for his recommendation of a man who was to have a share in the administration of a kingdom. Some may object, says he, "How should Plato be a competent judge, he who has never meddled in the government of his own country, nor thought himself fit to advise his own citizens?" He answers this by showing his reasons for such a conduct; but the last sentence is not at all clear. The thought is the very same with that in the 7th Epistle, p. 330, but some principal word seems to be omitted; perhaps after δράσας δὲ should be inserted ἰατρικὸν ἀνδρα, or ἰατρὸν ἀγαθόν.

EPISTLE VI.

This letter, cited by Clemens Alexandrinus in Strom. v., and by Origen contra Celsum vi., Menage, in Diog. Laert. iii., tells us is no longer extant among the epistles of Plato, and is supposed to be a fiction of the Christians. Bentley, in Phileluther. Lips., had reason to wonder at the negligence of that critic, who did not know that the epistle was still preserved: and he adds, that there is no cause to believe the letter not to be genuine, as there are passages in the Dialogues themselves as favourable to the Christian opinions as any thing in this epistle. The passage which those Fathers cite is at the end of the letter, and has indeed much the air of a forgery. I do not know any passages in the Dialogues equally suspicious; nor do I see why it might not be tacked to the end of an undoubtedly original letter: there is nothing else here but what seems genuine.

Erastus and Coriscus¹ were followers of Plato, and born at Scepsis, a city of Troas, seated on Mount Ida, not far from the sources of the Scamander and of the Æsepus; they seem to have attained a principal authority in their little state, and Plato recommends to them here to cultivate the friendship of Hermias their neighbour, and sovereign of Assus and Atarneus, two strong towns on the coast of the Sinus Adramyttenus near the foot of Ida. Coriscus had also been scholar to Plato, though an eunuch, and slave to Eubulus, a Bithynian and a banker. His master, having found means to erect a little principality in the places before mentioned, made Hermias his heir. He gave his niece Pythias in marriage to Aristotle, who lived with him near three years, till Ol. 107, 4, about which time Memnon, the Rhodian general to the Persian king, by a base treachery got him into his hands, and sending him to court he was there hanged. See Strabo xiii. p. 610, and Suidas. Aristotle wrote his epitaph, and a beautiful ode or hymn in honour to his memory, which are still extant.

EPISTLE VII. OL. 105, 4.

Callippus, after the treacherous murder of Dion, was attacked in Syracuse by the friends of that great man, but they were worsted by him and his party; and being driven out they fled to the Leontini, and he maintained his power in the city for thirteen months, as we learn from Diodor. Sic. xvi. 36; until Hipparinus, nephew to Dion, and half-brother to Dionysius, found means to assemble troops; and while Callippus was engaged in the siege of Catana, he, at the head of Dion's party, re-entered Syracuse, and kept possession of it for two years. At the end of which time, Hipparinus in a drunken debauch was assassinated, but by whom I do not find; and his younger brother, Nysæus, succeeded to his power, and made the most arbitrary use of it for near five years; when Dionysius, returning from Locri, as stated by Plutarch in the Life of Timoleon, became once more master of Syracuse, and, as it seems, put Nysæus to death.

Who were the friends of Dion to whom Plato writes, it is hard to enumerate. The principal were his son Hipparinus, and his sister's son, likewise called Hipparinus, and his brother, Megacles, if living, though I rather imagine he had been killed in the course of the war before the death of Dion; and Nicetas, who afterwards was tyrant of the Leontines.

Plato was about forty years of age when first he came to Syracuse. His fortieth year was Ol. 97, 4.

NOTES ON THE GREEK TEXT.

P. 324. Relations and acquaintances.] Critias, a man as remarkable for the brightness of his parts as for the depravity of his manners and for the hardness of his heart, was Plato's second cousin by the mother's side; and Charmides, the son of Glauco, was his uncle, brother to his mother Perictione. The first was one of the Thirty, the latter one of the Ten, and both were slain in the same action. Plato's family were deeply engaged in the oligarchy; for Calleschrus, as we learn from Lysias in Eratosthen. p. 215, his great-uncle, had been a principal man in the Council of Four Hundred. (Ol. 92, l.) It is a strong proof of Plato's honesty and resolution, that his nearest relations could not seduce him to share in their power or in their crimes at that age. His uncle, though a great friend of Socrates and of a very amiable character, had not the same strength of mind.

Ib. Against one of the citizens.] The Thirty, during the short time of their magistracy, which was less than a year, put fifteen hundred persons to death, as we learn from Isocrates in Areopag. p. 153, most of whom were innocent, and they obliged about five thousand more to fly. The prisoner here meant was Leo, the Salaminian. See Apolog. p. 32.

P. 328. And not as some imagined.] Plato had been most severely reflected upon for passing his time at the court of Dionysius. Athenæus, whose book is highly valuable for the numberless fragments of excellent authors, now lost, of which it is composed, has preserved abundance of scandal on this head, in xi. p. 507. This and the third Epistle are Plato's justification of himself, and are written with a design to clear his character.

P. 342.] I know not what to say to this very uncommon opinion of Plato, that no philosopher should put either his system, or the method of attaining to a knowledge of it, into writing. The arguments he brings in support of it are obscure beyond my comprehension. All I conceive is, that he means to show how inadequate words are to express our ideas, and how poor a representation even our ideas are of the essence of things. What he says on the bad effects which a half-strained and superficial knowledge produces in ordinary minds, is certainly very just and very fine. See the Phædrus, p. 274—276, where he compares all written arts to the gardens of Adonis, which look gay and verdant, but, having no depth of earth, soon wither away. Lord Bacon, in Nov. Organ. i. 43 and 59, expresses himself strongly on this head. See Book i. App. 43 and 50, Bohn's Edition.

EPISTLE VIII. Ol. 105, 4.

From this Epistle, p. 364, it appears that Plato and Herodotus make Lycurgus the author of the institution of the Ephori, and not Theopompus, as later writers do. See Aristot. Politic. v. c. 11.

NOTES ON THE GREEK TEXT.

P. 353. Opici.] The ancient inhabitants of Campania, particularly that country which lies round the Bay of Naples. See Aristot. Politic. viii. 10. In a passage cited from Aristotle by Dionys. Halic. i. p. 57, he seems to extend the name to all the inhabitants of that coast to the south of the Tuscan. Aristotle mentions the Opici as the same people with the Ausones. But Polybius judged them to be a distinct people. See Strabo, v. p. 242. The Siculi probably might speak the same tongue, having been driven out of Italy, as we learn from Thucyd. vi., by these Opici some years after the Trojan war, and settling in a part of this island. This name grew into a term of reproach, which the more polished Greeks bestowed upon the Romans, as Cato the censor complains in Pliny, xxix. 1, "Nos quoque dictant barbaros, et spurcius nos quam alios Opicos appellatione ferdant;" and in time it became a Latin word to signify barbarous and illiterate.

P. 355. My own son.] This directly contradicts both Plutarch and Cornelius Nepos, who particularly describe the tragical end of Hipparinus, Dion's son, when just arrived at man's estate. All that story, and the apparition which preceded it, must be false, if this epistle be genuine, which I see no reason, but this, for doubting. The only way to reconcile the matter is, by supposing that Plato might here mean the infant son of Dion, who was born after his father's death; and who was not yet destroyed by Hicetas, for Plutarch intimates, that he continued to treat both the child and its mother well for a considerable time after the expulsion of Callippus. What makes against this supposition is, that in the end of this letter, p. 357, he speaks of Dion's son, as of a person fit to judge of, and to approve, the scheme of government which he has proposed to all parties.

EPISTLE IX.

NOTE ON THE GREEK TEXT.

P. 358. Each of us is born not for himself alone, &c.] This fine sentiment is quoted by Cicero De Officiis, i. 7, and again, De Finibus, ii. 14, so that the 7th, the 4th, and this epistle, are of an authority not to be called in question.

EPISTLE XII.

This epistle is marked in the first editions of Plato as spurious: and so it is in a Vatican MS. Serranus sees mysteries here, where there are none. The same is said also of the 13th Epistle: but there seems no reason for it.

EPISTLE XIII. OL. 303, 3 or 4.

In order of time this is the second epistle in the collection. It is marked in the MSS. as spurious, and, I must own, it does little honour to Plato's memory; yet it is sure that Plutarch esteemed it genuine. He cites T. i. p. 966, E., a passage from it relating to Areté, the wife of Dion; and in T. ii. p. 474, D., he mentions the character of Helico the Cyzicenean, which is to be found here. I know not what to determine; unless we suppose some parts of it to be inserted afterwards by some idle sophist who was an enemy to Plato's character. It is observable, that Plutarch, in the place last mentioned, says it was written at the end of the epistle, whereas the words alluded to are here not far from the beginning. Possibly some fragments of the true epistle might remain, which were patched together and supplied by some trifler.

NOTE ON THE GREEK TEXT.

P. 362. The expensive linen of Amorgus.] The fine linen of Amorgos, of which they made tunics for women, was transparent. See Aristoph. Lysist. vss. 46, 150, and 736, where the Scholia call the plant of which the thread was made, ἡ λινωκαλάμη, and say, that it was in fineness ὡς τὴν βύσσον, ἢ τὴν κάτρασον: they were dyed of a bright red colour.
